NEW BOOKS.

The annual (if not semi-annual) business of "putting things to rights" in house and office, together with a little other spring business, etc., etc.—for when did a lazy man need an excuse for neglecting work?—have prevented me from preparing any detailed notice of new books received; and the pile keeps growing higher all the time, so that I will have a fine job of it soon. Br. Price has sent along copies of Layman's Legacy, Vol. 2; Williamson's Defence and Exposition of Universalism (a capital book, by the bye;) and Scripture

Scales, (a beautiful and expressive picture for framing!)—and Br. Tompkins has sent along a new lot of Chapin's Lectures to Young Men, and of Br. J. G. Adams' Christian's Triumph, including death scenes of believers—all of which I do hope our readers will buy and read for themselves, whether I find time to notice them at length or not. I do not want to write more than I must, so please call at Br. Hutchinson's Book-store, and take particular notice of all the new books for your selves—I am sure you will purchase freely if you be gin to examine them carefully.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The summer term of the schools will commence on Wednesday the 27th inst.

Mr. Edwin J. Stebbins has been appointed by the Executive Committee to receive and disburse moneys for such young students as the parents or guardians may wish to remit to him with directions for the expenditure and application of the same.

D. PIXLEY, Secretary.

BOARDING AT THE INSTITUTE.

Mrs. Miner, whose contemplated removal to Clinton, from New Haven, Conn., we noticed some time since, has opened her boarding house for the reception of pupils of the Institute as boarders. She will receive, and take kindly charge of such young misses as may be confided to her care, on reasonable terms.

I again repeat, that Mrs. Miner will be found every way qualified to discharge the arduous duties of a temporary guardian of young ladies with great kindness, propriety and conscientious correctness. I cordially commend her to the confidence of our friends who may wish such a guardian for their daughters during their attendance at the Institute.

Her terms made known on application at her residence near the Female Department of the Institute.

Miss Barker, the Principal of the Female Department continues to receive as boarders, young ladies—pupils under her charge—on moderate terms.

THEORY AND PRACTICE.

A consistent and perfect theory is truly beautiful and admirable. The mathematician solves for his own pleasure, the most intricate problems—problems, which at first might appear absurd, and contradictory, but when explicated, prove to involve truths of the greatest importance. The astronomer observes the order and harmony of the heavenly bodies in their orbits, and sees in their magnificent revolutions, the wonderful workings of an incomprehensible mind. Viewing our own earth he sees himself wafted with it through the regions of space, at a velocity almost incalculable; travelling onward, and still onward, until finally, he arrives again at the starting point, not to stop, but to continue on forages? The chemist can dissolve the air into its simple elements, and again unite them and form a respirable breathing fluid. He can separate the component parts of water, and by his arch skill can, with those parts, form water again. The botanist can roam through nature's delightful garden and collect from her heterogeneous bed of roses, specimens of every kind, and deposit them carefully among the numerous charms of his rich herbarium. The philosopher delights in the examination of nature's laws, the laws of motion, of light, heat, and electricity.

But what of all these, if no practical good were to be derived from them? What will these marvellous operations of the human mind effect, if by its workings, the human race is not benefited?

if they are only charmed, their senses dazzled by splendid experiments? But from all this knowledge which has been acquired by the ingenuity and assiduity of mind, the world has received the most numerous and the richest blessings. Why? Because theory has been reduced to practice, agriculture, manufacture, navigation, and all the multifarious machinery of the civilized world, owe their perfections and utility to correct theory and its application to the exigences of human life.—Without this application, science could only please the fancy—present an arena in which intellect might revel, but which would be productive of no positive good to any living creature.—Like the aeronautic car which the treacherous and inconstant wind wafts into the clouds, but can not be guided by man's utmost dexterity to any particular point, and is consequently useless, so all science, however complicated, grand or sublime, unless it results in some practical good, is no real benefit to our race.

Thus it is with our religion. Though our theory may be based upon the immutable foundation of eternal truth, supported by the testimony of all the prophets, Jesus Christ and his apostles, though we may believe in a God of infinite goodness; "that he will punish sin, and put an end to transgression;" that "the way of the transgressor is hard;" though we may have committed to memory all the precepts of our Saviour, yet unless this superhuman and transcendently beautiful theory is reduced to practice, unless we make it the rule of our life, the "man of our counsel," to guide us safely through the dark labyrinths of life, to direct us in our daily avocations, and in the social circle, in our reciprocal obligations as in the sanctuary of our God, it is all empty pagantry, and dazzles but to blind.

Yet how many there are in every denomination of professed Christians, who regard a belief in their peculiar theory, as the life and soul—the essence of all true piety and religion! How many of those who "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before God," are expelled from the church because they do not believe, and are not in all things "after the strictest sect." Thus, faith in certain dogmas is made the criterion by which Christianity is recognized! This is wrong—intrinsically wrong. Virtue and morality are the life's blood of Christianity. True religion and practical piety are not derived from a mere knowledge of an abstract theory, or from wild speculation in biblical disquisitions, but rather result from the benevolent effusions and aspirations of a pure, charitable disposition. And, though entertaining and cherishing correct ideas of God and his attributes, and embracing "that faith which was once delivered to the saints," will have a tendency to expand the soul and develop the moral powers of the mind, yet a knowledge and profession of that faith is not an infallible index to a benevolent and Christian heart. The theory should be reduced to practice.

POETRY.

THE PLAYER ON THE HEART.

BY HORATIO HALE.

I can not wake the breathing flute;
 The lyre and harp are dumb to me;
 I can not touch the lover's lute,
 Nor rouse its speaking melody.
 Mute, mute for me the lofty roll
 That fair Cecilia taught to swell;
 But there's a sympathy of soul,
 And I can wake it passing well.
 The merest child in Orphean art
 Can better strike the Doric quill;
 But I can play upon the heart,
 And touch its chords with Magic skill.

A truant boy his task forsook,
 And loitered in the vale adown;
 I found him idle by the brook,
 And warned him of his father's frown.
 Oh, clouded was his laughing eye—
 He sat him down and wept the while;
 I bent to cheer the sobbing boy,
 And whispered of his mother's smile.
 And lo! the sudden clouds depart,
 And lightly bounds he from the rill;
 For I can play upon the heart,
 And touch its chords with magic skill.

A soldier slept in stillness hushed—
 I broke his sleep and whispered "fame!"
 Forth to the battle field he rushed,
 To write in blood a deathless name,
 An infant on its mother's breast,
 He sought to slay in fury wild;
 The madman's arm a word repressed—
 A single name—his own dear child!
 I woke his spirit's gentler part,
 And Mercy spoke—the storm was still;
 For I can play upon the heart,
 And touch its chords with magic skill.

A dying man, with failing breath,
 Abode his hour. I entered in,
 And held before the eye of death
 The long account of crime and sin.
 Wild grew that eye in dark despair,
 And paler waxed that pallid cheek;
 I taught him then, with fervent prayer,
 A Saviour's pard'ning love to seek.
 Oh, welcome now the deadly dart—
 The Christian soul it could not kill,
 So I can play upon the heart,
 And touch its chords with magic skill.

I wooed a maiden in her bower,
 And lowly knelt and proffered gold;
 "Oh, wealth may purchase pomp and power,
 A faithful heart can ne'er be sold."
 I knelt me at her feet again,
 And pleaded love, and only love,
 The heart that scorned a gilded chain,
 Affection's lightest breath could move.
 I saw the pitying tear drop start—
 I felt the bosom's panting thrill;
 Oh, I can play upon the heart
 And touch its chords with magic skill.

CUNNING OF THE SPIDER.

A degree of the marvellous has characterized the stories of the sagacity of this animal that we do not attempt to reach; a simple exhibition of it, however, fell under our observation some two or three days since, which we will relate.—A spider, of moderate size, had fortified himself within a very formidable web—in a corner of our office, where he was suffered to remain, for no other reason than his predilection for musquitoes. His taste for variety, however, was very soon developed. We observed him, a morning or two since, making very rapid preparations to attack an enormous beetle, whose peregrinations had extended into his neighborhood. The web was made fast to two of his legs at the first onset. Mr. Beetle, apparently not altogether satisfied with this "fraternal hug," bade him good morning, and marched off, carrying his chains with him, in doing which he had well nigh demolished the fortress itself. In a few moments however, the beetle repeated his visit. In the meantime, the spider had repaired damages, and was prepared for the reception of the formidable stranger. The web was about eighteen inches from the floor; the spider precipitated himself from it, but stopped suddenly when within about two inches of the floor.—As this feat was again repeated, we have no doubt that it was an experiment to try his cord. At length he threw himself upon the back of the beetle, attached the web to the posterior extremities, and then retreated. Mr. Beetle's suspicions of the purity of the intentions of his long-legged host were now confirmed, and apparently, with no small degree of displeasure, he turned his back upon the spider, the frailty of whose web, notwithstanding his precaution, not interfering in the slightest degree with the dignity of Sir Beetle's measured tread. The spider convinced that open attack was altogether unavailable, resorted to stratagem. With rather an eccentric maneuver, he fastened the attention of Mr. Beetle upon himself, and then commenced a retreat up the surface of a somewhat rough wall. Whether Mr. Beetle mistook this trick of the spider for politeness, under the impression that he was conducting him to his castle, or whether it was a matter of sheer curiosity that induced him to follow his betrayer, we are not able to decide; it is sufficient that the decoy succeeded. Mr. Spider was vastly civil to Sir Beetle; court language was used on the occasion, without doubt, until they reached a point directly over the web, when, like another Roderick Dhu, he threw off his disguise, and, in a trice, mounted upon the back of Sir Beetle, disengaged his feet from the wall, and then tumbled together into the web. With the rough legs of the beetle, and being unable to obtain foothold, extrication was impossible, escape hopeless; he surrendered at discretion, and on the following evening, was found dead in his chains.

THE SAILOR SHIPWRECKED ON LAND.—If an honest heart beats in ones bosom more warmly than another, it is in that of the brave American tar. Whether it be the many dangers that beset him on a perilous voyage, or a sense of loneliness while rocked upon the mountain wave, that leads him to cherish and lock up with sacred care his affections and the better feelings of his nature, and keep them untouched by the scenes of vice and temptation of which he must often be a witness, certain it is, that the American sailor is more sensitive to wrong, and more keenly touched by his misfortune, than any other individual in the world. It may be that his adventurous life, teaching him, as it must, to cling to his shipmates as to his little world—his all strengthens his nobler and kinder feeling, and warms them into livelier action than the more monotonous and peaceful life of the landsman.

A sailor, who had been long absent on a voyage, came into port the other day, and immediately left Boston on a visit to his friends in Vermont, whom he had left in health a number of years before. Upon his arrival at the spot, the light-hearted tar found that they had all died in his long absence. Even the bright-eyed girl whom he had left in all her virgin bloom—and to whom he was betrothed—she who, year after year had anxiously watched for his return, slept beneath the cold sod of the valley!

He retraced his steps, and when we met him on his return he was seated by the road side weeping like a child. A feeling of loneliness had come over the noble hearted fellow that touched a chord in his bosom which all the loneliness of the ocean could not reach. His home desolate—the cherished of his heart, and the loved of his youth: his affianced bride; the sturdy oak and the lily that bloomed in its shade—gone—all gone forever! The sailor was shipwrecked on land, and the bold heart who had withstood the beating of the surge and the mountain waves—who had braved the perils of the deep in the midnight storm without the trembling of a nerve or the blink of an eye—had now lost sight of his polar star, and bitterly wept at the desolation which had come upon him. Such a man has treasures within his bosom above all price—treasures which are the fruits of a noble nature alone, and can be found embedded in none other than an honest man.—Claremont (N. H.) Eagle.

THOUGHTS.—Do sorrows weigh heavy upon your heart?—Cast your eyes upon that cradled infant, whose slumber no troubles discompose, no dreams afflict; you will catch some portion of that breathing innocence, and feel a calm come over your heart. When we visit in the time of misfortune, the scenes inhabited by us in the days of happiness, a something sad seems to exhal from the spot, composed of the memory of past joys, and of the feeling of present ills. What is not here that at such a period you were so happy? and now!—And yet these places are the same: what, then, has changed? ourselves.

The pleasures of youth reproduced by memory in the imagination, are ruins visited by torch-light.

The voice of man revives not like that of the echo: the echo may sleep for centuries in the depth of the desert, and yet respond at once to the call of the traveler: the tomb returns no answering voice.—Chateaubriand.

"Ah! Eliza," said a puritan preacher to a young lady who had just been making her hair into beautiful ringlets,—“ah, Eliza! had God intended your locks to be curled he would have curled them for you.” “When I was an infant,” returned the damsel, “he did, but now I am grown up he thinks I am able to do it myself.”

DEATHS.

In Mc Donough, April 4th, Mrs. LOUISA WILCOX, wife of Mr. Edward L. Wilcox, in the 18th year of her age. A year and a half since we saw the deceased led to the hymenial altar, a happy bride. Health bloomed upon her countenance and she had every prospect before her of a long and useful life. She succeeded in winning the ardent affection and esteem of her acquaintances, but she had little time to enjoy it, ere she was taken to her heavenly Father's mansion, there with angels and archangels, cherubim and seraphim, and all the countless blood-washed throng above, to chant the praises of him whose name and nature, center, circumference, and very essence, is love. Her life exemplified her moral worth and excellence, and her death, Christian confidence and resignation. May the smiles of Him who took little children in his arms and blessed them, rest upon her lovely infant, and may her young and worthy companion, her parents, brothers, sisters, and numerous other relatives and friends, who mourn her untimely exit, realize that freed from the ills and storms of life, she bears the moral image of her Maker in the land of everlasting rest. On the 6th, the writer delivered a discourse at her funeral to a crowded congregation and Elder Hines of the open communion Baptist denomination appropriately aided in the services. J. T. G.

In Unadilla, Otsego county, April 18th, STEPHEN BENTON, Esq. aged 66 years. Esq. B. was one of the oldest settlers of the village in which he resided, having lived there for near 40 years. By his untiring industry he succeeded in acquiring a large estate. He has left behind him a worthy partner, and a respected son and daughter, to enjoy the fruit of his labors. By his solicitations I visited and prayed with him a few days previous to his decease, and in accordance with his dying request, the Episcopal house in that place was opened, and the writer permitted to officiate in it, at his funeral. The congregation was large and the Rev. Mr. Adams, (Episcopalian) kindly assisted us in the services. J. T. G.

In Steuben county, in March last, Mr. EZRA FITCH, aged 67 years. Mr. F. while fording a stream which was swollen by a recent rain, was thrown from his horse and drowned. A Partialist clergyman attended his funeral, and instead of imparting the consolations of the Gospel to the mourning friends, irritated the wound already made in their bleeding bosoms. In consequence of the dissatisfaction of the family of the departed, April 19th, by request, the writer delivered a sermon to that portion of his relatives and his old friends and neighbors who live in Green, Chenango county, where he formerly resided, which was devoutly listened to by a numerous audience. ## A VOICE TO THE MARRIED. TO WIVES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Chap. V.—General Deportment.

"A virtuous woman is man's greatest pride."

It is a happy consideration, that as a general rule, woman is more particular in her conduct, and more correct in her deportment and manners, than man. The native modesty of her nature, and the finer susceptibility of her feelings, restrains her from that roughness and carelessness of demeanor, which is so frequently seen in "the lords of creation." But still woman is liable to err in this respect, much to the injury of her happiness and the happiness of those connected with her.

It evidently is as necessary and important that married ladies should observe as strict rules of deportment as those who are unmarried. Matrimony has undoubtedly wrought many striking changes in their situation and circumstances, but it should effect no change whatever in their deportment, in the modesty of their conduct or the purity of their language. Their demeanor should ever be of that delicate character that a stranger can not determine by their actions, or their conversation, whether they are married or single. There is nothing that strikes more unpleasantly upon my observation than to behold one who had the appearance of being a modest, delicate minded young woman before marriage, become soon after that event, bold and brazen-faced, with little restraint upon her conduct or her tongue. It leads me to suspect at once, that in the former propriety of her manners, she concealed the real nature of her tastes, for a sinister motive, viz: to obtain a husband. And now, when that object has been accomplished, she throws off this appearance, and acts out her real character. If such a change does not warrant these conclusions, then my reading of human actions is erroneous. It is exceedingly disagreeable to take this view of the proceedings of any woman, and it is gratifying to believe that changes of the character to which I have adverted, are observable in but a small minority of cases. But whenever they do occur, they are greatly to the injury of those who exhibit them. Hypocrisy in woman, is if possible, more abhorrent than in man. To be compelled to believe that a female assumes propriety of manners, when she does not in reality possess corresponding emotions in her mind and disposition, is a conclusion of a most painful and repulsive nature to the pure minded. It is pleasant and gratifying to all such, to be satisfied that the modesty and delicacy in word and deed, which they observe in ladies, are not deceitful, but that they are the outward exhibition of the genuine emotions of the soul—the natural fruit of modesty and delicacy pervading and ruling the heart. And such all candid and generous minded men will believe to be the character of every woman's modest deportment, until they perceive strong evidence to the contrary.

The woman who supposes that modesty and delicacy in all her deportment, are not as necessary after marriage as before, is involved in a most lamentable error; and the quicker she corrects this mistake, the better will it be for her respectability and safety. The standard of the married woman's manners should be as highly elevated as that of the single lady. Every thing that calls for delicacy in the latter, equally demands it in the former. If modesty in a young lady is requisite to attract and secure the attentions of a virtuous young man, who may eventually become her husband, modesty will be equally requisite after marriage, to add an indissoluble cement to his love and respect. Nothing will sooner weaken the affection of a husband for his wife, than immodesty and vulgarity in her conduct. No man who is worthy of being a husband, can sincerely love a woman who exhibits characteristics in violation of that delicacy which is ever looked for in a virtuous woman. Hence the wife who supposes that she can throw off from her general demeanor any of that modest reserve which she formerly exhibited, and which was so captivating in the eyes of him who became her husband, will be in danger of pursuing a course destructive alike of his regard and confidence, and of the happiness of married life. At every age of life, in all circumstances and conditions, modesty is one of the highest charms of woman. It gives beauty and attraction to the plainest features, and can not fail of inspiring respect and affection for its possessor. But without modesty, the most dazzling beauty is disgusting and loathsome in the sight of all virtuous minds.

To exhibit and sustain propriety of deportment, there is nothing more essential than self-respect. If we respect ourselves, others will be likely to respect us also. But if we have no respect for ourselves, others will have but little respect for us. These maxims are founded upon the well known operations of human nature. Whoever respect themselves, have in this self-respect, a strong guard to prevent their stooping to any course of conduct which would lower them in their own estimation, or in the estimation of the world. But those who have no self-respect, are without any restraint of this nature, and will be very likely to pursue a course which will gain the disrespect of community. Those who possess an inward, conscientious abhorrence of all improper conduct, are much safer than those who act solely in reference to outward detection. The former will revolt from improprieties, even of the most remote and secret nature. But the latter will not scruple to be guilty of wickedness, if they but feel assured that no detection and exposure will follow. Hence the character of our conduct will depend very much upon the manner in which we estimate ourselves. There is great necessity therefore, that a proper self-respect should be sedulously cultivated by all, and by none more than the wife. To have the confidence of society, of her husband, her children, her domestics, she must so far respect herself in her deportment towards them, as to do nothing calculated to excite their disgust.

Another of the chief ornaments of woman, is a reserved, retiring demeanor, which shrinks from public attraction, or the reckless gaze of the profligate. However necessary and useful a forward and bold deportment, and an insensibility to public scrutiny, may be to man in certain stations, in woman they are blemishes of a serious nature. When woman ceases to blush, she has lost the most attractive quality of her sex. It is evident her sensibilities have acquired a hardness and indifference, which will be construed much to her disadvantage.

This leads me to advert to a subject of some delicacy, yet of much importance. I refer to the practice of ladies becoming public speakers. I have witnessed some instances of this nature in late years, and have heard of many others. It must be confessed that when I have beheld a lady arise and harangue a promiscuous assemblage, it has struck me as unnatural and unfeminine. I will acknowledge that custom and prejudice may have had no small influence in producing this impression. But still, this coming boldly before the stare of a public assembly—this standing unmoved under the eyes of a multitude of people—requires a sternness of character and a deadness of sensibility, so opposed to the shrinking modesty, the retiring delicacy, which is so inwoven with woman's nature, and which to all eyes is so high an ornament to the feminine portion of our race, that it is difficult to reconcile it with propriety and decorum. Every person who has spoken in public, is aware of the peculiar sensations—the desire to shrink back under some covert—which beset a young speaker, when he discovers that he has become the common object upon which the eyes of an audience are riveted. To overcome these emotions requires in most cases years of practice—the feelings, the countenance, the nerves, must undergo a hardening, blunting process, which if not in opposition to true modesty, is not in addition to it. If such is the influence of public speaking on man, with the comparative coarseness of his emotions, what must be its effect upon woman, with all her refined sensibilities? I do not maintain that there may not be cases where it is proper for a lady to speak in public. We read of such instances in the history of the past, and circumstances may warrant similar occurrences in the present and the future. But these should be considered as exceptions to the general rule, which points to man, as the one fitted by his constitution, habits and talents, to become the public mouth-piece of community. While I consider it unfeminine and improper for a woman to address, in public, a promiscuous assembly, I can conceive of no impropriety in her speaking to an audience composed entirely of her own sex. Indeed, I am satisfied that a well informed lady may confer great benefit upon her sex by lecturing before them on topics relative to health and morals, which perhaps, could not, with propriety, be discussed so fully and freely as desirable, before a promiscuous audience. Lectures of this description have recently been delivered by a lady eminent for her extensive knowledge and usefulness, and I hope they may be continued, and others of a like character instituted in the various sections of our country.

It is possible that women have in some instances, put themselves forward in public places and taken part in public transactions, under the promptings of an ambition to rise, to distinction and to shine in the world. But for woman, this is an ambition exceedingly ill directed. An ambitious disposition is a dangerous ingredient of the mind, unless under the strict control of the moral sentiments. It is destructive to peace and contentment, and exposes its votaries to dangers which can not visit the lowly minded.

"Dost thou spurn the humble vale?
Life's proud summits would'st thou scale?
Check thy climbing step, elate,
Evils lurk in felon wait;
Dangers, eagle-pinioned, bold,
Soar around each cliffy hold,
While cheerful peace, with linnet song,
Chants the lowly dells among."

Ambition in woman to be distinguished, is more dangerous than in man. Besides all the dangers to which it will expose her character, it must necessarily lead her attention from that appropriate sphere in which alone she can excite admiration and respect. An ambition to be great has been the ruin of thousands and the source of immense evil. So highly did the poet Cowley fear this disposition, that he exclaimed—

"If ever ambition did my fancy cheat
With any thought so mean as to be great,
Continue, Heaven, still from me to remove
The humble blessings of that life I love!"

Ambition should have but one object, and that should be, to be useful in accordance to our several circumstances and capacities. This is the only ambition that can be properly indulged in the quman heart. The Deity has made it the imperious duty of all, in both sexes, to be as useful as condition and opportunity will possibly admit. If by mingling habitually with the crowd, and taking part in public affairs, a wife can be the most useful, then she should allow her ambition to take this direction, and give it full scope. But if she can be far more useful in the private circle—if she is so constituted by nature, as to be capable of much greater good in superintending the affairs of the household—in making home as comfortable and agreeable as possible for the husband who daily wearies himself that he may obtain wherewith to provide for the support of herself and her family—if she can be of more benefit to mankind in attending to the voice of humanity and the calls of charity, which reach her ears from the poor, the needy, and the helpless—then she will turn her whole attention into these channels, and be ambitious only to excel in the faithful discharge of the duties which may in this manner devolve upon her. This is a question which comes strictly within the province of conscience to decide. I leave it for every wife to determine the course she should pursue in this respect—believing that the most of women will unite in the language of the poet—

"Thou hast a charmed cup, oh Fame!
A draught that mantles high,
And seems to lift this earth-born frame
Above mortality;
Away! to me—a woman—bring
Sweet waters from affection's spring."

In the marriage state it is as important that the wife should strive to exhibit an affable and agreeable deportment to all, as before she took upon herself its obligations. Instead of neglecting this appearance, it should be cultivated to its highest extent. No woman is loved and respected in community, who is cold, exclusive and haughty in her deportment. She will ere long perceive that such conduct is fruitful of unhappiness. For say what we will, the good opinion of all around us is necessary to the comfort and enjoyment of every truly sensitive and delicate mind—so true is the old and homely saying, that "the good will even of a dog, is better than his ill will." And besides this, the prosperity of a man may depend in no small degree upon the manners of his wife. Let a woman be vain and supercilious in her deportment—let her be exclusive and dictatorial in her intercourse with society—let her be haughty and overbearing in her dealings with the poorer classes—and who can not see a thousand ways in which this line of conduct must injure the interest of her husband? But on the contrary, when a woman is polite, affable, social and agreeable to all with whom she meets, of every class and description, it not only promotes her husband's welfare, but acquires the confidence and good will of society, which is more to be prized than precious gems.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.
SECTION V.

The Saviour presented to the Lord.

LUKE ii: 22. And when the days of her purification, according to the law of Moses, were accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem to present him to the Lord,

23 (As it is written in the law of the Lord, every male that openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord.)

24 And to offer a sacrifice, according to that which is said in the law of the Lord, a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons.

LUKE ii: 22. Days of her purification. The days of purification for a male child were thirty-three, and for a female sixty-six. See Lev. xii.

24 To offer a sacrifice. A pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons were the offering for the poor; while the rich were required to offer a lamb of the first year and one young pigeon or turtle dove. See Lev. xii. The offering which the parents of the Saviour presented, proves that they were in moderate circumstances.

Simeon comes into the temple and embraces the Saviour.

LUKE ii: 25. And behold there was a man in Jerusalem whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel; and the Holy Ghost was upon him.

26 And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord's Christ.

27 And he came by the Spirit into the temple: and when the parents brought in the child Jesus to do for him after the custom of the law,

28 Then took he him up in his arms and blessed God, and said,

29 Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word;

30 For mine eyes have seen thy salvation

31 Which thou hast prepared before the face of all people, 32 A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel.

33 And Joseph, and his mother marvelled at those things which were spoken of him.

34 And Simeon blessed them, and said unto Mary his mother, Behold, this child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel; and for a sign which shall be spoken against.

35 (Yea, a sword shall pierce through thy own soul also) that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed.

Verse 31. All people. Simeon seems to have entertained more enlarged views of the Messiah's mission, than most of the people among whom he lived.

34. The fall and rising again of many. It was through the rejection of the Saviour that many in Israel, even the great mass of the people, should fall from their state of favor with God. And subsequently, by belief in him, the same people would rise again to a state of moral virtue and happiness. The fall and rise again of many in Israel, is particularly described in Rom. xi: to which the reader is referred.

35 A sword shall pierce through thy own soul. This undoubtedly refers to the anguish which the mother of Jesus would feel while viewing the sufferings of her son—particularly, perhaps, at his crucifixion.

That the thoughts of many hearts, etc. This language should be associated in sense with the 34th verse: the language immediately preceding being a parenthesis.

It was not the piercing through of Mary's soul that was to reveal the thoughts of many hearts; but the fall and rising again of many in Israel was to do this. Their thoughts that were opposed to the Gospel would be revealed in their fall—their thoughts in its favor would be revealed in their rising again. And this, in both cases, was spoken of many. Many were to fall and rise again: and the thoughts of many hearts were to be revealed.

Anna the prophetess.

LUKE ii: 36. And there was one Anna, a prophetess, the daughter of Phanneel, of the tribe of Asher: she was of a great age and had lived with an husband seven years from her virginity.

37 And she was a widow of about four score and four years, which departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers, night and day.

38 And she coming in that instant, gave thanks likewise unto the Lord, and spake of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem.

39 And when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee to their own city Nazareth.

Verse 36. Aser of Asher was one of the sons of Jacob, and his name was given to one of the twelve tribes.

Prophetess. This term is often used in the sense of teacher, without implying divine inspiration necessary in foretelling future events.

37. She departed not from the temple, etc. If Anna departed not from the temple, how could it be said that she coming in that instant, gave thanks likewise to the Lord? All that is probably meant by her not departing from the temple, but serving God night and day, is, that she was punctual in her attendance at the temple morning and evening.

38. In Jerusalem. In Israel, is the reading of some MSS.

39. They returned into Galilee. It is thought by some that Joseph and Mary departed with Jesus directly from Bethlehem to Egypt, at the instigation of the angel, who informed them of Herod's design to kill the infant Jesus. This has been inferred from the fact, that Herod sent to Bethlehem and slew infants there, instead of seeking for the Saviour at Nazareth, or slaying the infants of the latter city. Why did Herod, it may be asked, send and slay the infants of Bethlehem, when the Saviour was not there when the design of Herod was formed, but was at Nazareth? The answer is, that Herod supposed that Jesus was in Bethlehem, because that had been named as the place of his birth. Why, then, it may be asked again, was it necessary that the child Jesus should be conveyed to Egypt, to avoid being destroyed, since if he was in Nazareth, he was in no danger of being killed among the infants of Bethlehem? The answer is, that, while the Saviour was any where in Herod's dominions, his life was in danger; for it would have been discovered that the Saviour was at Nazareth, and his life would thus have become an easy sacrifice to the ambition and cruelty of that prince.

We suppose, therefore, that after the parents of the Saviour had discharged their legal obligations, after a period of seven days of uncleanness, and thirty three of purification, forty in all, (see Lev. xii:) they returned to their residence at Nazareth, from which place afterwards, through fear of Herod's cruelty, they fled to Egypt.

BR. FULLER'S DEATH AND BURIAL.

Br. S. W. Fuller, whose obituary will be found in another column, was extensively known and generally beloved by our readers in this section. A later mail has brought us the Nazarene, (which was edited by him,) clothed in mourning, and giving an extended account of his last moments, and of his burial. We think we can not do better than give the following extracts—they are by Br. J. H. Gihon, one of the Proprietors of the Nazarene.

Br. Fuller was taken down with bleeding at the lungs in December last—continued very unwell, with a few intermissions, and confined to the house, up to the day of his death. But his pen was not idle. The Nazarene was supplied, almost every week, with able articles in defence and illustration of Universalism, even up to the last number issued before his departure! By a post mortem examination, made at his own request, it was ascertained that he died of tubercular consumption, which, years ago, must have been so firmly seated as to prevent all attempts at its cure. Yet who heard him murmur or complain? And he continued thus resigned, patient, and sweetly joyful and grateful to the end. The following are the extracts. A. B. G.

"On the morning of Friday, the 15th inst., the evidences of approaching dissolution became too visible to be doubted, and from that time to the moment of his decease, his strength gradually departed. He was perfectly sensible of his situation, and referred to it with calmness and the most perfect resignation. He never indeed, throughout his illness, expressed a desire to live, without assigning as the reason, that he could benefit his fellow creatures by preaching the gospel or writing in its defence. As this seemed to be the sole object of his life when in health, so it appeared to be his only desire when struggling against the power of the destroyer.—And, although he was the victim of one of the most distressing diseases which it ever falls to the lot of man to suffer, still, it is a remarkable fact, that he was never heard to utter a complaint, while his lips were very frequently employed in praising his Maker for the mercy and goodness which he felt had ever been extended toward him. On Friday afternoon, at his request, several friends sung with him the 471st hymn in Streeter's collection, entitled "Loving kindness of the Saviour," in which exercise he took part, and with an unusual effort, pronounced distinctly and with evident satisfaction and pleasure, the words of the last stanza:—

"Soon shall I pass the gloomy vale;
Soon all my mortal powers must fail;
O may my last expiring breath,
His loving kindness sing in death."

Br. Asher Moore then addressed the throne of grace in prayer, and when during this exercise reference was made to the love and mercy of the Heavenly Father, and the bright prospect he has opened to our view of the blessedness of a future world for his earthly children, our dying brother devoutly exclaimed "amen" or "praise the Lord;" and when these devotional exercises were concluded, he expressed himself greatly refreshed by their performance. On Saturday evening, he was much weaker, when he exerted what little strength remained, to take part in similar services. When about to take leave of him at ten o'clock, I informed him that I did not expect to see him again alive, —stated that I should preach to his people in the morning, and asked him if he had anything especial for me to say to them. "Tell them," he replied, "that I shall undoubtedly die believing all that I have ever preached to them!"

When the Sun appeared through his window on Sunday morning, he thanked God that he was permitted to behold its light, and intimated that it was the last time he should enjoy that privilege. At about seven o'clock, he desired an attending friend to read to him the 15th chapter of St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, at the conclusion of which, he spoke joyfully of the blessed assurances it contains; and about half an hour afterwards he exclaimed, "Bless the Lord, O my soul!" These were the last words he was heard to speak. In less than a half hour from this time he was numbered with the dead. He died about eight minutes before eight o'clock, without a murmur, a struggle, or a groan. He seemed to suffer no pain whatever, but passed quietly away as the flame of a taper whose oil was expended. He had reached the age of thirty-six years, seven months, and seven days, eleven years of which time, were employed in the gospel ministry."

"The funeral of Br. F. took place on Tuesday afternoon. The procession was formed at 4 o'clock, and moved from his late residence toward the Callowhill Street Church, where the burial services were performed. The concourse of people was immense, filling the spacious house in every part, while many were unable to gain entrance. The corpse was placed in front of the desk, during the services, which were conducted in the following order:—

1. A dirge by the united Choirs of the two Churches of this city.
2. Reading of the Scriptures, by Rev. J. H. Gihon.
3. Hymn, 488 of Hymns of Zion.
4. Prayer, by Rev. John Perry.
5. Hymn, 246 of Hymns of Zion.
6. Sermon, by Rev. Asher Moore. Text, 1 Cor. xv: 57.—"But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."
7. Prayer, by Rev. J. H. Gihon.
8. Dirge, by the Choirs.
9. Benediction.

After the performance of these services, the corpse was deposited in the silent earth in the passage directly in front of the Church, where the worshippers in entering the house of God, may look with grateful sorrow upon the tomb of their departed Pastor."

THE MUDDY WATER.

After an absence of eight years, I stood at the head of one of the streets in my native city. I know not how it was, but my attention was riveted by the muddy water running down a gutter towards the sea,—so riveted, that I fell into meditation concerning it.—And the more I progressed in my meditation, the more was I interested in that muddy water, which seemed to have power of speech given it to answer the queries which arose in my mind.

This muddy water perhaps, thought I, has been all over the earth, in oceans, lakes, rivers, rain and dew—has been on a ceaseless journey to and fro, since "darkness was upon the face of the great deep." Perhaps it was in the rainbow which God did bend in the heavens, as a sign that the earth should no more be flooded. Perhaps—"perhaps," the water seemed to break in upon my meditation, and say, "there is no perhaps about it—I was in that rainbow. And when Pharaoh and his host were overwhelmed in the Red Sea, I was there, and touched the drowning monarch when he was sinking. I was at Canute's feet and rolled over them, when, at the instigation of his courtiers, he commanded the ocean not to flow. I was under the feet of the Saviour when he walked on the sea of Gallilee; and I was in one of the waves which threatened to overwhelm his little vessel, at the time when he arose from his sweet sleep and commanded the storm to be still. I have seen many a sea-battle, have helped cover up many a brave man, and beheld many a dark deed. I have fallen in dew on mount Hermon, and was in Jacob's well when Christ talked with the woman of Samaria. I have watered the gardens of India, the orange groves of Spain, the tea plants of China, the grass of the prairie, and the trees of the forest. I have—but it would take too long to tell all that I have seen and done; so I must flow along."

"But whither goest thou, muddy water?" thought I. "I am going to the ocean to be purified of the mud which has mixed with me," the water in its gurgling seemed to say. "To be purified, sayest thou? Stay a moment I will tell you a story. When Dr. Beecher, of Cincinnati, was in Auburn, he preached against Universalism. To prove that sinners who die impure, will always remain so, he spoke of a river pouring down from the mountains in thunder, whose waters, black with death and destruction, wither every thing in their course. Suddenly it falls over a precipice—is it supposable that its waters, the instant they disappear, become pure and sweet? And when the sinner drops down the precipice of death, can he become holy and righteous? So the Doctor concluded that men dying in sin, must be made endless sinners and sufferers. What sayest thou to this, muddy water?"

"He was wrong—he had no right to stop at the precipice where the water fell over—he should have traced it to the ocean, and ascertained what became of it. I will tell an incident in my history," said the water. "Many years, yea, many centuries before white men knew that America existed, I fell on the Rocky Mountains, and flowed into the Yellow Stone river. I was very impure by reason of the soil with which I came in contact. The Buffalo would not drink me—the deer would not taste me. I went into the Missouri, and then into the Mississippi, and then into the ocean.—There I was separated from all impurity; so that when I was drawn up into the air in vapour, I was pure as light. I was carried in a cloud by the wind over Palestine, on which I fell in rain. I was drank up by some flower-roots, and actually became those very lilies of which Christ said to his disciples, 'I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these.' Now, if Dr. Beecher had traced that water to the ocean, he would have found that it became as pure as I was, when I was turned into a lily of the valley. And, as I am a Universalist, (for God when he made me, commanded me to fall on the land of the just and of the unjust,) I will say that the notion of men remaining impure and sinful when they return to God, is not true—for once, when king Solomon was meditating in his palace about the destiny of men, I was in a golden dish by his right hand, and I heard him say, 'then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.'—And now I think of it, the next time I fall in rain at Cincinnati, I will whisper what Solomon said into Dr. Beecher's ear, and ask him if he recollects that God 'will not cast off forever.' So, good bye to you, as I must away; for the ocean is calling me to come and be purified."

"How is your health this morning?" said an intimate friend and believer in the Reconciliation, touching me on the shoulder and shaking me by the hand. "Good—how is thine?" And so we had old matters to talk about, and my meditation ceased. G. W. M.

MR. SHEPHERD'S ROCHESTER CONVENTION

By a letter from Br. B. M., postmarked Sylvania, Pa., we learn that Silas E. Shepherd says he can substantiate all that he has ever said on the subject of the pretended convention of 50 Universalist preachers, held in Rochester in the year 1836, who deliberated on the policy of avowing to the world their unanimous disbelief of the Bible. But he states it as his opinion, that we would not allow him to do so, in this paper, and that we would not treat him in a gentlemanly manner, if he attempted to be heard in it.

I reply, that I published all he wrote on the subject at the time; and will publish any reasonable amount having direct reference to the subject, which he may send us; provided that it is written in a respectful manner. If he can, (as I am sure he can not,) let him produce his proofs—1st. That Dr. Luke Shepherd was a Universalist preacher at or before that time—say in 1835 or 1836. 2d. That a convention or other meeting of Universalist clergymen to the number of 40 or 50, was ever held in Rochester subsequent to 1831, and previous to 1839. 3d. That Dr. Luke Shepherd was one of that convention or meeting. 4th. That said convention or meeting deliberated on the propriety of declaring their disbelief of the Bible, or of Christianity. I pledge myself to publish his proofs, if any he has, on these points, when forwarded to me by Silas E. Shepherd.

It is possible that Dr. Shepherd did tell his brother such a story; but proof that he did, is not proof that the story is true. Dr. Shepherd's declaring that he was once a Universalist preacher, is not proof that he was such, especially as his name can not be found in the minutes of any of our Associations or Conventions, nor in the published lists of our preachers, nor in any of our periodicals. So in regard to the pretended convention, and its pretended deliberations—Dr. Shepherd's story about these things does not prove that such a convention was ever held, or that such proceedings ever took place. Silas E. Shepherd may be able to prove that his brother told him such a tale, and so he may clear himself from the charge of inventing it; but he will only throw the falsehood from his own shoulders on to the dead body of a deceased brother. And if I can prove that Silas E. Shepherd knew that Dr. Luke Shepherd was not a respectable man, or a veracious witness, what will follow then? Answer. That Silas E. Shepherd was willing to circulate for truth, a story he himself did not believe! That is all. I do not desire to stir up the ashes of the dead—let them sleep in silence with all their errors and faults—but if S. E. Shepherd is determined to clear his character at the expense of his deceased brother, he can do so—or, if he wishes to continue his charges against the Universalists of this State, by quoting that brother as a good witness, let the blame of investigating that brother's character, rest on the assailant. It is my duty to defend the slandered innocent, even if I have to do it by unmasking the pretensions of one now departed; for Dr. Luke Shepherd never was a Universalist clergyman—never had a seat in the council of any Universalist Convention or Association—never was named in any Universalist periodical that I have seen, as a member of our denomination—and there never was such a meeting of Universalist clergymen held in Rochester or elsewhere, as is pretended in this slanderous story. I therefore, once more, invite Silas E. Shepherd to prove that story true in any of its important parts or allegations, if he can, and pledge myself to publish his proofs, if he has any, on their being forwarded to me. A. B. G.

To Universalists and Inquirers after Truth in Auburn and its vicinity:

Br. Wm. F. Gibbs, sexton of the Universalist Society, in Auburn, keeps an assortment of Universalist books for sale; and has made arrangement to have all the new books as they issue from the press. Our friends are respectfully invited to call on him, and procure some of the treasures of moral life. He is found at the office next East of Gen. Warden's Flouring Mill. ## HEARING OF THE WORD.

BY REV. MOSES BALLOU.
CHAPTER II.

There is another class which I shall denominate

II. Fanciful hearers.—They are those who care little about the public ministrations of the temple, any farther than they can be made to minister to the wants of an all-engrossing fancy. Every look of the speaker, every intonation of his voice, his mode of expression, his gesticulation, and even his personal appearance; his form, features, dress, and deportment, are all examined and weighed in reference to this particular. The most solemn and important truths that God has revealed to us, truths that regard his own glorious and ever-blessed character, the nature of his government and the design of his laws; truths that embody the dearest interests, the holiest hopes, and the immortal destiny of mankind, may flow from the speaker's heart, and yet fall powerless upon such hearers' minds, unless, perchance, they may happen to come in such form as to meet the wants of a squeamish taste, or answer to the promptings of a sickly fancy. While, on the other hand, errors of the most revolting nature, or theories and speculations which are little better than sublimated nonsense, will be sought with eagerness and swallowed with avidity, by this class of hearers, if only presented in that peculiar manner which may chance to chime in with the whims of their vain imaginations. The spirit which actuates them is very similar to that which prompts so many to run after some new or smart preacher—some theatrical mountebank, who can look pretty, and say pretty things, and preach most interestingly. As though the worship of God was a matter of mere idle curiosity! And yet, how many there are of this kind of hearers in Christendom. The Poets language is alas! too true:

"Can't's veriest ranter, crams the house, if new,

While Paul himself, oft heard, would hardly fill a pew."

What possible benefit can such persons hope to derive from the exercises of devotion? or what influence do they suppose it will exert on their hearts? or are these questions they care nothing about? If the object of preaching is the mere pleasing of the fancy, or rather, if this is the main object in hearing it, then, for aught I know, the mythology of the ancient heathen is a thousand times more valuable than the Christian religion; for while the former is made up of pleasing fictions and poetic images, the latter is but a collection of plain, simple, and unostentatious truths. And, indeed, if this object was a worthy one with the hearer, it is utterly of no consequence what an individual preaches, if it is only productive of the desired end. It seems to me impossible that any individual of common discrimination, with the least respect for the Saviour's Gospel, should seriously consider this subject, without feeling disgust at the deformities we have endeavored to expose. And if any have inadvertently fallen into this error, as is undoubtedly the case with some, I feel confident that one moment's serious reflection will serve to convince them of their folly and sin. Fancy never should be thought of in listening to the truths of God's holy word. The only thing we should ask ourselves, is, are they truths? and has God addressed them to me, as one of his children? If so, it is enough. Let them come from the lips of any individual, in a garb however plain and unattractive, they should be listened to as the counsels and instructions of an all-wise Father.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXVII.

MARK. This book was written in Greek, by Mark, who was an early disciple of our Lord, and son of Barnabas' sister; and he is sometimes called John Mark. He is supposed to have been converted by Peter, and to have written his Gospel at Rome for the use of Christians in general. Chap. v: 12. "And all the devils besought him," etc.

The word all, is omitted by many manuscripts and versions. Griesbach leaves it out of the text. "The devils," is also omitted by several. Griesbach leaves it doubtful. Probably it should read thus—"And they besought him" etc. See A. Clarke.

Chap. ix: 43. "Into the fire that never shall be quenched."

This clause is wanting in several ancient and valuable manuscripts, and many eminent critics suppose it to be an interpolation. The same clause in verse 45 is also spurious. In Wakefield's translation they are omitted.

Chap. xiii: 30. "This generation shall not pass, till all these things be done."

This generation, this very race of men now living. Generation signifies a period of a certain number of years; sometimes more, sometimes less. In Deuteronomy i: 35, and ii: 14, Moses uses the word to point out a term of 38 years, which was precisely the number in the present case, for Jerusalem was destroyed about 38 years after our Lord delivered this prediction.

FRUITS OF INQUIRY.

BY A FEMALE UNIVERSALIST.

I was a member of the Baptist church seventeen years, and during that time, was a constant reader of the Bible, but never could read any thing like Universalism. I verily thought, that all the denunciations against the wicked, alluded to a future state. But at a certain time, after a long discourse with my brother on the subject of Universalism, (to which I was opposed,) he said he had one favor to ask of me, and that was, whenever I should be reading in the Bible, about the punishments and miseries of the wicked, to notice whether they were described as being on the earth, or in a future state. Agreeably to his request, I was more particular in noticing the subject that I was reading; and to my great surprise I found that the miseries of the wicked, were said to be on the earth and on the sea. I learned from Isaiah xxxiv: that the fire which should not be quenched, would be on the land, in this present state of existence. According to John the divine, it was on the earth, and on the sea, that the vials of wrath would be poured out. I was much surprised to find that the following passages were spoken in the present tense:—"cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them"—"he that believeth not, is condemned already,"—"ye are already condemned, and the wrath of God abideth on you"—"destruction and misery, are in their ways"—"the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner." I looked at the judgment pronounced against Adam, for his transgression, and found that his punishment was in this life, and although the sin of Cain, was, perhaps as great as any ever committed, yet no intimation is given that either of them ever suffered in a future state. I read the accounts of the Egyptians, and the Israelites and found that their punishment also was in this life. I read the accounts of the old world, and the Sodomites, and although they were so hardened in sin, that they were not fit subjects for this world—yet (thought I) it was no more than a kind Father would do, to remove the malady of sin, and place them in a state of holiness where they could worship the true God, instead of worshipping the god of this world. I thought of what Jesus said, when speaking of the Gallileans, and the eighteen on whom the tower of Siloam fell—"except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Truly they were cut off from the earth, but no intimation is given that they are now miserable in eternity. I was truly astonished, to find that Jesus came to destroy him which had the power of death, that is, the DEVIL. Indeed, before I saw the passage, I would not believe it to be in the Bible. I can scarcely describe my amazement when I found that both hell and damnation, were in this present state of existence; for I observed that when James spake of hell, he described it as being so near to mankind, as to set on fire the course of nature—even by an untutored tongue;—and when Paul, speaking of a certain set of women who were tattlers, and busy bodies—says "having damnation because they have cast off their first faith," it is plain to be seen, that their damnation was in this life. While the spirit of inquiry was in my mind I read the account of the rich man and Lazarus; and although it appears to be spoken in positive terms, yet I found that the parable which Nathan spake to David, (by the command of God,) respecting a certain rich man, and a certain ewe lamb, was spoken in just as positive terms, as the account of the rich man and Lazarus; and yet the certain rich man, and the certain ewe lamb, of which Nathan spake, alluded to nothing more than David and the wife of Uriah; and surely the wife of Uriah was not literally a ewe lamb, neither do I believe that the hell of the rich man was beyond the mortal state of existence.

I can truly say, that I was overwhelmed with wonder and astonishment, because things were brought to my mind, that I had never before heard or thought of. I did not then know as any believed that Jesus has already come the second time, and that the day of judgment has already commenced, but from passages which were then present to my mind, I could plainly see that Jesus is now on the throne of his glory—that all nations are now before him—and that he does render to every man according to their works. I then saw that it is in this present state of existence that the righteous "do enter into rest," and so long as they walk in the light they enjoy the light, and so long as they are of the Gospel spirit, they have eternal life abiding in them,—but such as are contentious, and do not obey the truth, are punished with the spirit of condemnation—(or damnation)—"the wrath of God abideth on" them and in this situation, they will continue until they repent and believe the Gospel, which, according to the promises, will eventually take place, in the dispensation of the fullness of times.

It was a long time before I could be convinced of the nature and time of the resurrection. I formerly believed as Martha did, when she said she knew her brother would "rise again in the resurrection," but from what Jesus then said, and from what is written in the 15th chapter of Corinthians, I am convinced that we "attain unto the resurrection" at the death of the mortal body; because the resurrection is plainly set forth by the grain, when it dies and comes forth again, and we know that soon as the grain begins to die, it also begins to sprout and come forth.—Hence as it respects mankind, I think that

When the old body is perfectly dead,

The man is then perfect in Jesus the head,

The old things in Adam, then are all done,

And all things are new in Jesus the Son, and so death is swallowed up in victory.

After thus considering on what is written in the Bible, I found that I had embraced Universalism. And what, (thought I,) shall I do?—indeed I would not, for the world, have the brethren and sisters know that I have imbibed the Universalist principles! But then again I thought if I could see them, and tell them, how things appeared to me, they certainly would believe as I did, because the truth of Universalism appeared to be as plain as the sun in the firmament, and I thought if ever there was a Universalist preacher, father Paul was one. Indeed the whole Bible appeared as a new book. I was often surprised to see how differently passages of Scripture appeared to me.—But when I came to relate my views to the brethren and sisters of the church, they thought I could not be in my right mind, and I found that it required a greater power than I possessed to convince them of the truth; and indeed I do not believe it is in the power of human beings to open the eyes of the blind. That is a work which belongs to God alone, and as it appears to be his pleasure that the Jews should remain in blindness for a certain time, so it appears to be his will to conceal the great plan of redemption from the wise and prudent, and reveal it unto babes in Christ.

THE PATHS OF SIN.

The doctrine that the ways of vice are pleasant, and impart happiness to its votaries, is publicly held and advocated by many at the present day, who have modestly appropriated unto themselves the title of Orthodox—of being sound in doctrine. That a sentiment so revolting to the purest feelings of our hearts, so utterly opposed to the voice of nature, of reason, and of God, should not only find adherents, but be the popular belief of many in this enlightened age, is at once humiliating and strange, and shows the fearful power that habit and prejudice exert over the minds of men, when they once become riveted upon them, which lead them to blindly shut their eyes and turn a deaf ear to the clearest and plainest truths,—to facts that are daily and hourly presented to them. Professed ministers of the gospel, men who profess to have been called to proclaim the truths of God, and unfold the rich and boundless treasures of the gospel as revealed by the inspired writers, will stand up in the pulpit and labor with a zeal worthy of a better cause, to impress on the minds of their hearers, that the paths of sin are pleasant and strewn with flowers—that the waters of vice are sweet and delicious to the soul—that the way of the transgressor is easy, and his burden light. He will tell you that the path of virtue is a rough and thorny one—that the lot of the Christian is a hard and self-sacrificing one—that there is no pleasure, no comfort in leading a virtuous life, and doing good—no pleasure arising from the exercise of the purer and holier feelings of our nature, and from the performance of those high and holy offices of kindness and sympathy to our fellow beings—thus virtually giving the lie to the voice of God, as expressed in the words of holy writ. He has there told us in strong and unequivocal language, that “The way of the transgressor is hard,” that “There is no peace to the wicked;” that “he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong he hath done,” that “the soul that sinneth—it shall die,”—that is, become dead in misery and degradation—that misery and disgrace follow in the steps of him that drinketh of the black and turbid waters of vice, and that the path of virtue is sweet and pleasant, and affords peace to the soul of him who walks in it. What shall we think of the man who can unblushingly proclaim a sentiment which not only the voice of nature and of reason, but of that book, by whose teachings he professes to be guided, declare to be false! What can we think, but that either his heart is morally wrong, or that the mysteries of his creed have deranged the organs of his brain? Oh how has my heart ached, how, from my soul, have I pitied the blind delusion of the adherents of this doctrine, as I have heard proclaimed from the sanctuary, a sentiment so false, so damning in its effects, on the moral character of man! Yet those who hold this doctrine, will talk loudly of the licentious and immoral influence of Universalism! They will warn you to shun it, as you value your souls salvation: to beware how you investigate it; that it is so powerful, so baleful, and so seductive in its influence, that the person who dares to look into it and make himself acquainted with it is lost, forever—the beauties of Partialism can not draw him back! Now kind reader, suppose we unmask, and lay open to view, this doctrine—this hydra-headed monster. If it is so hideous, so revolting, there surely must be moral purity enough in our hearts to make us shrink back from it in horror and disgust. We do not willingly fly into the arms of the plague, or lie down beside the fierce tiger. The doctrine which he, who holds the revolting sentiment that the ways of vice are pleasant, will tell you it is so licentious, is this; it holds that God is a God of love; that all his attributes harmonize and blend together; that he is perfect in power, in wisdom, in goodness, and in justice. He hath said the way of the transgressor is hard, that there is no peace to the wicked, and that the sinner shall not go unpunished, and Universalists dare not call his word in question. They believe that the person who is deaf to the spirit of virtue, that is implanted in the heart of every intelligent creature, who turns aside from the bright paths of purity, and quaffs the polluted waters of vice, must experience misery and degradation, assuredly as effect follows a cause, and that from this there is no escape; that so surely as we sin, will punishment follow; that though the votary of vice may be blessed with every earthly comfort, though he may roll in wealth and be possessed of all that this earth can give, and may seem to all outward appearance to glide along the vale of life calm and unruffled, with happiness shedding her beams around him, still it is but an outward show—within there is a moral tempest, and the never dying fires of remorse are raging and consuming the life blood of his heart—the cankering worm is gnawing at his vitals! They believe that the path of virtue is a sweet and lovely one; that there is an innate power in virtue, in the consciousness of having done our duty, and contributed to the happiness of our fellow beings, that will impart a blissful serenity to the mind, console and buoy us up under the trials and sorrows incident to an imperfect state of existence; that the cultivation of the kind and social feelings of our nature will impart a rich and extatic flood of delight to the heart of him who lives in the practice of virtue. Reader, do you perceive any thing immoral or licentious in this doctrine? If not, then when you hear those who either wantonly or ignorantly assail it, and loudly declaim against its immoral tendency, dare to stand forth and proclaim their falsehood. Let us contrast the two doctrines of Partialism and Universalism. One holds that the paths of sin are pleasant, that the way of the transgressor is easy, that the path of virtue is rough and strewn with thorns, and that the lot of the Christian is a hard and self-sacrificing one. The Universalist holds that the way of the transgressor is hard, that though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished, that the path of virtue is a bright and pleasant one, and that the practice of virtue leads to the enjoyment of happiness.—But, says an honest objector, they believe that the sinner will be saved in his sins! Not so; they believe that he will be saved from his sins. They believe that sin, sorrow, and death will be destroyed; that every member of the vast family shall, by the general and all-conquering influence of love, be brought back to a state of perfect purity, and consequent happiness, and at last be gathered together, and encircle the throne of their Father in Heaven. Reader, you have the two doctrines before you—judge ye which is the immoral and licentious one. I speak as unto wise men.

THE FATHER'S LAST REQUEST.

A SKETCH FROM REAL LIFE.

BY ASA WILBUR TUPPER.

Can that be a religious, holy influence which severs the bond of affection between friends, families, communities and nations? Query!

On an eminence, commanding a view of a beautiful and picturesque landscape, in the county of S—, stood a magnificent dwelling. Every thing around was adorned in the most elegant manner. The trees, the shrubbery, the beautiful parterre, and delightful walks, evinced a cultivated taste, and caused the passing traveller to exclaim, “here is the abode of luxury and ease.” The interior of this dwelling was more highly decorated than the exterior. Carpets, sofas, settees, mattresses, all curiously and richly wrought, ornamented the palace within. Not far hence, and heightened by contrast with this habitation, lay an humble cottage. Here all things bespoke a neatness and elegance of which splendor can not boast. The lovely rose, wild eglantine, and jessamines, wove their tendrils around the sides of the lowly cottage, emblems of the innocent hearts which dwelt therein. An only daughter in the former of these dwellings, and an only son in the latter, are the subjects of this brief sketch. Henry M. was the son of pious and respectable parents, who lived by their own industry upon a few acres of land. They were, however, strictly happy. They were contented with what they already possessed, nor did they crave for any thing more than the necessary comforts and conveniences of life. Henry, inherited all the virtues of his parents. He was steady in his habits, kind and affable in his manners, generous and faithful in his attachments.

Ellen G. also, possessed devoted and honorable parents. Although the child of luxury and refinement, yet she, unlike most others in her situation, disdained to excel her associates in finery and equipage—in tinselled show and drapery. She was thought rather too meek and lowly for her circumstances by her own dear parents. But no persuasion could induce her to deck herself in the gaudy trappings of fancy—sickly, disordered fancy. She had much rather bestow her money upon the suffering poor, than to expend it for costly ornaments. Ellen was, in the eyes of all, the beau ideal of goodness. In native kindness of heart she was not excelled. She was in reality, an accomplished girl. Although she whiled away an occasional hour at the piano, or exercised her talent in drawing some interesting landscape; yet she did not do any of these things, to the neglect of her domestic duties. She was equally at ease in the kitchen as by the side of the piano.

From this brief but imperfect description, who could help but admiring the beautiful Ellen? for she was, indeed, beautiful beyond expression. She was graceful in form, and handsome in feature, but her chief beauty was her transcendent loveliness of mind and heart. Who could see her and not love her? Who could live by her and not adore her?

The situation of Henry and Ellen, were apparently very unlike. Henry had not beauty, or riches, (in the common acceptation of the term,) but he was rich in affection, in charity, in love! He was all a parents fondest hopes could wish. He might have held lucrative stations in society, he might have gathered fortune and fame, (for he had talents of a superior order,) but he preferred providing for his parents in good old age—to live in the lowly thatched cottage—to do good! Ellen, on the contrary, was surrounded by wealth and all its concomitant evils. She had but to ask, and it was given; say, and it was done. Being the idolized, loved image of a father's heart, how few like her escape those quicksands of intemperate pleasures, and unbounded gratifications of sense, which ever encircle the abodes of the opulent! Yet, all these delights, Ellen knew not—cared not for them. She considered the real object of life, to do good to all as we have an opportunity.

The reader will thus perceive, that though the circumstances of the two were so diverse, they were not irreconcilable. Riches with Ellen, was not the guide to respect, as with too great a portion of the civilized world. Her attachments were founded on the proper basis of true, genuine merit alone. The minds of Ellen and Henry were congenial. The same hopes, the same pleasures were common to both. Brought up in each others society, they blended their feelings in the same common “fount of deep, strong, deathless love!” They cemented that bond of friendship, which should have bound them in one for life, and for an eternity to come. They loved, and still, they knew it not. Ah! who can tell, how soon friends may become lovers. There is something strange and mysterious about that "little god," Love!! * * * *

It was a lovely day in June. The aerial element was calm. All nature presented a scene of beauty and sublimity, rarely excelled. But a scene very different presented itself within the walls of the happy Mansion House. Friends and relatives were hurrying to and from the noted dwelling of father G. Acquaintances and neighbors were seen passing in and out of the house, and those who went away, carried a melancholy expression upon their countenances. They were paying their last sad visits to the venerable father G. A mortal disease was upon his vitals, and soon, very soon, he was to bid adieu to the transitory things of earth!

The sun had long been sunk in the west, and the shades of evening covered the landscape. The hurry and bustle of the day was over, the meeting of friends and neighbors past. Most of them had bidden the respected resident of the mansion a long farewell, and breathed the ardent wish to meet again in that blessed clime where parting should be no more. During all this time the reader will probably enquire, where was the lovely, beautiful Ellen? She was there by the bed-side of her dearly beloved father, ministering to his wants, and assuaging his dying agonies. Here too she was at home! If woman ever deserves the name of angel, it is when she is relieving the sick, and mitigating the sufferings of humanity. And if I was permitted to locate the most suitable place for choosing a help-meet for life, my choice would be by the bed of sickness, anguish and death! There I should not, could not be deceived! There is a something in death, that excites our feelings in a peculiar, lasting manner. May I not say too, that there is a holy, blessed influence, in beholding a brother, a sister, or a friend in death! But to return. Ellen was by her father in the still hour of midnight, lonely, solitary, and single. Her father requested his head to be raised that he might say a final word to his much-loved, favorite Ellen. It was done. He then commenced in almost an inaudible tone of voice, "My dear Ellen, listen to me a few moments, for I am sensible that the time for my departure is at hand. I must die, and in all probability very soon; and before I take my leave of you, I have one request to make, which I trust will be readily granted to a loving, dying parent. It is my last and only request. Will you grant it, Ellen?" Those who have experienced like scenes may know how irresistible are the entreaties and prayers of a fond father, or an affectionate mother in an hour like this. However unreasonable may be the demand made on us at such times, there is but one mind and one voice. Ask what thou wilt, it shall be granted. So with Ellen. She meekly said, "I will, dear father." "This then is my request," said the father, "that you will never marry Henry M. until he renounces his heretical sentiments. I know something of your intimacy, and I tremble for you. If you should take a step like this, you will be everlastingly ruined. You know his religious tenets. He is an infidel—a Universalist! It is my last and dying request, therefore, that you never consent to marry a Universalist. If it does not render you unhappy here, you will hereafter be forever miserable, and where God and Christ are you can never come."

Ellen was silent. But the imploring looks of a dying parent, caused her to seal with a kiss, an everlasting covenant with him. She kissed her father in token of submission, to which he returned an affectionate embrace, and said, "now lay me down to die." Anon he sunk into that dreamless slumber that knows on earth no waking. Morning came with its bright sun, its clear skies, and its radiant smiles, but to the inmates of the mansion it brought gloom, desolation, and death. Yes, death was there! The customary respects were duly paid to the deceased by kind friends and neighbors, and time rolled on. When Ellen so far recovered from the shock occasioned by the death of her father, she shuddered when she came to recall to mind the promise she had made to him—a promise never to be broken! "Oh! I am undone! Why did I grant a request, so abhorrent to my feelings, and one which must destroy my happiness for life. But I will keep it sacred, though I sacrifice my health, my happiness, my life, my all! Yes, my father, thy departed spirit shall never behold thy daughter faithless, untrue!"

It is unnecessary to add the religious sentiments of father G. It is sufficient to say that he was not a Universalist, and Christ says, "he that is not for us, is against us."

Henry M. was a Universalist. He was respected by the father of Ellen, and greatly beloved for his many virtues; still his religious faith was the much dreaded Upas, the bane of his affection. Although Ellen was not a professor of any religion, yet her love for her parents was such, that they had but to desire, to be obeyed. There had long been an understanding between Henry and Ellen, but it did not amount to an actual engagement. It had been expressed that if neither changed their minds ere they arrived at a proper age for marriage, they would join in holy wedlock. Father G. was not ignorant of the feelings of Henry and his daughter. He was conscious that Henry regarded his daughter in an especial manner, and he therefore took this method to bring him about to his faith. It is not probable he intended to make both miserable for life. But he was deceived. Virtue is ever the same, stern and inflexible—changeless and unchanged. The man of genuine integrity is influenced by no sinister motive. He is dictated by true and fixed principles, which prompt to noble, undeviating conduct. * * * *

It was a beautiful day in the summer of —. The busy songsters were filling woodland, grove and dell, with melody, chanting their hymns of praise to the God who made them. The grazing herd and bleating flock were on the distant hill. The murmurings of the gentle zephyrs were heard in the cool and shady grove, and the soft rippling stream through the pleasant valleys. Happiness seemed to reign every where over the face of lovely nature—but within the mansion all was stillness. It appeared like the residence of the dead. They seemed unconscious of the beauties on every side of them. The song of birds, and the music of the æolian harp fell unheeded upon the auditory nerves of the inmates of the mansion, for death had been there again, and plucked a rose of fairest tint, instead of the shock of corn fully ripe. Yes, friendly reader, Ellen G., the beautiful, accomplished, amiable, gentle, lovely Ellen, was dead and buried. She died without even disclosing the secret of her untimely end, but to her mother. That mother now mourns as those without hope, for the victim of a father's last request. The religion of her fathers fails to give that consolation so necessary to respond, "thy will, not mine, be done." Nor was she the only mourner for the confiding Ellen. Henry M. was there, even in the hour of death—in the agonies of dissolving nature. But the canker worm which consumed her—the secret of her long pent up grief was never divulged to him, by Ellen. Her father and her God, to them alone she clung. She died true to love, and faithful to a father's last mandate.

Reader, my tale is told. It is no dream of the imagination—no fiction, but one of the sad realities of life, which I hope will never come under my notice again. And now, kind reader, if you are a father, permit me to say a word ere we part. Remember that your counsel, your advice, admonitions and instructions cease not at death. Remember that every word, is indelibly engraven upon the tablets of memory—the memory of your children—that no circumstances can efface the remembrance of a fond father, or obliterate a father's Last Request!!!

DUTIES OF RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.....NO. I.

"Let all things be done decently and in order."—1 Cor. xiv: 40.

This precept of the apostle is one which may be applied to all the duties of life. We should engrave it upon the durable tablet of memory, and carry it about with us, and go by its direction in every work which we are called upon to perform. It has a wide reach, and can be extended to subjects both of a temporal and of a spiritual nature; and if followed out, the result can not fail to be obedience, and happiness, and peace. But we do not propose, at this time, to occupy this broad and diversified field, but will confine ourselves to the consideration of some, at least, of the duties of Religious Societies—I mean by this, the duties of an association of believers, organized for the purpose of the support and dissemination and practice of Christian Truth; or of what they believe to be such. "Let all things be done decently, and in order," should be written upon the pillars of their institution, and should become practical in all their acts. Let us specify somewhat.

I. In the first place, that "all things" may be "done decently, and in order," the members of a Religious Society should diligently cherish and cultivate the means and forms of religious worship. Man, in his present state, is a two-fold being—a creature of body and soul. He is not swayed merely by essences and abstractions, by the inward and the spiritual. His outward eye must be filled—his outward ear touched; and the senses thus become mediums through which the mind is influenced and controlled. The power of sympathy is great. It is a chord that runs from heart to heart, and the pulses of one beating upon it, let it vibrate in the innermost depths of another. Social worship—outward forms—answer to this condition of things. The meeting of many, has, of itself, a great influence upon the individuals who compose that assembly. Have you not yourselves, my readers, when in the midst of a large congregation, all bent upon one particular subject—have you not caught animation from the numbers present, and become zealous and interested upon a topic which otherwise, would have fallen upon your ears almost unheeded, or, at least, with a far less important weight? And as some curious player upon that cunning harp, the human soul, has touched its varied chords with the glowing fingers of an eloquence that he has caught all kindling from the excitement of numbers, have you not seen the zeal which mounted and flamed in your own bosom, leaping, like the electric spark upon the chain, from man to man of that vast assembly? when, had you been there alone, or had only a few been present, that excitement in the speaker, and in his hearers, would have been wanting—that subject would have lacked interest, and fell cold and motionless upon your senses. Now, all this shows us that we are creatures of sympathy—that we are affected through the medium of our senses. Hence the propriety of social worship.—Hence the happy results of calling men together in the "Great Congregation," and appealing to many hearts instead of one. And then, again, as to Forms;—they have an effect upon the soul, and when used, and not over valued or perverted, may be, and are, used for good. Now, if the soul is in a right frame—if it is sincere and reverent in prayer, we believe that God looks upon that prayer as a true and spiritual offering, and that the form in which it is uttered is, comparatively, of little consequence, and that it is just as acceptable whether it goes up while the bended knee is upon crimson cushions, or on the wild turf of the forest—whether the petitioner and supplicant stands under the groined arches of the stately temple, or the high dome of the free, blue sky. But, at the same time, we believe, where people worship together, that some outward and general form of service should be maintained, and that it has its effect. There is the Catholic service, of much of which, it is probable, when you know its meaning, you can not approve; but just transport yourselves into some magnificent Cathedral, where the sun streams through richly stained windows upon the sacred emblems of religion, and see the white-stoled priest, officiating at the altar, and hear the faint murmuring of prayer, and the chanting of the choir, and the organ, wailing above all its soft notes of contrition, or breathing its low, yet articulate strains of mercy, or breaking out in the loud choros of adoration or of jubilee—pouring forth its "Te Deum," or its "Venite Exultemus Deo." Go and witness this, and you will feel a mystic moving and response of the soul, that will prove to you the effect of what may be called Forms. There should be Forms used, then—not a multitude—not a burdensome load—but enough to give outward testimony, that the soul is at worship, and to impart, if it may be, the sentiment of worship to others.

Thus much, then, to shew the propriety and efficacy of means and forms of worship—as to which, however, I presume but few, if any, would differ with me. But, I repeat, a religious society should diligently cherish and cultivate these. And, in the first place, they should do so, by regularly attending the stated meetings for divine service. It is singular, how slight an excuse, with some, will sometimes suffice to keep them away from meeting. To-day, it is too cold—to-morrow, it is too hot—a third day it is too dry and dusty—a fourth, too wet and damp. Now there are very few days in the year that, according to the church-going barometer which those who thus excuse themselves hold, are just right. There are very few days which are just hot enough and cold enough, or wet enough and dry enough. But here is a good test. Would these individuals, upon any excursion of amusement or interest, neglect to go out? Is it too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry for that purpose? If so, there may be for the invalid or the aged some excuse for the vacation of their seats in the sanctuary; but otherwise, we should look somewhat suspiciously upon such a plea. Again, if you are members of a religious society, consider who are to fill up its meetings if you do not? If you may stay at home, so may your fellow-believer, and who is there to go? And it is not very agreeable for the minister to labor in the preparation of a sermon, and then deliver it to bare walls—especially when he knows that the members of his society constitute a sufficient number to fill the house respectably, and that most of these are absent from no perceptible reason save a want of inclination. Now this subject is left to the consciences of all, and most assuredly your own convictions of duty, not the writer's, are to dictate to you in this instance. But it is my duty to speak of this and to leave it to yourselves, whether you are fulfilling your duties as members of Religious Societies, when you absent yourselves, with no good excuse, from the stated meetings of the Sabbath, or the week.

But, again—you will cultivate one of the essential means and forms of worship, by devoting proper aid and attention to the music of the sanctuary. This is truly one of the most delightful and thrilling portions of divine service. The pouring forth of the melodious voice—the gushings of the tuneful heart—the pealing of the instrumental strain—are all calculated to melt, or to purify and elevate the spirit. The human voice is then in harmony with the works of nature, that, continually, like some great organ, with its innumerable tones and forms of music, is hymning the praises of the Creator. No one who has the faculty of music, should suffer it to remain hushed and idle in the house of God. Consider—Who has tuned your soul to sweet accordances with harmonious strains, and made your lips eloquent with the majesty of song? God! And will you refrain from employing that gift, in sweet sacrifices and offerings of devotion to him—in pouring forth your gratitude and your praise in floods of sweet melody? Music!—it is a high and glorious faculty, calculated to add to the enjoyment and refinement of life—but this is not all. It forms a deep and delightful portion of our religious service through life. It is a lofty employment of the ranks of the redeemed. It trembles over the golden wires of celestial harps, and stirs the leaves that bend with their immortal greenness in the region of the blessed!

To this delightful exercise, I call your attention. It should not rest on a few. It should burst from the lips and the hearts of the whole vast congregation. Let all whose spirits have been at all tuned to the breathings of harmony—who are at all capable of pouring out their voices in sounds of music, join in this service; and let those who have not these gifts, make music in their souls. Duty, gratitude, nature, and reason, and revelation, all call upon you to improve this part of religious worship.

Once more;—in order that you may cherish and cultivate the means and forms of religious worship, you should contribute to the support of that worship by your means. I can conceive of a disposition to which a reasonable contribution of pecuniary gifts for the maintenance of religious worship, instead of being a tax, would be a pleasure. Spiritual in its nature, religious worship, according to the principles of our country, must depend upon the voluntary contributions of its friends. I say voluntary contributions, because I consider in this light, all sums given for its maintenance, whether paid as rent, or as a property-tax, or bestowed directly as a boon.—They are voluntary, because the individual may place himself, at least in this portion of our land [Virginia], in a condition where he will not have to give—because the law which regulates the tax and the payment is a voluntary ordinance framed by the people for that purpose. Religious worship, then, depends for its support upon voluntary contributions, and every member of a Religious Society should expect to give this support, and, according to his means, should give cheerfully and efficiently. It is not money thrown away—it is not a mere charity-gift which can have no immediate recompense. A return is given, a rich and large return, in the privileges and blessings of religious worship—in the right of worshipping according to the dictates of conscience, each man at the altar of his own denomination. When a man bestows a pecuniary boon upon a society to which he is attached, he gives for himself, then—for his own spiritual benefit. He should look to it, that, so far as he can consistently bestow his aid, the ordinances of religion are not checked or hindered. With all our pity for the darkness of the middle ages, and all our contempt for their ignorance and superstition, there was one spirit which prevailed then, that is to be commended. I mean the care and labor which were bestowed in building their churches. Some of the noblest specimens of church-architecture, are seen in their Gothic and massy cathedrals, with their lofty and magnificent arches, their devices and their ornaments. In this respect, I think that this utilitarian, money-making age, has degenerated—at least, it has not excelled them.—And so with other modes by which religious worship is maintained. It is a commendable spirit that shows itself willing to contribute to this support. Every man, young or old, who is at all able, should contribute to the support of some Religious Society—should aid in rendering its house of worship commodious and appropriate, and in supporting the other modes by which this worship is maintained. The members of a Religious Society, then, should cherish and cultivate the means and forms of religious worship. "Let all things be done decently, and in order." We will continue our remarks in another number.

POETRY.

From the American Monthly.

IMPROMPTU ON A SPRIG OF HEATH.

It grew not in that golden clime
Where painted birds, in bowers as gay,
Their notes on tropic breezes chime,
While Nature keeps her holiday!
'Neath northern skies its leaflets first
Expanding to the wooing air,
And, in the lonely wild-wood nurst,
It learn'd the northern blasts to bear.

Transplanted from its simple home—
By rocky dell or wind-swept hill—
Like birds in stranger climes that roam,
And keep their native wood-notes still—
Still in its modest vesture dressed
It blooms, unchanged with change of scene,
An emblem on its wearer's breast
Of Truth and Purity within.

WASPS THE FIRST PAPER-MAKERS.—The wasp is a paper maker, and a most perfect and intelligent one. While mankind were arriving by slow degrees, at the art of fabricating this valuable substance, the wasp was making it before their eyes, by very much the same process as that by which human hands now manufacture it with the best aid of chemistry and machinery.—While some nations carved their records on wood, and stone, and brass, and leaden tablets,—others, more advanced, wrote with a style on wax,—others employed the inner bark of trees, and others the skins of animals rudely prepared,—the wasp was manufacturing a firm and durable paper. Even when the papyrus was rendered more fit, by a process of art, for the transmission of ideas in writing, the wasp was a better artisan than the Egyptians; for the early attempts at paper making were so rude, that the substance produced was almost useless, from being extremely friable. The paper of the papyrus was formed of the leaves of the plant, dried, pressed, and polished; the wasp alone knew how to reduce vegetable fibres to a pulp, and then unite them by a size or glue, spreading the substance out into a smooth and delicate leaf. This is exactly the process of paper making. It would seem that the wasp knows, as the modern paper makers now know, that the fibres of rags, whether linen or cotton, are not the only materials that can be used in the formation of paper; she employs other vegetable matters, converting them into a proper consistency by her assiduous exertions. In some respects she is more skilful even than our paper makers, for she takes care to retain her fibres of sufficient length, by which she renders her paper as strong as she requires. Many manufacturers of the present day cut their material into small bits, and thus produce a rotten article. One great distinction between good and bad paper is its toughness; and this difference is invariably produced by the fibre of which it is composed being long, and therefore tough; or short and therefore friable.

The wasp has been laboring at her manufacture of paper, from her first creation, with precisely the same instruments and the same materials; and her success has been unvarying. Her machinery is very simple, and therefore it is never out of order. She learns nothing and she forgets nothing. Men, from time to time, lose their excellence in particular arts, and they are slow in finding out real improvements. Such improvements are often the effect of accident. Paper is now manufactured very extensively by machinery, in all its stages; and thus, instead of a single sheet being made by hand, a stream of paper is poured out, which would form a roll large enough to extend round the globe, if such a length were desirable. The inventors of this machine, Messrs. Fourdrinier, it is said, spent the enormous sum of 40,000*l.* in vain attempts to render the machine capable of determining with precision the width of the roll; and, at last, accomplished their object, at the suggestion of a bystander, by a strap revolving upon an axis, at the cost of three shillings and sixpence. Such is the difference between the workings of human knowledge and experience, and those of animal instinct. We proceed slowly and in the dark—but our course is not bounded by a narrow line, for it seems difficult to say what is the perfection of any art; animals go clearly to a given point—but they can go no further. We may, however, learn something from their perfect knowledge of what is within their range. It is not improbable that if man had attended in an earlier state of society to the labors of wasps, he would have sooner known how to make paper. We are still behind in our arts and sciences, because we have not always been observers. If we had watched the operations of insects, and the structure of animals in general, with more care, we might have been far advanced in the knowledge of many arts, which are yet in their infancy, for nature has given us abundance of patterns.

WILD REVENGE.—On the shores of Mull a craig is pointed out, overhanging the sea, concerning which there is the following tradition:—Some centuries since, the chief of the district, Maclean of Lochbuy, had a grand hunting excursion. To grace the festivity, his lady attended with her only child, an infant in the nurse's arms. The deer, driven by the hounds, and hemmed in by surrounding rocks, flew to a narrow pass, the only outlet they could find. Here the chief had placed one of his men to guard the deer from passing, but the animals rushed with such impetuosity, that the poor forerunner could not withstand them. In the rage of the moment, Maclean threatened the man with instant death, but this punishment was commuted to a whipping or scourging in the face of his clan, which, in those feudal times, was considered a degrading punishment, fit only for the lowest of menials and the worst of crimes. The clansman burned with anger and revenge. He rushed forward, plucked the tender infant, the heir of Lochbuy, from the hands of the nurse, and bounding to the rocks, in a moment stood on an almost inaccessible cliff projecting over the water. The screams of the agonized mother and chief at the awful jeopardy in which their only child was placed may be easily conceived. Maclean implored the man to give him back his son, and expressed his deep contrition for the degradation he had, in a moment of excitement, inflicted on his clansman. The other replied, that the only condition on which he would consent to the restitution was, that Maclean himself should bare his back to the cord, and be publicly scourged as he had been! In despair the chief consented, saying he would submit to anything if his child were but restored. To the grief and astonishment of the clan, Maclean bore this insult, and when it was completed, begged that the clansman might return from his perilous situation with the young chief. The man regarded him with a smile of demoniac revenge, and lifting high the child in the air, plunged with him in the abyss below. The sea closed over them, and neither, it is said, ever emerged from the tempestuous whirlpools and basaltic caverns that yawned around them, and still threaten the inexperienced navigator on the shores of Mull.—Inverness Courier.

WEIGHT OF THE ATMOSPHERE.—The earth's surface contains, in round numbers, 200,020,000 square miles; and, as every square mile contains 27,876,400 square feet, there must be 5,575,980,000,000 square feet on the earth's surface; which number multiplied by 2160 pounds, the pressure on each square foot, gives 12,143,468,800,000,000 pounds for the pressure, or whole weight of the atmosphere. Reckoning the surface of a middle sized man to be about 14 square feet, the pressure he sustains from the atmosphere is equal to 30,240 lbs. Troy, or 11 tons 2 cwt. and 18 1-2 lbs.

SAFE SEAL.—A letter closed with the white of an egg can not be opened by the steam of boiling water, like a common wafer, as the heat only adds to its firmness.

EPITHETS.—It is necessary that the epithet should increase the meaning of the word to which it is annexed; without this effect, terms are multiplied without any use. We should be cautious and sparing, likewise, in their admission. Quintilian compares a composition overcharged with epithets, to a company of soldiers whose number of suttlers is equal to their number of fighting men; in which case an addition is made to the troop without increasing its effective force.

INDUSTRY.—Seneca, in his letters to Lucilius, assures him, there was not a day in which he did not either write something, or read and epitomize some good author.

DRUNKENNESS.—Drunkenness in a man is detestable—in a woman appalling. The effects of intemperance are not confined to the race of the present day, but descend to future generations. A drunkard not only destroys himself body and soul, but leaves behind him a weak and degenerate progeny, if not afflicted with that "hereditary disease."

HAYDN.—The poet Carpana once asked his friend Haydn, how it happened that his church music was always of an animating, cheerful, and even gay description. To this, Haydn's answer was, "I can not make it otherwise; I write according to the thoughts which I feel; when I think upon God, my heart is so full of joy, that the notes dance and leap, as it were, from my pen; and since God has given me a cheerful heart, it will easily be forgiven me that I serve him with a cheerful spirit."

Socrates being asked the way to honest fame, replied, "Study to be what you wish to seem."

DEATHS.

In Salem, Steuben county, Indiana, on March 2d, 1840, Mr. WILLIAM WARREN WHEELER, aged 29 years. Mr. Wheeler was formerly a resident of Mr. Pleasant, Pa. About three years ago he emigrated to the West. His intellectual and moral worth had secured for him the respect and esteem of all his numerous acquaintances. And as his parents, brothers, sisters and other relatives, reside at Mr. Pleasant, it was thought advisable to have a sermon delivered at that place suitable to the occasion of his death. The Methodists were requested for the privilege of occupying their church on this occasion and they promptly refused—and we were necessitated to occupy the school house. As Esq. Wheeler (the father of the deceased,) and his family are among the most respectable people in Wayne county, that refusal was dictated by none other than a pharisaical spirit. We understand that the Methodists themselves have such a high respect for Esq. Wheeler, that they have even importuned him to join their church without a change of principle! In justice to the Methodist society in that place, I will say that many of them disavowed the trustees for refusing the Universalists the privilege of the house, as they were not to occupy it themselves; and, indeed, such conduct should receive the disapprobation of every Christian. The deceased has left the companion of his bosom to mourn her loss; we understand she is a member of the Methodist church. May this reprehensible act on the part of her brethren induce her to inquire, what spirit they are of—whether they be of God? May she investigate impartially the sacred oracles, and receive a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Then will she realize that friends part on earth to meet in heaven; and she will joyfully look forward to that happy country.

"Where sickness never comes,
And death no more complains;
Health triumphs in immortal bloom,
And purest pleasure reigns."

The consolations of the Gospel were administered to this afflicted family in connection with a large congregation of sympathizing friends, on the 23d inst., by the writer, from these words—"He shall return no more in his house, neither shall his place know him any more." Job vii: 10.

H. TORREY.

In New-Hartford, January 8th, 1840, Mrs. ALMIRA THOMPSON, aged 31 years. The deceased was well instructed in the Scriptures, and by them made strong in the faith of universal salvation. In this faith she lived, was guided by it in her practice, and died rejoicing in its hope and consolation.

A. B. G.

Very suddenly in Stafford, April 13th, Mr. SAMUEL L. CHAMPLIN, aged 45 years. The funeral was attended at the stone meeting house on the 15th. Sermon by the writer.

FATE AND FREE AGENCY.

BY G. W. MONTGOMERY.

PUBLISHED BY REQUEST.

"Therefore to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." James iv: 17.

The subject chosen for consideration, is one of importance. Consequently it is one which demands great caution in its examination—the more caution from the fact, that there are points about it, which no human wisdom can fully explain or make clear to the understanding. Whether there is any difference between absolute foreknowledge and absolute decree—whether every act which man performs is fixed in the chains of fate, and can not be otherwise than it is—or whether man is free to act as he pleases—are questions which have long agitated the Christian world. At the present time, we shall endeavor to avoid all speculation in regard to them—shall avoid all those parts of them which are not comprehensible by finite faculties—shall reject only those points which are clearly opposed to scripture and reason—and shall receive none others, but those which are obviously true.

The doctrine of necessity, or that God "foreordains whatsoever comes to pass," or that every action of man is decreed and can not be otherwise than it is, is a doctrine to which we can not give full assent. To affirm that sinners; the intemperate man, the noted debauchee, the notorious tyrant; in fact, vicious people of all grades, are just what they are decreed to be; that they can not act otherwise than they do act; is, to all intents and purposes a vicious doctrine. For, if an individual should have a congregation before him, composed entirely of criminals, and he should begin his communication by telling them that they have conducted just as God decreed they should conduct, and that they can not conduct otherwise than he has decreed, and should then exhort them to turn from their evil deeds, of what avail would his exhortation be? They could not obey that exhortation, though it should move them to tears and excite in them warm desire to become better, because fate had ordered otherwise. To tell a vicious person that his life is just as God decreed it, is to confirm him in his wickedness, to take away resolves for reformation, and to chain him in his sins by a belief in a fate, which throws such blight over the energies of the Moslem people.

It is a well-known fact, that the Bible, on almost every page, exhorts people to turn from their wickedness and to embrace virtue. And in multitudes of places, the voice of the Lord in the language of the prophets, is heard, calling and beseeching sinners to forsake their wickedness and walk in the way of holiness. But if the sinner is fastened to his conduct by stern fate, of what avail are such calls? They are mere mockery. Besides, it can not be possible that a God of all wisdom and affection, would constitute some of his children to sin according to absolute decree, and then deliberately command them to pursue another course of conduct, which, he knew, they were unable to pursue. This is not possible, because it represents him as endeavoring to procure conduct in his creatures, which is exactly opposite to his predetermined decree.

It is not unfrequently the case, that the creed which advocates that all things are foreordained, also advocates endless misery for the wicked. These two points united, form a doctrine at once opposed by the nature of Deity and the tenor of scripture. Can it for a moment be sustained, that Deity would foreordain exactly how a person should act, and then inform him, that if he did not pursue a path contrary to that foreordination, he would be punished with ceaseless woe? Take a vicious person—now if God absolutely foreordains whatsoever comes to pass, that person can not do otherwise than be vicious. And to doom that person to ceaseless woe for not doing that which it was decreed he should not do, and for doing that which decree prevented him avoiding, is wanton cruelty which belongs not to the divine character. What should we think of a parent, who should chain his child beyond the possibility of freedom, and then command him to walk ten miles, informing him at the same time, that if he did not obey the command, he would destroy him? We should call his conduct great cruelty. Is it not infinitely greater cruelty to bring a person into the world, force him into a certain kind of conduct, and then inform him that if he does not perform what decree has rendered him unable to perform, he will be chained in endless night? Nothing could be more unjust, and nothing more thoroughly destructive of all the moral accountability which the Scriptures represent man as possessing.

We can not then believe that all the actions of men are decreed; or that those actions, if evil, are followed by ceaseless woe. We must reject this doctrine because it is contrary to scripture and reason. That God is a sovereign, we do not deny—that he rules and reigns in the universe, we joyously acknowledge—that all his plans are wise, and that he has adopted adequate means to execute those plans, according to his good pleasure and will, is firmly believed—that his government is exerted over the children of men, is at once admitted—but that he decrees one thing and commands men to act another; or that he renders any person endlessly miserable for inability to perform a certain line of conduct, we most unequivocally reject.

In opposition to the doctrine of fate or decree, it is believed by many that man is a "free agent;" that he has perfect freedom to choose the good and refuse the evil; and that if he is lost, it is entirely his own fault. This view of the subject, we think equally faulty with the other, though not apparently so. For it does not appear reasonable that the all-wise God would hang the infinite destiny of man upon the feeble and changeable conduct of a worm of the dust, when he positively knew that man would abuse "free agency" to his irrevocable ruin. Besides, so far as cruelty is concerned, I can not perceive any great difference between decree and free agency, if ceaseless woe is true. For what mighty difference is there between absolutely decreeing an individual to ruin, and giving him a "free agency" which it is foreknown will infallibly lead to that result? The only difference is, that in the case of decree, God effects the ruin of his creature by an irreversible act of his power; while in the case of "free agency," he secures the same object by giving man a power which will eventuate in his ruin. So that the result is the same, though the means to produce it are a little varied.

It is frequently said, that, as man possesses "free agency," it will be his own fault if he is lost; since he has perfect freedom to choose salvation or damnation. But this is a mistake. The penalty of the law is said to be endless misery. Now, neither the "free agency," or the will of man created that penalty—it was, admit-ing it to be true, an act of the law-giver. And if a law has a cruel penalty attached to it, the fault lies, not with the criminal, but with the law-giver. That endless misery is a cruel infliction of pain for the privilege of using "free agency" for a few years, is very evident to sound reflection. And it is contrary to scripture; for we are told, that God will reward every man according to his works—that many stripes will be inflicted on him who is deserving of them, and few stripes on him who is less sinful—while all punishment is inflicted for a good end, viz., the ultimate reformation of all offenders.

If man is a "free agent," and his "free agency," in myriads of instances, will result in his endless ruin, there can be no mercy or propriety in giving to man such a power. Let us suppose that an individual is intemperate, and that he only lacks means to indulge his habit in its worst forms—let us also suppose him ragged and hungry. Now, if a benevolent man should give him a sum of money to remove his hunger and clothe his body, being at the same time positively convinced that the intemperate man will spend it in the most reckless indulgence of his passions and depraved appetites, would he be justified in giving that money? He might plead that he gave the money for the good object of feeding and clothing the man—but the fact would come back upon him with all its pungency, "did you not know that he would apply the money for a bad purpose?" Under such circumstances, it becomes a sin to give money. It is not right for the person giving, and it is great wrong to the person given to. To apply these considerations: Before the earth was created or man was formed, God knew all things—he knew how man would act, and how he would use the "free agency" given him; for "known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." This truth is freely admitted by all sects. Now, if Deity foresaw that the "free agency" which he gave to man, would be used for a very bad purpose and ultimate in the endless ruin of man, would he have given that agency? It is in vain to urge that Deity gave that agency for a good purpose—he knew that it would be used for a bad purpose—and under such circumstances, was it right or just to give it? No parent will give a liberty to his child, when he knows that his child will use his liberty to walk into the fire and be burned up—nor has the divine Author of existence, give a freedom to his children, which he knew would be used only to bring endless ruin. It may be urged, that these same objections apply equally well to an agency which produces finite evil, as to one which produces an infinite evil. But if finite evil will ultimately be overruled for universal good, and the purification and blessing of every son and daughter of Adam, the question assumes an entirely different form, from what it does, when the agency is to result in endless and unmitigated evil; and the same reasoning is not to be applied to it. We might as well argue, that the same reasoning which may be urged against the cruelty of a surgeon who mangles a patient only to make him suffer, may with the same propriety be urged against the conduct of a surgeon who takes off the limb of a patient, from the humane motive of saving his life. Pain as an end, and pain as a means, are two entirely different things—pain as an end, proves that the Being who inflicts it, is cruel; pain as means producing a good end, proves that the Being who punishes to reform, is good. With this view, how beautiful are the declarations, "the Lord will not cast off forever;" "he will not keep his anger forever;" "he will have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies;" he "will wipe tears from off all faces;" he "will swallow up death in victory;" "his mercies are over all his works."

We will admit for a moment, that man is a "free agent"—that he possesses "free agency" in the strictest sense of the phrase. From whence came that "free agency?" From the Being who created us. This will be freely admitted by all sects. It will also be admitted, that God has a plan in reference to the ultimate destiny of man; for Paul remarks, "this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." 1 Tim. ii: 1-6. And, in order to fulfil this plan, he sent his Son to be the "Saviour of the world," and to "taste death for every man." This plan must have been formed in his own deliberate wisdom; for Deity forms no plan hastily, or without the intention of fulfilling it. Is it consistent with correct views of the divine government, to affirm that Deity has formed a plan for the ultimate redemption of all men, and then has deliberately given to man a "free agency," which he knew would thwart that plan, and render it null and void forever, in regard to myriads of the human race? The very idea, that the will of the creature will become supreme over the will of the Creator, is absurd. For the will of God is infinite; commands all ways and means—the will of man is finite, and bounded to the comparatively little speck of matter on which he moves. Now let man be opposed to the Creator—can there be any doubt who will succeed? If God rules "in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth"—if he will do all his pleasure—and if his word shall not return unto him void—surely he can "gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth; even in him."

But it may be inquired if we expect men to be saved contrary to their will? By no means! He who reads all hearts and knows the best motives to influence human will; who understands what appliances and means will turn the children of men to himself, as the waters of the rivers are turned to the ocean; will so govern and place truth before his children, so operate upon the affections of men, and so win them by truth; that, to use the language of the Psalmist, "thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power," cx: 3: while "all the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship him." Ps. xxii: 27.

From these remarks, it must be seen, that we dissent from the common doctrines of "fate" and "free agency;" especially, when connected with the doctrine of endless misery. But it may be inquired if man has no liberty of will, no freedom of action; if he is not a "free agent?" I grant, that, to a certain extent, man has power to choose between good and evil; or rather, he possess power to practice either good or evil; though he has no right to do evil; for God has not conferred such a right upon any person whatever. But on the ground that man has power to do good or evil, does not a difficulty arise? It is admitted by all sects, that God foreknows all things. Is not foreknowledge synonymous with decree? And if God foreknows a thing, must it not come to pass exactly as he foreknows it? This cannot be denied! Where then is the difference between foreknowledge and decree? This is a point which human mind can not grasp—for this abstract question, being beyond human intellect, is a mystery. I confess that I can not fathom it. And I shall not, therefore, dwell upon it, because, if I should discuss it, I should be obliged to conclude by affirming that it is a mystery. I prefer to dwell upon such facts of the case as are within the reach of our capacities.

Every where in the Bible, man is addressed as a being possessed of moral power—he is exhorted to forsake the evil and practice the good. Multitudes of precepts and commands, in reference to this point, might be adduced were it necessary. Now it must be evident, that man would not thus be called to forsake evil and practice good, unless there was a difference between foreknowledge and decree, and man had power to obey. In addition to this, when we behold an individual resisting the most powerful temptation or shaking off the chains of vice; when we behold him turning without hesitation from wealth gained by fraud, resting satisfied with a small competency and a pure conscience; when we behold individuals, in the fervor of patriotism, sacrificing health, wealth and life, in the defence of the liberty and the rights of the world; when we behold individuals, shaking off worldly ease, to go forth in the cause of benevolence and humanity; when we behold men in a thousand situations, turning from vice to cling to virtue; we behold the nobility of the moral power which God has given to men; and we have the demonstration of fact, that there is a difference between foreknowledge and decree, though we may not be able to define that difference. We conclude then, that man has sufficient moral freedom to turn from evil and cling to good. The calls of God upon his chosen people, and the calls of the Saviour and his apostles upon the world, to turn from sin and walk in the paths of righteousness, demonstrate the position here taken. And if the Bible sustains us, we need not fear the soundness of our views on this subject. But though we cordially believe that man has moral power, yet we see no propriety in expressing that fact by the phrase "free agency." What is a "free agent?" Suppose an individual places in the hands of another individual one thousand dollars, and then says to him, "spend this money as you please, for your own and my benefit," he, the receiver of the money, is obviously a "free agent," because he has no directions as to the manner in which the money shall be spent. And if he spends the money and so errs in judgment or conduct as to lose it, he is not accountable to the person who gave him the money. But if he was told how he must spend the money, then he is no longer a free, but an accountable agent, and if he departs from the instructions given him, he is justly liable to punishment. Now, in the light of this illustration, there is no "free agency" among the subjects of the divine government. To whom has God given the right of using his moral powers and faculties as he pleases? So far from this being the case, God has told us how we must use our moral powers. And when we deviate from his instructions, he visits us with certain and unescapable punishment. In the parable of the talents, the individual who had five talents and put them to such use as to gain five other talents, was amply rewarded—but he who had one talent and hid it in the ground, was punished. Had he a right to do as he pleased with his one talent? Certainly not! So far from being "free agents," we are accountable for all our actions. Hence, in the divine government we are moral accountable agents.

That is; we are accountable so far as our knowledge extends. Man is judged according to that which he hath, and not according to that which he hath not. I can conceive of an individual, so born and brought up in evil influences, as to no longer have the power of right choice between evil and good, because evil companions, sinful education and a continual contact with vice, have so deadened the moral sensibilities as to give them an entirely wrong direction. A man may believe that wrong motives are correct ones, and follow them as right; though the cases are comparatively rare. Some of the most dexterous thieves in London, have been taught all the arts of stealing from early infancy, and when successful, have been applauded and rewarded by their parents, until they have adopted the principle that it is their right to prey upon community. For centuries there existed in India a vast community of murderers who were denominated Thugs, whose system was unveiled by Lord William Bentinck, Governor General of India. Thugs acted from the dictates of their religion—their goddess, Blowanee commanded them, they thought, to murder—this was a part of their worship. And their children were educated and prepared for murder; and if their first act was dexterously performed, they were caressed and rewarded. The Hindoo mother, if she sets apart a child to be sacrificed in the waters of the Ganges, thinks that she commits a crime if she fails to execute her vow. Now, where the moral sense is thus deadened by a false and pernicious education, no right choice between good and evil can be exercised. For is the child empowered to say in what society it shall be born and what education it shall receive? Nor can we say, in such cases, that they are morally accountable—on the principle which the Saviour advanced to the Pharisees, "if ye were blind, ye should have no sin; but now ye say, we see; therefore your sin remaineth." John ix: 41. But yet, the physical, evil results, which flow from a state of things already described, prove that they form not the right condition for human beings to obtain happiness.

Even ourselves are surrounded by decrees and circumstances over which we have not the least control. It was decreed that we should be born on earth—it was decreed that we should die—it was decreed, that in order to live, we must eat and drink—it was decreed that we should be human beings—we have no power to choose the society in which to be born, or of the manner in which we are governed and educated. In fact, there are thousands of facts and things around us, which are the result of decree, over which we have not the slightest control, nor can we alter them one hair. Even our existence as moral agents is a decree of God. It may sound strange to say that moral agency is the decree of God. But such is the case, or man would not have been a moral agent. There being many things on earth, the abuse of which produces great evil, God decreed that man should have, and actually gave to him a moral power, which, according to the knowledge obtained, decides between right and wrong, and enables its possessor to choose good and reject evil. This power is necessary for the well-being of man on earth—it causes him to avoid those things which appear to him vicious, according to the standard of right set up in his own conscience and the community in which he lives. But while we believe that men possess this moral power, yet we do not, and we can not believe that God has given any power to man whereby he can thwart the will or purpose of the Almighty in regard to man's ultimate destiny. It is clearly the purpose of God to raise men from death and crown them with immortality. And it is as clearly his purpose to fit and prepare the human family for the noble gift of unceasing happiness in another state of being. Hence Paul said, that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," 2 Cor. v: 19; and that "it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven." Col. 1: 19, 20. And we have no fears that the wise Master-builder of the universe has so constituted man as that he will destroy this plan and thwart the will of his Creator.

It will be seen from these remarks, that that individual is in the best situation to exert his moral power, whose knowledge of right and wrong is greatest, and whose affections are the most highly cultivated. A keen discernment of what is vicious and what will lead to vice, as well as a clear understanding of virtue in all its forms, connected with a love for holiness and a desire to walk in righteousness, are noble stepping-stones to a stern denial of sin and a vigorous practice of religion. The more thoroughly an individual becomes acquainted with the forms of virtue, traces the effects which are consequent upon their practice, and discovers the true nobility which a conscientious discharge of duty confers upon the intellect and the affections of human nature, the better prepared is that individual to exercise his moral power in purifying his soul and raising the excellency of his conduct. And however humble may be the sphere of life to which a person may be called; however small the circle of his influence; and however he may pass unnoticed down the current of life amid the great throngs of the world; yet if he keeps his moral power in activity and performs his duty faithfully, he is great in the moral kingdom of the Saviour, and his reward will be abundant.

The Bible is the great school in which to learn our duty; in which to educate our moral power to its greatest extent; in which to receive encouragement while we attempt to choose the good and refuse the evil. There the moral laws of Christianity are unfolded, from the sublime precept of loving God and our neighbors, to the propriety of cherishing pure thoughts; from the essence of all virtue in the form of doing unto others as we would have others do unto us, to the duty of judging justly of the actions of our fellow-beings. And it represents to us, that human nature is never so dignified or human beings half so glorious, as when adorned with good works and warmed with the spirit of the Saviour. Could there be a nobler sight than that of the prophet Samuel, when he stood up in the presence of all Israel, and in the integrity of having well used his moral agency, said, "I am old and grey-headed; and, behold, my sons are with you; and I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day—behold, here I am; witness against me before the Lord, and before his anointed; whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed; or of whose hand have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith? and I will restore it you. And they said, thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand." 1 Sam. xii: 2, 3, 4. Or could there be a more touching scene or one of greater moral grandeur, than that when the apostle Paul took his farewell of the Church in Ephesus, and in the consciousness of his integrity, said, "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel," Acts xx: 33—"for I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God," verse 27. Here we find a full and noble use of their moral agency in all its power.

While then, we remember that an abuse of our moral agency, must be followed by punishment, and that a conscientious use of it will be well rewarded, let us ever pray for integrity of purpose and purity of action.*

* The above discourse will exhibit my views of "fate" and "free agency," to the satisfaction, I trust, of the individual who wrote to me last season concerning this subject, from Marathon, N. Y. G. W. M.

THE BEAVER.—Practice, says Captain Bonneville, has given such a quickness of eye to the experienced trapper in all that relates to his pursuit, that he can detect the slightest sign of a beaver, however wild; and, although the ledge may be concealed by close thickets and overhanging willows, he can generally at a single glance make an accurate guess at the number of its inmates. He now goes to work to set his trap, planting it upon the shore in some chosen place, two or three inches below the surface of the water, and secures it by a chain to a pole in the mud. A small twig is then stripped of its bark, and one end is dipped in the 'medicine,' as the trappers call the peculiar bait which they employ. This end of the stick rises about four inches above the surface of the water, the other end is planted between the jaws of the trap. The beaver, possessing an acute sense of smell, is soon attracted by the odor of the bait. As he raises his nose towards it, his foot is caught in the trap. In his fright, he throws a somersault in the deep water. The trap being fastened to the pole resists all his efforts to drag it to the shore, the chain by which it is fastened defies his teeth, he struggles for a time, and at length sinks to the bottom and is drowned. Occasionally it happens that several members of a beaver family are trapped in succession. The survivors then become exceedingly shy, and can scarcely be brought to 'medicine,' to use the trapper's phrase for 'taking the bait.' In such case, the trapper gives up the use of the bait, and conceals his traps in the usual paths and crossing places of the household. The beaver being now completely 'up to trap,' approaches them cautiously, and springs them ingeniously with a stick. At other times, he turns the traps bottom upwards by the same means, and occasionally even drags them to the barrier and conceals them in the mud. The trapper now gives up the contest of ingenuity, and shouldering his traps marches off admitting that he is not yet 'up to beaver.'—Adventures of Capt. Bonneville.

CAMPBELL AND SKINNER'S DISCUSSION.

This work is now out of press, and ready for sale, wholesale and retail, at the Bookstore of Br. Hutchinson, 41 Genesee st. Copies will be forwarded immediately to other Bookstores kept by Universalists, as in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, etc. Retail price $1.00—for 436 large 12mo pages.

To the readers of the Magazine and Advocate for the past three years, nothing need be said in favor of this work—they know its origin, its progress and its termination—they watched its appearance with eagerness and rejoiced when truth triumphed, by it, over a powerful and subtle foe. Many of them will doubtless purchase it in the book form, for the convenience of reading it all at once in regular order—and others, will get a copy for the use of some relative or friend, or to circulate in their respective neighborhoods. To those who may not be acquainted with the columns of the Magazine and Advocate for some time past, I will briefly add, that this controversy originated in Mr. Campbell's own periodical. Some one had been reading Universalist books, probably Balfour's Inquiries, and put some questions to Mr. Campbell about the meaning of the words rendered Hell; which questions Mr. Campbell answered favorably to our views, but intimated that certain other passages of Holy Writ taught endless woe. Br. G. W. Montgomery of Auburn, thereupon wrote a letter of inquiry, which Mr. Campbell answered. Some time after, Br. Montgomery requested leave of Mr. Campbell to continue the inquiries, and was told that if he would get a substitute, Mr. C. would go into discussion, provided he (Mr. C.) did not get into a discussion of the important question in Boston. Mr. C. got into no such discussion, and accordingly, Br. M. selected Mr. Skinner as his substitute and the discussion was proposed. After various attempts to change it, and numerous delays, Mr. Campbell went into the field, and was at last most effectually beaten, on two of the most important points by his own notes and comments, taken from his amended version of the New Testament. Such is a history of the discussion, now published in a large, well printed book, and offered at a very low price.

It only remains to add, that the publisher is pledged to devote all the profits arising from the work to charitable purposes. A. B. G.

LA MARGUERITE.....No. IV.

To the Young Ladies of the Clinton Liberal Institute.

Dear Girls—It is rather to a continuation of the last subject, than to a new one, that I ask your attention in this paper. It was my purpose in the last, to remind you that we can not neglect the cultivation of those powers which distinguish us from lower orders of existence, without ingratitude towards Heaven, and injustice to ourselves. I wished to persuade you, that intellectual attainments are necessary to you, that they ought to constitute one of the objects for which you live; one of your most efficient means of doing good; and one of your best reasons for being happy.

If you reflect sufficiently upon the consequences of a disregard of mental improvement, and upon the little opportunity which the duties and employments of your future lives, will be likely to afford you, for any connected course of study; you can not but be sensible of the importance of allowing nothing to divert you from the purpose, for which you are at school. It is not enough that you are generally in your place, in the school-room, and at the recitation; there must be a love of knowledge, and a sense of its importance, or you are ever liable to be drawn away from the pursuit of it; by your own caprice, or at the will, or through the influence of others. We do not often hear of the failure of any reasonable undertaking, if the person engaged in it, has a love for the pursuit, and is deeply impressed with a view of the advantages it is able to confer. So it is in the attainment of an education. There may be difficulties in the way of both scholar and teacher; but they can be removed. Indolence may be overcome, indifference itself interested, and even dulness improved; if the form that knowledge is made to wear, has sufficient loveliness to engage the affections and sufficient "divinity," to inspire worship as well as love.

But the misfortune is, knowledge does not always wear this form, to the apprehension of the learner. It is too often personified as a being who sets difficult tasks; and reserves rewards and honors for those, only, who are willing to sacrifice all present enjoyment for their sake. And then some readier inclination than the inclination to study, assumes a lovelier appearance, and wins the devotion due to higher pursuits.

It is my intention in this number, to warn you against one of these seductive forms. I have found during my long acquaintance with school-girls, that there is one, more to be feared than any other. It is the love of society, joined with an exaggerated opinion of the pleasures and advantages, that society affords. I beg that I may not be misunderstood. In speaking reprehensively of an immoderate love of society, I do not speak evil of the social principle; and whatever I may urge against this very natural propensity, will be founded upon the universally admitted truth, that things not only innocent in themselves, but even pleasurable and necessary, may by an unwise apprehension of their nature and design, become to us sources of evil. If you ask for illustrations, they are every where around you and perfectly intelligible. Even our "needful food," will act as poison, if taken to excess, or when the physical system does not require it. The pure water, nature's own beverage, may be quaffed too copiously, or at an improper moment. And so numerous are the parallels to these instances, in every department of nature, that wisdom consists, not so much in knowing what things are proper for us; as how, and when, and to what extent, we are to use them.

Society has, indeed, its pleasures and its advantages; but they have been painted to your imaginations in too glowing a light, if, by a constant anticipation of them, or a willingness to give them an undue proportion of your time, you are prevented from attaining that knowledge, and those graces, which society demands of its individual members. Can you conceive of a situation more truly lamentable, than to fill a place in which you might become the favorite of refined circles, and the delight of true hearts—where you might aid the cause of education, and the sacred interests of religion, by the influence of your character; and win all hearts to the love of virtue, by the gracefulness of your well-doing; but for one reason? You were so dazzled in your early youth, by romantic ideas of the world you were about to enter, and so eager to mingle in it, that you qualified yourselves neither for its responsibilities, nor its enjoyments. This is no idle dream, young ladies. It is a living reality; one that you will meet but too often in your intercourse with the world.

How few there are, dear girls—how very few, who can say in view of the good they are able to effect; or the enjoyments they are permitted to share, that they have done all they could of the one, and realized all they might of the other. Other reasons, perhaps, might be assigned as causes, for these failures in human life; but in my interest for you, I can think only of that error in education which, while it would seek to give you all external accomplishment, and even all conformity to the principles of virtue, neglects the best means to promote both; the waking up of the discriminating, the pure, and the graceful, in your thoughts. But this would involve application to study and reflection. It would be to ask the young mind to forego some of its dreams of social pleasure, in order to develop its own internal resources of strength and joy.

One morning, many years ago, in England, a reverend man took his way to one of the old baronial castles of the country. As he passed along the border of the wide park, he heard merry echoes among the trees, and saw in the distance the fleet game and the gay pursuit. He passed leisurely on, for he anticipated a lonely hour at the hall; and great was his surprise to find the flower of that high-born family—the loveliest princess of the house of Tudor, sitting alone, and reading from a volume before her, in the language of classic Greece. "And why, dear lady Jane," said he, "have you chosen so dull an employment, when all your friends are seeking amusement in the park?" "Because," said the maiden, "I find more pleasure in reading Plato, than they do in the gaieties of the chase." "And how," he continued, with still greater surprise, "have you learned wisdom so unusual with your age and sex?" "My parents," she replied, "are harsh in their guardianship—they treat my faults with the utmost severity; I tremble when I approach them; but my tutor is always kind, and I have gratefully applied myself to the pursuits which he has recommended, and found them true sources of happiness."

In those true sources of happiness, that young princess found the true principles of conduct, and the true secret of making herself the beloved of all hearts. The graces of her character wrought for her a far more enduring peace, than the king—ly one she was briefly constrained to wear. There is not a more thrilling page in English history, than the one which tells that the Lady Jane Grey, at the early age of eighteen, went to the death prepared for her by the ambition of others, with an uncomplaining spirit, and a fortitude unsurpassed by any of the reverend martyrs of the age.

How strikingly beautiful do such examples appear, when contrasted with that frivolity of character, which would sacrifice the best interests of a whole life, to a love of passing vanities. Such contrasts must frequently be made by teachers; for there are some, even among those happily associated beings, denominated school-girls, who have such an inclination to be perpetually forming new acquaintances, such a wish to be known and admired, and such a love for the gay and exciting scenes of social life, that they are not only willing to neglect their own mental improvement while at school, but are very reckless of the injury they do to others, by complaining of the restrictions which teachers may find it necessary to impose.

Think of this subject, with seriousness, for one moment. A principal clause in the Constitution of this school, protects its members from the efforts of ill-judged religious zeal. But are its founders, on that account, to be considered the enemies of religion? And if a teachers should insist that it is inconsistent with the duties of school-girls, that they should give much of their time to the gaieties of society, must she be thought an enemy to social happiness? The motive in either case is to preserve the Institution true to the object for which it was founded. That object is, to afford to students, an opportunity to pursue their studies uncontrolled by the prejudices of party, and free as possible, from the counteracting influences of excitement. In this way our seminaries of learning can preserve that purely literary character, upon which their influence depends; and, at the same time, promote most faithfully, the social and moral interests of the scholar. It is the object of a school education, to store the memory with useful truths; to enlarge and refine the thoughts, by making them acquainted with the systems and the beauties of science; and to elevate, and strengthen the mind, by developing its own powers. And these things must exert a beneficial influence on the character, in all the relations of life. How careful ought we to be that the selfishness of individual feeling, does not lead us to injure the means, by which Institutions are endeavoring to effect general good. A single effort on your part will remove all difficulties from this subject. Convince yourselves so thoroughly of the value of a cultivated mind; both as it regards your own happiness, and the happiness you are to make in society; that you will have no disposition to spend the fleeting hours of school-time in an unprofitable manner. And forget not to be happy. Remember that duty is but half done, unless it be cheerfully performed; and that grace and courtesy of manner belong not to particular occasions alone, but to every hour of existence.

The sense in which I have considered the love of society, and the sense in which it is generally made the subject of advice, is a love of particular forms of it. But I do not condemn these forms. You may find not only enjoyment, but advantage in them whenever they do not injure better interests. I would make your happiness independent of them; but I would not destroy, on that account, a single pure social feeling of your nature. I would have you even more social than you naturally are; for I would have you consider yourselves always in society. I would have you purify your thoughts, and chasten your language for the ordinary intercourse of life; and find even in the material universe around you, not only subjects of conversation, but beings with whom to converse. I would have you make companions, not of your friends and acquaintances alone, but of your books, your own thoughts, "the divine and glorious arts," and the wonders and beauties of nature. Do you remember those beautiful lines in your Class Book, from Bryant's "Autumn woods?"

"My steps are not alone in these bright walks,
The sweet southwest, at play,
Flies, rustling, where the painted leaves are strewn
Along the winding way.

"And far in Heaven, the while,
The sun, that sends that gale to wander here,
Pours out on the fair earth his quiet smile,
The sweetest of the year."

Such a sense of society, and such a love of it, is richly worth your possessing. The ear is ever drinking in the harmonies of nature, and the eye is ever ready to look on its beautiful forms. Let them have their effect upon your characters, and the happiness of your lives.

"The mind,
Who, in this spirit, communes with the Forms
Of Nature, who with understanding heart
Doth know and love such objects as excite

No morbid passions, no inquietude,
No vengeance, and no hatred, needs must feel
The joy of that pure principle of love
So deeply, that, unsatisfied with aught
Less pure and exquisite, it can not choose
But seek for objects of a kindred love
In fellow-natures and a kindred joy."

READING.

This is truly called a reading age. And judging from the multitude of books which are issued from the press, one might very easily fancy that reading was done by steam, like almost every thing else. But as steam works sometimes run against a snag, so does book selling and book reading. And we verily believe that good sometimes immediately comes out of the latter. Let any man become so absorbed in money getting that he prefers counting his gold each night, to summing up his mental acquisitions, and if there was not a redeeming power even in this infatuation we should account him a pitiful object. And yet this has been too extensively the case for a few years past. And so far has it been carried that in the revulsion, and disappointment, and punishment which now succeeds it, many are compelled to be prudent, and studious, if not entirely honest. For the sake of economy even old clothes on the person of a real gentleman is becoming quite a fashionable occurrence, and if the speculation fever does not again revive in this particular crisis, so as to tempt men to make their fortunes by swapping old garments—almost the only article of traffic left—we may expect to find contentment even with a patch on the elbow, among all classes except the dandy. He of course must be included among the exceptions; for it costs him no more to cheat his tailor, than to manufacture his colloquial phrases or steal his choicest sentiments. Under these circumstances we must not wonder that there is economy even in book reading. Ask the book-seller and I venture to say you will find him fully aware of this fact.

An old customer whom he knows to be a great reader, comes into the store, merely from habit, or to indulge in a wish which he is determined not to gratify. "Good morning friend B." says Br. H., feeling particularly interested in the general diffusion of knowledge, "shall I sell you some books to-day?" "I called out of curiosity, not desirous to purchase." "I have just received some new works which I am sure it will please you to peruse." "So I perceive. You have several books that I truly wish to own, and mean to get; but really I am so poor now that I can not spare the money." "Friend B., have you read the last volumes you purchased of me?" "Yes, and all my family."—"What then do you all do with your leisure hours?" "Read the old ones again." And this is an excellent plan, when a man can not afford to enlarge his stock of books. There is more good to be obtained by perusing old volumes, if they are the right kind, than by wearing old clothes, and certainly more satisfaction.—It is better always to read old books than none at all, and sometimes the second reading is much more carefully done, and yields a vast amount of utility which the novelty or the amusement of the first denied us.

Perhaps there is no greater fault among the great mass of readers than that of reading too fast; as though a man's knowledge, or usefulness, or amusement consisted in running through or glancing at all the books that he can hear of. Such a man would work well in the same yoke with some of our fashionable student in college who divide six or eight hours each day for a year or two, equally between the Latin, Greek, French,

Hebrew, Belles lettres, Philosophy, Astronomy, Geography, Mathematics, History, Composition, and half a dozen other accomplishments, and think that a general smattering of each is better than a thorough knowledge of either. How mistaken! We have occasionally a man of powerful verbal memory who can read a work very hastily, gather all its beauties and choice sentiments, and beyond that know nothing of a single idea contained in it, or the object which the writer had in view. But where one can be benefited by this course, a thousand would render themselves ridiculous if not contemptible by their vanity and pedantry. Another fault is allowing the mind to be occupied by a little of every thing, except the book. Here is a young man who says he is not fond of reading. He thinks it is not natural to him. Most of the books he gets hold of are too deep or too abstruse for him—he can not comprehend them. And what do you think is the reason? A man is told there is a beautiful park somewhere—which, by the way, is not only untrue of this city, but probably always will be—and he concludes to take a survey of its beauties. As he does so, his eye wanders over the landscape with a careless stare, for his thoughts are employed with other matters. He sees the well pruned trees, and the vine clad arbor, but he thinks of interminable forests. He sees the cooling fountain gushing up beneath the refreshing shade, but he thinks of any thing but quiet and beauty now. He moves over the flower fringed walks, but thinks of rough roads and tedious journeys. Thus with his eyes in one place, and his thoughts in another, and retaining a faint recollection that the place which he visits, is considered a delightful one, he retires in disgust with himself. "Why" says he, "it is the most tedious walk I ever took. I can see no beauty or utility in it." This is rather a far fetched illustration, but I have not time to hunt up a better. This is what I mean. We must not expect to understand what we read, when we glance our eye over words merely, and allow our minds to be run away with in a chase after every care, and amusement and folly, that may offer to take the lead. Another fault is, reading such works only as absorb the mind for the moment and then leave it with sensations of emptiness, or throbbing with unnatural excitement. Especially of this class, is novel reading when it becomes a kind of habitual pursuit. I am not a wholesale denouncer of novel reading—I should hit myself if I was.—But where the taste for reading can not be satisfied without a novel, or where it can not be generally better suited with some other book, I think there is great need of discipline and improvement. But let us close our catalogue of faults, and examine two or three libraries belonging to as many friends. We will do so the more readily, because we shall find that it is essential that we understand both the manner of selecting a library and of using it.

The first belongs to our neighbor, Mr. Liberal. He is said to be a great patron and encourager of valuable literature, though very particular in bestowing his encouragement upon works of a substantial caste. He has indeed a splendid library, and takes great pride in having his friends improve their leisure in examining it. Knowing him to be a man of much business talent, and supposing he must possess a cultivated mind, I took occasion to ask him the other day if he had ever read all the books in his possession. "No," said he, "I have never read any one through. If I ever begin a volume, I soon begin to think there is some other one that is better, and so I throw it aside. The fact is I do not keep a library to read myself, but because it is the fashion." His whole family are of the same mind, and the consequence is, they read but little. Well, thought I, the book seller may be benefited by it, any how. I like to see all honest trades live.

Neighbor Cincinnati has also a splendid private library, though he began small and increased it according to his wants and means. It is composed of historical, biographical, and scientific works in abundance, a fair proportion of theological works, and a few novels and juvenile books. In fact it is well adapted to every class, and almost every taste among readers. The consequence is, that himself, his family, and their intimate associates are industrious, prudent, orderly, intelligent, studious, and highly useful in every sphere of life where they are called to move.

Young master Marvellous has a very singular collection of books. His library is small, but he contrives to give it a very respectable appearance by borrowing what he does not feel able to purchase. This is well enough; but look at his catalogue! Fairy tales, Gulliver's Travels, Sinbad the Sailor, Arabian Nights, Sorrows of Werter, The Devil on two sticks, Mountain mourner, and so on all the way down—novels! novels! that none but a novel reader ever thought of, relieved, perhaps, by a very few ghostly poems, which were permitted to take just one breath from the muse's fragrant bower, but died before they opened their eyes. These are the books that he reads—a novel for every forty-eight hours; and when he finishes the second novel he has forgotten every thing that pertained to the first, except that he was once pleased with it, and thought he should recommend it to his friends, if he did not forget both the subject and the title. He has, it is true, read the Scottish Chiefs three times, but he has never read the New Testament through yet. He boasts that he has read the Romance of the Forest six times, but he confessed to me the other day, that he had never seen the prophecy of Isaiah in his father's Bible. Shame, shame on the inveterate novel reader! A. R. B.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS...NO. XII.

There are many passages misunderstood and misapplied by persons who are ignorant of the fact, that all Eastern nations used much figurative language in setting forth their ideas—and that this is the fact even at the present day. Some most striking examples of it occur in modern times. In 1830, the king of England sent five horses as a present to Runjeet Sing, the Seik chieftain of Lahore in India. Runjeet Sing returned a letter of thanks to the king of England. In that letter, he denominates Lieutenant Burnes, who delivered him the present, "the nightingale of the garden of eloquence," the "bird of the winged words of sweet discourse." Of the shoes of the horses, he speaks thus: "On beholding their shoes, the new moon turned pale with envy, and nearly disappeared from the sky." Lieut. Burnes' Travels into Bokhara, in Waldies' Circulating Library; pp. 94, 95. This practice is adopted in the Scriptures, especially in the prophecies. Thus, in speaking of the destruction of Babylon, Isaiah says, "For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof, shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine." Isa. xiii: 10. That this is figurative language and applied to the overthrow of the city of Babylon, is evident from the 19th verse—"And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah." There is a passage in Matt. xxiv: 29, which is very much to the point. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." Now, from want of attention to the use of figurative language, this passage is made literal by multitudes of the readers of the Bible, and is applied to the destruction of the heavens and the earth at a supposed great day of judgment, the scenes of which, admitting them to be true, would mark the divine government with cruelty, and the mission of Christ with failure. And yet that the passage is figurative, and that its application is strictly to the destruction of Jerusalem, is demonstrated by the Saviour's declaration in a verse of the same chapter—"Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." Verse 34. Dr. A. Clarke gives an excellent note on the verse under consideration:—"Commentators generally understand this and what follows, of the end of the world, and Christ's coming to judgment; but the word immediately shows that our Lord is not speaking of any distant event, but of something immediately consequent on calamities already predicted; and must be the destruction of Jerusalem." "The Jewish heaven shall perish, and the sun and moon of its glory and happiness shall be darkened—brought to nothing. The sun is the religion of the church; the moon is the government of the states; and the stars are the judges and doctors of both."

Another source of mistake in the application of some passages of Scripture, is want of knowledge concerning the eastern practice of personifying inanimate things and principles, and speaking of them as though they were living beings. Indeed, this practice is not confined to eastern nations—it is very common even among us.—We say of the sun, "he shines"—we say of the moon, "she is bright"—we say of a ship, "she sails"—we say of lake Superior, "it is the king of lakes"—while Bishop Heber has beautifully personified the ocean; for when speaking of the "heaving sea," he makes it a person in pain.—

"How calm the sky! rest, ocean, rest,
From calm and ruffle free;
Calm as the image on thy breast,
Of her that governs thee!
And yet, beneath the moon's mild reign,
Thy broad breast heaves as one in pain,
Thou dark and silent sea!"

A great many instances of this kind of personification are found in the Scriptures. Thus, in the song of Deborah and Barak, which commemorated their victory over Sisera, it is said, "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." Judges v: 20. Our Saviour said in regard to the folly of the Jews, "but wisdom is justified of her children." Matt. xi: 19. And Paul said of Christian affection, "love worketh no ill to his neighbor."—Rom. xiii: 10. In these cases, the stars, wisdom and affection, are personified, and spoken of as living beings.

It is through forgetfulness of this practice, that people mistake concerning the serpent which is represented in Genesis as conversing with and tempting Eve. People dream that it was a literal serpent, and that a fallen angel or satan was in the serpent, as though a serpent could tempt a human being. The fact of the case is, that the serpent is a personification of wrong desire. God gave Adam and Eve a command, that they should not eat of the tree of good and evil. Eve's desire at once arose to know what the fruit of that tree was—her judgment told her, that to partake of it, was against the command of God—but desire told her that she would be happy by partaking—and so this dialogue in the mind went on between desire and judgment, until desire prevailed, and the command of God was broken. The deceptive and beguiling reasonings of lust and passion, which all persons must have experienced in their hearts, are well personified by the serpent, "the subtlest beast of the field," who glides noiselessly and instantly from sight, and some of whose species fascinate birds to their destruction. When our Saviour sent forth his disciples, he said to them, "be ye therefore wise as serpents and harmless as doves." Matt. x: 16. Here the Saviour corrects the cunning of the serpent by the simplicity of the dove—and the simplicity of the dove by the cunning of the serpent. So that the disciples were to be cunning in their actions, but not cunning to evil and vice—and they were to be simple and harmless in their ministry, but not to imbecility and weakness.

There is another important passage, which the system of personification explains. In Proverbs i: 26, it is said, "I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh." This language is, by multitudes of people, supposed to be spoken by Jehovah.—And the way they apply it, is this—when the sinner shall go into the gloom of endless anguish, God will laugh at his calamity and mock at his fear. Shocking description this, to represent God as the taunter of the afflicted, and as mocking and laughing at pains, at which none but fiends could mock and laugh. How different this view of the divine Being from the view which the Scriptures present. "The Lord is good to all."—"The Lord will not cast off forever."—"But God commendeth his love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."—While the Saviour, who is the image of God's moral character, when he remembered the distress which was coming upon the Jews, instead of mocking and laughing, prayed to the God of impartial grace and love, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But the fact is, the language in Proverbs is not the language of God. It is a personification which speaks it.—"Wisdom crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets; she crieth in the chief places of concourse, in the openings of the gates; in the city she uttereth her words." Verses 20, 21. It is wisdom which is personified, and is represented as a living person, standing in the streets, and calling the simple to heed her voice. And when they neglect her words of instruction—when they go on in folly and wickedness—and all the consequences of sin fall upon them—then wisdom is represented as laughing at the calamities which they meet as the just judgment for their iniquities. Hence in verses 30, 31, it is said; "they would none of my counsel; they despised all my reproof; therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices." Thus, on the principle of personification, is this whole chapter of Proverbs correctly explained, so as not to dishonor Deity with cruelty.

DUTIES OF RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.....NO. II.

"Let all things be done decently and in order."—1 Cor. xiv: 40.

II. In the second place we proceed to remark, that "all things" may "done decently, and in order," the members of a Religious Society should cultivate a spirit of love and unity. "A house divided against itself, can not stand," says our Saviour. All experience corroborates this truth. The rods that when bound together are mighty to conquer and prevail, singly and apart are weak, and may be broken, piece by piece. The nation that becomes split into factions and agitated by civil wars, is an easy prey to the bold invader, who shall rush into the gaps which men have left in the walls of their common country, and overthrow the whole. So is it in families, so is it in communities, so is it in associations. And certainly, nowhere so much as in a Religious Society, is the spirit of love and unity appropriate and necessary. For, what is the object of its members in thus coming together and organizing? It is to learn lessons of wisdom at the feet of the Redeemer—to study and practice the great principles of love to God and love to man. And how can they do thus consistently, when they are warring, and jangling, and dividing among themselves? How can they kindle these principles in their hearts, and yet look without affection, with apathy, upon their fellow-believers. Religion abrogates all the mere outward forms and badges of human superiority. True, it takes from no man his real dignity or the honor due his rank or office; but, at the same time, it says to all who enter within the enclosures of its ample pale—"Ye are brethren."

"In the temper of the invisible mind,
The godlike and undying intellect,
There are distinctions that may live in heaven,
When time is a forgotten circumstance.

The depth
Of glory in the attributes of God,
May measure the capacities of mind:
And as the angels differ will the ken
Of gifted spirits glorify Him more."

But these are not the tinsel and the gaud that mark the trappings of wealth, and station, and power.

"The pathway to the grave may be the same,

And the proud man shall tread it, and the low
With his bowed head will bear him company.
Decay will make no difference, and death,
With his cold hand, shall make no difference.
And there will be no precedence of power,
In waking at the coming Trump of God.
The elevated brow of kings will lose
The impress of regalia, and the slave
Will wear his immortality as free
Beside the crystal waters."

As to outward and temporary circumstances, the monarch and the beggar are equal at the feet of Jesus—there we should meet as we will meet in heaven—the high and the low, the rich and the poor—as brethren.—If so, we are to cherish brotherly affection—to twine the sympathetic chord of unity around every heart, until it vibrates from soul to soul with harmony and love. And those who are toiling and striving together for the same cause—who meet, week after week, to participate in the service of the same sanctuary—who lay by their toils, and cares, and implements of labor upon the dusty high way of every day life, and sit down side by side to listen to the same discourse—to join in spirit in the same prayer—to pour forth the music of their hearts in the same hymn—who go forth into the world to bear the name of a common sect, and, as the case may be, the odium or esteem of the same belief—whose religious interests, and hopes, and fears, gather around the same altar, and who, perhaps, stand at the same baptismal font, and partake at the same table of communion; oh! say, shall not these—possessing so many ties in common—bound together by so many associations; shall not these live with each other as brethren, and strengthen the bonds of unity, and kindle and nourish the flame of brotherly love? Let the reader understand the full force of the precept which I would teach here. It is to be hoped that there are not many Societies whose members are engaged in enmity and warfare with each other. This is not the point. We would that societies not only live in peace, but that they improve in brotherly love—that they cultivate the principle of affection one for another, and that they draw the ties, of which I have spoken, closer, and make them bonds of immutable union.

UNIVERSALIST TRACTS.

A society has been formed in Lowell, Mass., to publish tracts in defence and in illustration of Universalism. Nos. 1, 2 and 3 have already been issued. They are general in their character, and especially adapted for exchanges with our opposers for those they furnish us. They are offered at the low rate of one dollar per thousand pages, cash. Thus one dollar will purchase 250 copies of No. 1, or No. 3, (or 125 copies of each)—or 125 copies of No. 2. Orders may be sent post paid to BRS. T. B. Thayer, and A. C. Thomas, Committee, Lowell—or to T. Whittemore, A. Tompkins, or B. B. Mussey, Boston. Br. Hutchinson will probably get some on also, for sale.

I would add, here, that Br. Hutchinson has a large lot of the Christian Visitant, in numbers, which form excellent tracts, and which he will gladly dispose of at the same rates.

17. Br. G. W. Montgomery, of Auburn, was chosen Standing Clerk.

18. On motion of Br. T. Clowes, the following preambles and resolutions were adopted—

1. Whereas, history has demonstrated that the Gospel of impartial grace advances in proportion as light and knowledge are diffused among the people—and whereas the experience of our denomination proves that our periodicals have been greatly blessed of God in spreading true religious knowledge among the people, and are important aids in devising means for advancing the prosperity of our Zion, therefore

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend the Expositor and Universalist Review to all our able lay brethren, who, in conjunction with our preachers, are often called on to defend and advocate the doctrine of the Restitution—and that our societies in this State be requested to subscribe for it also, and to keep it in their several libraries, for the use of their present and future ministers.

2. Whereas, the circumstances of the times require renewed exertions in favor of the weekly periodicals devoted to the cause of Universalism, therefore

Resolved, That this Convention do recommend to our ministering and lay brethren, their continued and efficient support of the Christian Messenger (or Universalist Union,) published in the city of New York, and of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, published in the city of Utica.

19. Thursday.—Voted that Br. A. B. Grosh be requested to prepare the minutes of this session for publication in our papers in this State.

20. Brs. S. R. Smith and A. B. Grosh were appointed a Committee to take into consideration a letter from Br. T. C. Eaton, requesting the advice of the Convention in relation to charges alleged against Rev. —.

21. The Committee on adjournment being unable to agree on the place for holding the next session of the Convention, the Council voted to adjourn, at the close of this session to Watertown, Jefferson County, N. Y.

22. The committee to whom was referred the letter from Br. T. C. Eaton, reported—

That the ministering brother complained of, by settling as the pastor of a society in the bounds and fellowship of the Genesee Association—and by accepting a seat as a member of the councils of that association, and by acting as its officer, has placed himself under, and acknowledged the jurisdiction of the Genesee Association, and made himself amenable to its rules and regulations—and, further, that the ministering brother referred to, was, at the time of committing the offence alleged, a resident in the bounds of the Genesee Association, although said alleged offence was committed in the bounds of the Chautauque Association. We therefore recommend our aggrieved and injured brethren in Chautauque county, to appoint a Committee of inquiry to collect the facts and testimony in the case, and forward the same, well attested, to the Committee of Discipline of the Genesee Association, to whom it properly belongs, for such action as they, in their wisdom, may deem right and proper. Report adopted.

23. Adjourned at the close of the services, on Thursday afternoon, (28th,) to meet in Watertown, on the last Wednesday of May, 1841.

PITT MORSE, Moderator.

REMARKS.

The Convention enjoyed a very delightful and harmonious session. And while we regret that so many of the delegation were not present to share our joys, and to mingle in its deliberations, we rejoice that the few who did attend, performed their duties as members of the council, with perseverance, patience and industry; and were rewarded for their labors by the consciousness of duties well performed, and the prospect of a happy result.

Sermons of varied character, but all excellent of their kind, were preached by Br. N. Brown on Tuesday evening; Brs. D. Ackley, L. L. Sadler, and D. J. Mandell, on Wednesday; and by Brs. P. Morse, and S. R. Smith (who also delivered the usual addresses), on Thursday. These brethren were aided in the services by Brs. Soule, Waggoner, Chamberlain, Woolley, and Wilcox, and by the spirited and appropriate strains of the choir of the Utica society. When we add to this, the delightful weather and season, the attentive and joyous congregations, and the hospitality and social intercourse (pleasing to the hosts, and we trust, to all their guests) which filled the intervals between the services, we have briefly sketched the illumined portions of this "feast of fat things." The shades that tempered its warmth, and sobered to chasteness its enjoyments, were the death of Br. S. W. Fuller, (unknown to many until their arrival here,) and of Br. Wm. Underwood, on the very eve of the Conventional session. The tears dropped to their memory, beamed with the radiance of a hope of reunion; and the sorrowing allusions to our loss, were turned to devout thankfulness that it was their gain.

Another painful circumstance, was, the call for our advice in relation to reported difficulties in the western part of the State. The course pointed out in the minutes, is the only one we could recommend as just to all parties—and we think the brethren in each Association will perceive that, in giving it, we have no disposition to refuse the request of the one, or to interfere with the rights of the other. The vote on that, as on most other subjects acted on by the council, was unanimous.

The place of adjournment, which caused some discussion, is in a region never yet favored with a meeting of the Convention; and yet is equally central to our large north eastern associations, and to those of the middle portions of the State. It is easy of access from East and West, by lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river; and from the South, by 80 miles stage route from Utica, or by water from Syracuse, via Oswego. It is to be hoped therefore, that few will find it difficult to attend our next annual session.

The recommendation of the Expositor to more general and substantial patronage, will not, we hope, be looked at as a mere expression of a faint wish; but as an earnest desire. We feel some denominational pride in that matter, as well as a pure zeal for the extended usefulness of the work. It is the only work of the kind in our order, and is acknowledged by all acquainted with it, to be highly useful. We boast that we are a reading people—fond of acquiring correct and extensive religious and biblical knowledge, and that our sentiments flourish best where such knowledge is most diffused. Shall the world point to our neglect to support well and truly, this best means of disseminating such knowledge among us, as a practical refutation of our pretensions and professions?—a refutation, too, furnished by ourselves! Forbid it, every feeling of honest pride and holy consistency.—In regard to the weekly periodicals recommended to be renewed and more efficient patronage, the vote would have been unnecessary, (however grateful to the feelings of the publishers,) had not the pecuniary embarrassments of the past three years, prevented their late and present subscribers from being more prompt and faithful in paying, and in continuing, their subscriptions. And may we not say here, that the aid most grateful to, and desired by, the publishers, is the speedy payment of what is already due to them; and next to that, and most useful to the cause, will be a large addition of the names of promptly paying and zealous Universalists to their subscription lists. In return for this gratifying voluntary vote of the Convention, and for any aid which it may lead our brethren to extend to the publishers of our periodicals in this State, I think I can pledge the continued devotion of the best talents, energies and means of the publishers, to make their papers more and more interesting and profitable to their subscribers and readers—more useful to the cause of God and humanity.

And now, brethren and sisters of every name and nation, we commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, praying that you may increase and abound more and more in every good word and work, until the fullness of God's salvation breaks on the universe, in the dawn of a holy and happy resurrection to immortality. AMEN. Per order, A. B. Grosh.

HUDSON'S QUESTIONS.

I see by the Boston papers that this excellent Sunday School book has been revised and enlarged by Br. O. A. Skinner, and the new and improved edition is now published by Br. Abel Tompkins, of that city. I have no doubt it will now be found entirely free from the objections heretofore made to its use in our societies. A. B. G.

SPRING.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

When the wind blows
In the sweet rose-tree,
And the cow lows
On the fragrant lea,
And the stream flows
All bright and free,
'Tis not for thee, 'tis not for me,
'Tis not for any one here I trow.
The gentle wind bloweth,
The happy cow loweth,
The merry streams floweth
For all below.
O the Spring! the bountiful Spring!
She shineth and smileth on every thing.
Where come the sheep?
To the rich man's moor.
Where cometh sleep?
To the bed that's poor.
If peasants weep,
And kings endure,
That's a fate that none can cure.
Yet Spring doth all she can; I trow,
She brings the bright hours,
She weaves the sweet flowers,
She dresseth her bowers,
For all below.
O the Spring! the bountiful Spring!
She shineth and smileth on every thing.

A SKETCH FROM LIFE.

An old fellow, whose name we veil under that of Hanks, died in the adjacent town of Charleston last week. He was a miserly, close-fisted old hunk, a real skin-flint, who, it was supposed by his neighbors, had scraped together, as such characters will, in one way and another, a considerable amount of money. This was not known, however. Some said that he had money concealed in the earth—others judged, from the slovenly manner in which he lived and dressed, that he had nothing but the few acres which he cultivated. He lived like the poorest, shutting his door upon every intruder—till at last Death knocked and he was obliged to open. During his sickness he was wont to send daily for a small purse of silver and gold, hid in the wall of his cellar, which he would count over with that feeling of painful delight, which inhabits the bosom of the true miser alone. Disease, however, wore down his frame rapidly, and at last he was unequal to the task of going through his daily custom of counting the pieces in his purse, and could only, as they were displayed before him, pat them softly with his hands, as a lady pats her favorite dog on the back.

One day during the last stages of the disease, he sent for a neighbor, and expressed a wish to impart a secret to him—"Go down cellar (said he) and in the farther corner you will find a tub. Raise it, and you will see a shingle, beneath which is a box." The individual followed the directions, and found a box of specie. "Now go to another corner"—said the miser describing the place. Another box was found embedded in the earth. A day or two after, when he found he must soon leave all his earthly treasures, he desired to be raised up in his bed. His request was granted, when he immediately reached out his skinny hand beneath his pillow, and lo—another box was found cunningly concealed, containing about five hundred dollars in French gold pieces, which it is understood he took from one of the banks about the time of the suspension of specie payments. All these buried treasures were given in the keeping of his neighbor for the benefit of others. He said there was one other box, but that he didn't like to tell where it was, as he might want it himself. He however consented to write the place of interment on a piece of paper, so that the secret might not perish with him. He died soon after, and his hidden treasures—no inconsiderable sum—were counted over at the close of the funeral ceremonies.

Thus died, at an advanced age, one whose only aspiration, through a long life, seems to have been the hoarding of specie and burying it, where it could be of no earthly benefit to any one—a perfect miser—a lover of money, not for the blessings which it might impart and diffuse around him, but for its own sake—not for the name of possessing it—for he feigned and was thought to be poor—but because the mere habit of acquisition had become a passion, and the bare consciousness of possession was a pleasure—a phantom of delight, which he could hug with rapture to his bosom,—

Well will it be for such if they have laid up treasures in heaven as well as on earth. But we will not sermonise—the lesson conveyed by the sketch, is left with the reader.—Claremont N. H. Eagle.

EFFECT OF SCIENCE ON REVELATION.

As long as science shall continue to influence the development of intellect, the beauty and majesty of the sacred writings must be at every perusal more appreciated. Since astronomy has opened to our vision the sunlit system of the universe, how much more sublime is that verse, "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy work!" Since the telescope has changed the sparkling diamonds of night into rolling spheres, where perhaps intelligent beings like ourselves send up their anthems of adoration to the Father of Creation, how much vaster, how much grander is that expression, "Day unto day uttereth speech; and night unto night sheweth knowledge."—We no longer gaze on the stars as but mere ornaments on the wide arch that walls in the world. We see them as globes composing system on systems—having centres around which they fell in abysses where no eye but God's alone has glanced—and those centres, in their turn, moving around suns that are controlled by other suns, whose attendant worlds only then sparkling in the "suburbs of creation." Take this thought in connection with the passage, "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my thoughts higher than your thoughts," and how glorious, how overpowering to the reflecting mind are the words of the sacred writer.

Since geology has opened to the gaze the shining crystals, the caverned torrents, the diamond-paved recesses and the submarine volcanoes of the world—how much more forcible are many passages of holy writ. And chemistry, too, standing up in the great laboratory of nature, flashes light on many a sacred line.

Eloquence can do much—but science holds the brightest torch over the "World" of the Almighty. When she suspends her lamp over creation, we see an immense stage on which God has been acting, and performing his wonders for ages not to be computed by the most powerful of angelic intelligence—a stage whose area is infinitude, whose acts occupy eternity. How could the Chaldean shepherd, who watched the midnight stars, and thought them only objects that controlled the destinies of poor little man—how could the Egyptian who scanned the upper worlds from his pyramid, for the purpose of weaving, from their mystic movements, a creed by which he could govern his countrymen—how could the Greek, who made the constellations animals—we say how could these have the same admiration and soul-absorbing love and reverence for the Deity as we, who see the genius of science disclosing to the eye, by every motion of her touch, new beauty in our revelation?

Then let us ponder on our advantages—let us encourage that which will make us feel a deep awe for the Divine intelligence.

JUGGERNAUT.—The car of Juggernaut is a monstrous vehicle, gigantic in its dimensions, and associated in the mind with images of horror; it is a sort of platform, forty-three feet in height, and 35 feet square, moving upon sixteen wheels, each six feet and a half in diameter; the ornaments with which it is decorated are by no means splendid, its principal attraction being a covering of striped and spangled broad cloth. The neighboring villagers have their fields rent free upon the condition of attendance at the cars or the idols. This duty, at present esteemed a privilege, is not exclusively confined to those who are so well rewarded for its performance; but before the whole ceremony concludes, the zeal of many of the devotees is so completely exhausted, that the raths would scarcely reach their destination were it not for the services which the Brahmins can command. It takes 1,500 men to put each of the cars of Juggernaut in motion, and when the idols are fairly established in their places, the shouts and cries of the frenzied multitude are such as to lead us to fancy that the whole of Pandemonium had been let loose—an idea which is strengthened by the fiend-like figures of Jogies, Goseins and other religious mendicants, whose grim visages lighted up with a frantic joy, give them a superhuman appearance as they cheer on their insane followers to acts of horror. Though the ponderous wheels of Juggernaut no longer go crushing over the bodies of prostrate victims the fury and excitement with which the assembled crowd rush to the car, is truly appalling. In places of very inferior note, there is something frightful in the noisy, lumbering progress of the cumbrous rath, surrounded by a hideous idol dragged about in honor of the festival; but in the very heart and centre of this abominable superstition, the celebration becomes perfectly terrific, and the senses, over-wrought, faint and sickened at the view. The senery of the place, its bare sands, the surging of the ocean in the distance, the drenching rains, the damp gales and sudden tempests of the fitful atmosphere, add to the wild horrors of the awful pageant. Each day the exhibition becomes more ghastly, as the wan victims of famine and disease drop exhausted around, making a golgotha of the unhallowed precincts.—Miss Robert's Scenes of Hindostan.

MARRIAGES.

In Taunton, Onondaga, April, 13th, by Rev. N. Brown, Mr. WILLIAM O. BYINGTON, of Geddesburg, to Miss ALMIRA LINCOLN, of the former place.

In the Universalist church, in Geneva, in the morning of the 11th, of May, by Rev. N. Brown, Mr. MORRIS W. HEMIUP, to Miss LUCY R. PRESCOTT, daughter of Imly Prescott, Esq. of Geneva.

In Knoxville, March 9th, by Rev. Wm. M. Delong, Mr. JOHN PHELPS, to Miss CHLOE CRANE, both of Knoxville.—In Lebanon, April 20th, by the same, Mr. ROBERT RAY, of Georgetown, to Miss MARY BRUSH, of Pompey.

DEATHS.

In Butternuts, May 22, JESSE, son of Stephen H. and Betsey Adsit, aged 11 years. The funeral was attended, and the consolations of the Gospel were presented on Sabbath the 24th, by L. HYATT.

At his residence, in Litchfield, Herkimer county, on the 26th ult., Rev. WILLIAM UNDERWOOD, aged about 73 years.

Br. Underwood was an early settler in this county, and was extensively and favorably known as a Baptist preacher, and a determined opponent of the then very small but growing denomination of Universalists. He personally withstood Br. Stacy in his attempts to spread this doctrine, but after a long struggle, many fervent prayers, and deep and patient inquiry, he was compelled to avow himself a convert to the doctrine of illimitable grace, and felt it his duty to preach the faith he once destroyed. From that period down to a few years since, he continued earnestly, ably and faithfully to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to lead mankind into the ways of truth and peace. Increasing infirmities, only, called him from the field of public labor; but in the social circle he still continued to dwell with pleasure on the great theme of a world's salvation, with tongue and pen, to the confounding of opposers and the delight of believers.

His disease was dropsy. Its pains he bore with great fortitude and resignation—dwelling on the goodness of God, and the hopes of a universal and blissful immortality, as a sweet and soothing cordial for all his sufferings, and pointing all to whom he addressed himself to the entire sufficiency of Christ for salvation, and as the great comfort wherewith he himself was comforted and sustained. Thus lived this suffering, and thus died this venerable brother. He rejoiced to see faith and piety flourish around him, and lived to behold his numerous descendants grow up around him in the same faith that made his own decline so glorious and cheering. His aged widow, numerous children and grandchildren, and his other relatives, friends and neighbors of every denomination, feel that a kind husband, father and friend has departed, and that a good man, a devoted follower of the Lord Jesus, has gone from earthly toils and sufferings, to heavenly rest and glory.

The funeral was attended on the 28th, by Br. Potter—and a fellow believer with the deceased in the Baptist church, and since a faithful co-worker with him the ministry of universal reconciliation. A. B. G.

In Cherry Valley, N. Y., Dec. 4th, 1839, Mr. LEVI SKINNER, aged nearly 92 years.

Mr. Skinner became a Universalist in 1777, and remained the same for nearly 63 years. Shortly after he came out in the faith of the restitution, he had the happiness to hear that one John Murray, had arrived in this county preaching the same.

The steps which he took from his first faith to the latter, were tedious, and often to him fearful. It appears that Mr. S. was a man of prayer, and his invocations to Heaven often reached not only to mortals, but even to the damned in hell! This would startle him. He thought it a very great sin to pray for the damned, and yet, for the soul of him, he could not refrain from it. His heart far too merciful for his religion, he could feel no peace nor joy in believing. But by prayer and searching, at length he arrived at Canaan, and the fruits of the land were abundant and satisfying. His theme was the Scriptures, through life—as he drew near to death, his mind was absorbed in the contemplation of what he scripturally termed "that great feast."

He has gone like a shock of corn fully ripe, and the world has lost another truly good man. L. C. MARVIN.

In Cheshire, Berkshire county, Mass. on the 30th of November, 1839, CALVIN HINMAN, after a distressing illness of eighteen months, aged 44 years. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of relatives and friends, at the Baptist meeting house, in Cheshire.—Sermon by Rev. Wm Wilcox. Although the deceased never became a member of any church, he was a Universalist in faith and practice. The sentiment cheered him in health, supported him through his long and trying sickness, and consoled him in the hour of death. His friends were very numerous, and we knew not of his having an enemy.—Com.

In Ashtabula county, Ohio, April 25th, of consumption, Mr. SANFORD HARRINGTON, formerly of Otsego county, N. Y., aged 48 years.

MORAL SUBLIMITY.

An Oration delivered at the annual exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute, August 28th, 1839.

BY W. R. CIDDLECOM.

It is a truth, which observation has authenticated, and which has received the sanction of the past, that moral influence is measurably limited by intellectual power. Morals, as a subject, is vast and almost incomprehensible. It requires comprehensive and unlimited powers to embrace it in its fulness; and not only this, but it loudly calls for the concentrated forces of all classes and distinctions of men. Its importance demands the engagement of all grades of minds—the civilian, the orator, the historian, and the student—in whatever sphere they move. It is true, that the inferior, though not the least important duties, can be performed without any other knowledge than that consciousness of which every one is possessed; but it is equally true, that all who have ever rendered themselves beneficially eminent to mankind as successful reformers of the benighted corners of earth, have been signally noted as possessed of substantially sound intellectual strength.

Man, by nature, possesses an instinctive longing for that which is beautiful. His mind wanders among objects which are grand and imposing, and takes its flight amid scenes in which imagination is fostered and fancy ranges unconfined. He delights to gaze on the bold and jutting precipice, on the smooth polish of the marble, and on the old and storm-worn mountain.—The purling stream, the boundless plain, each holds a charm; and the rushing, headlong cataract, the tramping charger, and the prairie deluged in an ocean of angry flame, kindle a spark of mingling awe and admiration. As the eye wanders in unwearied search over the myriad novelties of creation, the mind discovers that its capabilities are enlarged—the soul feels that its sentiments glow brighter and brighter, and the spirit witnesses a nearer approach to the throne of seraphic purity. If man is conscious of an elevation in the contemplation of such objects, should his mind not be expanded in view of deeds, which are noble in action—which have wrought out some immensurable good—which have effected a pervading influence—which, though not blazoned to a gazing world, will shed its secret and mysterious workings through all advancing ages? When the mind is brought to a right state, it will see a surpassing beauty in moral acts. The most glowing and brilliant genius is often cloaked in a degrading garb, and the amusements and gratifications of the noble faculties of nature, in themselves pure and innocent, are often found in immediate and intimate connection with haggard vice and revolting impurity. So that it is only when the mind lingers in contemplation over objects of unlimited moral grandeur, that we are conscious of that refined admiration and ennobling association, which seem to carry the spirit upward and onward, in unwearied and limitless progression.

In looking over the annals of entombed centuries, where is it the mind lingers longest? Is it among the poets who have infused the dignified with the ludicrous and obscene—who have thrown the honeyed charm of words around the pollution of ungoverned and wanton immorality? Or is it among those who bared the bosom in defence of justice—who kindled the smothered flame of Liberty—who spurned the bribery of reckless tyrants, and asserted their godlike pre-eminence, by fearlessly grappling with vice, and uncompromisingly vindicting the cause of virtue and truth? Which now draws the loudest acclamations—he who would sway the plebeian throng at his pleasure, and lead captive the feelings and understandings of wondering multitudes, or he who severed at Cæsar's fall, the iron-riveted chains of slavery—who proclaimed the dignity of his soul, and shouted on the shattered fragments of tyrannizing authority and legalized oppression, "Rome again is free?"

Some have ascended with quickened step, the dazzling heights of philosophy, and grasped the whole universe of reason and thought; some have soared like the eagle, high above the common order, and looked down in contemptuous scorn upon their astonished beholders; and yet they may be truly called,—

"The wisest, greatest, meanest of mankind."

One has taken a path in the field of political action, before untrod; has entered with the mighty energies of a Hercules upon the arena of national engagement, and seized upon the all and all of civil polity. Yet for all this, what is the first reflection, when the name of Aaron Burr is mentioned? Yes, Aaron Burr—who was the associate of freedom's glorious apostle, and who had prospective possession of the highest power of an American! Alas! he too was wrecked on the rock on which many of his predecessors were ruined. He lost the dignity of his soul; he did not raise high the standard of moral sublimity. No! he sacrificed, at the shrine of a bloated ambition, that very principle which alone could sustain him, and notwithstanding his name has been attempted to be smoothed over by one who came "to bury Cæsar, not to praise him," his course will be remembered, but to be shunned, his name mentioned but to be despised, and his conduct spoken of but to receive the unqualified reprobation of every friend and lover of true greatness!

There is no one thing so essentially requisite to him who lays claim to genuine exaltation, as mental independence; nothing, which so emphatically bespeaks a stately sublimity of character, as moral decision. Man, launched upon the ocean of life without this guide, is like the ship which ventures the trackless waste with neither compass nor helm. In vain he strives to stem the tide of party faction, to triumph over the billows of ever-changing opinion—at one moment he sails along as smoothly as the hum of the zephyrs—the next, the merciless victim of the vengeful tempest; at one moment, gliding in beauty down the breathless current—the next, cast away on the shoals of doubt and anxiety. Of all the forms which the undecided assume, none are so despicable as the devotee of popular applause. What shall we say—what must we say of him who has no principle, save a parasitical servility, who stands like a weathercock perched upon the temple of popularity; who will bow like a cringing slave, and play the part of an obsequious sycophant to gain the momentary adulation of an unfeeling multitude? Yet there are men, professional men too, who when asked for their opinions, can not give the semblance of an answer; and who, like the fabled Proteus, will assume ten thousand different forms to evade a reply. Shall we call that being man, who, like the Hindoo beneath the wheels of Juggernaut, will sacrifice himself at the accursed shrine of mammon's god? No! such are not men, and they might say as did Cassio—"I have lost the immortal part of myself, and what remains is bestial." Such things as these existing in an enlightened society, and among men, too, who assert high claims and make loud pretensions; should be discountenanced and frowned down—yea, more; they should be treated with the bitterest detestation—hear no voice but that of denunciation, and without scruple receive the unapologized scorn of every friend and promoter of principle. The bard of Avon, has correctly pictured a most numerous herd, when he says,—

Look! as I blow this feather from my face,
And as the air blows it to me again;
Obeying with my wind when I do blow,
And yielding to another when it blows;
Commanded always by the greater gust;
Such is the lightness of your common men.

I hesitate not to say that he who forms no principles, and wishes to form none, tramples the divine image to the dust, and shows himself unworthy the station of a man; he who fears the sneer of a pampered few, is a slave to the most oppressive and merciless of all tyrannies—the "tyranny of opinion;" and he who dares not assert his principles is a dastardly poltroon. And now were my thoughts the quivering lightnings' flash; my voice, the hollow thunder's deep, muttering groan, and had my eloquence the rumbling earthquake's startling shock, I could not express the utter abhorrence in which such actions and such men should be held.

It may be asked, in what does this magnanimity of soul consist? We answer: It consists in a complete developement of the whole moral man. It consists in a cultivation of the powers with which all are invested, and a proper application of them to the state and condition of universal humanity. It consists in a rigid adherence to principles rather than men—in the purity of kind sentiments and correct social feeling; not in the gross hollow-heartedness of flattery—not in a polished and courteous civility, but in the improvement and refinement of the high and holy sentiments of the heart, and in the perfection of deep affection and sensibility wherever they are found. It is seen in that philanthropy which is as broad as creation and co-extensive with the afflictions of the whole kindred family; in the tear which trickles for the sorrows of a fellow, and that sympathy which enters the heart of the suffering, with all the ardor of reality. Finally it is beheld in the glowing fire of patriotism, in an animated zeal for freedom, and an intense longing for liberty in its fullest sense, which has sung a requiem over the sepulchre of tyranny, planted the foot upon the neck of authorized oppression, and which will peal through coming ages, like old ocean's roar along her rock-ribbed coasts. If you would find an answer to your question, go, ask the chaste spirit of philanthropy's consecrated son; ask the slumbering relics of the son of France, who weathered the storms of the boundless deep to shield the cause of justice and of God. Invoke the hallowed names of Vernon's sleeper—of "Monticello's sage," and the thousand others, who, like the stars of heaven, went out in beauty after having faithfully finished their appointed watch. Go, sit in converse with the reposing shades of Leonidas and his three hundred, and there learn true magnanimity and real glory. Here is something worthy our notice—something which will outlive all the boasted pride of mere physical conquest; will remain when forgetfulness shall have enshrouded the fame of Alexander's name, and when the seal of oblivion shall have been stamped on the glory of Corsica's exiled hero. This moral sublimity, will always be revered; and even though physical strength and ill-directed mental power may be wondered at, they never can be loved, and that will only b the more eagerly watched and sought, and shine brighter and brighter, like the far off light-house which becomes more clearly seen from the Gothic gloom* which surrounds it. It is this alone which constitutes that particle of divine essence, which always has been and ever will be the boast of the truly great. Where is to be found the glory of the warrior who spurs his steed over prostrate thousands, when brought in comparison with well-directed thought? What becomes of philosophy, when compared with a glorious conquest over vice, a victory over degrading passion. All things else must yield to the merit of principle—to him who stands up as a martyr for unstained purity of heart; who—with a heaven-directed eye, with benevolence flashing from his inmost soul, and a flame burning within with all the intense ardor of a divine spirit, without the impulsive power of an incited populace, and standing isolated upon the eternal rock of his own self-wrought greatness—is urged on to great and glorious moral action. It is true, such a hero may not be lauded in his first enterprise; he may be compelled to struggle with and baffle against the combined and opposing powers of a whole nation; yet there will be a time, when his greatness will be acknowledged, when the beauty and splendor of a high-toned, moral feeling and action will become manifest. And if his goodness and honor be not seen until he has gone to the home which he has nobly merited, it will be seen then, and the rising world will say of him as was said of one of olden times, "The whole earth, is the sepulchre of such men." And most assuredly, this is the glory of all glories, to live a pure and immortal life in the hearts and affections of a grateful world; to live and conduct himself so

When he has run his course and sleeps in blessings,
May have a tomb of orphan's tears wept on them."

That person who is the victim of corrupting principles, who is the subject of degrading sentiments and unconquered habits, though he have the power to wander through the limitless wilds of ether, to decipher and read the laws which guide the farthest ball that hangs in the uncompassed immensity; even if he can draw into the capacity of his mind, the whole existence of the past, and range with "the vigor of angelic thought," among the myriad incidents, which shall flood futurity, still he seems like another Laocoon, struggling, writhing, and finally yielding to the serpent's gripping folds.

It may be said that the mind travelling in this track is not satisfied. Sateless ambition is not fed; there must be something more mighty, more sweeping, more vast, more deluging, than this mere doing of good; there must be something to fondle and nourish, an unholy banking for a worthless name—yes, this comprehends the whole! But objector, have you ever learned from experience? have you ever sown the seed, that you might reap the golden harvest? have you ever personally felt the full force of that mighty truth, "how happy," and the poet might have added, how great, "are the good?"

If the mind wishes noble themes for contemplation, let it rise with all its energies, but with becoming reverence, to the presence of the Alone and Infinite Jehovah. Let the spirit be transported in her enfranchised wanderings, and hold blessed communion with the veiled seraphim. Let her, in her breathing aspirations, visit the untold existence, and then settle back with the glorious resolve to one day merit its sublime glories. Is not this a contemplation far more worthy the sensible mind, than a freful itching for a few empty preferments—an engulfing desire for airy and fickle honor, or an unholy covetousness? Oh yes! we say let every one often and gladly dwell on such glowing and inspiring themes. Let every one give wings to his thoughts and reflect upon Him and Eternity. His duration—

* Divine participation answer.—Horace.

Ages past, yet nothing gone!
Morn without eve! a race without a goal!
Unshortened by progression infinite!"

And then, and not till then, will he begin to feel an expansion of sentiment, an enlargement of mind, and a consciousness of deserved dignity; then will the standard of his intrinsic excellence float in majesty above the hollowness of earth, and the splendor of his moral sublimity be transcended only by the combined beauties of that Heaven to which he meekly aspires!

Truth has been, and still is, the great and paramount object of the moral man. It is but due, to remark that the present age is peculiarly distinguished for its investigating and truth-searching spirit. Here is the great field for eminent action. This is the time in which is needed the valiant arm, the dauntless resolve, a burning zeal and a fearless heart. He most grossly mistakes the day in which he lives, who enters the field of moral conflict unarmed, and he must leave unguarded, who enters unprepared. He must have a determination more brazen than that which scaled Alpine snows, a force mightier than he who would convulse the thrones of mired demigods, who would rise with hope against the bulwarks and barriers of "century-matured" opinions and creeds; who would successfully grapple the Nemean lion of prejudice and fanatic error. And above all does he need a fearless intrepidity, and an unsubdued resolution, who would assail the "high places" of immorality and corruption, who would bring vice in the purpled monarch, on an equal standing with vice in the ignoble serf. This, we would once again say, is the only true field of action. This is the goalless, though not unwarded course, and here alone can man assert that sublime grandeur of morality; but let him who enlists take heed that he be armed, accoutred and caparisoned, like the warrior who would enter his gory field of battle.

Man universally should engage in the cause of justice and right, and though error may triumph for a season, yet its reign must soon cease. He must nerve stronger the arm, gird closer the panoply and take fresh courage for the conflict, remembering with the American poet that "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again,

The eternal years of God are hers;
But error wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies among its worshippers."

Moral truth must survive; it must prevail and prosper because of its own inherent worth. Her temple will stand immutable and unmoved throughout the winding cycles of time. At its altar will be worshippers when all others have passed away, and be mouldering beneath the vaulted shades of forgotten things. Yes,

"When the sweeping storm of time
Has hung its death dirge o'er the ruined fane,
And broken altars of the mighty fiend
Whose name usurps her honors," it will rear its triumphal spire in godlike majesty, and her base planted and imbedded on a foundation, as enduring as eternity, shall remain unshaken as Gibraltar's surge-beaten cliff, and only be the more and more revered as the passing tide shall wash from its pillars, the taint of buried ages. Now were I standing on the very threshold of eternity, and just looking through the veil which curtains time, were these the last words to which my tongue should give utterance, and could its notes be heard as far as existence claim some remnant subject, I would say unto one and all, dedicate your mightiest powers to this one superior and engrossing subject. Let your sentiments be proclaimed to all, with a voice like that which spake to him who sat wreathed in the mists of Sinai's top. Subdue the animal man, that the angelic essence may be disclosed. Give to the faculties of Intellect—of supreme love to Him and His—an illimitable development. Let your "virtues plead like angels trumpet-tongued," and your deeds in and of themselves, from their own illustrious achievements, throughout the immensity of being, tell with a force, like the echoing boom of elemental thunder; and finally—

"Be just and fear not,
Let all the ends thou aimest at, be thy country's Thy God's and Truth's; then if thou faltest, Thou faltest a blessed martyr."

CHARITY.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

The last sun of 1839 had just sunk below the horizon, and dark, looming clouds spread heavily over the concave, while a distant moaning sound gave notice that Boreas was tuning his wild, discordant lyre, preparatory to giving us one of his shrillest blasts. The air was cold and bleak, and though sheltered by embowering woods, I knew full well that the court of the wintry monarch was fully attended, and that his ministers, frost, and wind, and snow, were raising fierce uproar on the highways and open uplands.

But the merry bells began to jingle, and their joyous sound from the distant roads assured me that the old year was not to depart without festivity; that youth, and beauty, and fashion, were assembling to give the old pilgrim a ceremonial adieu, and welcome with song and dance his successor. The winds began to sing wildly on the distant hills, while the occasional sharp, hollow rap of king frost upon the surrounding trees, made a cold shudder run through the veins, as the idea of some homeless traveller buffeting the storm, would flit across the mind, or the picture of the poor, ragged groups that shiver around a cheerless hearth, where the chill breeze piping through the crannies, responded fearfully to the dying infant's groans—and fell mournfully on the sick father's heart, who saw his loved ones about to be bereft of their last earthly stay, and cast upon the uncertain charities of a bleak world.

My mind fell into a musing train, and ere I was aware I was lost in the bewildering regions of fancy. A person, of stately, fascinating appearance met me, and accosting me very politely, begged me to attend her, and witness the ceremonies of her levees. She informed me her name was Pleasure, that she was of high rank in the court of the new king, whose sole object was the happiness of his subjects; for which purpose she had instituted her assemblies, where fashion and the graces ever dispensed their choicest smiles, and dissipated all gloom by their tasteful and magnificent appearance, and the harmonious melodies that ever attended her presence.

I followed her footsteps and soon entered a gay and gorgeous hall splendidly illuminated, and thronged with the young, the beautiful and gay. Music, and gladness were there, and as the sweet-voiced viol filled the lofty arches with its animating cadences, and forms of grace and beauty floated onward in the mazy dance, I almost forgot that sorrow was abroad in the land. There were the graces, and fashion with all her numerous train, presiding over the festival; yet gay, and fascinating as was their appearance, I could not help observing a very unobtrusive personage, with white flowing garments, and countenances of heavenly benignity. She displayed no ornaments, but the radiance of a meek and holy benevolence shone in her azure eye, and lighted up her countenance with angelic lustre. I was glad to observe that her influence had a happy effect upon the vast assemblage. Beauty forgot its arrogance, the pride of wealth and station seemed softened by her bland smiles, and more than one young heart sent the rich blood to the beautiful cheek, while it whispered a promise to remember the poor to-morrow. I was pleased to see that though she courted no observation, she was altogether the most important personage in the assembly, softening all the asperities of jarring and discordant passions, and disposing each one to look upon the bright side.

After arranging every thing in the pleasantest manner, she prepared to depart. I thought her dress insufficient to shield her on such a night, but I had not learned that warmth of heart would carry neglected Charity where the devotees of fashion and pleasure would hardly dare to venture. I followed her, and saw her enter the abodes of luxury, and plead for the miserable and wretched, and portray in stirring words the wants of of hungry, starving innocents, crawling suppleless to their fragment of a bed, and in infantile moans, wondering why those rich people could not spare them a little bread. Well, they appeared almost all of them willing to bestow of their riches, but they had not learned active charity. Yet her mission sped well, and I followed, till I saw her enter the hovel of wretchedness, where haggard wretches sat scowling by the dying embers, and conjuring up sad visions before the aching heart. O, what happiness did her presence give! how did the young eyes flash forth their gratitude from beneath the tangled locks and pale neglected brows! Here was the place to drink in pure pleasure; to satisfy the spirit that shrunk from the sight of misery, that could not enjoy the bounties of heaven while a fellow being starved by its side. She went to the cold and cheerless hearth, where the sick parent gazed upon the stiffening features of the cherished infant, as if it would learn of the departing spirit the viewless track it must soon follow. The pearly drops that coursed down her heavenly cheeks as she ministered to the wants of the living, and spake in tones of inspiration of a happier home for the dead, gave sweet consolation to the mourners' hearts, and taught them to trust in the goodness of Him who is the Father of the fatherless.

I awoke from my dream, and gleaned this moral from fancy's teachings. That though the presence of charity, in other words the spirit of love, is necessary in all the intercourse of life, yet her holiest mission is in binding up the broken hearted, bringing the cup of consolation to the bowed down and afflicted, comforting the mourning ones, and relieving the distress of those who are ready to perish.

THE LOGOS—OR WORD—NO. I.

BY REV. A. C. BARRY.

"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God."—JOHN i: 12.

The object we have in view in these articles, is to illustrate and defend what we conceive to be the true meaning of the passage which stands at its head, and to furnish such helps as may enable those who are at a loss what they are to understand by the words of the evangelist, to successfully arrive at the truth concerning the same.

The reader is probably aware that the passage in question is supposed to teach that Christ, the Saviour, is none other than the infinite and immutable God—the Creator of the heavens and the earth, and the great Ruler and Governor of the world.

That the "Word" spoken of, has reference to the Redeemer of mankind, I do not doubt; but that the inspired penman intended to teach that he was in very truth God, or in every sense equal to him, co-existent, and co-eternal, and possessed of the same attributes and the same perfections, and to the same degree, I do most seriously question. And is it not plain from the passage itself, that he did not wish to be so understood—that he did not intend to teach that Christ was in fact Deity himself? "In the beginning" he says, "was the Word." But, had God a beginning? Was, there ever a time when he was not? Has he not existed from the eternity that is past? If he has not, then Scripture testimony is but a dream. Were Christ the infinite and immutable Jehovah, the language of the evangelist would be perfectly inconsistent and absurd. To say, "in the beginning was God," when he never knew a beginning, would be sheer folly, and a palpable contradiction.

"But," it is said, "the sacred writer especially declares, that the Word was God." Very true—yet it is evident from the remaining language, that he did not intend to say that the Word, or Christ, was actually Deity; for this would be to contradict himself. To say that the "Word" was in the beginning with God, and then to say that the "Word" was God himself, would be somewhat contradictory, not to say absurd and inconsistent. For no one could say with much sense or propriety that God was in the beginning with himself, when, too, he had no beginning, but existed from eternity.

The word "God," as applied to Christ, is undoubtedly to be understood in a secondary sense, and was unquestionably so applied by the author of the text. A word, or title, is oftentimes modified by the nature of the being, or subject, to which it is applied. And this is one of the many instances, in which a modification does actually take place in a word or title. And indeed, it is a fact which none can dispute, that the title "God," is applied to other beings than the Great Sovereign of the universe. In Exodus it is applied to an idol—an image carved out and graven by men's hands. The Most High is represented as saying unto his people by the mouth of his servant Moses—"He that sacrificeth unto any God, save unto the Lord only, he shall be utterly destroyed," xxii: 28. Here the word "god" is used in a secondary sense; for no one would suppose that a Heathen idol was equal unto God himself. Again we read in the same book, "Thou shalt not revile the gods, nor curse the ruler of thy people," xxii: 28. By the word gods in the passage, we are to understand the judges which were appointed under the law. Now, are we to, or can we, believe, that each of the judges, being a god, was equal unto the Almighty, or was the Deity himself? By no means. The word is used in a secondary sense, and was applied to those officers, because they occupied an exalted and important station in the midst of Israel, or to signify that God had assigned them an important office under his government.

The word "God," may also be found applied in a secondary sense to men and things, in Ps. lxxxii: 1, 6; 1 Sam. iv: 7; Phil. iii: 19; Ex. vii: 1; 2 Cor. iv: 4; 2 Thess. ii: 34.

Now as this word, (God,) is found to be frequently used in the Scriptures, in a secondary sense, may it not be thus applied in the passage under consideration? And is it not a plain and obvious fact, that it was used by the sacred writers? Would not John's language, taken in connexion, go to show, that this was indeed the case? He tells us that, "in the beginning," the "Word" (or Christ,) was with God," and the fair inference deducible from this language is, that he spoke of the Saviour as a separate and distinct being from the Almighty—as a being occupying an inferior station, and to whom he applied the title God, to signify that though inferior, he was still a "ruler of pre-eminent dignity"—the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person.

2. The united voice of the Scriptures, is, there is but "one God"—one self-existent, Great First Cause, Creator, and Father. We read that the Lord our God is one Lord. Deut. vi: 4; Mark xii: 29. We are also informed by the apostle Paul, that there is one God and one Mediator. 1 Tim. ii: 5. In writing to his Corinthian brethren, he introduces the following language: "As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one. For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many and lords many,) but to us there is but one God the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him." 1 Cor. viii: 4-6. This language is perfectly plain. To us, says the apostle, there is but one God, the Father. Are there any who can not understand so plain a declaration as this? Not one.

Now, as there is but one sovereign Creator and Ruler, it is impossible that there could have been another supreme God in the beginning with him. Those, therefore, who contend, that the "Word," (or Christ) is actually God—Deity himself—must either yield the point, or advance proofs that there are two infinities, or two Supreme Gods, each infinite in all his attributes and perfections! But this would be a herculean task: and as we can have no hope that it will ever be accomplished, we must still contend that the title "God" was applied to Christ in a secondary sense.

ESSAYS ON WAR. NO. XI.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"The more I am acquainted with agricultural affairs, the better I am pleased with them; inasmuch that I can nowhere find so great satisfaction as in those innocent and useful pursuits. In indulging these feelings, I am led to reflect, how much more delightful to an undebauched mind is the task of making improvements on the earth, than all the vain glory which can be acquired from managing it by the most uninterrupted career of conquest."

WASHINGTON.

We now resume our labor by pointing out the influence of war upon civilization. And we must apprise the reader, that we enter upon a wide field, and therefore, owing to the narrow limits to which we are confined, our remarks must be few, and perhaps, somewhat imperfect. Our first inquiry is, what are we to understand by civilization? Hence, we can not do better than to cite the words of a very amiable writer whose labors on the subject on which we are now engaged, have been somewhat extensive. "The leading elements of a truly and highly civilized state of society are various; such as agriculture, the useful arts, the liberal or polite arts, literature, the domestic relations, and duties, civil and religious institutions, etc."

It would seem, at once, from the above view, that in order to enjoy a highly civilized state of society, we must do all in our power to promote agriculture, the arts, literature, and civil and religious institutions, and to render permanent domestic relations and duties. The question, then, that presents itself on the very face of this subject is, does war tend to bring on and establish civilization? A moment's reflection must convince us to the contrary.

I. Look at the influence of war upon the cultivation of the soil. It has been said that as men rise in the scale of being, as they bring themselves more and more under the influence of just and benevolent principles, the earth itself, as if conscious of so propitious a change, will begin to put forth, and to bloom more beautifully. But war always throws cultivation back; the soldier is called from his plough, and the vine of his cottage droops till his return. Let us take a single instance: "Affecting traces," says a writer who was in the Peninsula during the devastation by the armies of Napoleon, "of the invasion of this smiling country were every where to be seen, cottages all roofless and untenanted, the unpruned vine growing in rank luxuriance over their ruined walls, gardens, the shells of fine houses, destroyed by fire, * * * all proclaimed silently, but forcibly that I was travelling through a country which had been the theatre of war."

II. Has war promoted the arts? That war has tended to advance those arts that enable men to destroy life, we are of course prepared to admit. But can science and art be considered among the results of campaigns and devastating wars? But without discussing the point to a great length, let us look to the fine arts, such as sculpture, painting, architecture, and the like, and we shall at once see that war has been extremely unfavorable to their progress. In the year 410, the city of Rome was taken and pillaged by the Goths and Huns of Alaric. After the streets had been strewn with the dead of every age and condition, a violent assault was made upon the works of art. "The palaces of Rome," says Gibbon, in his history at the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, "were rudely stripped of their splendid and costly furniture. The side boards of massy plate, and the variegated wardrobes of silk and purple, were irregularly piled into the wagons that always followed the march of a Gothic army. The most exquisite works of art were roughly handled or wantonly destroyed; many a statue was melted for the sake of the precious materials; and many a vase in the division of the spoils, was shattered into fragments by the stroke of the battle axe." Far greater outrages were committed at a later date by the soldiers of Charles V. Take another instance, given by Southey in his history of the Peninsular War. Speaking of the castle of Benevento, he says, "Every thing combustible was seized. Fires were lighted against these fine walls; and pictures of unknown value, the works perhaps, of the greatest Spanish masters, and those of other great painters, who left so many of their finest productions in Spain, were heaped together as fuel."

But this number has been extended to a sufficient length, and we therefore close it with a single remark, which the whole history of war will amply prove to be correct. We do not know of a single instance in any age or country where the works of art have been spared, when their demolition would tend to promote the objects of invading and conquering armies.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXVIII.

LUKE. This book was written by the evangelist whose name it bears, at Corinth, for the use of Gentile converts. Luke was a Jew, and is supposed to be the same person who is sometimes called Lucius. See Rom. xvi: 21. Acts. xiii: 1, and xi: 20. He is thought to have been a physician by occupation. See Colossians, iv: 14. He died in Achaia, at the age of 84.

Luke ii: 34.—"Behold this child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel."

This is an allusion to Isaiah viii: 14-15. The Jews were expecting a temporal deliverer, and because Christ did not answer their expectations, they rejected him, and stumbled at that "stumbling stone." On them the stone fell which "ground them to powder." See Rom. xi: 11, 12. Matthew xxi: 44. Nevertheless they have the promise here of rising again, for the "child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel." See also Rom. xi: 26.

Verse 35—"Yea a sword," etc. This clause should be transposed and follow after the latter clause of the same verse. See Clark.

Luke viii: 50.—"Thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace."

That is, thy faith hath been the instrument of receiving the salvation. This present salvation could not, and can not be enjoyed but by faith and repentance.

Faith leads to repentance, for "whosoever hath this hope within him, purifieth himself even as God is pure," and repentance leads to faith, for John preached repentance and his disciples were prepared to believe on Jesus Christ. "Repent and believe the Gospel," etc.

Luke x: 1.—"After these things the Lord appointed other seventy also" etc., etc.

Rather seventy others. The word other has reference to the twelve disciples which he chose, to be constantly with him, and seventy others to go before him.

He chose the twelve in reference to the twelve patriarchs chiefs of the twelve tribes of Israel, and the seventy in reference to the seventy elders or Judges, whom Moses appointed to assist in the government of the people.

Chap. x: 18. "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven."

This is probably an allusion to Isaiah xiv: 12. "How art thou fallen, O Lucifer, Son of the Morning." The word Lucifer signifies, bringing light, the Star Venus, and is here applied to the king of Babylon. The word Satan in Luke x: 18, signifies an adversary, and is here applied to the supposed cause of demoniacal possessions, or to the enemies, adversaries, or opposers of truth and Christianity, in general.

Luke chapter 13th: "Gallileans whose blood Pilate" etc., etc., verse 1.—"eighteen upon whom the tower of Siloam fell." See verse 4.

Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, is represented by Josephus as sending his soldiers into the temple and slaying 3000 men while they were employed in offering sacrifices. See Josephus' Wars, book 2, chapter 1, section 3, and book 2, chapter 5. But whether this is the circumstance referred to is uncertain. The account of Pilate's cruelty here mentioned is not found in any other history. Josephus however speaks of the Gallileans as being the most seditious people in the land. They belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, but as they kept the great feasts at Jerusalem, they probably, by their tumultuous behaviour there at one time, gave Pilate, who was a mortal enemy to Herod, a pretext to fall upon and slay many of them. Some however think that this refers to the followers of Judas Gaulonites—see Acts v: 37—who would not acknowledge the Roman government, a number of whom Pilate surrounded, and slew, while they were sacrificing in the temple. See "Josephus' Antiq." book 18.

"Tower of Siloam." This tower was probably built over one of the porticos near the pool mentioned, John ix: 7. See also Nehemiah iii: 15.

"Shall all likewise perish." See verses 3 and 5. That is, shall perish in a like way in the same manner. This was fulfilled to the letter; for when the city was taken by the Romans, multitudes of the priests and others who were going on with their sacrifices, were slain, and their blood mingled with the blood of their victims.

And multitudes were buried under the ruins of the walls, houses, and temple. See Josephus' Wars, book vi: chapters 4, 5, 6.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

SECTION VI.

Departure of Joseph and Mary, with Jesus, to Egypt, and their return after the death of Herod.

Matt. ii: 13. And when they (the Magians) had departed, behold the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise and take the young child and his mother and flee into Egypt; and be thou there until I bring thee word; for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him.

14 And when he arose he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt,

15 And was there until the death of Herod, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord, by the prophets, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my son.

16 Then Herod when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wroth, and sent forth and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time that he had diligently inquired of the wise men.

17 Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy, the prophet, saying, 18 In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation and weeping, and great mourning, Rachael weeping for her children and would not be comforted because they are not.

19 But when Herod was dead, behold an angel of the Lord appeareth in a dream, to Joseph, in Egypt, 20 Saying, Arise and take the young child and his mother, and go into the land of Israel: for they are dead which sought the young child's life.

21 And he arose and took the young child and his mother, and came into the land of Israel.

22 But when he heard that Archelaus did reign in Judaea in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither: notwithstanding, being warned of God, he turned aside into the parts of Galilee.

23 And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene.

Verse 13. And when they had departed, etc. Though the appearance of the angel to Joseph would seem to have been immediately after the Magians had departed, yet such is not a necessary inference. In many instances we shall find that a considerable space of time intervened between two events, concerning which it is said that the one took place when the other was done. This is one fact that must be understood and acted upon in harmonizing the Evangelical writings. When the Magians had departed, the angel appeared to Joseph—that is, after the Magians had departed, etc., admitting some months, perhaps, of intervening time.

Flee into Egypt. There is an Apocryphal book entitled the Gospel of the Infancy, which relates several very wonderful miracles said to have been performed by the Saviour, while in Egypt; one of the most interesting and probable is related in the following language: "But the son of the priest, when his usual disorder came upon him, going into the inn, found there Joseph and St. Mary, whom all the rest had left behind and forsook. And when the Lady St. Mary had washed the swaddling clothes of the Lord Christ, and hanged them out to dry upon a post, the lad possessed by the devil took down one of them, and put it upon his head. And presently the devils began to come out of his mouth and fly away in the shapes of crows and serpents." Gospel of the Infancy, ch. iv: verses 14-16. See Apoc. Test.

A large number of other similar relations are found in this book, too foolish to be introduced here.

15. That it might be fulfilled, etc. The prophecy here said to be fulfilled, did not originally relate to the Saviour, but to the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. See Hosea xi: 1, and the concluding remarks.

16. Herod was wroth, etc. The cruelty ascribed to Herod in this verse has been supposed to constitute a serious objection to the Evangelical narrative. But he that supposes this, must be grossly ignorant of Herod's character, and of the extent of the cruelty here ascribed to him. See concluding remarks, where this subject is illustrated.

17. Then was fulfilled. See concluding remarks.

20. They are dead. That is, Herod is dead, the plural being used for the singular, according to the Hebrew idiom, which is used in many places in the New Testament. That there is any reference to Antipater the son of Herod, and heir apparent to the throne, and who was executed by the order of his father five days before the death of the latter, I do not believe. It may be an easy explanation, but it is an unnatural one.

22. Archelaus. This was one of the three sons of Herod to whom he left his dominions. He resembled his father in character—a good reason why Joseph should fear to go thither. It does not seem to have been the intention of Joseph to go to Judea, with a view of settling or remaining there; but merely to pass through that province as the most direct route to Nazareth. But fearing to do this, he turned aside from the most direct route, and came to Nazareth, which was under the government of Antipas, another son of Herod, but of a different character from Archelaus.

The difficulty ascribed to this verse by Robert Taylor (see his Diegesis) is only imaginary, and proceeds not as he says, from the ignorance of the Evangelist respecting the geography of the country, but from the ignorance of Mr. Taylor respecting the passage to which he objects, or from a wilful intention of perverting it.

23. He shall be called a Nazarene. "Though the words he shall be called a Nazarene are not to be found in the writings of the prophets, yet as the thing intended by them is of frequent occurrence, the application is made with sufficient propriety. The Israelites despised the Galileans in general, but especially the Nazarenes, who were so contemptible as to be the subjects of ridicule even to the Galileans themselves. Hence Nazarene was a term of reproach proverbially given to any despicable, worthless person whatever. Wherefore, since the prophets have in many parts of their writings, foretold that the Messiah should be rejected, despised and traduced, they have in reality predicted that he should be called a Nazarene. And the Evangelist justly reckons Christ's dwelling in Nazareth, among other things, a completion of these predictions; because in the course of his public life, the circumstance of his having been educated in that town, was frequently objected to him as a matter of scorn, and was one principal reason why his countrymen would not receive him. (John i: 46 and vii: 41, 52.)"—Horne's Introd. Vol. I. p. 294.

TRUST IN GOD.

Says the wise man, "Whoso putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe." God is unchangeable, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; without variableness or shadow of turning. He is a being of infinite wisdom, power, mercy, and love. On account of the unchangeability of his nature, and the goodness of his character, it is safe, under all circumstances, and at all times, to put our trust in him. The safety of putting our trust in him presupposes his goodness and benevolence. It would be very unsafe to put our trust in a being, who, we knew was our greatest enemy, and would do his utmost to injure rather than benefit us; we would be very unwilling to repose confidence in a worthless wretch, who was employing all his craft that he might see us engulfed in the dreary abyss of misery and despair. But how much more unsafe would it be, to trust in God, if he hated us, was ready to hurl us down to the regions of despair, and would be glorified in our sufferings; if he hated us and could not love us, till we did something to elicit his love! Infinitely better would it be to trust in the most abandoned of the human race than in such a being; the most obdurate pirate that ever lived, would cause suffering only for a limited period; and, in this suffering, he would not, he could not delight! We are confident that it would be unsafe to trust in the Lord, if he was a being of hatred and revenge.

The Singer of Israel, in speaking of our subject, says: "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man. It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes." Again, when impressed with a sense of the goodness of God, he said, "And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God; many shall see it and fear, and shall trust in the Lord. Blessed is the man that maketh the Lord his trust, and respecteth not the proud, nor such as turn aside to lies." The Psalmist was well acquainted with the frailty and imperfection of human nature, and knew how much more safe it was to trust in the "Father of mercies," than in puny, fallible man. When mindful of the care and providence of God, he said, "The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; the God of my rock; in him will I trust; he is my shield, and the horn of my salvation, my high tower and my refuge, and my Saviour." David had been plunged into the nethermost depths of sorrow and adversity; he had experienced the instability of friends; had been surrounded with the most implacable enemies, and suffered the greatest reverses of fortune; still he trusted in God and was safe, and found deliverance.

So it is with every person who puts his trust in God; though he is called to experience a great amount of ingratitude; though his friends turn his most hostile enemies, his foes take courage at his calamities, and the whole aspect of affairs seem clad in the habiliments of horror and blackness, yet he trusts in God, views these adverse scenes as calculated to work out the peaceable fruits of righteousness. He views them as designed by the infinite Mind to result in good; these circumstances of adversity have for him no stings; he, with trust and confidence, looks through their clouds, beholds the hand of unlimited goodness at the helm of the universe directing all things in accordance with the counsels of his own will, and is saved from the doubts and fears, that otherwise would press down upon him like an incubus.

Affliction's faded form may stalk before us, we may be laid upon beds of sickness by the hand of disease, the mountain waves of adversity may roll upon us, and the furnace of deprivation and bereavement may be heated for us seven times hotter than it is wont to be, still, if we trust in the Lord, we are safe, based upon the rock of ages, and these have no pains for us. Would, that men would make the Lord their trust, be possessed of the confidence of Job, when he said, "Though he slay me, yet in him will I trust!" "O, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

"Oh for a strong and lasting faith,
To credit what the Almighty saith!
To embrace the message of his son,
And call the joys of heaven our own!"

AN AGENT'S TROUBLES.

Friend Grosh—If publishers have as much more trouble than agents, as their interests are greater, I pity them; and I do not believe that they are publishers because it is a pleasant business. Some two or three years since, I was appointed an agent for the Magazine and Advocate. I always took some pains to procure subscribers to it, but never made out much. The present year I determined to make a vigorous effort, and the list of names, and amount of money I send you, shows how successful I have been. Every one would be pleased with the paper, but none are prepared to take it just now. Some are poor, and, by their excuses, one would think them "pennyless as Job," notwithstanding their thousands. Others are so pinched by "the hard times" that they can not take a paper; and yet others care more about the "Sub-Treasury," and "hard cider," than any thing else.

Now if an agent, should not get discouraged trying to get subscribers under such circumstances, then I acknowledge myself unfit for one; and if there are any who think it nothing but "a pastime," I wish that they would go round among their neighbors, and try to get subscribers to some periodical.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.....NO. XIII.

In the 56th Psalm there are allusions to some things, an ignorance of which, deprives that Psalm of nearly all its power. David was speaking of the wicked—hence he said, "the wicked are estranged from the womb; (birth;) they go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies." Verse 3. In describing wicked people, he said: "their poison is like the poison of a serpent; they are like the deaf adder who stoppeth her ear, which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely." Verses 4, 5. What are we to understand by "charmers?" In ancient times, and to this day, there are those in Eastern nations, who charm snakes or serpents by the power of music—and the "Indian serpent charmers" have such power over them, that they handle them freely without harm. That music has great influence over serpents, is clear from the following fact, related by Chateaubriand when he was in Canada. A rattle-snake entered their encampment, and to amuse the party, a young Canadian advanced against it with his flute. On his first approach, the snake exhibited great rage. "The Canadian now began to play upon his flute; the serpent started with surprise, and drew back his head. In proportion as he was struck with the magic effect, his eyes lost their fierceness, the oscillations of his tail became slower, and the sound which it emitted became weaker, and gradually died away.... The shades of azure green, white and gold, recovered their brilliancy on his quivering skin, and slightly turning his head, he remained motionless, in the attitude of attention and pleasure. At this moment, the Canadian advanced a few steps, producing with his flute sweet and simple notes. The reptile, inclining his variegated neck, opened a passage with his head through the high grass, and began to creep after the musician, stopping when he stopped, and beginning to follow him again, as soon as he moved forward. In this manner he was led out of the camp, attended by a great number of spectators, both savages and Europeans, who could scarcely believe their eyes, when they beheld this wonderful effect of harmony." Abbott's Scripture Natural History, p. 184.

To attract serpent's with music, and to tame them, is what is intended by "charmers." Now observe the manner in which this fact is introduced in the 58th Psalm—"They are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear, which will not hearken to the voice of the charmers, charming never so wisely." From this declaration, it seems that there are some adders or asps whom the charmers can not effect. This is actually the case.—"Roberts mentions an Indian serpent-charmer, who came to a gentleman's house to exhibit his tame snakes. He was told that there was a cobra di capello in a cage, and asked if he could charm it. "Oh yes!" said the charmer; and the serpent was accordingly released from its cage. The man began his incantations and charms; but the reptile fastened upon his arm, and he was deaf before night. This serpent 'would not listen to the voice of the charmer.'" Penny Magazine, Vol. 6, p. 151. Now, assume adders refused to listen to the soothing music and voice of the charmer, so were the sinners of whom David spake, practically deaf—they refused to listen to the sweet and soothing music of wisdom and righteousness, and went on in the poison of their actions and wickedness.

In regard to them the Psalmist prays, "break their teeth, O God, in their mouth." Verse 6. Here is another allusion to a physical fact, which it is necessary to know before we can understand what David means.—The asp has a little bag or sack at the bottom of his two front fangs, in which its poison is continually deposited. When it bites, the fangs are pressed upon this little sack, which gives forth poison, and injects it into the wound through the fangs, and death is soon produced by it. The serpent-charmers, when they catch serpents, break out their fangs or teeth, and extract the poison, and then, though they may bite, the bite is harmless.—In this fact, we can discover David's meaning, when he prayed the Lord to break out the teeth of sinners—it was, that they might be deprived of the power of doing injury by the poison of their conduct, and the unholy deeds of their wickedness.

In how many instances the Lord has effected this work. When the brethren of Joseph endeavored to poison him to death, by their wickedness, the Lord deprived their envenomed fangs of power. He watched over and shielded Joseph—brought him through all trouble and harm—and though he punished those criminal brothers for their sins, yet he made Joseph the instrument of their conversion and reconciliation. And when the Jews thought to destroy the doctrine of Christ by crucifying Messiah, Jehovah broke the envenomed teeth of their wickedness, for by the very death of Christ, which they meant unto evil, God produced the great good of establishing Christianity; while in the end, Christ will save "all Israel," inasmuch as there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, to turn away ungodliness from Jacob. And in the ultimate triumph of the divine government, God will draw the fangs of sins poison from every soul—he will charm them with the music of truth—and he will render them obedient—until his divine laws shall be written in every heart by the power and influence of heaven's affection.

RELIGIOUS TRUTH.

"But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest; for, as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against." ACTS xxviii: 22.

After the apostle Paul had been successively examined before Felix, Festus and Agrippa; and by his appeal to the judgment seat of Cæsar, had been conveyed to Rome for the purpose of meeting his trial; he called the chief of the Roman Jews together, to inform them the reason why he was there a prisoner, bound with a chain, and why he had appealed unto Cæsar.

This subject having been explained to them, the Roman Jews returned for answer, "We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came, showed or spake any harm of thee. But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest: for, as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against." They candidly admitted that they knew no harm of the apostle, nor that any serious matter was laid to his charge. But the sect of the Nazarene Reformer, they perfectly understood was most violently opposed—the Saviour was called a "glutton and a wine bibber;" a "friend of publicans and sinners;" an enemy to the law of Moses and the government of Cæsar; as one possessed of a demon; and one who declared the most obvious untruths. With this knowledge, the Roman Jews, in a candor and justness of procedure which is not often exhibited in modern times, even by pretended followers of the Saviour, desired to hear from the apostle's own lips, what were the principles of the faith thus opposed and villified by its unbelievers.—They therefore appointed a day for this purpose; on which they met the apostle at his lodgings, where "he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses and out of the prophets, from morning until evening." The effect of this very proper conduct on their part, and the judicious instruction of the apostle, is said to be as follows, "and some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not."

In applying this instruction to present circumstances, I shall consider that my readers are aware that the sect attached to the Restitution, is "every where spoken against." For the fact needs no proof, that the Restitution is denominated a licentious doctrine and a doctrine of satan, by those who are ignorant of it—while its believers are represented, even by men who profess to be charitable and Christian teachers, as a graceless, godless and vicious people. The most revolting and untrue descriptions are given of the doctrine, in churches, and especially during protracted meetings; so that persons, hearing such untrue descriptions, can obtain no just notions of it; for, as the doctrine of the Saviour was represented as of evil when it was of good—so this is represented as of satan when it is of divine origin.

These facts being known to my readers, I shall consider them as instituting the inquiry concerning the Restitution, "but we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest; for, as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against." I shall assume as pith, that there exists a liberality, in portions of community at least, which is desirous of meeting and understanding this doctrine, before it is condemned. I shall therefore expect attention, while I show what are the leading Scriptural truths to which this despised sect gives assent: We shall not attempt to develop the minutiae of faith, because there are hardly two individuals in any sect, who believe exactly alike in regard to some minor things—and as it is one of the cardinal principles of Christianity to let every person have perfect freedom in differing from others, should his reason and conscience dictate such difference, so we shall not attempt to regulate private and small matters of faith.—We shall only exhibit the great and uniform points of Scripture doctrine, which give character to the believers of the Restitution as a sect differing from all other sects. And, in effecting this object, it will not be expected that an elaborate proof of each point of faith will be given, because such a work would manifestly be impossible in the limits to which I have confined myself.

I. In looking abroad among the sublime objects to us visible in the universe, we hear in the infinite variety of material forms, in the wise and complex mechanism of animal life, in the amazing size, the wonderful revolutions, the unchanging harmony, and the grand array of heavenly bodies; a voice of reason, of divinity and of philosophy, uttering with its own peculiar eloquence,

"The hand that made us, is divine."

The dissection of the most common forms of animal or vegetable life, proves to demonstration that Supreme Intelligence reigns over, in and through all nature.—For, in the light of this great truth, all other views which attempt to account for the origin of the universe, are feeble and unproved. If an individual should inform us that a beautiful music-box which he held in his hand, was produced by chance or by certain blind laws growing out of unintelligent matter—that no intelligence superior to, and separate from, the materials composing this box, had an agency in forming, fitting and arranging its various parts, which, when united, give forth the beautiful music we hear—no person would believe such statements. Because it is a demonstrated fact, that there must have been existing intelligence to procure the different metals composing the box, to mould them into the necessary shapes, and to so nicely adjust every part, as to warble out the desired melody and its accompaniments. Is this fact less true in regard to the complicated works-discoverable in nature? Can chance, or blind laws, or unintelligent matter, produce material forms, which, in nicety of arrangement, in utility of purpose, in beauty of order, and in wisdom of creation, are as much superior to a music-box as the sun is greater than a grain of sand?—It is manifestly impossible! It is therefore evident that Intelligence of the highest order and of infinite capabilities exists above, and as sovereign Creator, reigns over all nature.

Hence rejecting the doctrine of atheism in all its forms, we believe that there is one, only living and true God—who is "without beginning of days or ending of years," ever-existent, eternal, undying, the great "Master of all life"—who "created the heavens and the earth," and all things therein—who is the Father of all creatures, their Originator and Preserver, satisfying all their rational desires, and surrounding them with continuous tokens of his benignant Providence—who holds the reins of supreme government in the universe, working "all things after the counsel of his own will," and with unerring certainty bringing all things to a good end, because disappointed by no circumstance—who is infinite in wisdom, boundless in power, ever-consistent and unwavering in justice, illimitable in goodness, and unbounded in mercy—whose united attributes form the grand characteristic, the universal magnet, and the name and nature of Deity, LOVE; the Benevolence which is displayed in, and diffused among all the works of creation.

The fact, then, that there is a God, is the foundation of our faith, and the Fountain from whence flows that divine and efficient grace in which we find a guaranty of the ultimate triumph of truth and virtue over error and sin.

"FOR ALL LIVE UNTO HIM."

To prevent the occupancy of our columns with a longer article, and a long reply, etc., etc., and also to prevent a correspondent from being interrupted in, and drawn off from, his series of articles before he has time fully to explain his views, I offer a brief correction of a part of No. 10, of the Notes on the Resurrection, by a Rural Evangelist, which appeared in No. 21, current volume.

The author of the Notes is arguing against the sleep of the soul, after death and previous to the resurrection. He quotes the passage placed above, and the fact that the patriarchs must have been alive to God after their death, as proof of the falsity of that sentiment, and seems to place that sentiment on a level with the doctrine of the Sadducees, if not to consider it the same doctrine. This is an error. The Sadducees believed in a total cessation of existence itself—Christian materialists only believe in the suspension of consciousness.

It is therefore only by changing the terms of the proposition, the "suspension of consciousness," or a being who is not conscious, or "who sleeps," into the term, "a being who does not exist,"—I say, it is only by this change of the terms of the proposition, that the author of the Notes succeeds in bringing this text to bear directly and positively against the doctrine of the sleep of the soul. For it is perfectly plain, that if the man exists after death, whether conscious or unconscious, God is his God. Whereas, it can not be denied, and will not be denied by any who hold to the sleep of the soul, that in the words of the Rural Evangelist, "it is a perfectly plain case, that a being which does not exist, is incapable of having a God, or indeed any thing else." The defect in the bearing of the argument in this case is, that no Christian materialist holds to the extinction of man's existence at death—but only of his conscious existence.

I wish both parties may be satisfied with this correction, and forbear arguing the point in dispute, at least for the present—at least, until the series of articles is completed. I do not believe it either profitable or interesting to the mass of our readers to discuss at length the doctrine of the consciousness or of the sleep of the soul between death and the resurrection. "THE UNIVERSALIST COMPANION AND REGISTER"—AND "THE UNIVERSALIST ALMANAC," FOR 1841.—We have received comparatively few orders for the above works, thus far—and shall therefore print but small editions, (unless further orders come in very soon,) for we can not risk large editions in our present circumstances. We regret this, 1st, because the tables on olam and aion, prepared with great care and labor by Dr. Clowes, and the rest of the reading matter of the work, is worthy of a very extensive circulation—the tables alone, are worth far more than the price of the whole work. 2dly, I regret it, because it will very materially lessen the proceeds which I had hoped to derive from the work, and which I not only greatly need, but feel that I have earned. And 3dly, I regret it, because I fear that after the work is issued, many will want it, and not be able to get it because the edition will be too small to supply more than the early orders. But I can not avoid it. The 3d reason is not strong enough to my mind, to warrant me in going to the expense of publishing thousands of copies that are not ordered, and may not be wanted, and which in that case, will be heavy and useless on my hands, absorbing all the profits on those I do sell.

The first form of the "Universalist Companion and Register for 1841"—a work which will embrace 72, common sized pages—is nearly ready for the press; and as the edition must be regulated by the orders received for the work, it is earnestly desired that all who intend procuring it to sell again, will forward their orders IMMEDIATELY, to O. Hutchinson, or to A. B. Grosh.

N. B. Will our Editors generally please copy this last paragraph into their next papers, with such remarks to call attention to it as they may deem proper. Their doing so will greatly oblige A. B. G.

Brs. T. Clowes, A. B. Grosh, and A. R. Bartlett, were appointed said committee.

Adjourned on Thursday afternoon, to meet in Stockbridge on the first Wednesday in June, 1841.

Wm. Lord, Moderator.

A. R. BARTLETT, Clerk.

REMARKS.—Though the weather was not very unfavorable during the session, yet the severe rain of Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday morning doubtless prevented many from attending the first day. Nevertheless a goodly number assembled, and on Thursday the congregation was very large. Sermons were delivered by Brs. Cook, Bartlett, Brown, and Grosh, assisted in the services by Brs. Delong, Woolley, Gibson, and Belding. Usual addresses by Br. Potter. A sermon was also delivered in Hamilton Village. Wednesday evening, by Br. Brown. The word was devoutly listened to, and we trust will exert a happy influence.

What more shall we say? Shall we say that we were cordially welcomed and kindly entertained during our stay? Yes we will say this, for as a lay brother observed, it really did the heart good to escape from the ordinary business of life and partake of the hospitality of warm-hearted friends. Many a one was present who could say—"I was a stranger and ye took me in." But we must be impartial. Last year, we had the unpleasant duty of reminding our brethren of another association, of certain wants of the preachers which were overlooked. We did not do it with the disposition to wound, but rather for the sake of the cause. If our associations are useful and necessary, (and who will dispute it?) it is equally so that preachers should attend them. But our preachers, are generally poor and their salaries small. Besides there are many who would gladly contribute something, if a collection was taken up, for the benefit of the preacher. Shall we, then, compel our preachers to absent themselves from the Associations by the consideration, that they have not the means to defray the expenses of the journey? Our brethren of the Central Association will remember the text, "What shall we have therefore?" and the preacher remembers it too. Doubtless, as he wended his way to the place of meeting, and thought of his duty as a preacher of the everlasting Gospel, and his toils and labors in preparing himself for discharging that duty, he might have asked himself the question—"What shall we have therefore?" and the answer would have been ready in his anticipations, as it was in his experience—we shall have kindness, and hospitality, and happy greetings which will pay us well. But when his labors were over, and he was about to depart with recollections of the expense of his journey and the unblest condition of his funds, if the question came up at all, it came up unanswered, unheeded—"What shall we have therefore?" It is sincerely hoped that such will not be the case again, unless our brethren can conscientiously say that the preachers, scanty and only means of support, belong to the list of sacrifices when he is bound to make for the preaching of the Gospel.

A. R. BARTLETT.

NOTICE.

For the information of my friends abroad I wish to state that I have recently moved out of this city, about two miles, into the edge of Deerfield, directly on the old Albany Turnpike where I shall be found in the brick dwelling house erected and formerly owned by General Weaver, and recently occupied by Mr. Clarke. I wish all letters and communications designed for me to be directed to Utica as heretofore; as Deerfield Post Office is four times more distant from me than is the Utica P. O.

THE UNIVERSALIST PULPIT.—Names are beginning to come in for this monthly publication of original sermons, so as to create in us a belief that we shall be able to issue the first number early in July. The subscriptions received this month—especially at our associational meetings, will determine the matter. And as we wish to supply all who do subscribe, and shall not print more copies than are subscribed for, we desire our friends to subscribe early, and our agents to forward all the subscribers' names during the present month, if possible. We must know precisely how many to print, before the 10th of July next. A. B. G.

A new Universalist (Restorationist) paper is to be started in Mendon, Mass, by Br. Adin Ballou, assisted by Brs. D. R. Lamson, G. W. Stacy, D. S. Whitney and W. H. Fish. We wish them abundant success in making known the great truth of a world's salvation. A. B. G.

Br. N. Gunnison was installed pastor of the society in Amoskeag, N. H. May 23th. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou.

Rev. H. Sample, (Presbyterian,) near Macon, Geo., has embraced and is preaching Universalism.

Br. Geo. Messenger, late of this State, now of Springfield, Ohio, has had a public discussion with a Mr. Mason, a Calvinistic Baptist preacher, in Springfield, which has added a great number of new members to the Universalist Society in that place, and the result appears to threaten the entire breaking up of the Baptist church in Springfield. ## DEVOTIONAL FEELINGS.

O could I sing a strain
Worthy thy glorious name,
Then would I take the lyre, with joyful hand,
But though with gratitude
Each feeling is imbued
The gems of thought shine not at my command.

Yet still—O Father dear!
Accept a heart sincere,
Though seared and blighted, by the cares of life,
Sick of earth's vanity
Fondly to thee I fly,
Shield me—O shield me, from all worldly strife.

O, hasten on the time,
When misery and crime
No more shall mar sweet nature's lovely face;
When love and peace serene,
Shall beautify each scene,
And earth shall be fit for thy dwelling place.

No more, with slavish fear
Will mortals then appear,
To worship thee, as partial, and unjust,
For error will have flown
And thou wilt then be known
A God of love—worthy all power, and trust.

THE BRIDE OF THE SUN.

Some three years ago, there lived at Montmartre, in the private establishment of the kind and indefatigable Doctor Blanche, a woman whose insanity was singular and affecting. She was young, her features were pleasing and her smile still more so; the only mental disorder she had was the belief that she was betrothed to the sun—he had promised her marriage she thought, on a bright autumn morning, and her lover had covered his radiant visage with clouds to avoid dazzling the eyes of his mistress. Since that time, he had been her's and she his; she had felt her spouse's burning kiss imprinted on her hand, and she now lived for him alone. The sun was her joy, and her pride, and her glory; poor creature! she rose at the very instant when her best-beloved cast his first rays across the sky, and hailed him with her looks, as the birds do with their songs, the stream with its murmur, the flowers with their perfume. The finer the day, the clearer the sky, the more radiant the whole face of nature, the happier was the poor wretch! Was it not her godlike husband that distributed light, and warmth, and comfort around her? Was he not the monarch of the world, and was he not her's? So she watched every change of place or appearance which her divinity presented; she seemed anxious not to lose the feebly of his rays, and the higher he rose in heaven the more ardent was her poetical enthusiasm. She could hardly be persuaded to take her meals, so full of passion was she; and to make her eat, it was necessary to tell her that it was her divine spouse who had gilded this fruit, ripened this grain and these grapes—so that she had a right to sit down at the table he had himself prepared for her. As night drew near, and the sun was on the point of sinking into the waters of the Seine, his tender spouse became as uneasy as any poor fisherman's wife, whose husband has been absent a couple of months, when she hears the sea roar—"What will become of my husband?" she used to say—"If he only escapes accidents while he is on his journey!" Gradually day would give place to night; then she would clasp her hand, and cry—"Wait for me—wait!" and hurry to rest.

Singular and happy madness! sweet delusion! to feel that one's soul belonged to the sun in heaven—to have no other desire than for an unsullied sky—to fear nothing but the clouds that sometimes obscure the face of the luminary—to be happy whenever all nature is happy! Such was the life of this poor lunatic for ten years. She had her troubles, too, as much as though she had retained her reason; for as soon as the winter approached, and she saw the face of her spouse grow pale, like that of a man mortally wounded—when she saw his glory hidden behind thick clouds, like a man whose renown is blackened by envy, she became the most melancholy of women. How long and sad were the short days of winter! The more exalted her bridegroom was, the more did she suffer at seeing him debased, obscured, enchained, and helpless. But she is soon to be happy again; yet a little while, and the sun pierces through the thick masses of vapor that conceal his brightness, and re-appears in all his grandeur and glory. So, when this poor lunatic found her spouse, at the return of spring, the same as he had been in the foregoing season, and saw the leaves of every tree and bush breaking their prisons to welcome him, joy returned to her spirit—she put on her gayest dresses, and sang her most cheerful hymn: "rejoice, all ye in heaven and on earth; rejoice, ye stars of the firmament; rejoice, ye waves of the stream!—ye angels who are above our heads, and ye men who tread the earth beneath your feet, rejoice! for my spouse, the sun, was sick, and has come back in health; he was lost, and now is found!"

This happy delusion, as we have said, lasted ten years, in spite of all efforts of science. The bride of the sun died some three years ago, and her death was as touching as her life. It was noon of a lovely day; the sun was bright, yet mild, and showered down its purest rays on all creation. His bride, seated on the turf under an aged fruit-tree, watched the movements of her august spouse in the sky. Her heart had never been more filled with love, her glances had never been more tender, her dream had never approached nearer to a reality. They understood each other so well—the sun and she!—he moved so slowly through the sky, doubtless to have the more time to look upon her as she knelt before him. But, oh heavens! all at once the fountain of light and heat stops, and grows dark; all at once it disappears—not as formerly, sinking gradually into the river, after having shaken brilliant gold-dust from his garments; but pauses abruptly, hides his visage, and is seen no more. Where is he? "Yes!" she screamed, "my husband is with a rival—he is false to me! he has left me during the day, and will not return again at night!"—and the poor creature, who lived only to gaze on him by day, to wait for him at night, to greet him in the morning, to sing his praise in spring, to admire him in summer, and weep for him in winter—the poor creature, seeing him disappear so suddenly, without knowing whether he went, or when he would return, died during the eclipse—died of jealousy, love and despair.

A little unbreeched fellow, the idol of his mother, and plague of his father, went to the post office and enquired if there was a letter for his "Drampa?" (grandpapa.)

"For whom?" inquired the Post Master.

"For drampa," answered the little fellow.

"Well, what is your granpapa's name?"

"Why drammama calls him Josh!"

"Well, what does your grandfather call her?"

"He says, 'Oh thunder, Bets, do keep your clack still for once.'"

The Post Master, baffled by the urchin's simplicity, dismissed him with the request that he should return home and ask his drammama her name.

THE WINE VESSEL.

An Emperor's daughter once said to a sage, "What great abilities are possessed by thee, and yet how ugly thou art! How great the wisdom in so mean a vessel!"

"Tell me," answered the sage, "in what vessels do you preserve your wine?" "In earthen," said she. "And you are so rich! Beg of your father that he put his wine in silver vessels."—She did so, and the wine became vinegar.

"Wherefore hast thou persuaded my daughter to such folly?" inquired the Emperor. The sage explained to him the occasion, and maintained that in one and the same man, Beauty and Wisdom seldom dwell together.

"Ah," said the Emperor, "still there are beautiful men, who are at the same time learned and wise!" "If they were not beautiful," continued the sage, "they would probably be more learned and more wise. A handsome man is seldom humble, he thinks of himself, and by that means forgets to learn."

TURKISH WIT.—Nash-red-dyn, the Turkish Æsop, wishing to propitiate the conquering Tamerlane, proposed to carry him some fruit. "Hold," said he, "two heads are better than one; I will ask my wife whether I had better carry quinces or figs. His wife replied 'Quinces will please him best because they are larger and finer.'"

"However useful the advice of others may be," rejoined Nash-red-dyn, "it is never well to follow that of a woman; I am determined to take figs." When he arrived in the camp, Tamerlane amused himself by throwing the figs at his bald head. At every blow Nash-red-dyn exclaimed "God be praised." Tamerlane enquired what he meant. "I am thanking God that I did not follow my wife's advice," replied Nash-red-dyn, "for if I had brought quinces instead of figs I should certainly have had a broken head."

MARRIAGES.

In Stafford, Feb. 27th, by Rev. A. Kelsey, Mr. DEWITT C. BUSHNELL, to Miss ALVIRA C. REED, both of that place. By the same, in church at South Le Roy, April 26th, Mr.

LEWIS HOOPES, of Alexander, to Miss CLARA S. SLAYTON, of South Le Roy. By the same, April 30th, Mr. JAMES H. HARMON, to Miss LUCY REED, both of Stafford.

DEATHS.

In Plymouth, Chenango county, May 1st, Miss POLLY HOLMES, only child of John W. and Ann Holmes, aged 21 years. Her virtuous life, unpretending manners, retiring modesty, and Christian examples, won for her the friendship and affection of all who knew her, and proved her to be a humble follower of Him who went about doing good although she never formally connected herself with any denomination of Christians. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered, at the funeral, on the 3d ult., to the mourners, by J. T. GOODRICH.

In Norwich, March 18th, Mr. AMOS WESCOTT, in the 79th year of his age. During the latter portion of the revolutionary war, the deceased served as a musician. He was ever an affectionate parent, a kind husband, an obliging neighbor and an honest, useful, and industrious citizen. He has left a wife with whom he has happily lived for more than 54 years, and numerous descendants, to mourn their loss, but they are comforted by the truth that all who die in Adam shall be made alive in Christ. The subject of this notice, for some time past was a firm and zealous believer in the unlimited and unchanging goodness of Almighty God. Within the last year, he has several times travelled on foot, to Oxford, a distance of near 6 miles, to hear it proclaimed—an example well worthy the imitation of many who are younger and much better able to perform the task. His faith supported him during a protracted illness, and enabled him triumphantly to exclaim in the hour of death, that he was going to a better and a happier world.

Funeral on the 19th, and a sermon was delivered to a very numerous congregation of sympathising relatives, friends and neighbors, by J. T. G.

In Smithville, February 15th, of consumption, Mr. WILLIAM HASTINGS, aged 37 years. The deceased though in many respects a worthy man, regretted upon his death-bed that he had not lived a better life. His last sickness was long and painful, but he was sustained by the prospect, that a happy immortality beyond the grave awaited not only himself, but all nations, families, kindreds and tongues, and this enabled him to rejoice in the very agonies of dissolution. A worthy partner and a large family of children, by this dispensation of divine Providence, are deprived of their principal source of support, and left needy and destitute. May that aid which was extended to them during the illness of Mr. H. be continued, and may the bestowers realize that "blessed are they who cast their bread upon the waters for they shall find it after many days." In the absence of the writer, Br. S. J. Gibson, who supplied my place at the time, attended the funeral, and in a highly satisfactory manner tendered the consolations of the Gospel to the mourning friends and neighbors. J. T. G.

In Spafford, Onondaga county, N. Y., May 17th, WILLIAM B. infant Son of William B. and Maria Cook, aged 5 months and 13 days. The funeral was attended the following day in the Baptist meeting house in that place, and a discourse delivered by the writer.

May the consolations of the Gospel of Christ, be the portion of the bereaved parents, and may they truly appreciate the instructions embodied in the words of the Master: "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." T. D. COOK.

In Russellburg, Warren county, Pa., April 6th, JABEZ GOWDY, aged 64 years, formerly of Western, Oneida county. Br. Gowdy had been a Universalist about 30 years. He died in the full triumphs of that faith. He selected 2 Tim. iv. 6, 7, 8, to be preached from at his funeral, and requested that a Universalist clergyman be sent for. He was Father to Br. G. S. Gowdy who has recently commenced preaching the Gospel of Universal Reconciliation to God.

The consolations of the Gospel were tendered on the 8th by T. C. E.

Also in Arkwright May 16th, Mr. SILAS HOLMES, aged 70 years, formerly of Plymouth, Chenango county. At the request of the friends a discourse was delivered on the 17th, at the school house near his residence, from 2 Cor. v. 1, by the writer, when a large concourse of neighbors assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to the deceased. The bereaved family mourn not as those without hope. T. C. EATON.

MOSAIC ACCOUNT OF CREATION.....NO. II.

Our remarks were, in our last number, principally confined to Gen. i: 1, touching the nature of the original substance of the earth, and the duration that it remained "without form and void," before the solar system was arranged. How long the earth remained in this state, the sacred historian does not inform us. It remained so, until "the spirit of the Lord moved upon the waters;" or until divine energy brought it into form, beauty and order, as described in the six days' work of creation, or formation. These days we shall notice in another number. We shall in this, confine our remarks to geological facts relating to the earth's phenomena, which show that not only the earth as a sphere, but animals and vegetables upon it, must have existed more than six thousand years, and consequently that the solar system must have been arranged before that recent date. This the following discoveries, resulting from deep excavations of the earth's surface, will fully show. The lowest coat or stratum which man has been able to penetrate, is found to consist of rock in which no remains of animals or vegetables are found. This is called primary or primitive rock, because it must have thus existed before animals were formed. This goes far to establish, in us, the opinion that the earth is centrally a mass of solid rock. The next series are transition rocks, composed of slate, limestone, sandstone, &c. Here the remains of the lowest order of marine animals appear. These rocks are called transition, "from the supposition that they were formed when the earth was passing from an uninhabitable to a habitable state." Now we think that these first formed series must have been constituted by the operation of the sun and atmosphere on the surface of the earth. And when thus formed, they would become susceptible of being inhabited by the lowest marine animals. This is the more probable, from the fact, that the "spirit of the Lord moved on the face of the waters," (in which God might now have placed sea animals,) for ages before the next series were formed. I allude to the coal series, in which the remains of vegetables and large trees are found, which trees could not have been created until the third day. Some suppose that these coals were formed from the decomposition of vegetable substances—that trees grew then to an immensely greater size than they now do, the configuration of some distinctly appearing in these beds of coal, whose diameter must have been fifty feet. Now could these grow without the solar and atmospheric influences? The remains of land animals are not found in these coal formations.—Hence, as these are found for the first time in the next series, we conclude that the gases were then in such a state that they could not exist. Hence land animals were not made until the sixth day, except fowls who were created on the fifth. How long these coals were forming, after sea animals appeared, before land animals existed, we leave for the reader to judge. It is certain they could not have formed in one day, nor in one thousand years, which is sometimes called a day.

In the next series, especially "in the upper secondary strata, the remains of lizard-shaped animals of immense size, are found." So the remains of animals are found in the next or tertiary series. Lastly in the alluvial strata, composed of sand, gravel, clay, near the earth's surface, are found the remains of living species, and also of men, which demonstrates that they are of a more recent origin.

Now, so far as these strata, and vegetable and fossil remains are concerned, these brief remarks accord with the views of Br. G. W. M., as expressed in the Expositor, as they also do with the views of Dr. Buckland, Prof. Silliman, and other geologists.

Since inditing our views, as expressed in these numbers, we have seen in Zion's Herald, a synopsis of a lecture on geology, delivered last Winter in Boston to a crowded and admiring audience by Professor S. In it he fully corroborated the views which we have expressed, viz., that the earth was not a mass of melted metal, but originally a solid rock. He supposes that the diluvium stratum, composed of broken rocks, slate, sand, limestone, etc., was first formed by the operation of the atmosphere on this naked, barren rock. Hence earth and these other substances are formed out of rock. In these strata the bones of huge animals now extinct are found. In the upper or alluvial series, (where the earth is in some places 220 feet deep, as at Amsterdam,) are found the remains of large animals, trees, etc. He also stated that the remains of human beings were only found in the alluvium, and then only near the surface of the earth. This was, to his mind, convincing proof that man did not exist contemporary with the animals whose remains were more deeply imbedded in the earth. This geological fact strongly corroborates the Mosaic account of the formation of man, at the close of the last day or "generation," and after God had made all other animals.

Now, what is the logical inference from Prof. S.'s views? Is it not, that the sun, and firmament, and atmosphere, were formed at the same time, or soon after our globe was formed? Of the same opinion is Br. G. W. M.. After noticing these phenomena of the earth, he adds, "The most of these vast deposits were made, and the most of the animals found imbedded in rocks and earth, were deposited, during the indefinite period that elapsed between the creation of matter and the present arrangement of the surface of the earth with its existing animals." Here he does not tell us, that these deposits were made before the solar system was arranged, but "before the present arrangement of the surface of the earth," etc. All this is true, and yet none of these "extinct genera," or "extinct species of animals and vegetables," could have existed until after, at least, "the evening and the morning were the third day." Of this opinion, appears to be Br. M., when he says, "successively, all the planets, with their sun, forming the solar system, and all the phenomena of arrangement in the earth, together with men and animals [animals and men] commenced their wonderful operations, to the praise of God and the good of the intellectual creation." Here things are placed in their proper order, as Moses places them. And yet we can not see how these events could be placed at "about six thousand years ago," or take place in "six days."

Now, after admitting the existence of these phenomena of the heavens and our earth for indefinite ages, we confess we see no necessity of a labored answer of the objections of the skeptics to the popular notion, that the earth has existed, in its present arrangement about six thousand years. All this labor is superfluous, unless we believe in these popular notions; for according to the former admissions it may have required ages for layers of good soil to form between successive strata of lava; or for the falls of Niagara to recede for miles, from Queenstown to their present location. The Chinese chronology might also be true, although it has every appearance of being fabulous, as their religion extends only back to Confucius, 600 years before Christ. Hence, all these statements of the rejectors of the Bible may be true and yet not conflict in the least with the Mosaic account of the creation, which covers indefinite unknown ages. Viewed in this light, all these objections would apply with as great, yea, greater force against the Platonic or Socratic philosophy; for while these ascribe the creation to secondary agents, Moses directly ascribes it to the great I AM. It appears to have been the design, then, of this great Hebrew legislator, to direct the homage of his countrymen, and the world, to the only wise Jehovah, the Supreme Architect of the universe, instead of paying a blind devotion to the "hosts of heaven," the sun, moon and stars, irrational animals, or senseless blocks of wood or stone. ## PROPHECY OF THE COMING OF JESUS CHRIST.

"To render unto every man according to his deeds."

LETTER IV.

This prophecy commences in Rev. xix: 11, and continues to chap. xxi: 8. "And I saw heaven opened and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True; and in righteousness he doth judge and make war. His eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many crowns; and he had a name written that no man knew but he himself; and he was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood; and his name is called the Word of God. And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses clothed in fine linen, white and clean. And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword that with it he should smite the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; and he treadeth the wine press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS." This clause of the verse presents Christ upon a white horse, with all the ensigns of war; with his name concealed from his enemies with whom he contends: followed by an army of saints, riding upon white horses, to denote the speed of their march, and the righteousness of their cause. Glorious theme, a righteous king, a righteous army, and a righteous cause, the cause of God, against Antichrist. I have assumed the point, that it is Christ that rides upon the white horse, and this I have done, from the names, titles, and characters ascribed to him. I have also assumed, that his army is an army of saints, from this uniform, which is fine linen, white and clean, explained to be the righteousness of saints.

"And I saw an angel standing in the sun; and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God; that ye may eat the flesh of kings and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all men, both free and bond, both small and great." This figurative language, drawn from the fountain of light, foretells the utter desolation of the kingdom of the beast. They are sacrificed to the fowls of heaven by a weapon, not carnal but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds; even a sword from the mouth of him that rides upon the white horse.

"And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse, and against his army. And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. And the remnant were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of his mouth: and all the fowls were filled with their flesh." The beast, false prophet, and kings of the earth, and their armies, represent the combined force of the kingdom of antichrist, in array against Christ and his saints. The war is spiritual—the beast and false prophet, are their leaders—they are not slain but taken alive, they are not taken out of the world therefore, but in the world are cast into a lake of fire. That the army of the beast and the kings of the earth are religionists, there can be no doubt, from the fact, that the beast has a false prophet for his minister, and the whole are zealous worshippers of the beast and the dragon, and their names are not in the Lamb's book of life.

"And I saw an angel come down from heaven having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent called the devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be fulfilled, and after that he should be loosed a little season." The overcoming of the beast and false prophet, sets the power of the dragon at defiance, for it was the dragon that gave to the beast his seat, his power, and great authority. I can discover no power, that the beast and false prophet have received from the devil, but the fear of endless damnation. And it is true that the beast and false prophet have extended, and maintained their reign over the world, by a power that results from the devil, and the eternity of his kingdom. But the messenger of truth, with the key of knowledge, shall bind the dragon, and set a seal upon him; that he shall no more deceive the nations for one thousand years, nor reign over them in the persons of false teachers. The power by which the pagan priests reigned over the people, was the fear of the devil and tartarus. And when Christianity triumphed over paganism, the dragon was cast down from his exalted station. But on the apostacy of Christians, and the rise of the beast, the same power was transferred to Christian rulers, and is the power by which the priesthood reigns at the present time. There is but one denomination that is exempt from this charge, who have ceased to reign by the power of the dragon, or to give heed to his deceptions, and among them he is now bound, and sealed, that he cannot deceive them, neither reign over them. The truth is, they have no faith in him, nor in the eternity of his dominion, and have entirely cast him off. No part of their ministry is enforced by preaching the devil, and the eternity of hell torments. But they preach Christ and him crucified, (to whom God has given all power in heaven and in earth) and have no use for the devil.

"And I saw thrones and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years. And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle; the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saint about, and the beloved city, and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone where the beast and false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever." This section of the prophecy, contains a summary of the two following sections, and indeed of all that is after written in this book. He that rides upon the white horse, is the same that sits upon the white throne. On the one he makes war, on the other, he proceeds to judgment, and renders to every man according to his works. On the conquest, by him on the white horse, of the beast and false prophet, a change of government was to be anticipated, and it is announced in the first clause of this section. The passing away of the empire of the beast, is fully announced in the following section, under the figure of the heavens and the earth, which flee away before the face of him that sits upon the throne, who takes to himself his great power and reign, when the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. This government or reign of Christ with his saints, is fully declared in the last section of this prophecy, under the figure of a new heaven and earth. Thus at the close of the dispensation of the Gospel to the Gentiles, Christ comes to reward every man according to his works, overthrows, abrogates, and abolishes the kingdom of antichrist, and makes all things new. Then commences the thousand years reign with his saints—then the deliverer goes out of Zion and turns away ungodliness from Jacob—then descends the new covenant dispensation upon the house of Israel. But alas for the worshippers of the beast.

THE LOGOS—OR WORD...NO. II.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God."—JOHN i: 12.

3. There is another fact that sheds fuller light on our subject, and tends to confirm us in the correctness of the view we have thus far taken of it. It is this: Christ never arrogates to himself the title, "God." He never said of himself that he was the self-existent, infinite, and immutable Jehovah; but his most exalted claim was, that he was the Son of God—the chosen of his Father, to communicate his will and purposes to the children of men. In one instance on record, he called himself the "only begotten Son of God:"* but in general he speaks of himself as the "Son of God;" or the "Son of man."

This shows that Christ is a dependent being: "for sonship necessarily implies dependence. If not used to denote that Jesus derived his existence, I can see no propriety in the term. Derived existence is its usual meaning * * *. Let it not be said, the terms Father and Son are simply names by which the first two persons in the trinity have chosen to be distinguished, that really one is no more Father nor Son than the other; for throughout the Scriptures the distinction is kept up; and the Son is always spoken of as subordinate to the Father, as coming from, and returning to him, as being indebted to him for wisdom, grace and power. Besides, we never put the Son in the place of the Father, nor the Father in the place of the Son; but we always conceive of them as two distinct beings, one sustaining the relation of Father, and the other the relation of Son."†

why did he not acquaint the people with this fact? Why did he not tell them that he was the sovereign Creator, instead of saying that he was the Son of God. The fact is, if he had been the Father as well as the Son, he would have declared himself as such to the multitudes who continually thronged around him. But there is nothing on record to certify that he did this, or claimed for himself a higher title than the "Son of God."

When the Jews accused him of making himself God, or equal with God, he promptly repelled the charge, and denied that he had even done any such thing, in the following language, "Is it not written in your law, I said, ye are gods? If he called them gods unto whom the word of God came, (and the scripture can not be broken:) say ye of him, whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest, because I said, I am the Son of God? If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works, that ye may know and believe, that the Father is in me, and I in him." John x: 34-38.

The Jews accused him of making himself God, because he said that he and his Father were one. But he showed them that they had wholly mistaken or misapprehended his meaning—that he intended to convey no such idea by the language he used, and would only be understood that he was the Son of God, and not God himself. He and his Father were not one and the same being, as the Jews understood him to say, but one in the same sense that he and the Father and believers are one; and as he that planted, and he that watereth, according to the apostle, are one—one in spirit—one in work—so he and the Father were one in the great object had in view in all their benevolent operations, the salvation of a lost and sinful world.

Again, Christ even spoke of himself as being inferior to the Father. In discoursing to his disciples concerning the awful and tremendous judgments that were about to be poured out upon the Jewish nation, he says, "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, BUT THE FATHER." Mark xiii: 32. Again, he said on another occasion to his disciples, "I go unto my Father, for my Father is greater than I." John xiv: 28. And again he said, "I can of mine own self do nothing." John v: 30.

It is true, that Christ was possessed of much power, but it was all given him by his Father. The apostle tells us that "by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, and that he is before all things, and by him all things consist." And for the very reason that "it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things to himself, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven. Col. i: 16-22.

It will be seen from this testimony, that the power, by which Christ created all things in earth and heaven, was given him by his Father, and all that follows, by which he was to be enabled to reconcile all things to God. It was literally true, as he said, that of himself he could do nothing. If he brought up the slumbering dead from the tomb, to the light of conscious being, it was by the power of the Father working through him. If he healed the sicknesses and the infirmities of men at a word, it was because he was clothed upon with a divine influence from heaven. If he triumphed over the powers of darkness—over sin, death, and hell, it was because the might of a Father's arm was with him—it was because he was clothed with power from on high—it was because God gave the victory through him, and enabled him to prevail over the enemies of man.

THE LAST CHAPTER OF AN OLD MAN'S LAST REVIEW OF THE SCRIPTURES.

"For the creature (man) was made subject to vanity; not willingly; but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope."—Romans viii: 20.

Of this subjection to vanity, there is daily proof, and undoubtedly will be, until Adam's last son hath fallen to the earth. In me, saith Paul, i. e. in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing. Why? because it was made subject to vanity. The wisest and best thing that Paul could do, was to keep under his body, and bring it into subjection to the will of the inward man. In Adam (or the earthly nature) we all die, because all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; i. e. perfect holiness. So judgment passed upon all men to condemnation, or damnation, for it had been proved that the carnal mind is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. Therefore, perfection in the earthly man will never be seen during his present mode of existence. Where, then, is perfection, and in what doth it consist? It is perfect love in the hidden man of the heart. God is a spirit, and seeketh such to worship him as worship in spirit and in truth. God speaks to the spirit, saying, "My son, give me thine heart"—"be ye holy, for I am holy"—"be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." This is the will of God, even our sanctification. He desires the perfect happiness of his children, therefore he commands them to be perfectly holy. It is in vain, it is replying against God, to say we can not live without sin—we may as well say we can not live without death; for death is the wages of sin. Besides, it is a directly implied charge against the Almighty, that He makes an unreasonable demand, and requires of us an impossibility. What God commands his children to do, they are some how made capable of doing. As many as believed, to them gave he power to become the sons of God. The foibles, and vanities that we see in the outward man are not criterions by which we are to judge of the hidden man of the heart. Paul in writing to his Colossian brethren, exhorts them to set their affections on things above, not on things on the earth—for ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God—of course, out of the reach of our examination or knowledge. In Hebrews xii: 11, Paul writes to his living brethren of their spiritual blessings and privileges, that they are come to the city of the living God; the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, and to God the judge of all; and to the spirits of just men made perfect. This perfection is all comprised in love to God, and, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

Our gratitude and love to God, is due to him as our Creator and Preserver, and bountiful Benefactor; for He daily loads us with benefits. In adversity, he is a Friend, and an almighty Protector, when dangers surround us; and if we keep his saying, we may ask what we will, and have a promise, that it shall be done unto us. Love is the bond of perfectness—the all conquering principle. It has virtually overcome the world. And it is enjoined upon us to follow the example, and overcome evil with good; and thus obtain a victory over all earthly things. The spirit struggling and longing for this victory or sanctification, feels to say,

"Had I ten thousand worlds,
And each as good as this,
I'd freely barter all away,
For perfect holiness."

I shall now make a few brief remarks on what is called our Saviour's golden rule. It may be so called, because of its preciousness and purity. And reference also may be had, to its being a rule that shall govern the inhabitants that "walk the golden streets." It may also be compared to gold seven times purified; in its being the substance and essence of the law and the prophets, comprised in so short a sentence. "As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." This is the strait and narrow gate. And the injunction or command of our Saviour is, "strive to enter in at the strait gate." What, must there be a strife at the gate? Yes, and a hard one too; for here the battle is at the gate. Here the God of this world musters all his opposing legions—this is his dernier resort. Here, if the battle is lost, the reins of government are for ever plucked from his hands; and those that enter, and pass through the gate break loose, and pass away from the dominion of the god of this world, and have gotten the victory over the beast, (i. e. all things earthly, beastly, or carnal, every lust and passion,) and are now on the kings highway of holiness, which leads to the city of the living God, and the spirits of just men made perfect. All that the law and the prophets required in union with the Gospel of Christ, is now fulfilled in them, and they are prepared to join in the song of Moses, and the song of the Lamb, saying, "great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints—for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXIX.

LUKE xiv: 26. "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother and wife and children," etc. etc.

We are not to understand this in the sense, that we are required to actually hate any of these, but to be ready to forsake them if the cause of Christ should require it. The word hate is sometimes used to signify a less degree of love. When we read Romans ix: 13. "Jacob have I loved but Esau have I hated," the meaning simply is, I have loved, or preferred Jacob—the Israelites, to Esau—the Edomites. See also Genesis xxix: 30, 31; where Leah's being hated is explained by Rachel's being loved more than Leah. See also Deut. xxi: 15-17.

Chap. xix: 11. "They thought the kingdom of God should immediately appear."

Jesus was now on his journey to Jerusalem, and his followers thought that on his arrival there he would proclaim himself king.

Chap. xxi: 16. "For I say unto you I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God." See also verse 18.

That is until that of which the passover is a type is fulfilled in my death, through which the kingdom of God or of Heaven (see Matf. iii: 2.) shall be established among men. Before the time of another passover, the Holy Ghost shall descend, the Gospel of the kingdom be established, and that which was typified by the paschal lamb shall be fulfilled.

Chap. xxi: 44. "And his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground."

Observe it is not said it was actually blood, but was "as it were great drops of blood" etc. But this circumstance is not mentioned by any other evangelist, and it is worthy of remark that among many of the ancients, the authenticity of these two verses (the 43d and 44th) was doubted. They are omitted in two of the oldest manuscripts in the world, besides several others, manuscripts and verses. In some very ancient manuscripts they are marked as being doubtful. They are however extant in a vast number of manuscripts and versions, so that on the whole they may be considered doubtful.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Niagara Association of Universalists for 1840.

The Niagara Association of Universalists met in Churchville, June 3d, 1840, and organized the council by choosing Br. M. B. Smith, Moderator.

Appointed Brs. J. M. Cook, E. F. Davis, and J. Fuller, committee of arrangements; E. Hammond, N. Sawyer, and E. Farwell on fellowship and ordination; M. B. Smith, J. M. Cook, C. Hammond, on Discipline; M. B. Smith, N. Sawyer, (ministerial) and Robert Wooden, and William Mudgett, (lay) delegates to the State Convention in 1841; and J. M. Cook to deliver an introductory sermon at the next session.

Voted to confer ordination on Br. J. M. Cook at this session—adopted the report of committee of Discipline, "No complaint"—recommended four conferences to be held the ensuing year in this Association; the organization of Sunday Schools, Bible Classes, etc.—heard an imperfect statistical report from the lay delegates, and agreed to adjourn this Association to Ridgeway, Orleans Co., on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1841.

ORDINATION SERVICES.—1. Hymn. 2. Prayer, D. Van Alstine. 3. Hymn. 4. Sermon, T. J. Smith, text John xviii: 37. 5. Voluntary. 6. Ordaining Prayer, S. Miles. 7. Charge and delivery of the Scriptures, C. Hammond. 8. Right Hand of Fellowship, M. B. Smith; and concluding addresses by the same.

MINISTERS PRESENT.

Elisha Smith, Barre; E. Farwell, S. Weatherbee, Clarendon; R. Wooden, A. M. Dutton, Chili; John Proctor, Gaines; J. Hiscock, A. C. Wilmet, Parma; William Mudgett, Ridgeway; S. Shepherd, J. Emerson, Riga.

Six sermons were preached by the ministering brethren in the order of their names, other exercises by the remainder.

REMARKS.

We had pleasant weather, warm and devoted friends, harmonious council, and joyful exercises in the sanctuary. Thirteen ministers came up to the feast of fat things, bearing witness to the infinite goodness of God, and the unspeakable joy of our "common salvation." The subjects discussed from the desk, were varied into the following order: 1. The authenticity of the Scriptures. 2. The reconciliation of all things to God. 3. The Cuman of rest. 4. The Christian soldiers' warfare. 5. General and particular Providence. 6. Universalism confirmed by evidence drawn from nature and revelation. The subjects were set before a highly respectable auditory, in a manner well calculated to produce the most happy consequences. Indeed we must believe that some good was done at this meeting. But Br. Knap, we regret to say was not there. The fathers in Israel we always need—the young men we always welcome to the deliberations of the council.

All the societies were represented but one (Lockport,) who reported that the cause of Universalism was prosperous, particularly in Riga and Chili; the latter having received the fellowship of this Association, at this session. And what rejoiced our hearts the more, was to learn that the old society in Parma, after having been dead for ten years, has come forth unto the resurrection of life; and a similar resurrection seems to be taking place in No. Murray (now Kendall) through the agency of the truth by Br. Miles. Four conferences will be appointed the ensuing year, at different places.

One worthy young brother was set apart to the work of an evangelist by solemn ordination. May the Great Head of the Church smile upon his labors, and give him strength to run and not be weary, to walk and not faint.

Our thanks are due to the ministering brethren from other Associations for their help in time of need, and to our brethren in Churchville for their generous hospitality and Christian kindness during this meeting.

THE INFLUENCE OF TRUTH AND ERROR CONTRASTED.

I well know that the advocates of protracted meetings pretend that they are schools of piety, and one of the most powerful means which God has established to promote the cause of truth and religion in the world—that there, sinners are converted from the error of their ways, and are made to rejoice in the truth as it is in Jesus, and that there God's character is proclaimed to the world in its true and proper light. But do not stubborn facts prove, beyond dispute, that this is not the case? Is it not true that through the influence of those meetings, thousands are led to hate God, and abhor every thing that bears the name of religion—that they are not only confirming those that are already skeptical, but are every way calculated to drive most, if not all that at first adhere to their doctrines, into the awful vortex of Infidelity? And is it not a solemn truth, that in many instances the young, and the inexperienced are, by hearing the awful denunciations and most abominable descriptions which are used by these destroyers of human happiness, frightened and made to believe that the only way they can escape falling into the hands of an awful God who is possessed of infinite wrath and indignation, and avoid being doomed to a state of endless pain and despair, is to obey their mandates and believe all the doctrines that they teach? Thus thousands, by having their fears excited, are led to believe that all which these false teachers say, is the truth of God, and consequently that they must believe it, and obey them. But when their fears subside and the excitement is over, they speak of their conduct with utter disgust and abhorrence; and though in many instances they will strongly support some of the great and glorious truths of the Bible—they reject that Bible, and consider it a mass of priestcraft and lies, because they have been taught that it supports the doctrine of an endless hell, Triune God, personal devil, vicarious atonement, and all those inconsistencies which, combined together, have for a long time been called by the false name of orthodoxy.

Now I think every candid person must see that Partialism is the very foundation of Infidelity. But let us compare the doctrines of these self-styled evangelists with some passages in the word of God. We read in Psalms cxlv: 9, "The Lord is good to all and his tender mercies are over all his works." Psalms ciii: 9, "He will not always chide, neither will he keep his anger forever." Lam. iii: 31, "For the Lord will not cast off forever." Eph. i: 9, 10, "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him." Tim. ii: 3, 4, "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." Rev. v: 13, "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing and honor, and glory and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." I might quote many more passages, but the above I think are sufficient, for no candid person will deny that they teach and prove the impartial and unchanging love of God to all created intelligences, and his purpose to make them ultimately and eternally happy. If so, then it is true that the conductors of protracted meetings contradict the plain and positive assertions of scripture, when they contend with awful solemnity, that God will cast off millions and millions of the human race and appoint them their portion in the dark world of woe, where they will have to suffer inconceivable pain and anguish under his almighty wrath and infinite displeasure. When these false teachers assert then, that because all have sinned they consequently deserve endless misery, and that the only way any one can go to heaven or be saved, is to be cleared from this deserved punishment, by Christ's suffering in their stead, and that God will bestow the gift of eternal life or endless blessedness on some of the lost race of Adam, and leave the rest to sink beneath his vindictive wrath for ever and ever, do they not contradict the positive declarations of the word of God? They do.

Well then, whether they cause those that come under their influence to take sides with the bold and avowed Infidel, or to adhere to their absurd and erroneous views of God and his government, their influence only tends to debase and injure man, and fill him with doubt, fear, and anguish. In other words, the influence of their doctrines on the mind of man is as different from the influence of truth, as light is from darkness, or pain and anguish from peace and happiness. This I know to be true, having experienced, in days gone by, those indescribable and heart rending fears, and those tortures of mind, which can not be expressed, by believing what those ravenous wolves in sheep's clothing preached and taught for the truth of the Bible. Yes, many are the times that I have sat and heard them when their horrid views of God and their descriptions of the damned, caused me to wish that I had never been brought into existence; and desire in all the sincerity of my soul, that God would bestow upon me the gift of annihilation, that I might cease to exist—become nothing; rather than be exposed to an endless existence of pain and misery! O, my God who can describe such feelings! How long shall man, poor ignorant man, have to endure these excruciating tortures! When shall the Sun of Righteousness arise, and with his beams of light and truth, disperse these clouds of darkness, doubt and superstition, and cause poor erring mortals to rejoice in their God and Saviour! Hasten, O Lord, the glorious time when the songs of joy and rejoicing shall sound throughout the world, and the galling chains of superstition shall no longer bind the minds of the sons and daughters of humanity!

But to return. This last boon of hope I was assured would never be granted; and unless I got religion, or made my peace with God (according to the terms which they used,) before I died, I must lie down in sorrow and anguish, without the least ray of hope that my misery would ever be lessened, but with a certain assurance that it would continue to increase to all eternity. Yes this was the certain doom of all that died in their sins, on the supposition that there is no change after death.

Now are such views of God's character and government as the above, calculated to rejoice and happily the heart of man, and raise him to that state of bliss which he is capable of enjoying even here on this earth? I answer no. But says the Partialist, this represents the state of the sinner's mind and not that of true Christians, for they can feel happy in the glorious prospect of enjoying a state of perfect bliss at God's right hand to all eternity. Ah! beloved friend, do you expect to enjoy perfect happiness, when you know that your beloved parent, child, brother, sister, husband, wife, or any of your friends shall be waiting among the damned in the dark world of unutterable anguish and despair? You can not; neither can you enjoy happiness from the thought of this, here on earth. So think as you may, as it regards your own safety, you must be miserable while you believe, as you profess to, that sin will cause the endless misery of any of the human race. I know that Christians think they are happy in the love of God, and do feel sometimes to rejoice in the prospect of a blessed immortality for themselves and all true Christians; but this joy is soon driven from their minds by strong and cruel doubts and fears in regard to their friends that are out of Christ, and are yet exposed to unending tortures. So whether professed Christians or not, no one can enjoy the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ while they believe that any one of their fellow beings are exposed to endless misery. This I also know from experience, and therefore, can not be mistaken.

But is there no balm in Gilead, and is there no physician there; is there no boon of hope that will satisfy the longings of the human soul and cause it to exclaim, it is enough; yea it is enough; I ask no more? I speak the truth and lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness when I affirm that there is. For when we view God as he is revealed in his sacred word, the Father, and the infinite, impartial and "unchanging Friend of all created intelligences, and feel perfectly satisfied that he will overrule all things and all events which ever have or ever will transpire, to his own glory and the ultimate good and endless happiness of all his intelligent and rational creatures, can we ask for more than this? Can we think or conceive of any thing more glorious than this? Certainly not. Well beloved reader, whoever thou art, know that this is Universalism. Yes, Universalists, although they see sin, error, and superstition now raging against this glorious doctrine of the blessed God, look forward with the assurance of faith to the time when truth shall triumph, sin be finished, transgression ended, and an everlasting righteousness brought in to crown the wants of all God's creatures. This faith is not a mere phantom, a wild conjecture of the excited mind. No, it is as firm and sure as the eternal throne, having the unerring word, the faithful promises, the immutable and incontestable oath of God who can not lie, to affirm and substantiate it. The proof in the Bible is so clear and positive that, methinks no one who will give the subject a careful and candid investigation can help but be convinced of its truth. And O, what a glorious truth! What a blessed hope! What a consoling and heavenly faith, enabling as it does, every sincere believer to rejoice with joy that is unspeakable and full of glory, and to say as did Israel of old, it is enough! This is the hope and the consolation of the true and firm believer in the doctrine of God's impartial grace.

But, says one, are there no passages in the Bible that support the doctrine of endless misery? I answer no, and I boldly and fearlessly challenge the world to produce one positive assertion that supports that horrible dogma. I know that there are many passages, which, by a misinterpretation, have been used by Partialists to prove that doctrine; but while one proves it by this passage, another one will contradict it and prove it by some other passage, and there is such a disagreement between them, take them altogether, that no one can tell which to believe. This ought to be sufficient proof to convince any one that their views are erroneous. But the Bible proves the contrary doctrine plainly and positively, as it has been shown already in this article, and as the Bible does not contradict itself, it must be true that Partialists' views of those passages which they bring forward to prove their doctrines, are erroneous. Hence, all who support the doctrine of endless misery, dishonor God, injure man, contradict the teachings of nature, reject all the arguments and conclusions of reason, and bring down upon their own heads misery and anguish of soul. And now, in conclusion, I would entreat one and all to think and reflect on this subject, for it is of immense importance to all of us. Do you ask how it can be of such great importance when all are sure of being saved in heaven at last? I answer, by referring you to the misery and anguish of those who are ignorantly led by the popular preachers of the present day, to believe that God is a cruel, vindictive, and malignant tyrant, and to the thousands that are by the same means driven into the dark and gloomy doubts of Infidelity? On the other hand, I would also refer you to the joys, consolations, and glorious anticipations of those who have a true knowledge of the infinite, holy, and ever blessed God our heavenly Father, that you may draw the contrast, and see what is the suffering of man, and what he is deprived of by adhering to, and believing what those false teachers proclaim to the world. Is not this enough to awaken the best sympathies and most noble powers of our nature, and call them all into vigorous action in behalf of our fellow beings? Remember we all have an influence which affects more or less our friends and associates, and all with whom we have to do. And do we want that influence to benefit and increase the happiness of our kindred race, and glorify our heavenly Father? Then let us arise and exert our every power to suppress vice, to dissipate error and superstition, and to promote the cause of truth and virtue throughout the world. Yes, if we want to be happy, if we want to do good, we must in the first place shun even every appearance of evil, and cleave unto that which is good, we must endeavor to promote and increase in our own hearts a spirit of love and true devotion to God, and of benevolence and good will to all our kindred race. This is, I can conscientiously say, the spirit that induces me to pen this article, although some may think I manifest a spirit of ill will and hatred towards Partialists in speaking of them as I do. But God, who knows all hearts, is my witness when I affirm, that I have no feelings but those of love and pity towards them; and that I have strong desire to do them good. It is not them that I contend against, but it is their false and erroneous sentiments; and I frankly confess to all, that I do, with all my soul, abhor, hate, and detest those God-dishonoring and peace-destroying doctrines which Partialists profess to believe, and which they proclaim to the world. And I have firmly resolved, God being my help and strength, to do all in my power to counteract and destroy the influence which they are now exerting over thousands of the human race. When Universalists live as becometh saints of the Most High—live quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty, and adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour with a well ordered life and a godly conversation—then shall Zion arise and shine, and the glory of the Lord shall be in the midst of her, and the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth. Then shall the votaries of truth be multiplied, the cause of God prospered, and light and knowledge extended; the sum of human happiness be increased on the earth, and the praises of our God sound throughout the world. This is the glorious time I long to see. O, that the Lord would, by the power of his blessed spirit, revive and quicken us with a more ardent zeal, and cause us to realize that our duty is our interest, and that under God it depends on us whether truth shall spread and prevail, and cause man to rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, or whether superstition and error shall fill his mind with sorrow and grief all his days, and cause him to die in hopeless despair.

HEARING OF THE WORD.

BY REV. MOSES BALLOU.

CHAPTER III.

Another class, deserving of censure, I shall denominate.

III. Fashionable hearers.—Fashion, that most capricious of all tyrants, rules the world. Nothing can be said, nothing thought, nothing done; whether in business, social intercourse, or the pursuit of pleasure, but it must conform to the dictates of her legislation. The most extravagant, and to my apprehension, foolish things imaginable, are pursued as though life depended on their attainment, merely for accommodating one's self to whatever may chance to be the adopted fashion of a day. But with whatever feelings I might view the whims of fashion, I should probably pass them by in silence here, did they not encroach upon the sacred department devoted to religion. However little it may be thought of by people generally, yet it can not be denied that there is a fashion in religion as well as in every thing else. In almost every populous place in our country, so far as I am acquainted, there are one or more places of worship that are deemed most fashionable. The question is apparently never thought of by the devotees of this goddess, whether truth or falsehood is taught there; whether God or some idol is the object of worship, and indeed it would seem that these are matters of indifference, if the church is only a popular one, and patronized by the aristocracy and fashion of the place. Now if there is any one class of hearers whose pretended homage must appear as an abomination to the All-Seeing Eye, it verily seems to me that it must be this. God is not the object of their devotion: his truth is not the subject of their attention; for they would barter either in a moment for one breath of popular applause, or a nod of recognition from the wealthy and fashionable. God, truth, duty and religion, are foreign from their thoughts, and they go to meeting as they would go to a party, without the least sense of either pervading their minds. Such conduct appears to me little better than insanity; and for my part I would rather meet with a congregation of beggars on the Sabbath, in any hovel in the land; if they were but sincere and devoted Christians; than in a gilded temple with a congregation of fashionables such as I have described. Christ was the humble son of a poor carpenter in Judea; without wealth, rank, or education, or "where to lay his head;" and his first and most acceptable preachers were the fishermen of that country; and one of the first great duties they urged upon their followers was meekness, humility, and lowliness of heart. A sincere devotion to God, and a strong desire for their own spiritual improvement, made their meetings acceptable and profitable, whether held in the caves and dens of their mountains, or in the humble cottages of the fishermen on the banks of the Gennesaret. Here, in this state of lowliness and humility, they grew up, the favored and accepted children of the Most High. And if those of the present day would be equally blest of God, they must imitate much of their spirit, and copy more closely their example. We ask no man to give up his wealth, forsake the blessings of life, and clothe himself in rags: this is not my meaning; "for all this might be done," and still the individual be nothing better than a hypocrite, with a proud heart and a haughty spirit; but I mean, simply, that the humility of soul should be copied that we find exhibited by them, if we would become "followers of God as dear children."

GAINESVILLE, NUNDA, AND ANGELICA.

Br. Grosh—It is quite customary for our preachers to let the public know where they preach, and the success (they are not apt to mention the non-success) of their labors. Perhaps I may be permitted to fall in with the common custom, and give you and the public a very brief statement of what I am doing, and the prospects of the cause of truth where I labor.

I have recently commenced labors in Gainesville, three eights of the time, in Nunda, three eights, and in Angelica one fourth of the time, for one year. In Gainesville I have preached a part of two years previous to the present, and have the satisfaction to believe that I am doing some good—that the cause is moderately prospering.

Our friends in Nunda have had a revival during the last winter, among themselves I mean, in consequence of an excitement among other denominations; and hence have engaged my services as stated above. Our prospects are now flattering, and we trust the cause of truth will be built up in that flourishing village, and in the surrounding vicinity. At Angelica, we have had no preaching till the present year; but we have a goodly number of friends in the vicinity, (though there are few in the village,) by whose influence and exertions we have reason to believe the cause will be promoted. May the Lord bless their efforts and build up his kingdom in their midst.

Yours truly,

ANECDOTE.

Difference between a Christian and a Universalist.—In the town of P., Allegany county, there lives a Mrs. C., whose husband died last winter, very suddenly, by accident. Whether the widow is in indigent circumstances or not, I have not been informed—but no matter, as far as the present relation is concerned. Mrs. C. was in want of some straw, and sent to one of her brethren in the Church to see if she could obtain it, and on what conditions. The reply she received was, that she could have the straw for one dollar per load, and send her team and draw it away: that if she could not give that, she should not have the article—he could, he said, put it on to his farm, and thus manure his land, and unless he could get a dollar a load, he should make that use of it. Mrs. C. felt that she was not able to give so high a price for straw, and accordingly she sent to one of her Universalist neighbors, and made the same inquiry she had made of her religious brother, and was told that she could have as much as she wanted for nothing. So the owner of the straw took his team and carried her a load gratuitously. Mrs. C. says, that she now knows the difference between a Christian and a Universalist.

RELIGIOUS TRUTH.

"But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest; for, as, concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against." ACTS xviii: 22

II. Whoever considers the history of past pagan nations, and studies their situation as they at present exist; who remembers their idolatries, their sacrifices of human life to imaginary and vindictive gods, and their constant and manifold errors, must we think, admit the necessity of divine revelation or of an immediate communication of the great principles of truth from God to men. This fact is admitted by some of the wisest men that have ever graced the pagan world.

And when we take into consideration the antiquity of the books which we designate by the name "Bible," the oldest of which books can be traced for thirty-three centuries back to Moses—when we consider the prophecies therein recorded, most of which have been wonderfully and minutely fulfilled centuries after they were written, and whose truth is recorded in the ruins of Ninevah, Tyre, Babylon, Jerusalem, and the past and present condition of the Jews—when we consider the miracles therein recorded, which could alone be effected by the power of God, and yet whose performance is attested by the most creditable witnesses, and which were not denied by Celsus, Porphyry or Julian deists of the second, third or fourth centuries—when we consider the moral purity and excellence of those whose writings compose the Bible, as well as the life, and death, and character of Christ, whose existence and crucifixion are matters of unquestioned history—when we consider what superiority of civilization, of institutions, of advance in knowledge, and of increase in virtue, Christianity has given to the nations who have cherished it—when we consider how the truth of the Christian covenant has reformed the vicious, instructed the ignorant, given hope to the despairing, consolation to the mourning, and songs of triumph and victory to the dying—we are constrained to admit, that in the Bible, God has spoken to the children of men.

Therefore, rejecting the doctrine of skepticism, we believe that the Bible contains a divine revelation from God to men, making known the character, will, purposes, plans, and designs of Deity—that this revelation is the “man of our counsel,” the source of moral wisdom, the fountain of Christian truth and virtue—that it is infinitely superior to all creeds, and creed-books, and that the Christian should go to it as his only creed-book—that it is the perfect guide of man for belief and for practice—and that it is the only rule of decision by which to arrive at Christian truth. By these remarks, it is seen that to faith in the existence of the only living and true God, we add faith in the Bible, as containing a revelation from heaven to the inhabitants of the earth.

III. The individual who peruses the Old Testament carefully will find a personage prophesied of who was to be the Messiah, the Root of David, the Branch, the elect Servant of God—who was to set judgment in the earth, though he was to be rejected by his people and led like a lamb to the slaughter. If that individual will also peruse the New Testament carefully, he will find a personage spoken of, “called the beloved Son of God,” the man “Christ Jesus,” whose life, actions and fate, were the exact fulfilment of the prophecies found in the Old Testament concerning him. This personage presents a character of spotless purity, of ennobling virtue, of earnest compassion for the ignorant and sinful, of untiring energy for the welfare of the world, of unswerving confidence in the Father who sent him, of unshaken courage in facing persecution and yet mingled with the most sincere forgiveness of his foes. He declared noble doctrine, and in proof of his divine mission, performed miracles of surprising character. These, and other facts recorded in the New Testament, will convince the reflecting, that the Messiah is of divine origin, sent among men as the “Saviour of the world,” as the Redeemer of man.

Therefore, rejecting unequivocally the doctrine of the trinity, we most cordially believe that Jesus is the Son of God, sent forth by Deity on a divine mission of truth and grace—we believe that he was an individual chosen by heaven for a special purpose, was endued with power from on high, which enabled him to perform miracles, to foretell future events, to read the thoughts of men, and to establish Christianity—that he has “all power in heaven and on earth” in regard to the moral interests of the human family—that he was without sin, and was the “express image” of God’s moral person—that he was the well-beloved to “bring life and immortality to light”—that he will rule and reign in the kingdom of Christian truth, until, having subdued all things to himself, he will deliver up the kingdom to God the Father, that he, God, may be all in all. And we perfectly agree with the apostle, when he said, “for there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time.” 1 Tim. ii: 5, 6.

IV. Wherever men can be found—in whatever age or clime they may have lived—however degraded and ignorant they may have been, or are now—to whatever nation or tribe they may have belonged, or do now belong—no person exists, but that has hopes of life beyond the grave. This hope or desire is as universal as the race of Adam, and as prevalent in the soul as hunger is in the body. And certainly no nation or tribe has yet been discovered, which is without a religion embracing future and enduring life in some form or other. The New Testament assures us, that this universal desire will be gratified; for, in the wisdom of his Providence, Deity has determined to confer an immortal existence on the minds of all people, when he shall place them in the spiritual bodies of another and better world. It was for this purpose that Christ rose from the dead, bursting the cements of the grave, to reveal the great truth of the “resurrection of the dead,” to the waiting sons and daughters of Adam. Hence, of the Saviour, Peter said, “who God hath raised from the dead.” Acts iii: 15. Hence Paul had hope “that there should be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.” Acts xxiv: 15, and that “as in Adam all die, even so, in Christ shall all be made alive.” 1 Cor. xv: 22. And it was not the least of his joys when he felt empowered to say, “for we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.” 2 Cor. v: 1.

With these instructions for our guide, we, rejecting the doctrine of annihilation, believe that there will be a resurrection from the dead of the whole human family—that each and every son and daughter of Adam will be made to exist forever after they depart from this life—that as they are on earth weak, they will be raised in power; as they are on earth dishonorable, they will be raised in glory; as they are on earth corruptible, they will be raised incorruptible; and we fully believe that the resurrection state will be glorious; for the language of the Saviour, spoken to the Sadducees, exactly expresses our views. “Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels of God in heaven.” Matt. xxii: 29, 30. We freely confess, that we do not believe that the resurrection state will be one of dishonor and sinfulness. For, as the all who die in Adam, are to be made alive in Christ; and as Christ is the first fruits of the resurrection, or but an exhibition of the glory of the whole resurrection, so it must be evident, that no blasphemous, sinful, and depraved wretch will be raised in that character in Christ—for it is as clear as light, that as in the heart we have partaken of Adam’s sinful and imperfect nature, so in the resurrection, we shall put on heavenly natures.

CONTROVERSY AND INVESTIGATION.

It can not be denied that every day develops more fully the necessity for thinking minds to think more carefully and investigate more deeply. Literature, the arts, and the sciences, as they have already claimed the notice of the world, show us conclusively that we have but just entered upon the wonders of human progression. New sciences are coming forth from the hidden things of time; light is irradiating the sublime mysteries of nature, and many a mind has been awed at the mighty strides of heaven-directed intellect, and felt the power of truths upon which it has stood, though until now undreamed and unknown. Yet, perhaps it will be unnecessary to point the reader to these matters in order to instigate him to continued exertions at self-improvement. We hope it is so. We hope no one will allow an indifference to the most important sources of knowledge to throw him in the rear of his fellows, or set up the land-marks of ignorance along the path which he travels. Methinks it is proper to infer that every one who appreciates the value of knowledge, will hail with gladness every new born offspring of science, and improve every hour which he can spare from other pursuits, in enriching and strengthening the mind.

And yet it would seem that thousands do not fully appreciate the value of knowledge. The fact that they have long cherished opinions without an effort to test their correctness, is, in their eyes, sufficient to sanctify those opinions and screen them against every ray of light which beams from heaven upon them. Their opinions are the idols of their souls; and especially are their religious opinions—instead of being adhered to for their consistency and utility—preserved and protected, as a witch doctor preserves and protects the rusty, worthless nail which has wounded the foot of some unfortunate urchin, or as the antiquarian preserves the relic of ages, the use of which is forever lost in the obscurity which envelopes its origin. With these circumstances before us we can easily see that their natural tendency is consistent with facts. Men have cherished religious principles which have been completely separated from every consideration of utility, justice, and benevolence. They have held them sacred when the only merit which they could discover in them, was, that they saved them the trouble of investigating truth. And hence, though the natural language of all the works of God, though a better acquaintance with the Bible, though a more extensive knowledge of human nature; and a deeper and more abiding sense of the dependence of the finite upon the Infinite, all contradict their received notions, there is still not enough, in their estimation, to induce them to serious and prayerful investigation. They are aware that the plainest dictates of common sense are against them—that the plainest and most positive declarations of holy writ are at variance with their feelings; but their excuse is that they understand some portions, (they should say isolated portions,) of the Bible so and so, and it is not for them to inquire into the mysteries of truth; thus admitting that they are willing to leave received truths forever darkened by inscrutable mystery. I admit and insist that the Bible should be received as the highest authority in matters that pertain to man’s highest interest. But it should be remembered that truth is never at war with itself, that God never reveals in nature or in science any thing that is contrary to inspiration. What one positively declares, can not be contradicted by the other. It only remains therefore, that we understand them, to perceive their consistency. With these facts in mind we shall see, not only that we need not fear investigation, but that investigation is an indispensable portion of human duty.

It is a remarkable trait among errorists of the present age, that they are more anxious to have their own assertions taken for authority, than they are to have the world inquire for itself. A few have the arrogance to refuse openly the privilege of free inquiry to their adherents; but a far greater number promote the same end indirectly by cowardice and deception. They are willing to engage in wholesale slander and denunciation, because it is more difficult to fasten upon them the charge of personal abuse. A sly insinuation is a very handy weapon for such to wield against a foe; because while they themselves escape detection, it leaves their less guarded followers to take it as their authority for more definite charges, to be aimed wherever the bitterest prejudice may dictate. Of this class are the many nameless, dateless, unauthorized, and unowned accounts which find their way into the columns of partialist journals, against that faith which is, and was anciently, “everywhere spoken against.” But notwithstanding such proceedings exhibit a species of cowardice which is deeply reprehensible, they are still persisted in. If you seek the privilege of correcting unjust representations, you are repulsed with the grave information that they do not wish to enter into a controversy. This is not a picture of the fancy. You have but to open the journals of some of the most conscientious (?) opposers to Universalism. There is an editor who is continually provoking controversy by his stereotyped arguments, vulgar anecdotes, and misrepresentations, and yet you can not reach the dear, pious man, for he is very much opposed to controversy! He can publish false statements of conversions; convert, by the magic touch of the pen, the most abandoned specimens of human depravity from the fostering care of partialism, into Universalists; make the world think that Franciscan members of orthodox churches are Universalist deacons; yea, and even defy Universalists to defend their faith against his tautological arguments, and after all, if you attempt to answer him, or expose his errors, he is most conscientiously opposed to religious controversy! Reader, you have seen the school boy cower before the superior courage of his classmate, and industriously avoid all irritable language until he considered himself within the protection of his father's door yard, and then, taking to his heels as he retreated towards the friendly domicile, shake his fist at his foe and dare him to meet him half way. This may not be an unpardonable offence in children, but it is detestable in men, and disgraceful in Christians.

THE BOOK OF NATURE.

There is no portion of nature but is a minister of truth in proclaiming the wonder-working energies of the Almighty. The solemn magnificence of night—the splendor of the noon day—yea, all things that are, ever unfold the character of their Author and the paternity of his government. Nature is a noble book, and is full of that instruction which exalts the moral and intellectual powers of man. Its pages are ever open to invite the lover of God's works to that knowledge which caused Israel's bard to declare, "O Lord! how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all." Every where Deity is manifested. The gentle breeze in its whisplings, no less than the terrific thunder storm—the odor of the flower, no less than the solemn diapason tones of the ocean's roar—the arrangement of a plant no less than the vast universe itself—are capable of proving the existence of God and of filling us with devotion. Some of my most devotional feelings have sprung up in my soul when looking up to the heavens in an evening hour, or when meditating concerning the works of God. One of the most gifted of prose writers, says of his gazing at the stars from one of the great Western prairies, "how often, while contemplating their mild and benignant radiance, I have called to mind the exquisite text of Job: 'Canst thou bind the secret influences of Pleiades, or loose the band of Orion?'" Irving's Tour on the Prairie, p. 256.

Why should the Book of Nature be so neglected as it is? Why do not people go to it more frequently for that instruction which exalts the understanding and is so productive of rational piety. Our Saviour has given us a tender example on this point. When conversing with his disciples, he said, "And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; And yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is and to-morrow is east into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" Matt vi: 28-30. We should follow this example of reference to nature, and be eager to behold the character of God legibly written in the temple of the universe.

Parents should bring their children frequently to the Book of Nature. They should show them the stars and the bounties of earth; and tell them of him who made them all; tell them of his character, of his love for his children, particularly as it is shown in rewarding the righteous and punishing the wicked. They should tell them how nature exhibits the goodness, power, wisdom and justice of God; and how it proves that "his tender mercies are over all his works." Children have an interest in such things—while thoughts will sometimes crowd their minds in regard to the natural objects which they discover around them, that would astonish persons of maturer age. The curious interest of some children is set forth by a gifted poet, (N. P. Willis,) when describing a little girl who was looking out of a window at early eve, and who had been told that "God made all the stars."

"Presently, in the edge of the last tint
Of sunset, where the blue was melted in
To the faint golden mellowness, a star
Stood suddenly. A laugh of wild delight
Burst from her lips, and, putting up her hands,
Her simple thought broke forth expressively—
'Father, dear father, God has made a star.'"

How frequently, when gazing on the heavenly bodies on still evenings, has the thought suggested itself to my mind, shall man live forever, and know all the secrets of nature? This thought has brought all the proofs of the resurrection fresh to consideration, with all the passages of Scripture which refer to another state of existence. These have amply decided the point, "there is a resurrection of the dead." He who created all worlds and holds them in their orbits, can clothe all minds with immortality. How exalting and sublime is the fact, that when dust shall return to dust, the mind, in a new and spiritual body, shall enjoy the noble destiny of endless life in Christ Jesus our Lord. In the language of Young's Night Thoughts:—

"How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
How complicate, how wonderful, is man."

"A beam ethereal, sullied and absorbed!

Though sullied and dishonored, still divine!"

"An angel's arm, can't snatch me from the grave; Legions of angels can't confine me there."

THE TITLES OF CHRIST.

We invite the special attention of our readers to the prospectus which will be found on our last page. Br. Charles Spear, the author of the book, is one of our best essayists, and has been long and favorably known to our readers. One or two articles on the titles of Christ were published a few years ago in our columns and were extensively copied into a number of our periodicals, and read with great pleasure and profit by our numerous readers, several of whom specially signified their approbation of them at the time. The whole work will be similar in character and style to those samples—for they were extracts from the manuscript of the work here proposed. This work is a labored one—Br. Spear has been engaged in writing, correcting, and revising it, for several years past—and from his known abilities, and the samples already furnished, I think it will be a work well calculated to strengthen faith in the Redeemer as the Saviour of the world—to promote knowledge concerning the excellency of his character and precepts, and to increase piety and devotion generally, in its readers.

Persons feeling an interest in the work, and desirous of extending the circulation of a good book, and aiding a meritorious and faithful servant of the Lord Jesus, can be supplied at this office with printed proposals whereon to collect subscriptions in their respective neighborhoods—and persons wishing merely to procure the book for themselves or their friends, can subscribe by calling at this office, or sending their names and address to us free of postage. ### THE CHRISTIAN'S TRIUMPH.

This is an excellent work by Br. J. G. Adams, and well calculated to imbue the mind of the reader with resignation to the divine will in allotting death as the termination of our earthly career. It tends greatly to enhance the value of our faith, and to remove the fear of death, which owing to the influence of false education, is too apt to overshadow the soul with a stern and repulsive gloom. A portion of the book is occupied with "Happy Death Scenes," or accounts of the triumphant departures of many believers in God's universal grace. These instances are practical illustrations, to the believing reader, of the author's remarks on Christian faith—and to the opposer of Universalism, they are proofs, undeniable proofs of the falsity of that common objection that Universalism may do to live by, but will not do to die by." Let Universalists read this work—and let them circulate it well among their opposing friends and neighbors. Its salutary tendency will improve their own hearts, and greatly tend to soften if not remove prejudices in the minds of others. We are indebted to Br. Tompkins, the publisher, for a copy. For sale by Br. Hutchinson. A. B. G.

BRIEF MINUTES.

Right, Br. Price—I have, and do yet, recommend condensed minutes of the proceedings of our Associations; but have said, also, that the proceedings of our State Convention (as there is but one, and as its proceedings are of more general interest and importance,) might be given more at length. For this reason I did not condense the proceedings of the Convention, but prepared them as ordered. Those who want a sample of the mode in which I would have the Minutes of our fifteen Associations prepared for publication, can take the most condensed form in which we have heretofore prepared them—or look at the excellent model furnished by that practical Scribe, Br. Hammond, in preparing the Minutes of the Niagara Association this year. I had not to alter a word in preparing it—it was as well done as an Editor could wish. From my heart I thank him for his care thus neatly to condense them.

A. B. G.

Br. Wm. Magee, of Glasgow, Scotland, solicits a donation of 400 volumes of Universalist books to be circulated in that country, as a preparation for a Universalist missionary to be sent from this country. He will expend all the proceeds of sales in advertising the books, and publishing extracts from them in various papers, periodicals, etc. Br. Whittemore offers to send 40 volumes—6, each, of the Guide, Illustration of the Parables, Hell Torments Overthrown, Ballons IX Sermons, Ballon on Future Retribution, and other works to make up the number. Br. Geo. L. Lumsden, of Petersburg, Va., orders 50 copies of Dodd's short sermons, 25 Williamson's Exposition, 6 Thomas' Hymns of Zion, 12 Argument for Christianity, and 7 Causes of Infidelity Removed. Br. Hutchinson will give 3 each of Austin's Voice to Youth, Ballon on Atonement, Ballon's Select Sermons, Ballon's Lecture Sermons, Ballon's Notes on the Parables, Life of Murray, and 100 Pamphlets. A. JUNE.—The absence of the Editors necessary in attending several Associational meetings during this month, must be our apology, if any is needed, for any neglect that may be manifested to our friends, in the paper or its correspondence.

DIVINE GUIDANCE.

I love the silent evening hour,
When I can freely gaze
Upon the sky, nor dread the power
Of the sun's dazzling rays—
Each gem which the blue arch doth span
Seems whispering, "goodwill to man."
Although the sable veil of night
Is drawn o'er nature's face,
Yet dimly, by the twinkling light,
Earth's beauties, we can trace;
And sweet is every whispered sound,
When all is dim and hushed around.

And O, methinks the lovely night,
May be an emblem true,
Of revelation—Thus its light
Our eyes, undimmed, may view,
Though mortal vision ne'er might see
The unveiled face of Deity

Through all our earthly wanderings here,
May we be guided by that star
Which, amid darkness thick and drear,
Guided the sages from afar,
To where the infant Saviour lay
Serenely on his bed of hay.

But in the treasures, that we bring,
May grossness bear no part;
We need no other offering
Than a pure, grateful heart.
Then at his feet, with joy, we'll fall
And own him Lord and friend of all.

WEEPING.

Young women are full of tears. They will weep as bitterly for the loss of a new dress as for the loss of an old lover. They will weep for anything or for nothing. They will scold you to death for accidentally tearing a new gown, and weep for spite that they cannot be revenged on you. They will play the coquette in your presence, and weep when you are absent. They will weep because they cannot go to a ball or tea party, or because their parents will not permit them to run away with a blackguard; and they will weep because they cannot have every thing their own way. Married women weep to conquer. Tears are the most potent arm of matrimonial warfare. If a gruff husband has abused his wife, she weeps, and he relents and promises better behaviour. How many men have gone to bed in wrath and risen in the morning quite subdued with tears and a certain lecture?—Women weep to get at their husband's secrets, and they also weep because their own secrets have been revealed. They weep through pride, through vanity, through folly, through cunning, and through weakness. They will weep for a husband's misfortunes, while they scold himself. A woman will weep over the dead body of her husband, while her vanity will ask her neighbors how she is fitted with her mourning. She weeps for one husband, that she may get another. The widow of Ephesus bedewed the grave of her spouse with one eye, while she squinted love to a young soldier with the other.

A NOBLE SENTIMENT.—I have ever had in my mind, that when God should cast me into such a condition, as that I can not save my life but by doing an indecent thing, he shows me the time is come wherein I should resign it; and when I can not live in my own country but by such means as are worse than dying in it, I think he shows me, I ought to keep myself out of it.—Algernon Selig.

THE BIBLE, I SAY, THE BIBLE ONLY IS THE RELIGION OF PROTESTANTS!!

I am fully assured that God does not, and therefore that man ought not, to require any more of any man than this—to believe the Scripture to be God's word, to endeavor to find the true sense of it, and live according to it.—Chillingworth.

RELIGION OPENS THE HEART!

The Rev. Mark Wilkes is, I believe, still alive.—He was and still is well known in London. He is an eminent divine, a pious and most worthy man; and a considerable wit, withal. God has placed him in easy circumstances, has also given him a warm and charitable heart. No deserving poor man went away sorrowfully from Mark Wilkes' door. One day a poor man, belonging to his church, who had something of Mark Wilkes' manner, as to the matter of wit—and who certainly was a very worthy and pious man—came to his door, and told his minister, that "his poor wife had just been confined, and that she had brought him another fine child. But then so it is," added he "God has not given us, this day, a morsel of bread in the house." "Ah!" said Mark Wilkes, affecting great indifference, "John! I have always understood that when God sends a child into this world, he also sends bread with it." "Most true! your Reverence," cried John, "God's goodness always does so; but, then, he has sent the child to me—and the bread to you. And therefore it is that I have come for some of it." "Come in, John," cried Mark Wilkes, as a tear coursed down his cheek—"come in, and take as much as you want."—Ref. Dutch Mag.

THE GRAIN OF MUSTARD SEED AND THE TULIP ROOT.—

A small grain of mustard seed being thrown by accident near to a large tulip root: "How durst you," says the insolent neighbor, "take rank with a tulip?" "My dear sir," replies the grain, "forgive the chance which brought me here, and let me rest in peace. My life, at present, is dull enough, but if you will permit me to stay, I promise you by and by a sheltering shade for yourself or your family."

People of easy fortunes discourage a budding genius: the latter, not in the least attentive to their arrogance, suffers without complaint; foreseeing, that when he is arrived at his full growth, their walk, compared to his, will be but a mere crawling.

GRAVE CORRESPONDENCE.—Dr. Schmidt, of the cathedral of Berlin, wrote to Frederick II, in the following terms:

"Sire—I acquaint your majesty, first, that there are wanting books of Psalms for the Royal Family. I acquaint your majesty, second, that there wants wood to warm the Royal seats. I acquaint your majesty, third, that the balustrade, next the river, behind the church, is become ruinous.

SCHMIDT, Sacrist of the Cathedral."

The king, much amused with the epistle sent the following answer:

"I acquaint you, Mr. Sacrist Schmidt, first, that those who want to sing, may buy books. Second, I acquaint Mr. Sacrist Schmidt, that those who want to be warm may buy wood. Third, I acquaint Mr. Sacrist Schmidt, that I shall no longer trust to the balustrade next the river. And I acquaint Mr. Sacrist Schmidt, fourth, that I will not have any more correspondence with him. FREDERICK."

BREVITY.—Short speeches, short stories, short courtships; a wise man will always be short in these things. I never knew a short sermon that was not more liked for it—or a short story that had not the more pith in it—or a short courtship that was not more fortunate than a long one. I showed a lad who had been running after his sweetheart two years, old cousin Jeremiah's long purse, which measured half a yard and had but a single sixpence at the bottom—he borrowed it to take down to Charlotte, and they both took a hint from it, and got married at once.

Tell all the story tellers, and speech makers, tell all manner of good people, how pleasant a thing it is to be short.—Oliver Outwood.

Lady Morgan, in her late work on France, mentions having seen a horrible relic in the museum of a private gentleman. It was a copy of the constitution of 1793, bound in human skin! It had been the property of a terrorist, who paid the forfeit of his atrocity on the scaffold.

MARRIAGES.

In South Bainbridge, May 7th, by Rev C. S. Brown, Mr WM. PALTRIDGE to Miss LYDIA B. CORBIN. In the Universalist Church, Upper Lisle, May 24th, by the same, Mr SAMUEL TICKNOR, to Miss MARYETTE ADAMS.

In Champion, June 4th, by Rev. O. Wilcox, Mr. ALANSON MYERS, to Miss CLARISSA EARL.

In Rochester, May 21st, by Rev. J. Chase, Mr. WM. FISHER, to Miss ELIZABETH H. GRIGGS, both of that place. In same place, June 1st, by the same, Mr. ROBERT DARTLING, to Miss SARAH SANDERSON, all of Rochester.

DEATHS.

In Russia, May 26th, Mr. JOHN R. GRAVES, son of John Graves Esq., aged 31 years. He died of an injury received by having his arm accidentally caught in the wheels of a chair factory, by which his arm, above the elbow, became literally mashed and broken. One foot was also severely injured, the bones being broken and the joints dislocated, besides he received other internal injury in the region of stomach. He lingered along in the most excruciating pain for about twelve days and then expired, leaving a wife and four children to mourn their loss. The funeral services were attended at Russia Corners on the 28th, and a discourse delivered to a large concourse of sympathising friends and relatives, by the writer. O. ROBERTS.

In the town and county of Onondaga, May 10th, Miss SA-LOME, daughter of Br. Sabina and Sister Lavina Titus, aged twenty two years, and nineteen days. In the death of this amiable young sister, her affectionate parents have been bereaved of a most lovely and pleasant child, brothers and sisters of a discreet and virtuous sister, and her young friends of an interesting and agreeable associate. But while they mourn their loss they rejoice in her gain. She had drunk deep of the cup of affliction for a long time, being called away by a lingering consumption. But by the grace of him who administers relief when most needed, the Son of righteousness arose with healing in his wings, dispelled every tear, removed every doubt, and enabled her to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory in the grand deliverance of the whole creation from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. On the 12th, she was interred, and a discourse delivered agreeable to her request, by the writer, to a numerous collection of sympathising friends and neighbors. J. FOSTER.

In Howard, September 19th, 1839, Miss MARGARET FRENCH, in the 20th year of her age. Miss F. possessed a sound mind, and fair reputation. She was respected and beloved in life, and lamented in death. She is the only one of nine daughters, (nearly all of whom are grown to womanhood,) that has been snatched by the hand of death from the parental bosom. She was attacked with an illness, while engaged in teaching. She left her school about two months previous to her death, and never returned. It was the first season that she had engaged in that noble, but arduous business. She gave promise of future usefulness. May the Creator and Preserver of all, comfort and console all who mourn her departure; cause them to how in humility and reverence before Him, and bless them with the hope of a happy reunion with the loved daughter, sister and friend, in a fair and beautiful clime, where affection's tie may ne'er be severed, and where all may, clothed with purity and holiness, unite in chanting praises to their Saviour, and to their Father and God. Funeral on the 21st. Sermon by Rev. Mr. Fleming, Unitarian. Rev. M. L. Wisner, was invited to attend, but could not conveniently leave home at that time. S. F.

In South Chili, Monroe county, May 12th, Mrs. MARTHA PIXLEY, aged about 82 years. The lamp of life burnt out by natural exhaustion of strength, and this excellent and amiable mother in Israel fell calmly asleep without a struggle or a groan. She has left numerous descendants, who grew up and blessed her, to remember her memory, and as numerous a circle of relatives and friends to sigh at her departure for their sakes, not for hers. A. B. ## A NEW WORK.

"NAMES AND TITLES OF CHRIST"

BY CHARLES SPEAR.

The author proposes to publish a new work bearing the above title. He has been engaged for several years in preparing it for the press. It is unlike any other which he has ever seen. Criticisms on many of the titles are to be found in reviews and controversial works of the day, but there is no work extant, the professed object of which is to embody all the titles of Jesus in a single volume.

Criticisms on the significance of each title are presented; also, the number of times it occurs. And that the eye of the reader may at once, be directed to any name or title, the whole is arranged in alphabetical order.

In addition to this, there will be an index of all the passages illustrated.

The author believes that such a work is much needed in the Christian world, and he has spared no pains to render it as perfect as possible.

The volume will contain about 300 pages, duodecimo, handsomely printed, neatly bound, and will be offered at the low price of $1. Six copies for $5.

All orders respecting the work to be addressed, post paid, to the author, or to B. B. MUSSEY, 29 Cornhill, Boston. Subscriptions to be returned by the first of September. Boston, May 25th, 1840.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

SECTION VI.

Jesus attends the Passover with his parents.

LUKE II: 40. And the child grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom, and the grace of God was upon him.

41 Now his parents went to Jerusalem every year, at the feast of the passover.

42 And when he was twelve years old, they went up to Jerusalem, after the custom of the feast.

43 And when they had fulfilled the days; as they returned, the child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem, and Joseph and his mother knew not of it.

44 But they, supposing him to have been in the company, went a day's journey; and they sought him among their kinsfolks and acquaintances;

45 And when they found him not, they returned back again to Jerusalem, seeking him.

46 And it came to pass, that after three days, they found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them and asking them questions.

47 And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers.

48 And when they saw him, they were amazed, and his mother said unto him, Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Behold thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing.

49 And he said unto them, "How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

50 And they understood not the saying that he spake unto them.

51 And he went down with them, and came to Nazareth and was subject unto them; but his mother kept all these sayings in her heart.

52 And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man.

VERSE 41. Passover. This feast was instituted in commemoration of the passing over of the first born of Israel, when the first born of Egypt were destroyed, on the eve of the departure of the Israelites, from that country. It was commenced on the 14th day of the month Nisan, the first month of their civil year, and corresponding with a part of our September and October; and it lasted seven days. The institution is described particularly in Exodus xii.

42. Twelve years old. It is thought by some that the age of twelve was the time at which the Jews were required to be present when the passover was observed.

44. They sought him. It would seem that the company that was together at this time, was very large, else the parents of the Saviour would have known where he was. Such was doubtless the case; for great multitudes were accustomed to assemble on such occasions. And during the first day of their return, the company would doubtless be larger than on succeeding days.—There is therefore no necessity of resorting as some have done, to the Quaker solution of the men and women travelling in two separate companies, and that while Joseph supposed Jesus was with Mary, she supposed that he was with him.

46. In the midst of the doctors. Josephus tells us that when he was only 14 years of age, the chief priests and principal men of the city, came frequently to him for information respecting the teachings of the law. That the Saviour, at the age of twelve, should be equally capable of imparting instruction is not surprising.

47. All that heard him were astonished. They were astonished that a person so young should possess such extraordinary knowledge.

49. Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business? The Saviour intimates in this language, that his heavenly Father had a work for him to perform; and his attending to that business was sufficient to justify his absenting himself from his parents.

51. He was subject unto them. He acted the part of a faithful and dutiful son. His father was a carpenter; and Jesus probably followed the same occupation, till the time of his public ministry, which commenced at about the age of thirty.

52. Jesus increased in wisdom. An increase in wisdom implies that it is finite. Could Jesus then have been the eternal God? Can God increase in wisdom?

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

In the concluding remarks of this section, the following subjects are to receive our attention.

1. The meaning of Isa. vii: 14, quoted by Matt. i: 23, and its application to the Saviour. 2. The doctrine concerning the Logos found in John i: 1-4. 3. The phrases, "that it might be fulfilled," "then was fulfilled," etc. and 4, the cruelty of Herod.

I. The explanation of Isa. vii: 14, quoted by Matt. i: 23, and its application to the Saviour.

The paragraph in Isaiah, containing the passage to be explained reads as follows, "Moreover the Lord spake again to Ahaz, saying, Ask thee a sign of the Lord, thy God; ask it either in the depth, or in the height above. But Ahaz said, I will not ask, neither will I tempt the Lord. And he said, hear ye now, O house of David. Is it a small thing for you to weary men, but will ye weary my God also? Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign, Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings." Isa. vii: 10-16.

It would seem that nothing more is necessary to convince the rational mind, that this language did not originally refer to the Saviour, than a view of the language itself, its connexion and attendant circumstances. The birth of the child referred to was to be a sign to Ahaz that the united forces of Pekale and Rism, who were then invading his kingdom, should not prevail against him—that at a certain period, not exceeding a few years at most, his people would again enjoy peace and plenty. Before that happy era the child was to be born. How then can it be supposed that the Saviour was referred to?

The name of the child was to be Immanuel, that is God with us. The birth of the child was to be a sign of the return of peace and prosperity; and his name was said to correspond with that fact. Immanuel, or God with us, is significant of prosperity. In the following passages, and others that might be referred to, God is represented as being with certain persons as expressive of his favor and their prosperity. Gen. xlviii: 21; Zech. viii: 23; 1 Chron. xxviii: 20; John iii: 2; Acts vii: 9. Even in chapter viii: 10, where the phrase God is with us occurs, in this sense, the original is Immanuel, God with us, the is being supplied by the translators. Hence it is obvious, that the name given to the child was intended to denote the prosperity of which he was to be the pledge; and that it has no possible connection, as some expositors contend, with the doctrine of the deity of Christ.

That the child should eat butter and honey, when he should be able to distinguish between good and evil, was descriptive of the kind of prosperity or blessing indicated by the name Immanuel—viz., peace and plenty. It was the same as saying, that peace should be restored to the country, and consequent plenty should abound. It may be added, that the language "Butter and honey shall he eat that he may know," etc., should be, "Butter and honey shall he eat, when he may know." See Lowth in loco.

The question now arises—in what manner does this prophecy apply to Jesus Christ? We answer, by way of accommodation, like many other of the prophecies of the Old Testament, quoted in the New.

That it originally referred to him, either directly or indirectly, we have no proof. But that it is applicable to him in this secondary and accommodated sense is obvious: for, 1. Mankind are suffering from worse enemies than those that invaded the kingdom of Judea. 2. Jesus Christ is the pledge of our deliverance and may be called Immanuel, as denoting that God is with us by his blessings, And 3. by his ministry we are to become partakers of the abundant spiritual provisions, and heavenly luxuries which he has to bestow. I have devoted so much space to the explanation of Isa. vii: 14, and its application to the Saviour, because I supposed it necessary to illustrate Matt. i: 23, and wrest it from false interpretation, by which it is made to sanction a doctrine that can not be deduced from it, by any just rules of Biblical criticism.

II. The doctrine concerning the Logos, found in John i: 1-4.

We have in manuscript an article in which the doctrine of the Logos is treated at length, from which we take the following extracts as all that is required in this place. "The only way in which the term Logos seems applicable to the Saviour is as a figure, in the same manner as light, life, truth, and other similar terms, are applied to him. This is made perfectly plain from the language of John i: 1-4, compared with the following verses, from the 4th to the 11th. In the first of these verses the Word is spoken of in the same way that the Light is in the last. For instance, of the Word it is said, "all things were made by him," and of the Light, "the world was made by him." And inasmuch as Light, in the last instance can not be considered a proper name or an appellation of the Saviour, but a figure to represent him, the same must be said of the Word.

Having ascertained, we trust correctly, the nature of the application of the terms Logos to the Saviour, we are prepared to point out one important error in the manner in which Christians generally seem to have reasoned respecting this term. In John i: 1-3 we are told, first, that the Word was in the beginning with God; second, that the word was God; and third, that all things were made by the Word. And since these things are affirmed of the Word; and as the Word (it is said,) means Jesus Christ, it follows of course, that Jesus Christ was with God in the beginning of time—that Jesus Christ was God—and that all things were made by Jesus Christ—and that finally the common doctrine of the deity of Christ is a true doctrine.

The error of this reasoning lies in ascribing to the Saviour what is affirmed of the Word—that is, in ascribing to the thing represented what is affirmed of the figure used to represent—a kind of reasoning that will not hold good in all cases. The figure and the thing represented must necessarily be supposed to agree in certain particulars; but he who supposes that they must agree in all particulars; or that what is affirmed of the one, must in all cases be true of the other, will involve himself in a thousand errors. Let me illustrate. The disciples are called the light of the world, (Matt. v : 14,) and light, we know, has existed ever since the morning of time. Are we therefore to infer that the disciples have existed as long? It will be seen in this case, that what is true of the figure is not true of the thing represented; and such is the case with a multitude of particulars, while in some respects there must, of course, be a resemblance. The truth of our remark, I have no doubt will be admitted, as it respects the disciples; and why it is not true of the Saviour when we say that certain attributes and actions belong to the Word, that do not belong to Jesus Christ, we have yet to be informed. We admit that the Word was in the beginning with God—that God was the Word, (for that was the form of the original,) and that all things were made by the Word; but that this is true of Jesus Christ we do not admit; and if it is proved it must be done by different passages than that of John i : 1-3.

"I propose in drawing this article to a close, to make some quotations from the Fathers of the church or from Mosheim respecting them, for the purpose of illustrating and proving the views we have advanced."

Speaking of the opinions of Christians, in the third century, respecting Jesus Christ, Mosheim says, "In Egypt and the adjacent countries, the greatest part embraced in this as well as in other matters, the opinion of Origen, who held that the Son was in God that which reason is in man." Eccl. Hist. Vol. I, p. 315. As farther illustrative of his views, Origen himself says, that "by the second God we mean only a virtue which comprehends all other virtues, or a reason which comprehends all other reasons; and that this reason (logos) is particularly attached to the soul of Christ." Contra Alsum Lib. 5, p. 259 and 247.

Athenegoras says that God "had reason (logos) in himself being from eternity rational."

Fatian says, when God "pleased the word (logos) flowed from his simple essence; and the word not being produced in vain, became the first begotten work of his spirit. This we know to have been the origin of the word."

Tertullian has the following language, "Before all things God was alone; but not absolutely alone; for he had with him his own reason, since God is a rational being. This reason the Greeks call Logos." "God (says he) was not always Father or judge, since he could not be Father before he had a Son, nor a judge before sin; and there was a time when both sin and the Son (which made God to be judge and Father) were not."

It will be seen that in the instances which we have introduced and in others that we might bring forward were it necessary, the first Christians use the word logos as denoting the reason or wisdom of God, and that they ascribed to it eternity and all that properly belongs to that attribute of the divine nature; but at the same time regard the person of Jesus Christ which they seem to have considered as represented by this Logos or reason, as having had a beginning, and being created or begotten by the Deity. This accords with the representation we have given of the Logos in John i : 1-3, where we have said that Logos means the wisdom of God, which was in the beginning with God and by which all things were made; and that this wisdom represents the Saviour, who received his existence when "the Word was made flesh."

So much respecting the Logos which we have written for the purpose of explaining a passage which has been greatly perverted to sustain a sentiment which, it were easy to prove, had its origin in Paganism.

III. The phrases "that it might be fulfilled"—"Then was fulfilled," etc. In the use of these and other similar expressions, several passages are introduced into the New Testament from the Old, where it can not be pretended that the events to which they are applied in the New Testament, were had in view by their original authors. We have already found several cases of this kind. For example. Besides Matt. i : 23, which we have explained at length in the first division of these concluding remarks, we have in Matt. ii : 15, a prediction that was originally spoken in reference to the deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage, and which the evangelist has applied to the return of the Saviour from Egypt, whither he had been carried by his parents to avoid the effects of Herod's cruelty. Also in verse 18th of the same chapter, an event that occurred in Rome is said to have been fulfilled in Bethlehem. And in verse 23, the residence of Jesus in Nazareth is said to have fulfilled the predictions of the prophets, while the prophets had only indirectly predicted what is said to have been fulfilled. The explanation of this subject is as follows. The evangelists use such passages from the Old Testament by way of accommodation. In other words they meant to be understood that the events to which they apply these passages, were similar to those to which they were originally applied.

As evidence, it should be observed, first, that the passage can not be properly fulfilled in the events to which the evangelists apply them; and secondly, that the Rabbins quote and apply passages from the Old Testament in the same way, and that the Arabs do the same from the Koran, making it obvious that the evangelists, while they apply the language of the Old Testament in accommodated application to the events which they record, only conformed their practice to a common custom. See Expositor for July, 1839.

There are undoubtedly some predictions in the Old Testament that are quoted in the New, and said to be fulfilled, that related originally to those events to which the New Testament writers apply them; but when this is the case, and when not, must be learned from the connection, and other circumstances, aside from the use of the expressions we have been noticing.

IV. The cruelty of Herod. Unbelievers have considered Matthew's representation of the cruelty of Herod as incredible, and a serious objection to the Christian religion; and it is for this reason that we introduce the subject here.

Having examined with some degree of care the character and conduct of Herod as given by Josephus, we have come to the two following conclusions: 1st, that there is no act of cruelty within the power of Herod, that he would not have performed to accomplish his ambitious purposes; and 2d, that in the performance of cruel acts his motives were not as bad as is commonly supposed.

Saying nothing however of the motives of Herod in destroying the infants of Bethlehem, we must say of the act that it was in perfect accordance with his general character, as delineated by Josephus, and therefore not incredible. And whoever says that Matthew's account is incredible, must either be ignorant of the writings of Josephus, or must consider his statement as incredible as that of Matthew.

As to the extent of the cruelty which Matthew ascribes to Herod in destroying the infants of Bethlehem, we may offer a few remarks, as this is a point which unbelievers either do not understand or wilfully misrepresent. "Voltaire, either from ignorance or dishonesty, asserts that fourteen thousand children must have lost their lives in this massacre. . . . But as the children whom Herod caused to be put to death, (probably by assassins whom he kept in pay,) were only males of two years old and under, it is obvious according to this statement, that more children must have been born annually in the village of Bethlehem, than there are either in Paris or London. Further, as Bethlehem was a very small place, scarcely two thousand persons existed in it and its dependent district, consequently in the massacre not more than fifty at most could be slain." Horne's Introd. vol. I. p. 419.

The size of Bethlehem and "all the coasts thereof," seems to have been greatly misunderstood by unbelievers, and the phrase "from two years old and under" much more so. Bethlehem is now and was doubtless then a very small village; and "all the coasts thereof" mean merely its dependent district, at most, but a few miles in circumference. And the language, "according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men," which is added to the phrase "from two years old and under," shows that Herod did not destroy all the infants under two years old down to a month or a day; but so far under that age, as would correspond with the age of the infant Saviour, according to the time of his birth, as stated by the Magians. And as Herod diligently inquired of them, that is carefully, so as to obtain accurate information, it is rational to suppose that none were destroyed but such as were nearly of the same age.

With these limitations therefore to the cruelty of Herod, the massacre of the infants of Bethlehem becomes a comparatively unimportant transaction in the sanguinary history of that tyrannical prince.

THE LOGOS—OR WORD—NO. III.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

As further proof of the inferiority of Christ, I would refer my readers to the fact, that, when he shall have accomplished the objects of his mission—when he shall have done the will of him that sent him, and finished his work—when, through the mighty efficacy and power of his Father's grace and spirit he shall have subdued all things to him, and brought a rebellious world to submit to the righteous government of God; in short, when the end and object of his mediatorial reign is fully consummated and finished, then he is to deliver up the kingdom to the Father, and be himself subject to Him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all. 1 Cor. xv : 24.

This fact alone is sufficient to convince every candid and reflecting mind that Christ is not the Supreme Deity. It shows at once that he is inferior to the Father; for, we are given to understand, that, for the accomplishment of a certain object, all things were given into his hands by God; consequently he was not himself God, for it would be both foolish and absurd to say that God gave all things into his own hands! We are also given to understand, that when this object is accomplished—when the purposes of Christ's mediatorial government shall have been effected, then he will deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father, and he himself be subject to the same. Now if Christ were the Sovereign Creator, the eternal and immutable God, this language would sound very strange. God then, according to this, would deliver up the kingdom to himself, and be subject to himself, that he might be all in all! If this were the meaning of the apostle, we might truly say, "Much learning hath made thee mad."

But the truth is, the language used by Paul conclusively shows, that the Messiah was not absolutely Deity. It shows that he was inferior to the Father, that he received dominion and power from him, and is finally to deliver up the kingdom to Him from whom he received it, and be subject, together with all intelligent creatures, unto God, that He may be all, and in all!

Now, as Christ is inferior to the Father—as he came from God, and is to return to him—as he derived his power and knowledge from the all-powerful and wise Creator, so he must be styled "God" in a secondary sense. And it is plain, as I have before remarked, that the author of the passage we are noticing did thus apply the title to him. Knowing as he did, the inferiority of Christ to the Father, and having been taught this fact by the Saviour himself in the saying, that, "of himself he could do nothing"—and that his Father was greater than he himself was, it is perfectly obvious, that he applied the title "God," to Christ in a secondary sense, to denote that though inferior to the Great Maker and Builder of the Universe, yet still, he was an exalted Prince and Saviour—the beloved of the Father, and his chosen one to effect ultimately the redemption and salvation of all his children!

As such, he was with the Father, and the Father with him—His grace and His truth were assisting him, and aiding him onward in the good work in which he was engaged. He was with God in the beginning, or in the commencement of the Gospel dispensation: and God gave him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, of things on earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess, that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father! The work in which Christ was engaged, was God's work, and even while personally engaged in the work, he was with God—he was with him in design—in the great and glorious object had in view, in scattering abroad upon the soil of humanity, the precious seed of divine and everlasting truth, and in disseminating the holy and heavenly principles of that Gospel in which life and immortality are brought to light. In this sense Christ and his Father were one—not one in person, but one in design, in purpose, and in the good work of freeing mankind from the dominion and thralldom of error and sin!

We do not degrade the Saviour, as some have asserted, by these views. He claimed for himself no greater honor, than to be called the Son of God—we acknowledge him as such—we believe him to be the well beloved Son of the Most High—we trust in him as our Redeemer and Saviour—and we expect to triumph ultimately only through the grace, the sufferings and death of the Son of God! We would have the world see him as he is—their hope, their strength, their salvation, and their rejoicing! We would have all "hear a language from his bleeding hands and feet; from his throbbing temples—his dying agony, and his gushing side, which should ring through every chamber of the heart—reach through the dark recesses of the soul, and roll back the whole tide of sinful feeling!" No—we would not say forget Christ, but bear in everlasting remembrance his life of unexampled love—his kind and forgiving disposition—his impartial and universal benevolence of heart—his toils, his sufferings, and his death on Calvary! Yes—this would be our cry, until the shout should go abroad over every isle and nation, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessings for ever and ever!

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. R. GUILD.

NUMBER XXX.

JOHN. This book was written by John at Ephesus, in the year 97. At this time heresies had begun to rise in the Church, and this book was written against the Corinthian, the Gnostic, and Sabian heresies. For an account of these sects see "Buck's Theological Dictionary," pages 71, 168, 464.

It should be remembered that all these sects held some important truths, but had adopted some erroneous and whimsical opinions, such as that the man Jesus Christ was not really Jesus Christ, but that the real Christ was the dove which descended upon him at his baptism. John takes pains to confute this notion by saying that "Christ did come in the flesh."

John wrote his gospel in Greek and as he was a close attendant upon our Lord throughout his ministry, he relates what he saw and heard. He was with our Lord and saw him expire on the cross, and saw the soldier pierce his side with a spear. See John xix: 34, 35. He is called the beloved disciple, and is thought to have been a relative of our Lord. He was the son of Salome the sister of Christ; therefore John was his nephew. John is thought to be the only disciple who died a natural death. He died at Ephesus, aged 100 years. Mary the mother of Jesus lived with him until her death, which happened 15 years after the crucifixion.

John iii: 3. "Except a man be born again, (or from above,) he can not see the kingdom of God."

Our Saviour here has allusion to that new birth which the Jews supposed every baptised proselyte enjoyed. For they held that the Gentile who became a proselyte was like a new born child. This birth was from the baptism of water, and from below; but to be born from above was by the baptism of the Holy Ghost. From this it is evident that the baptism from water is not regeneration, as some pretend. Hence, we find that those people who came to John's baptism were afterwards baptised with the Holy Ghost. See Acts i: 5, and xix: 2-6.

Verse 5. "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit," etc.

It is not necessary that by "water and spirit" (in this place) we should understand two different things; it is probably only an elliptical form of speech for the Holy Spirit under the similitude of water, as in Matthew iii: 3. The "Holy Ghost and fire," does not mean two things but one, viz: the Holy Ghost under the similitude of fire. See A. Clarke.

John iv: 20. "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain," etc.

That is Mount Gerizim. The patriarchs had worshipped here. Jacob builded an altar on this mountain, and worshipped the true God. See Gen. xii: 2, and xxiii: 20. On this mountain Sannaball had built them a temple about 332 years before the birth of Christ. See Josephus' Antiquities.

John xiii: 58. "Before Abraham was I am."

"I am he." The word he is here left out by the translators. The same words occur verse 24, where our Lord says, "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." "I am he"—who? The Messiah—the Christ.

The meaning of this verse, (58) is this: Before the birth of Abraham my mission was settled and certain. See Wakefield's Translation.

John x: 30. "I and my Father are one."

One thing, or the same thing. See Wakefield's Translation, and notes, page 78. See also John xvii: 11-32. 1 Corinthians iii: 8, and 1 John v: 8.

John xi: 50, 51. See these two verses.

This saying is misunderstood by many. Caiaphas did not mean to prophecy of the death of Christ—his meaning was that it was better to sacrifice one man than a whole nation, for he imagined that if Jesus was suffered to live, the Jews would all believe on him, and thereby bring ruin on the nation; but contrary to his intention, or not of his own accord, (see Wakefield,) he pronounced a prophecy of the death of Jesus.

After considerable hesitation, I give the following remarks a place in our columns—hesitation, not because I am satisfied with the views of Br. Manley; for I rather incline to those of Br. J. F.; but because—1st, I do not wish a controversy on the subject, so long as there is more important matter to be discussed; and 2d, because I do not wish to interrupt a writer in the midst of a series, by any strictures on his essays. In many cases, where I have felt strongly inclined to interpose explanations, dissents or and opposing arguments to a writer's views as contained in a part of his series, I have forborne to do so for this latter reason. I have always treated our readers as reasoning beings, capable of judging for themselves of the truth of a sentiment or the force of an argument, on a point I deemed slightly or only probably erroneous; and have therefore often preferred their doing so, to my interrupting the writer, or controverting the point.

Some points may be corrected, or an opposite view stated—others (and this is one) would if followed up, lead to an interminable and unprofitable controversy, in which few converts would be made to either side, and no tempers be improved by the discussion. I therefore give Br. F.'s remarks in the belief that it will not be followed up by either party.

THE MIRACULOUS CONCEPTION.

BR. GOSH—I am extremely sorry to see Br. Manley so poorly employed, as I think he is, in his remarks concerning the supposed miraculous conception and birth of the child Jesus. I fear that his labors will tend much more to make and confirm infidels, than either to make or instruct Christians. I have not time to go into particulars, and if I had, I do not deem the subject a proper one for public debate. For one, I am satisfied that the story commencing Matthew, Chapter 1st, verse 18, and closing with the 2d chapter, and the corresponding account in Luke, is an interpolation; and that the story was never heard of in the days of Matthew and Luke. And I confess I can see no reason why the sign given to Ahaz (Isa. vii.) in the birth of the child Emmanuel, might not as well be said to be fulfilled in the birth of John, Peter or Paul, as in that of Jesus; for as the event was a sign to Ahaz, it must of course occur in his lifetime; and as it was a sign of the destruction of the Syrians and Samaritans by the king of Assyria, it must have occurred previous to that destruction; whereas the birth of Jesus did not take place till many centuries afterward. See the notes in the Improved Version of the New Testament on the subject, 5th Edition, London, 1819. I wish Br. Manley would give these notes a careful perusal; or, if he has read them, that he will have the goodness to inform us how we are to get over the difficulties there presented against the genuineness of the narrative.

PRACTICAL HINTS.

We are a controversial people—too much so, for our own spiritual improvement, and quite enough so, for the permanent advancement of genuine Universalism in community. It is refreshing, therefore, to get hold of a good practical work. Especially from the pen of an able writer, whose heart is alive to the practical beauty and strength of the Gospel in its purity. To our opposers, who often complain of our warlike and controversial spirit, (for which they may thank their own bitter attacks on us, we commend this book. It will prove to them that if in controversy Universalism can boast of great power, in a practical point of view, it professes no less beauty and grace. And to Universalists we say, we have an internal work to perform on our own affections, no less important, no less useful, no less necessary, than the external warfare we have so long waged against the errors of others. Turn then occasionally from the field of strife, turn your swords to plough shares, and your spears to pruning hooks, and cultivate the ample fields, and chosen gardens in your own hearts. Take this book—peruse it carefully and prayerfully—and you will find in it many practical hints that will aid you greatly in the work.

We thank Br. Whittemore for the copy sent us. The work is for sale at Br. Hutchinson's bookstore.

Br. Sharp requests us to state, for the benefit of the friends interested, that the reason why he did not fulfil his several appointments recently, is that he was prevented by the sickness of himself and family.

DIALOGUE

Between a Partialist and a Universalist.

P.—Good morning, neighbor U. I am happy to meet you again, though in the street. I have been absent some few days, but I have been permitted to return, and, as I can now spend a few moments with you without encroaching upon other duties, I would like to propose a few queries for your consideration, relative to the subjects alluded to at the conclusion of our previous interview, if you have time to hear and answer them. I certainly feel some interest in such investigations.

U.—Brother P. I can heartily rejoice that you have been permitted, through the abundant goodness of God, to perform your journey in safety, and to return to the endearments of home and friends, and that we can enjoy another opportunity of conversing together upon the important and interesting subject of religion. I can spare the time, and if you please, we will seat ourselves upon nature's beautiful, green carpet, and converse freely upon the subjects you wish to propose.

P.—Well, as I have before remarked to you, there are many threatenings in the Bible which appear to me to stand in opposition to your very desirable conclusion, and I should like to know how you will undertake to get by or over them.

U.—That there are threatenings in the Bible I readily admit; and I believe as fully in the execution of them as I do in that of the promises. But I do not perceive how this can be made properly to militate against the reconciliation and salvation of the world, a doctrine which I think I have pretty clearly established upon the testimony of reason and Scripture.

P.—Probably you do not exactly understand what I mean by Bible threatenings; I will cite you to one declaration which I call a threatening, and then hear what you have to say to it. In the 9th Psalm, 17th verse, we read, "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God." Here, you will see, the wicked are threatened with the torments of hell.

U.—I am glad you have hit upon that text, as it is probably as good a text in favor of your views as can be found, and will therefore serve as a sample of all others of the kind. And if I can show you that this text is in perfect harmony with my "conclusions," you will be willing to let the others pass.

P.—Yes, if you can show me in any consistent manner, that the passage cited harmonizes with your conclusions relative to the final condition of the human family, I will say nothing about the rest of the threatenings.

U.—Well, neighbor, you will admit, I presume, that there is no condition expressed or implied, by which the wicked can escape being "turned into hell?"

P.—Why, let me see, yes—no—there is one condition by which we can escape being turned into hell, and that is by not being wicked.

U.—That is true, friend P. Upon condition that we never become wicked, we shall never be turned into hell. But if we do become wicked, is there any thing in the text, that indicates in any manner any possible means of escape from being turned into hell?

P.—Let me think a moment. * * * Why, it reads, "The wicked shall be turned into hell." Well, really I can't see that there is any hope of escape for the wicked, only by faith and repentance.

U.—Does the text embrace any proviso which will exonerate such as believe and repent, from being turned into hell?

P.—I can not say that it does. But still, I should think it would be reasonable. But to be honest in this matter, I can not see in this passage any means of keeping out of hell, only by not becoming sinful. It certainly does say, "The wicked shall be turned into hell," etc.

U.—Well, neighbor P. whershall we find the man or woman, who is not embraced in the phrase "The wicked?" I will admit that there is a great difference in the moral characters of men—some are much more vile than others—but where is the accountable individual who is free from sin? St. Paul says, "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God;" and St. John says, "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us—if we say we have not sinned, we make Christ a liar, and his word is not in us." Here the apostle is addressing his brethren in the faith of Christ; and if they were sinners, who can rationally claim to be sinless? You will thus see, that all mankind, being sinners, must inevitably be turned into hell, for, by your own admission there is no escape for them. Now will you have the goodness to define the term hell?

P.—Why, I have always been taught, and always supposed that hell was a place, or state, of endless suffering in the eternal world.

U.—Well, do you not see, allowing such to be the true meaning of the term, that your "threatening" proves too much? Do you not see that it proves universal endless damnation? Who will be left to people the regions of bliss?

P.—I see the result of your arguments and my admissions, and I will now hear your explanation of the text, for I am anxious to see how you will make it harmonize with your general views.

U.—Your anxiety shall be gratified in a few words. The term hell, in our version of the Bible, has several significations. When it is used as the literal translation of the Hebrew sheol, or the Greek hades, it signifies, according to your own ablest and most popular expositors and Biblical critics, the grave, or state of the dead indiscriminately, without any regard to their moral character or condition. See Campbell, Stewart, and others.

P.—Yes, but why is it said, "The wicked shall be turned into hell"? According to your definition of the term, the righteous will be turned into hell as well as the wicked; for all go down into the grave, or state of the dead. That definition will hardly do.

U.—You are rather too hasty neighbor. We should never jump at conclusions. I have only given you the literal meaning of the term. It is used, like a thousand other terms in the Bible, not only in a literal, but moral sense. It is evidently so used in the text under consideration, as will be seen by permitting David to explain his own language. Referring to his previous, backslidden and miserable moral condition, he says, "The pains of hell gat hold on me—I found trouble and sorrow." Here he defines the pains of hades, hell, morally to mean, mental agony, conscious guilt, trouble and sorrow of soul. But these pains of hell were endured previously to this reference to them, for he speaks of them in the past tense. And he further says, "Great is thy mercy, O Lord, for thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell." Here, hell, or the state of the dead, is used metaphorically to represent that mental pain and agony which is the unavoidable consequence of transgression and folly; David sinned—he was turned into hell—the pains of hell gat hold of him—he was in trouble and sorrow—but he turned to the Lord—reformed—was delivered, not only from hell, but from the deepest caverns of hell, wrote his Psalms afterwards, and is now, probably, praising God in heaven. From his own experience, then, he was authorized to say, "The wicked shall be turned into hell—all the nations that forget God." And he was thus enabled also to conclude that, "All the ends of the earth shall turn to the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him." Here you will perceive, that the divine threatenings are fully executed, and the divine promises fulfilled—that the wicked are turned into hell, and yet reformed, reconciled, and saved, through the means of divine justice, mercy, and grace.

P.—I have certainly never heard such an explanation of the threatenings before; but really, taking all that you have said of my views of this text, into examination, and all you have said in vindication of your own, I must confess that your views look somewhat reasonable and just, while mine appear rather absurd. But as I have agreed to let an explanation of this threatening answer for an explanation of others of the kind, at least for the present, I will now ask you what utility there can be in turning sinners into a limited hell of mental pain and agony, if all are in the end to be saved? It looks to me like inflicting a wound upon a man, simply for the purpose curing it.

U.—Permit me, before answering you, to re-tort the question, and to ask you what utility there can be in turning sinners into an endless hell of pain and agony? Will their ceaseless agonies gratify a God whose name and nature is love? Will they result in any benefit to the inhabitants of this world? Will such a proceeding magnify the office of the Saviour, who came to seek and save that which was lost—who sacrificed his life upon the cross to redeem and save a sinful world? Will such miseries, without mercy and without end, prove any benefit to the doomed sufferers? All these questions you must, I think, answer in the negative. Then what utility can there be in such punishment? Will you have the goodness to tell me?

P.—I can not, unless it be to vindicate the perfection and rectitude of the divine government.

U.—But will the inevitable and endless damnation of sinners, serve to vindicate the perfection and rectitude of that administration whose results are so infinitely deplorable to its subjects? This, to say the least, would amount to a singular mode of vindication! But who needs such a vindication of the perfection and rectitude of the divine administration? Jehovah does not, for he is infinitely independent. Angels I should suppose would be satisfied on this subject without such vindication. The saints certainly can not require it, and the doomed will be just as well off without believing in the perfection and rectitude of any administration.

P.—Well, give me your views of the utility of limited punishment, and if they are reasonable and scriptural, I will receive them.

U.—Neighbor, I will do so at any future time, but it is now twelve o'clock, and I must return home. Think over what has been said till we meet again, which, probably, will be soon, and I will go thoroughly into this matter and convince you if I can. J. C.

ESSAYS ON WAR. NO. XII.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"I know not whether any war ever succeeded so fortunately in all its events, but that the conqueror, if he had a heart to feel, or an understanding to judge as he ought to do, repented that he had ever engaged in it all." ERASMUS.

In my last, I endeavored to show the deleterious influence of war upon civilization. It was shown that war had an unpropitious influence on the leading elements of a truly and highly civilized state of society. Some remarks were made upon the cultivation of the soil, and upon the fine arts. It was shown that neither was promoted by war, but that it tended to retard the one, and entirely destroy the other. We now proceed to look at war in a social point of view.

I. War tends to break down those civil and religious institutions which strengthen the social ties that bind man to man. Indeed, war seems to be almost an entire interruption of the principles and institutions of Social life. Take for instance, the violation of the Sabbath. No institution has done more to ameliorate and civilize man. But war pays no regard to it. "War acknowledges no Sabbath," said a militia officer to a subaltern, who demurred at serving notices of a training on that day. "I never heard," says a forcible writer, "of but one General in modern times who refused to give battle on the Sabbath lest he should break God's holy law, and he was a Roman Catholic." But we designed not to dwell on this particular point, but rather to take a more general view.

II. Look at the direct influence of war upon the heart. And, perhaps, we can not show this better than to cite an instance from the life of Frederick the Great. It is said that during the war which he made against the queen of Hungary, he one night gave orders that every light in his camp should be extinguished by eight o'clock. Walking out at that time, in order to see himself if all were dark, he noticed a light in the tent of a captain Zeitern. He entered the tent just as that officer was folding up a letter. Zeitern knew him, and instantly fell on his knees to entreat his mercy. The king asked him to whom he had been writing. He answered that it was a letter to his wife, in order to finish which he had retained the candle a few moments. Frederick coolly ordered him to rise and write one line more, which he would dictate. This line was to inform his wife, without any explanation, that, by such an hour the next day he should be executed. The letter was then sealed, and Frederick himself took charge of having it conveyed, and the next day the captain was shot.*

We present one more, which occurs in the history of the wars occasioned by the efforts of the Netherlands to secure their independence. So completely did these wars deprave and demoralize the heart that the Spaniards often threw their Dutch prisoners into the sea. This greatly exasperated the Dutch, insomuch that the State's General gave orders to Hautain, one of their naval commanders to retaliate in the same cruel manner. It was not long before this officer took some Spanish soldiers, whom he found on board of certain English and German vessels; and in obedience to his orders, five companies of them were tied together in pairs, and at a given signal were thrown alive into the ocean.†

So, we might proceed to multiply instances, but we should weary the reader. War promotes every vice, and in fact, makes men barbarous. It eradicates all the kindly and generous sensibilities. It throws men back in the scale of civilization, and reduces them to a condition of recklessness, stupidity and cruelty. Indeed, when we view it in all its horrors, we are disposed to adopt the aphorism of Coleridge: "If a man is not rising upward to be an angel, depend upon it, he is sinking downwards to be a devil. He can not stop at the beast. The most savage of men are not beasts: they are worse, a great deal worse." C. S.

THE VIEWS OF WAYLAND REVIEWED.

BR. GROSH—I have just finished reading "Wayland's Elements of Moral" (immoral!) "Science," which is the text book adopted in the branches of the University of Michigan; and wish to say to such of your readers as have not yet examined it, that, in my opinion, its doctrines are both pernicious to the morals of the rising generation, and contradictory. Pernicious, because the author denies that we ought to conduct virtuously because it makes us happy, and that happiness necessarily follows virtuous conduct; and contradictory, because he not only contradicts some of the plainest assertions of the Bible, but virtually annihilates some of his own positions. The first of these assertions I shall attempt to prove by transcribing and comparing a few of his propositions.

"We know that God always acts right, that is, deals with all beings according to their deserts;

but whether he always acts to promote the greatest happiness, I do not know that he has told us. Besides, suppose that we are under no obligation to do any thing unless it were productive of the greatest amount of happiness, it would follow that we are under no obligation to obey God, unless the production of the greatest amount of happiness were the controlling and universal principle of his government. Now this may, or may not be the ultimate end of God's government; or it may be his own pleasure, or his own glory or some other end, which he has not seen fit to reveal to us. Now, if I mistake not, this is wholly at variance with the whole tenor of Scripture and reason. I do not know that the scriptures ever give us a reason, why we ought to obey God aside from his existence and attributes. To me the scriptures seem explicitly to declare, that the will of God alone is sufficient to create obligation to obedience in all his creatures; and that this will, of itself precludes every other inquiry." pp. 23, 24, 25. Again, "I think that obedience, or love to God, from any more ultimate motive, than that this affection is due to him because he is God, and our God, is not piety. Thus, if a child should say, I will obey my father because it is for the happiness of the family; what the character of this action would be, I am not prepared to say, but I think the action would not be filial obedience. To feel under obligation to love God because this affection would produce the greatest good, and not on account of what he is, and of the relation in which he stands to us, seems to me not to be piety; that is, not the feeling, which a creature is bound to exercise to his creator." pp. 29, 30. Once more, "An action performed from the conviction of any other obligation," (than the above) "if this obligation be excluded, fails in infinitely the most important respect, and must, by the whole of this deficiency, expose us to the condemnation of the law of God, whatever that condemnation may be." p. 158. With such incoherencies does the author occupy nearly 200 octavo pages; and the only proof he quotes, is, Rom. i: 19, 20, and Luke x: 21, which have no direct reference to the subject in hand.

I have long thought, and still think, that:

"Self-love, the spring of motion acts the soul;
Reason's comparing balance rules the whole."

And that,

"Happiness is our object; ne'er could we miss it,
In life's varied path, if the talent were ours
From all we encounter some good to elicit;
As bees gather sweets from the meanness of flowers."

Now, if God has created man with a desire for happiness, and has also incapacitated him to act without a motive; is it not preposterous to say that he is guilty, and deserving of punishment, for indulging that desire, and acting in accordance with the motive placed before him? And is it not absurd, also, and contradictory to the principles implanted in our very nature by God himself, to say, man must not labor in expectation of the reward which God has promised to those who obey him? To require man to act without this expectation, is requiring him to act without a motive; for there can be no other motive, except the hope of reward, or the fear of punishment. This latter is, accordingly the one which the author holds out, and requires man to become God's slave, and love him supremely at the same time, which is utterly impossible in the nature of things, and contrary to all the revelations which God has ever made to man. As well, and with just as much success, might the Czar of all the Russias require the author to blacken his boots, all the rest of his days, without any reward, and love him simultaneously.

This pernicious doctrine is the great cause of almost all the wickedness that has deluged the world, and steeped mankind in crime, and its consequent miseries ever since the creation. Men have always been taught by false prophets, and are now taught from the pulpit, and by books, that virtue is not rewarded in this life; nor vice punished either here or hereafter on condition that they repent before death—that, if there is a reward for virtue, it is sinful, and deserves punishment, to act from the motive of obtaining it—that the happiness, promised in the immortal state, is not a free gift, nor a reward for virtuous conduct, but for repentance; and that there is an infinite punishment threatened, not because man commits sin, but because he does not repent before he dies. Thus the evil day is put far off, even beyond our death, and is there also uncertain; for the veteran who has spent three score years in iniquity, and committed one thousand murders, may repent, and escape all punishment, if he does so before he dies. Verily, this is repeating the serpent's doctrine: "Ye shall not surely die"—there is no certainty about it.

Convince mankind of the fact, that implicit obedience to the Gospel of Christ, and a conduct corresponding to its injunctions, only, can yield true and unalloyed happiness—that it is not a gloomy and an austere theory, subjecting its votaries to persecution, neglect, and the contempt of the world, and depriving them of the indulgence of those propensities, which the God of nature has implanted in their constitutions; but that it only requires man to restrain those propensities so far as it is necessary to prevent harm to themselves and their fellow-men—that God is their constant and unchanging friend, who has instituted general laws, which inflict a certain and an unavoidable punishment in this life, upon every offender, for his immediate profit, that he may be partaker of God's holiness—that happiness is essentially social and gregarious, and can never be fully enjoyed by any created being, while those around him are involved in sin and consequently in misery—that even savages have often been, and can always be, subdued by love and kindness, and will invariably respect genuine goodness wherever it is found—and lastly, that God will, in his own appointed time, finish transgression, make an end of sin, bring in everlasting righteousness, and unite the whole human family in one bond of universal brotherhood, where joy and peace shall reign triumphantly, universally, and immortally—convince men generally of these facts, or even of the first four, and a great and glorious reformation will appear immediately. For all men, of every grade, and in every situation of life, however deeply involved in crime and moral degradation, are pursuing happiness, and expect to attain to it, at least, in some degree, by the course they are pursuing. And to reform their conduct, it is only necessary to convince them of their errors; and this can never be accomplished by threatening them with the confessedly contingent punishment of hell fire and brimstone, even if it was a reality. Reason and kindness are the only Gospel means to soften the hard heart of the obstinate sinner, the only means which the Apostles used. Knowest thou not "that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance." H. R. S.

The Southern Literary Messenger, published by Mr. T. W. White, Richmond, Va., at five dollars per annum, is certainly one of the best conducted, and well filled, and largest monthlies in our country. The June number contains a review of the "Duties of Young Men," by Br. E. H. Chapin, written by one who is careful to state that he differs from Br. C. in his peculiar religious views, but finds nothing in the work to condemn, but a trifling exuberance in the style. He greatly praises the work, gives copious extracts from its pages, and warmly recommends it to every young man in America.

The "Duties of Young Men" is free from sectarian—perfectly so—and will be a valuable addition not only to every parent's and young man's library, but to the numerous District School Libraries which are being founded in several of the States. We ask School Committees to give it a special examination, satisfied that they can not get a more useful, well written, and interesting book, than this same work. ## RELIGIOUS TRUTH.

"But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest; for, as, concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against." Acts xviii: 22.

V. The New Testament ascribes to Jesus the august name of "Saviour of the world." 1 John iv: 14. And it declares that he came to "call sinners to repentance." Matt. ix: 13. That he came to seek and to save that which was lost. Luke xix: 10. That he came to "save his people from their sins." Matt. i: 21. And that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." 2 Cor. v: 19. The ascriptions of the high and ennobling duty to the Lord-Messiah of redeeming the whole world, is not made in the New Testament, without other testimony of his ability to accomplish the work and of its being in agreement with the divine government.

It is on all hands admitted, that God is almighty in power, unlimited in wisdom, and unbounded in goodness. And it is very evident that the unbounded goodness of God would never permit his almighty power to create an intelligent being, when his unlimited wisdom saw that said intelligent being would be endlessly miserable. Hence he says, that he "will not cast off forever." Lam. iii: 31. "For I will not contend forever, neither will I always be wroth; for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made." Isa. lvii: 16. Consequently, as the Lord will neither cast off forever, nor contend forever, the opposite of this must coincide with his will, pleasure and purpose. Paul declares that God "will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." 1 Tim. ii: 1-6. While, in another instance he says, "having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him." Eph. i: 9, 10. So that from this testimony, we gather the sublime truth that the gathering together of all things in Christ, and the bringing of all to the knowledge of the truth, is in agreement with the will, purpose and pleasure of the Almighty. Consequently, as Christ is the "Saviour of the world," and the "propitiation for the sins of the whole world," in effecting the work of universal salvation, he will execute the will, pleasure and purpose of Deity—he will fulfil the word of Jehovah, for the word has gone forth from God, that "every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength."

That the pleasure of the Lord will prosper in the hands of the Saviour: that Messiah will accomplish the will of God, which it was his meat and drink to do; that the purpose of God in Christ will stand; is demonstrated in Scripture. Sin shall be finished, Dan. ix: 24—tears shall be wiped from off all faces, Isa. xlv: 8—pain and sorrow shall have an end, Rev. xxi: 4—death shall be swallowed up in victory, Isa. xlv: 8, and being the last enemy, shall be destroyed, 1 Cor. xv: 26—all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him, Ps. xxii: 27—then shall Christ see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied.

With these considerations, we are prepared to affirm that we believe, after unequivocally rejecting the notion that multitudes will be endlessly lost from virtue and happiness, that in the providence of God and in the fulness of times there will be a complete reconciliation of every son and daughter of Adam to truth and holiness, by the work and reign of the Saviour—and that, when Christ shall have subdued all things to himself, he will render up the kingdom to God the Father, who will be all in all. Beyond this period, we believe that there will not be any pain, sorrow, sighing, tears, sin, error or death; but that each individual will be happy, will increase in knowledge, and go onward in offering the praise of intelligence and holiness to God and the Lamb forever and ever. In the fulfilment of this noble and divine doctrine, we find great consolation and moral power.

VI. It is clearly taught in the Scriptures, that violations of the moral law of God will be punished, and that sin will be distinctly and certainly chastised. God "will by no means clear the guilty." Ex. xxxiv: 7. And no observer of actual life can fail of perceiving that vice is followed by painful consequences—for it is every where demonstrated that "the way of transgressors is hard." The sinner can not escape the just judgments of God. But the punishment thus inflicted, is reformatory in its tendency; for God chastises with the hand of a parent. Hence it is said, "now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby." Heb. xii: 11. When chastisement shall have effected its office in subduing the offender, then forgiveness will be extended; which forgiveness consists in blotting out his sins from remembrance and receiving him again into favor, the same as though he had not been sinful.—Hence it is said, "speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins." Isa. xl: 2. The wandering prodigal, though severely punished for his vices in the far-off land, yet was forgiven when his father received him and forgot his sins in the joy of his recovery.

Therefore, while we have no faith in the doctrine of endless misery, yet we believe that the sinner will be punished according to his deeds—that pain will follow crime as a consequence—and that when punishment shall have effected its object, then forgiveness will be extended to sinners, and they will be received into favor and adopted into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

PRAYER.

When the spirit of Christ grows warm in the Christian's heart, and swells and overflows in the aspirations of his soul, how fervent is the petition offered to God for the salvation of sinful fellow-beings—for their release from the bondage of iniquity, and their restoration to the glorious freedom of holiness and bliss. And as heaven-born charity is awakened and refreshed and strengthened by this holy exercise of its affections, how the petition becomes enlarged, until the humble petitioner wearies God with importunate supplications that refuse to be denied, for the salvation of all mankind. This is prayer—truly Christian prayer—like the last social prayer of Jesus—"Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one.....that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." John xvii: 20, 21. Every disciple of Jesus, therefore, feels that such supplications for all men, are "good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth."—Hence it is that our opposing brethren and sisters can so fervently and cordially unite in and approve our prayers, even when they decidedly dissent from and condemn our preaching. I have often heard of rigid Partialists who heard our preachers lift up the fervent supplication to God for the salvation of all sinners, and who declared such prayers to be good, heavenly, truly Christian, and undoubtedly acceptable to God. But the preacher's sermon—they could not hear of that with any patience—it was abominable, wicked and demoralizing—he spent his whole time in proving that all mankind would be made holy and happy!

Now there is something in all this, which appears extremely unreasonable and inconsistent. Is there any thing more abominable, wicked or demoralizing in preaching universal salvation than there is in praying for it? If praying Universalism to God, is so acceptable to our Father in heaven, why should preaching it be so abhorrent to his children?

These questions might be extended to a great length, but my object is merely to awaken attention to the subject, and to induce our opposing brethren and sisters to look at the subject soberly, candidly and prayerfully.—I think they must see their inconsistency and their error. For it is certain to my mind that the all-wise and ever-consistent Deity who is pleased with our prayers for the universal salvation of our race, would not require, and has not required us to believe or to teach any thing contrary to the desires and prayers he has required us to cherish, cultivate and offer up to him. Think of it, brethren and sisters—pray for light and guidance respecting it—and search the Scriptures to learn what God has commanded and taught on these subjects.—And may God bring you into the embrace of that faith which will agree with, satisfy and strengthen your hope and charity.

REMARKS.

The business of the Council was transacted in peace, harmony, and the most perfect good feeling. No "root of bitterness" sprung up to trouble us. The weather was most delightful—the skies were cloudless and bright—and the whole face of nature seemed to unite with God's "nobler workman-ship," in songs of thanksgiving and rejoicing, to the God of universal life.

Seven sermons were delivered, by Brs. J. D. Hicks, (occasional,) H. L. Hayward, T. D. Cook, H. B. Soule, O. Roberts, A. B. Grosh, and D. J. Mandell—who were assisted in the services by Brs. Waggoner, Hathaway, Chamberlain, Pickering, Gage, Wilcox and Belding.—Addresses by Br. Waggoner. The congregations, especially on Thursday, were immense—and the preached word was listened to with the most devout attention.—It was a joyful and happy time. The spirit of friendship and brotherly love, seemed deeply to pervade every heart—and the devout language of all appeared to be, "Lord, it is good for us to be here." Many of those who attended the Mohawk River Association at Middleville, will long remember it as one of the most pleasant and joyful seasons which it has ever been their lot to experience. Such were our feelings, as we beheld the vast multitudes which thronged the gates of the sanctuary; and listened with most devout attention, to the proclamation of the "good tidings of great joy." God grant that the effort then and there put forth, in behalf of the cause of impartial truth and grace, may not be "in vain in the Lord"—but may it aid in the advancement of the doctrine of free salvation.

REMARKS.

The Association enjoyed this year, probably the brightest session it ever held. The delegation attending was very large, and certainly the meetings were never exceeded by those of any Association I ever attended. On the first day, the commodious stone church owned by our friends, was crowded, and on the second day, notwithstanding the driving clouds of dust, and threatening skies, we had to divide the congregation.—Having accommodated the Baptists a few days before with the loan of the Universalist house, our friends found them ready to reciprocate the kindness, and we filled both houses—one even to crowding—during the day on Thursday!

The business of the council was conducted in general peace and unanimity—and differences of opinion, when they arose, were settled or decided in unity of spirit.

The public services began on Tuesday evening and ended on Thursday evening. Twelve sermons were delivered, and other services performed by the ministers present, (including the most excellent occasional discourse, by Br. O. Wilcox, on Wednesday morning, and the administration of the eucharist and the dedication of a child, on Thursday forenoon, and the addresses in both houses, on Thursday afternoon,) all of which, so far as I can learn, were well received by those who heard them, and will probably produce much fruit in due season. Indeed, the attentive countenances and glistening eyes of those audiences, will not fail to cheer onward in their arduous labors, the speakers also. The performances of the singers were unusually good—especially of the regular choir who officiated in the Universalist church. And the hospitality of our Watertown friends rose above every demand made upon it by the increasing crowds which thronged their beautiful village, as if each call but added to their pleasure—and doubtless it did—for, if "the giver is more blessed than the receiver," they must have been greatly blessed.—And if any of our brethren and sisters elsewhere doubt that saying of the Lord Jesus, there is one resolution among the proceedings with which we invite them to comply largely and freely, and they will find the saying most delightfully true—I allude to the resolution requesting aid for a most faithful and deeply suffering servant of the Lord Jesus, now greatly needing donations for himself and family, from his brethren and sisters in the faith. Need I say more! No—not to Universalists! Their deeds I hope will prove them worthy of the name.

Brethren and sisters—may we fervently pray and actively labor in the good cause of God and humanity, that such sessions may bless all our Associations, and increase in numbers and interest year by year.

THE PULPIT.

Some agents inform us that there are those in their neighborhoods who will take the work when it is published, but do not now subscribe for it. If we could be certain of this fact, it might be well enough to forward their names; but as we can depend on none but actual subscribers, we say to all such, Subscribe if you want it—for it may not be published for the very want of subscribers such as you; and even if published and the edition is limited to the subscription list, you will not be able to get a full volume. We want a considerable number of names yet, before we can venture to publish the first number. So, what thou doest, do it quick, ly—the time is at hand.

THE UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES' REPOSITORY.—The June number of this valuable and interesting monthly, should have been noticed earlier. Suffice it then to notice the whole work. The present number begins the ninth volume, under the continued publishing care of Br. Abel Tompkins, and the Editorial labors of Br. Henry Bacon, and Sister Sarah C. Edgerton. Those who are acquainted with the work, are well aware of the great and numerous improvements that have been made in it since the present publisher and editors have had it in charge—and of the unwearied care exerted year by year, to make it, if possible, still more interesting to its readers and useful to the cause of truth. And to those unacquainted with the work we can only say, give it a trial. It is not a doctrinal work and leaves the rough road of controversy alone. Its articles are eminently literary combined with the spirit of our holy faith, and inculcating its practice. It short, just such a work as our ladies would like to read themselves, and to offer to Partialist sisters for their perusal. Monthly—40 large octavo pages each number—at $2 00 per annum in advance. Subscriptions received at this Office.

SALVATION.

On the fair banks of Canaan's land,
Beyond the reach of death's cold hand;
In shining realms of endless rest,
In Christ shall all the earth be blessed.

There on her pleasant banks to rove,
And feast upon eternal love;
With harps of gold in every hand,
To chant the praises of the Lamb—

There shall the sons of Adam's race—
Be freed from sin, and saved by grace:
A ransomed world, redeemed by God,
Shall shout the victories of the Lord.

There shall the Lamb on Calvary slain,
Be crowned with everlasting fame;
The Jews, who nailed him to the cross,
Shall be subdued by him at last.

No more shall Satan's galling chain,
Torment mankind with cruel pain;
Jesus, the Father's only Son,
Shall wrest the tyrant from his throne.

Shout hallelujah, O, my soul!
And spread the news from pole to pole:
From East to West, the echo fly,
Death the last enemy shall die.

THE EVILS OF INTemperance.—At a meeting of the Temperance Society in this city, a resolution was adopted to appoint a committee whose duty it should be to procure the publication of articles on temperance—Among others the Rev. E. H. Chapin was appointed; who preached an able and eloquent sermon on the subject of Temperance, Sunday evening, and who in discharge of the duty assigned him has furnished us the following extracts from that sermon. We publish them with pleasure, and doubt not our readers will be gratified by their perusal.—Richmond Compiler.

EVILS OF INTemperance.

PHYSICAL EVILS.

Look at the confirmed drunkard as he staggers by you. Look upon his shrunken or bloated form, his wan and ghastly countenance, his blood-shot eyes, his trembling, tottering limbs. Has age caused this hideous change? No, these are not the effects of age, and the maturity of manhood yet keeps its seal upon his brow. What then: has wasting sickness—haggard and desolating disease—laid its hand upon him, and corrupted thus the fountains of life, and turned them into poison? No—it has been no natural sickness that has prostrated his energies, and withered his very heart. It has been a slow and consuming fire, that has been kindled in his veins, that he has taken into his mouth in deep and burning draughts. It was but a little while ago, that he was a free and happy boy, with a countenance all unmarked by care, bounding along with a fresh and vigorous grace, and gazing upon life with a clear and happy eye. It was but a little while ago that his mother laid her hand upon his "curls of gold," and blessed him, and thought what a man he soon would be—what bright fruit his early promise should bear, and what a pride and stay he should be for her. And now, he is a wreck!—a diseased and wretched being—breathing the fumes of intoxication, and dragging onward to a drunkard's grave. A drunkard's grave! He shall fall with no laurelled honors wreathed around him—with no peaceful thoughts of good actions well carried out, to soothe his lot. Nay! the hand of that gentle wife that might have been there to "wipe the death-damp from his brow," is cold and still:—he broke her heart. The voice of his child that was once like music, is hushed in the grave—misery, want, destitution, hurried it there!

This is not a painting, filled up with imaginary sketches and vivid colors, in order that it may show. It is the dim reflection of realities—of realities that many can testify to—that are around us in our daily walks—that meet us upon this green and sunny earth, with an appalling, soul-chilling power. This is one of the effects of Intemperance. It is destructive to the physical energies. It digs the grave of thousands. In casting our eyes upon a report of the American Temperance Society, we find the following statement: "Of 33 persons found dead in one city, 29 were killed by intemperance. Of 77 persons, found dead in different places, the deaths of 67, according to the coroners' inquests, were occasioned by strong drink. Of 94 adults who died in one city, in one year, the deaths of more than one-third were, according to the testimony of the Medical Association, caused, or hastened, directly or indirectly, by Intemperance." Speaking of the habit of daily tipping, says one—"The rosy hue of health is exchanged for a deep scarlet; the eye loses its intelligence; the voice becomes husky; the blood parts with its florid color; the appetite is impaired; the muscles waste; the face is bloated; and in rapid succession the liver, the digestive organs, the lungs, and heart and brain, lose their vital forces and but imperfectly perform their functions; and sooner or later the constitution is broken down, organic disease supervenes, and death closes the scene."

But I will not pause to dwell upon details. These are facts, broken from a mass that lies heaped up—a frightful mass—in the pathway of human misery and woe. They speak for themselves. They need no argument. They address the young, with a strong and thrilling eloquence. It is as if this gigantic fiend strode out before them and said—"These are my awful and blood-dripping trophies—these are my weapons, with which I smite and crush and destroy. I will deal fairly with you. Follow in my track, and I will lead you along, for a time, in a course of gay revelry and excitement. But this shall be your end. The libation you pour at my altar, shall be the very life-tide of your hearts—the draughts you imbibe at my hand, shall be the black waters of death." Let the young give heed to this. Oh! let them beware of a course of intemperance. I take my stand now upon this ground only—that intemperance is the cause of much and fatal physical evil—and on this ground I entreat you to beware. As you value health—as you would enjoy life with strong and fresh energies—as you would avoid a racked, a worn and wasted frame—beware! For—"Who hath wo? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babblings? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine."

INTELLECTUAL EVILS.

But let me exhibit another evil result of intemperance. I allude to the injury that it works upon the intellect. The body and the mind, during our mortal existence, are intimately connected with each other.—They react upon each other. Is one diseased? The other becomes afflicted. The body becomes worn and feeble and diseased, when the mind is unsettled; and on the other hand, when the body is diseased and afflicted, the mind becomes feverish, excited, weak. So, then, intemperance, affecting the body as we have seen, must also affect the mind—must enter the very home of thought and reason and imagination, and work its devastations there. Look at facts a moment. "Of 286 persons in the Lunatic Asylum in Dublin, 115 were known to have been deprived of reason by intemperance." "In four years, from 1826 to 1829 inclusive, 495 patients were admitted into the Liverpool Lunatic Asylum; and 257 of them were known to have brought on their derangement by drinking; and this was supposed to have been the case with many others." "A distinguished gentleman man," says the appendix to one of the Temperance Reports contained in a volume from which we have taken these facts, "who has had extensive practice with regard to this malady, states that more than one-half and probably three-fourths of all the cases of insanity, which have come under his notice, were occasioned by excessive drinking." "In the pauper Lunatic Asylum in Middlesex, the number of patients increased in one year from 825 to 1100 and 1200; and principally by the increase of the use of gin."

What is the intellect, my hearers, that it should thus become debased and wrecked by a vile and burning animal thirst? What is the intellect, that man should abuse it thus, and wither his prospects of usefulness, and wring the hearts of his kindred, and fill the Lunatic Asylum with raving tenants? It is a gift that God has bestowed directly and especially upon man—that elevates him in the scale of being—that raises him above the brute, and distinguishes him as he walks the earth. It is the faculty by which he measures the stars, and analyzes the earth, and explores the waters. It is his patent of nobility—the seal of his high excellence. And shall it be polluted and perverted like this? Shall the young man apply to his mouth a beverage that shall disturb its wondrous powers with fury, and consume its curious organs with fire? Shall it become so hideous and distorted, that the eloquent eye shall lose the light of its beauty, and the breathing lip become parched and shrivelled, and mow and gibber its incoherent and idiotic phrases? Who is that reeling by you, like one blind—the contempt of the streets—the joke and scoff of the heartless and unthinking—a subject of pity to the benevolent and the good? Can it be a man?—a man gifted with intellect, once, at least, capable of soaring and striving with brave thoughts, and reasoning with profound skill, and conceiving high ideas of beauty and of power? Yes, it is a man! It is a young man.—A few months ago, perhaps, and they were few, whose prospects were brighter. That lofty reason bound men by its delightful and thrilling power. But he has fallen!—and how? He put the beaker to his lips.—Draught followed draught. Property became wasted—popularity was lost—business was closed. His heart turned to ashes—his brain to fire. He is a lunatic!—They trample him in the very kennels of the streets—he will die there, or will drag out his days in the Lunatic Asylum. This is not "fancy's sketch." You may go out into the streets of our large cities and see it this very night. What is the cause? Intemperance! Beware of it. I plead against it on the ground that it is destructive to the intellect. Dash down the goblet!—Put by its temptings! For "who hath wo? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babblings? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine."

DEATHS.

In North Bloomfield, May 25th, after an illness of three months, Wm. C., son of Rev. T. J. Smith, aged 12 years and 4 months. This is the second child, which brother and sister Smith have been called to part with within a few months. Affliction and much sickness, have borne heavily upon them, and presented the bitter cup of sorrow to their lips, but the hand that wounds is able also to heal their bleeding hearts. May they be sustained by the conviction that the loved ones whom they have resigned to God, will meet them in heaven. A. R. B.

In Bethany, March 2d, Mrs. BETSEY BUEL. Funeral on the 3d, by Elder Stimson in Bethany; also by Rev. O. Roberts in Conesus, April 25th, O. R.

In Marshall, Mich., in January last, an infant child of Mr. and Mrs. White. J. B.

In Marshall, Mich., June 7th, GEORGE, son of Henry J. and Ellen Phelps, aged three years and seven months. The joys and consolations of the impartial testimony of God, were administered to the bereaved family (excepting sister Phelps the mother of the deceased, who was absent to the east on a visit) from 1 Cor xv: 16, by the writer. A large concourse of friends and neighbors came together, to pay their respects to the dead, and console our brother and his little family group in this hour of trouble and sore affliction. Although the deceased was young, yet he was one of the most interesting children ever known. Every person who saw him noticed him, and could not help but become attached to him. It surely was a great affliction to the family, more so from the fact that the affectionate mother was absent, and not privileged with an opportunity of following her little son to the place of burial. May God strengthen and comfort her when she shall hear that there is one the less at home to receive her hand, and the impress of her lips. And may the Gospel of peace guide them through life's uneven journey, until they arrive at that blessed home "eternal in the heavens," where all is joy and harmony. J. BILLINGS.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. XI.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"And behold, there talked with him two men, which were Moses and Elias."

As I do not believe that the spirit of a man dies with the body, or in other words, that the whole man dies at death, so neither can I receive the doctrine which is held by some, that the spirits of the departed are sleeping in unconsciousness, to be awakened to a knowledge of existence at some future period, when all shall recommence conscious existence at the same time. It is not in accordance with the course I have marked out for myself, to introduce, at present, a great portion of the evidence which in my mind goes to disprove this doctrine. A notice of one occurrence related in the Scripture, with some remarks thereon, must suffice for the present number.

Matthew, Mark and Luke, all give a brief account of an incident in the history of our Lord, which by combining their accounts, and adding what Peter says respecting it, in his second epistle, appears to have been substantially as follows:

Not a great while before his death, our Lord took his three confidential disciples, Peter, James and John, and conducted them up a high mountain away by themselves, in which place he engaged in prayer. In the course of his devotions, from some cause or other, the disciples, who were present, though at a little distance, sunk into a transient sleep; and on awaking therefrom, they perceived that the appearance of his countenance was changed, his face shone as the sun, his clothing was exceedingly white and glistening, and there were with him two men of like appearance, who are declared to have been "Moses and Elias;" and it is added that they were talking with him respecting his death, which was soon to happen at Jerusalem. The awe-stricken disciples very naturally remained silent, until the men having retired a little distance, seemed about to depart. When Peter, not thinking of any thing else to say, and being probably very desirous that the visit might be repeated, expressed himself as follows: "Master, it is good for us to be here—if thou art so minded, let us make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias." But while he was thus speaking, a bright cloud appeared just above them—the men "entered into the cloud"—the disciples grew more afraid—there came a voice from the cloud, saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him"—they were now so affected with fear that they sunk forward to the ground, and could no longer look up—Jesus directly came and touched them, saying, "Arise, and be not afraid"—they looked around, and saw no man but Jesus with themselves. And as they were descending from the mountain, he charged them particularly that they should tell no one what they had seen until himself had risen from the dead, which injunction they faithfully observed. See Matt. xvii: 1-9; Mark ix: 2-10; Luke ix: 28-36: 2 Peter i: 16-18.

Now the presence of Moses and Elias on this occasion I deem to be good and sufficient evidence that they, at least, were not in a state of unconsciousness. And if two of the departed are not in such a state, I see no good reason for supposing that the rest are.

I am aware that as Elijah was taken from earth in a miraculous manner, it may be said that he might be in a conscious state though others were not. I am not convinced, however, that even according to the objector's own views, the manner of Elijah's disappearance renders him such an exception to the general rule as is requisite to overthrow the argument which we have based upon his reappearance. Yet if we were compelled to admit this, it would not materially weaken our argument, for Moses did actually die, if any dependence can be placed upon Scripture testimony. Thus we read, "And the Lord said unto Moses, behold thy days approach that thou must die"—"Get thee up into this mountain..... and die.....as Aaron thy brother died in mount Hor." "So Moses the servant of the Lord died there." "And Moses was an hundred and twenty years old when he died." "Now after the death of Moses.....it came to pass that the Lord spake unto Joshua.....saying, Moses, my servant is dead," etc. See Deut. xxxi: 14, 27; xxxii: 49, 50; xxxiii: 1; xxxiv: 5, 7; Josh. i: 1, 2. And that this was actually the death of the body is evident from the fact that mention is made of "his sepulchre," as also of his being "buried" in a certain valley. Nor is this conclusion in the least affected by the circumstance that it is said the Lord buried him, and that "no man knoweth of his sepulchre until this day." Though the exact spot of his interment was unknown to any mortal being, (and for the concealment of the same no doubt the Allwise had some good and sufficient reason,) the fact of his being buried indicates just as clearly that his body became exanimate, as Gen. xlix: 31, and l: 13, indicate the same respecting Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.*

If, therefore, it were conceded, that the appearance of Elias is no good argument against the unconsciousness of the dead, there would still be in the fact of Moses' appearance, a direct, and to me convincing proof that the departed are in a state of consciousness.

I am aware also, that some consider the transfiguration of our Lord to have been a scene presented merely to the imagination; and in support of this proposition, insist upon the fact, that according to Matthew, Jesus called it a vision, saying, "Tell the vision to no man," etc. In reply to this, I observe that the word vision may as properly import a real as an unreal occurrence; and that if this vision was not real, it must have been of the nature of a dream, or else of a spectral illusion. Under the head of dreams, I include trances, and indeed all "visions of the head" which are presented to us while in a sleeping state. Under the head of spectral illusions, I include apparitions, and all unreal sights which appear when the observer is awake, excepting however, such as are explicable by the principles of natural philosophy.

But it is evident that the vision of the transfiguration was not a dream, for Luke in recording the incident expressly tells us that when "they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with him," the disciples, "were awake." Luke ix: 32.

And that it was not a spectral illusion, is evident to my mind from a great number of considerations, some of which follow.

1. Peter, in speaking of our Lord's transfiguration, says in his 2d epistle, "We were eye witnesses of his majesty;" which language seems to me utterly inconsistent with any other view of the subject, than that he believed the scene to be real.

* I have been particular in the above, as I am knowing to its having been gravely asserted that there is no Scriptural evidence of Moses' death.

2. He further says, "For he received from God, the Father, honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son," etc. But if the voice was imaginary, how did Jesus receive honor and glory thereby?

3. Peter believed the voice to be real. He says "This voice which came from heaven, we heard when we were with him in the holy mount." But if they really heard, did they not really see?

4. The men talked* with Jesus. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, all mention this circumstance; and Luke says, "there talked with him two men, which were Moses and Elias, who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." Now not to insist particularly upon what I deem to be a fact, that apparitions always seem to be mute, I observe here, that the circumstance of the figures' being said to have talked not merely to, but with our Lord, which imports that he helped carry on the conversation, addressing them in turn, as they him, goes very far in my mind to establish the reality of what was seen and heard. For would he talk to shadowy forms and phantoms of the imagination.

5. It is very improbable that both the sight and the hearing of a sane person, when awake, should be subject to illusion at once—it is still more improbable that three men should experience the same illusion, of either sight or hearing, especially at the same time, and that three persons should labor under the same illusion, at the same time, of sight and hearing both, is improbable to the last degree. And it may not be out of place to observe here, that for three men to have dreamed of seeing and hearing the same things at once, is quite as improbable as that they should all have imagined the same things when awake. Yet Peter, James, and John, all thought they saw and heard the same things at the same time; and hence unless they were all deceived to the extent just now described, those things were actual occurrences.

And now observe. Mark and Luke in relating the incident, do not use the word vision. The former tells us that Jesus "charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen;" until the Son of man was risen from the dead;" and the latter says that "they told no man in those days any of those things which they had seen;" and this language is to say the least, most naturally expressive of real events. Observe further, that according to Walker's Dictionary, the word vision may mean "a supernatural appearance;" that is, as I understand it, something that is real, but not properly belonging to this world. This is just the sense which I attach to the word in Matt. xvii: 9; and by giving it this meaning, the testimony of the different writers perfectly harmonizes.

Respecting the "bright cloud" which overshadowed them, into which the men entered, and out from which the voice proceeded as from the Supreme Father, announcing Jesus as his beloved Son, I remark that it seems to me to have been the same as is called in the Old Testament "the glory of the Lord," which abode upon Mount Sinai while Moses was gone up thither, which filled the tabernacle when it was first set up, and afterwards the temple when it was finished, and which often appeared in the early times of the

* It would seem that if Moses and Elias were not awake at the time they appeared, then they talked in their sleep, and we may add, walked also. But who is willing to take the ground that some of the dead are somnambulists.

Jewish church. See Ex. xxiv: 15-18; xl: 34; 1 Kings viii: 10, 11; Lev: ix: 23; and many other places. This luminous cloud was regarded as the symbol of the divine presence; and that the same was seen on the mount of transfiguration, appears not only from the circumstance that the description of it in the New Testament corresponds to that given in the Old, but also from the fact that the words issuing therefrom were uttered in the name of Jehovah. Moreover the voice which Matthew, Mark and Luke, inform us came "out of the cloud," Peter describes as proceeding "from the excellent glory;" and what could he have meant by that, other than "the glory of the Lord?" And in view of this, which by the way, is a strong proof of the reality of the whole of the vision, I think I perceive a very good reason for his taking them "up into a high mountain apart by themselves;" for the glory of the Lord, whenever it appeared in the Old Testament times, seems to have been as visible to all as would have been any other luminous object of like brightness and magnitude, in the like situation; and it appears to have been the design of God that in this case none should witness its appearance, with the accompanying events, except Jesus and the three disciples.

But as I have before observed, the manner of Elijah's disappearance from earth, may be urged against the correctness of the conclusion which we have drawn from his re-appearance on the mountain. Let it then be observed that those who hold the doctrine under examination, believe, as indeed is commonly believed, that there was no resurrection prior to Christ's, which as all are aware happened after the transfiguration; and they believe also, that upon the death of the body, the individual remains until the resurrection in a state of unconsciousness. Hence then, according to this doctrine, when Elias appeared on the mountain, he must have been there in the same corruptible and mortal body of flesh and blood that he had when he stood before king Ahab. So also Moses, if he did not literally die, must have been there in a like condition. For according to this doctrine, had their bodies been dead, they themselves must have been in a state of sleep. But were they at that time mere mortal men? I trust the response of the intelligent and unprejudiced reader is already in the negative. Yet if they did not then inhabit their earthly bodies, the doctrine under examination is disproved by facts.

I close this number by observing that (to say nothing respecting Elias) the appearance of Moses at the time and in the manner herein related, is to me, an irresistible proof that he was then in some sense alive, though his body had been dead and buried for centuries. Hence his appearance is, to my mind, an irrefragable argument against the correctness of the doctrine examined in our last number.

MAN, HIS PROGRESSION AND FUTURE DESTINATION.

BY D. D. S. BROWN.

An Oration, written for the semi-annual Exhibition of the "Genesee Wesleyan Seminary," Lima, N. Y., April 2, 1840.

Man! a social, moral, intellectual and accountable being—the intermediate bond that connects heaven and earth—the undisputed lord of this lower world—most sublime of created nature—miniature of Infinite Greatness—noblest emblem of God—the rival of angels—an heir of Immortality!

Man, though a fallible being, is endowed with faculties and propensities, which if rightly developed and cultivated, direct him in the path of happiness and peace; but if neglected and unrestrained, lead him to the commission of crimes of the blackest dye. In the primitive ages of the world, man roamed the earth unprotected by social laws, nearly unconscious of his existence and totally ignorant of his future destination. Revenge, that dire foe to man, swayed his blood-crimsoned sceptre over a deluded world. The angel of wrath raised high his unfolded crescent, dyed in gore, and in muttering tones of vengeance, predicted incessant woes upon fallen, fallible man. Armies clothed in the panoply of destruction, were marshalled for deadly combat, the jaws of Death were yawning to receive its victims, the war-cry was heard, the clarion blast sounded, and the glittering hosts were weltering in their blood, and the smoke of demolished cities ascended from their plains. Enshrouded in the sombre clouds of heathenism, the celestial fire of his soul was smothered by the overwhelming billows of voluptuous inebriation. The bright rays of intellectual light shone not upon his darkened understanding. He stood beside the crystal stream, hastening to its destined home in old ocean's bed, but his soul was filled with no lofty aspirations. He gazed upon the star-spangled canopy of heaven, bedecked with innumerable, celestial orbs, rolling in their appropriate spheres, but he saw not the hand of the divine Architect. He looked forth upon the broad expanse of nature's loveliness, clothed in the flowery robe of beauty and delight, but he traced not therein the workings of the Almighty. He listened to the notes of nature's melody, echoing in the effusions of angelic symphony, but he distinguished not in its eloquence the voice of Omnipotence. The doleful cry of sorrow, and the pathetic wail of anguish made not the tender chord of sympathy vibrate, nor roused one feeling of commiseration.

But time rolled on, and a change took place in the condition of man. No barriers were sufficiently formidable to stay the progress of the human mind. Tyrants endeavored in vain to extinguish the fire of intellect, which like the lava beneath the groaning Titans, burst the shackles which bound it; and suddenly as the birth of Minerva from the brain of Jupiter, its effulgence pierced the dense darkness, and chased away the horrors of that dismal gloom. Greece, lovely Greece, first awoke, and starting from the long sleep of ages with loud pealing accents, broke the awful silence, when the thundering notes of Liberty reverberating o'er placid sea, and towering hill, were caught by proud imperial Rome, which echoed back the notes of triumph, until arousing the slumbering nations, they gathered around and knelt at the shrine of Grecian Genius. But the light which then shone upon the world, was soon to be extinguished in blood. The Egyptian, the Greek, and the Roman, all drank deep at the fountain of knowledge, but its waters were polluted by error and vice. Those renowned nations, amid all their wisdom and greatness, were destitute of those moral virtues which render a people prosperous and happy, and without which no nation can long exist. Hence, those brightest constellations recorded in the Book of Time, having finished the tragedy of national glory, were swept into the mazy labyrinth of sensuality like the lost Pleiad of olden time, no more to rise above the nadir of their destiny. An unbounded desire for wealth, and an effeminate luxury, infected the moral atmosphere, staining the escutcheon of man's glory, consigning honor, patriotism, and public virtue, to the tomb of the Capulet's repose to wait for a renovating influence of a more benign orb. The sages and philanthropists who stood forth as the polar stars of the moral world, the monitors of virtue, were overwhelmed by the billows of a discordant faction, and man, having lost his self-respect and all correct views of true merit, became the willing votary of vice. And when we view his condition from the fall of the great Roman Empire through a successive period of ten centuries, we find him void of all that exalts and ennoble the human character; guilty of the most debasing crimes, and, thinking himself released from all moral obligation, yielding implicit obedience to the edicts of Roman Pontiffs, and bowing in blind submission to a diabolical and superstitious priesthood.

The Inquisition, that worse than fiery dragon, was crimsoned with the blood heretics—a cloud of superstition overhung the world, discharging its thunder-bolts of death. Error raised her banner upon the "outer wall," and the legions of darkness gathered around to defend the polluted standard. There was a reign of universal ignorance, more blighting than the Siroc's withering blast. It was like a Juggernaut, rolling its mighty image over the fairest forms of creation, crushing them beneath its ponderous wheels. It may be truly said that,

"No light, but rather darkness visible
Seemed only to discover scenes of woe,
Regions of horror, doleful shades."

But the darkness of that mental night, was destined to flee before the effulgent glory of the sun of science and truth. A mighty reformer appeared upon the theatre of Europe in the person of Martin Luther, not with trained armies thirsting for blood; not with the glittering instruments of death, but clothed in the armor of truth, and using nought but the weapons of moral power. He shook kingdoms to their centres, and the thrones of Pontiffs crumbled into dust. He unfurled the banner of mental freedom, and raising high the flaming sword of truth, struck a soul-chilling fear to the hearts of the devotees of delusion. A host of European worthies followed the example of Luther, and the dark cloud which had long enshrouded them in its murky folds fled before the mellow light of the sun of Christianity. Most glorious era in the history of Time! The vestal fires of intellect were lighted upon the altars of wisdom, and the mind of man was unshackled by the power of the reformation. A Bacon and a Newton, with profound sagacity of thought, rescued science from oblivion and placed it upon the rock of induction, upon which modern Philosophers might rear a glorious superstructure. The votaries of error, seeing with indignation the sun of Righteousness rising to the zenith, put forth a mighty effort to smother its light. But its progress could not be stayed. It had met with the approval of the legate of Heaven, and its course was to be onward. From that time to the present it has moved forward with rapid celerity, bursting the bands of tyrants; dissolving the chains of despots, and teaching man the inherent rights of his nature. The snowy hills of Switzerland greeted its genial rays, and the plains of Hanover revived under its renovating influence. Continuing still its onward course, it dissipated the clouds of prejudice, overthrew the baseless fabrics of aristocrats, and raised Europe's degraded sons from the frozen regions of doubt and uncertainty to enjoy the bright effulgence of mental illumination.

Yet the light of the reformation was but the dawn of a mighty revolution in the moral, religious, and political world. Though the apostle of mental freedom had rent in twain the veil of ignorance, yet it was reserved for the people of this hemisphere to divest truth of all its deformities, and present it to the world in its true and pristine beauty. The heroes of the American Revolution, rising in the majesty of conscious might, demolished the citadel of oppression and instituted a model of government founded upon the firm basis of eternal Justice—the immovable rock of republican equality. And shall the fame of their exploits ever be forgotten? No! their memory shall never die. Their achievements in rescuing man from the thralldom of oppression will ever remain fresh in the memory of the great and good. Their deeds of glory will be chanted in the undying anthems of freedom, as long as Liberty shall have a votary. Their names are engraved high on the tablets of immortal Fame, there to remain amid the convulsions of empires, to elicit the praise of admiring man, until the "war of elements and the crash of worlds" shall sound the funeral knell of time. The gallant sons of Columbia bequeathed to man the inheritance of "free and equal" rights. And here he now walks forth, the undisputed sovereign of his own reflections, "responsible to man for his conduct, to his God alone for his belief."

In thus comparing the condition of man in the early ages of the world with that of the present time, we have abundant proof that he is a progressive being, designed for a higher and more exalted sphere of action. His present prospects are ominous of a glorious future. That celestial spark, the human mind, once shrouded in darkness, now in its longings to scan the works of the Almighty and explore the secrets of nature's laws, soars into the boundless regions of space, and in its momentous meanderings, surveys with a comprehensive glance those myriads of worlds that emanated from primeval chaos, and continuing still its penetrative search deigns to point out the paths of their eternal circlings. The sphere of earth has become too small for man's aspiring intellect. It rises on the wings of the wind to the empyrean regions amid the wandering satellites of infinity, and takes up its abode in the vast profound of God's immensity. It grows not giddy in its sublime flight, but declares with mathematical certainty, that the glittering gems which bedeck the vault of night, are the solar centres of systems as extensive as our own, the great attracting bodies of mighty planets and revolving worlds. It dives into the subterranean caverns and draws wisdom from the very bowels of the earth. It has unlocked the mysteries of creation and admitted man into the expansive chamber of the material universe. It has analyzed matter animate and inanimate, and unravelled the mystic tie which connects us with a higher grade of existence. But has man with all his wisdom and experience reached the summit of his greatness, again to relapse into the darkness of mental night? Is he here to stop in his upward march of improvement before he has half attained the zenith of his glory? No, it cannot be! A light has dawned upon the world never to be extinguished. The demon of superstition has flapped his wings and flown from his dazzling splendor to seek for himself a more congenial home amid the forgotten tales of delusive witchcraft and frantic ghosts of Milton's benighted regions.

What mean those deep tones which are borne upon the breeze from the arid plains of Hindostan? What mean those sounds of Regeneration which are coming up from the isles of the sea like "the voice of many waters?" What mean those sonorous anthems reverberating in the wind like the deafening peals of Sinai's terrific thunders? It is the omnific voice of a world's redemption, that arose from Mount Calvary, and its responsive notes which aroused the nations from their lethargy are now echoing over the rolling billows of the western ocean. Genius has gone abroad in its might to combat the legions of darkness, and has raised its potent arm for the contest. With the boldness of the giant in his wrath it has assaulted the barriers of ignorance, and with its magic wand has inscribed upon the walls of spiritual Babylon, "glory departed." And may the time be hastened on, when all theories and systems which are not founded upon the broad basis of truth shall sink into the shades of oblivion, no more to be remembered in ballad or in song. May man move forward from progression to progression, from perfection to perfection, until the stars of heaven shall gild the cerulean vault of night for the last time; until suns shall vanish into darkness, and worlds sink into chaotic night; till

The sevenfold thunder's awful roll
Shall shake the earth from pole to pole;
When pliant man shall kiss the rod
And bow submissive to his God.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Genesee Association of Universalists for 1840.

Met at Alexander, June 17, 1840, and organized the council by appointing Br. Earl Kidder, Moderator, and Br. W. E. Manley, Clerk, and Br. S. Goff, Assistant Clerk. United in prayer with Br. Hammond. Received and read letters from the societies in Perry, Boston, Alexander, Wethersfield, Gainesville, Covington and York. Received into fellowship the society of Gainesville. Heard the report of the committee of discipline, informing the council that a complaint had been presented to them involving the charge of intemperance against the Rev. David Pickering, of Buffalo. Heard the written documents that were presented to sustain the charge. And as the case involved some intricate and difficult questions, the subject was referred to a committee, who should report to the council, the proper course of procedure in reference to it. Appointed as said committee, Brs. J. Chase, C. Hammond, and A. Kelsey.

Heard the report of the committee on fellowship and ordination in favor of conferring ordination on Br. S. Goff, of Alexander. Report accepted. Appointed Brs. E. Kidder, W. E. Manley, and J. Sprague, committee of fellowship and ordination for the ensuing year—and Brs. J. Sprague, jr., S. W. Remington and Wm. Ferris, the committee of discipline.

Heard a request for an adjournment to Pavilion, which was acceded to. Appointed Br. Remington to preach the next occasional sermon, with power to appoint a substitute. Adjourned till the next day.

Met according to adjournment, at 8 o'clock, on Thursday morning, and opened the council by uniting in prayer with Br. Chase.

Heard the report of the committee to whom the case of Br. Pickering was referred. Accepted the report for examination. After some amendments and considerable discussion, it was sanctioned and adopted as follows:

Whereas, a complaint involving the charge of intoxication has been presented to this council, and fully sustained, against the Rev. David Pickering, a resident within the bounds of this Association, and whereas, he has, by letter to this council, plead unconsciousness of the truth of the charge, but pledged himself that he will hereafter entirely abstain from all intoxicating drinks, therefore, Resolved, That with due reference to the interests of the accused, and the cause of truth and righteousness; and having confidence in Br. Pickering's resolution of reform, we do request him to suspend his labors in the ministry for at least one year, or until evidence of his reformation shall be manifest.

Appointed Br. Manley to prepare the minutes for publication. Per order, REMARKS.—The attendance of the Association was quite numerous, and the sermons (with one exception) extremely good. And there can be no doubt that the cause of truth was greatly promoted by the exercises of the occasion.

It will be seen from the statistics, that the cause is prospering moderately in the several societies represented in the Association. And this is the way we think that the cause will generally prosper where such prosperity is permanent. The report of the committee of discipline, (which was the only thing that marred the happiness of the occasion,) and the decision of the council respecting it, should perhaps be attended with a few explanatory remarks. It will be seen that the Association has not wholly withdrawn fellowship from Br. Pickering. This it did not feel authorized to do from the following, among other considerations, 1. Br. P. was not present, and had not been officially required to be, to offer any defence against the charge preferred.

2. He had, by letter to the Association, declared his utter unconsciousness of the truth of the charge, but, to avoid all future suspicions, had pledged himself in the strongest and most emphatic language to abstain hereafter from all intoxicating drinks; and 3. It was thought that the mild and benevolent spirit of the Gospel would not justify us in withdrawing fellowship from an offending brother, till he had been properly admonished and "labored with;" and an opportunity of reformation, allowed. But as the charge preferred had been fully sustained, it was thought that less could not be done, in justice to the cause of truth, than to request Br. P. for the present to suspend his labors in the ministry, hoping that ere long he may resume them, with the prospect of becoming, as he unquestionably has for a long time been, an irreproachable and successful advocate of the great salvation. His avowed unconsciousness of the truth of the charge alleged against him, and the statement that the charge was fully sustained, may at first appear to involve Br. P. in the guilt of falsehood, or at least to be contradictory. But should the opinion of one of our brethren, who was with us in council, prove true, (and if it be true, Br. P.'s friends can convince the public of the fact,) that Br. P. has, at times, been under the influence of mental alienation, it may yet be seen, (and God grant that it may,) that there has been neither wilful intoxication, nor falsehood on his part, nor yet false testimony on the part of his accusers. One circumstance, connected with this affair is worthy of notice. The questions that were agitated in council, respecting the jurisdiction of the Association and some other important particulars, concerning which no "statutes had been made and provided," shows conclusively that we are not often called upon to act upon such unpleasant business: otherwise all these matters would have long since been definitely settled and distinctly understood. Unitarian ecclesiastical councils are not I presume greatly troubled with any doubtful questions of this kind. In conclusion, we tender thanks to our heavenly Father for the favorable weather that existed during the meeting, and to our friends in Alexander for their hospitality and kindness.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXXI.

John xii: 31, 32. "Now is the judgment of this world, now is the prince of this world cast out. And I if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto me."

As these passages of Scripture are of much importance, I choose to give the various readings and translations, and let every one judge for himself.

1. The Improved Version, renders these words thus, "Now is the judgment of this world, now the ruler of this world will be cast out. And although I shall be lifted up from the earth I will draw all men unto me." By the term judgment they understand the punishment which was about to fall on the Jewish nation, and by the ruler of this world they understand to mean, the Jewish hierarchy, the magistracy, or political existence of the nation, which was about to be abolished. Kneeland in his translation also takes the same view of it.

2. Adam Clarke, in his commentary on the Gospel supposes that by judgment, we are to understand the punishment about to fall on the Jewish nation, and by the prince of this world, he thinks is meant the devil.

3. Dr. Campbell in his translation renders the passage thus, "Now must this world be judged. Now must the prince of this world be cast out. Verse 32. As for me when I shall be lifted up from the earth I will draw all men to myself." He however, makes no comment on the passages.

4. Wakefield in his translation renders these passages thus, "Now will this world pass sentence; now will the ruler of this world be scornfully rejected. And after I have been lifted up from the ground, I shall draw all men to myself." John xvi: 11, compared with Revelation i: 5.

John xii: 44. "He that believeth on me, believeth not on me but on him that sent me."

That is, seeth a display of his goodness, wisdom and power. See improved version note. The following are the different translations which I have seen.

"He who believeth in me, believeth not only in me but also in him who sent me." Kneeland.

"He who believeth in me, believeth not so much in me as on him who sent me." Wakefield.

"He who believeth on me, it is not on me he believeth, but on him who sent me." Campbell. In a note he adds, "not only in me," and says the expression is similar to Mark ix: 37. "Whosoever shall receive me receiveth not me," etc.

John xiv: 9. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."

"I am in the Father and the Father in me," (see verse 10,) is a sufficient commentary on this text.

"I am in the Father and the Father in me," because my doctrine is my Father's, and my miracles are my Father's." See Newcome's translation.

John xiv: 30. "The prince of this world cometh and hath nothing in me."

Some good copies read, "but will find nothing in me." "I shall soon be arrested and brought before Pilate and the tribunal as a criminal, but no crime will be proved against me." See Improved Version—see Kneeland. "The prince of this world is coming though he will find nothing in me." See Campbell. "The ruler of this world." See Wakefield.

John xvi: 8. "And when he is come he will reprove the world of sin of righteousness and of judgment." etc.

"Of their sin in not believing in me. Of my own righteousness and veracity when I said I was sent by the Father, and of God's equitable judgment in punishing the princes and rulers, who so unjustly condemned me." So reads Imp. Version, Kneeland, Campbell, Wakefield and Clarke.

Verse 15. "All things which the Father hath are mine."

That is, every thing which relates to the kingdom of God in the world is committed to my direction and superintendence. See Priestly, Kneeland, and Imp. Version.

John xvii: 5. "With the glory which I had with thee before the world was."

Or as Mr. Wakefield renders it, "with that glory, thine own glory, which I had before the world was." The glory which is the object of our Lords petition is that of which he speaks, verse 22, the glory of instructing and converting mankind. See verses 8-14. This glory he had given to the apostles—verse 22—that is he intended it for them. The same glory the Father had given to him—that is reserved it for him, and purposed to bestow it upon him before the world was. He had it therefore with the Father before the world was; that is in the Father's purpose and decree. In the language of Scripture, what God determines to bring to pass is represented as actually accomplished. Thus the dead are represented as living. See Luke xx: 36-38.

Believers are spoken of as already glorified, Romans viii: 29, 30. Things that are not are called as though they were, Romans iv: 17. And in verse 12, of this chapter, Judas is said to be destroyed though he was then living. See also, verse 10. Eph. i: 4. 2Tim. i: 9. Rev. xiii: 8. Hebrews x: 34.

THE NATURE OF SALVATION.

It must be evident to every person in any measure conversant with the Scriptures of divine truth, that in the same there are two distinct salvations spoken of; the one consequent on believing and maintaining good works, the other, the effect of God's astonishing grace and love towards mankind—the most noble portion of the workmanship of his hands. The former may be enjoyed in this world; the latter we have the promise of in the world of spirits where God's love for man will be more fully revealed. Neither of these salvations, of which the Scriptures teach, are as many honestly suppose, salvations from merited, deserved punishment. The reader is doubtless well aware that it is strenuously contended by a large majority of the Christian world, that salvation consists in the removal of those punishments which man's guilt would justly incur. But from whence an idea so averse to the Bible doctrine of salvation originated, I am at a loss to know, unless it sprung from among the absurd notions of the ancient heathen. There surely is no foundation upon which to rear so absurd and grossly inconsistent a theory in the sacred volume of God's revealed will. This assertion we now shall attempt to maintain in as brief a manner as the subject will admit of.

It will be recollected that Christ is spoken of as coming to save his people from their sins. A material difference will at once be discovered between his saving his people, or in other words, mankind, from their sins, and the removal of deserved punishment as a consequence on timely repentance. We may be saved from our sins by commencing a course of virtuous living; by renouncing sin and all uncleanness, and living in obedience to the requirements of Heaven. Being saved in sin, however, implies something vastly different. It implies the removal of guilt as a consequence of having a merited punishment averted. But it should be borne in mind that the passage to which we refer explicitly declares that Christ came to save his people from their sins. And this he does by the power of his Gospel. The practical believer in the truths therein revealed, so far as his constitution will allow, refrains from sin, obeys the monitions of conscience, and enjoys the rewards of virtue. In thus doing he is saved from sin and its destructive consequences. But no exertions on the part of man can avert the punishment of the guilt he has already accumulated by disobedience and wicked works. No ingenuity of his, will prove effectual in removing deserved punishment, for the infinite Jehovah hath made the unequivocal declaration, that "though hand joined in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished"—that "he will by no means clear the guilty," and that "there is no peace to the wicked; they are like the troubled sea whose waters cast up mire and dirt." Salvation in sin is therefore manifestly impossible, and clearly inconsistent with the unalterable decrees of the Almighty. God hath declared the way of the transgressor to be hard, and therefore what daring absurdities are connected with that system of belief which represents the pathway of iniquity and vice as pleasant while in the pursuance thereof!

But to return. Respecting the Scriptures authorizing a belief in two salvations, the one to be received as a consequence of believing, the other the free unmerited gift of God; we now purpose to offer a few brief remarks which we trust will be corroborated by the testimony of Holy Writ. Commencing at the first verse of the tenth chapter of Romans, the apostle Paul thus speaks: "Brethren, my hearts desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved," etc., etc. Here the apostle speaks of a strong and ardent desire which he possessed that all Israel might be saved. Hear him again if you will, "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery; lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, Then shall come out of Zion a deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." An important inquiry now presents itself, a correct answer to which will serve to do away many of the objections to the view of the subject we have taken. It is this: If the apostle had not in view both a conditional, and an unconditional salvation, why did he involve himself in so apparent a contradiction as the foregoing language of his contains? At once he speaks of a strong desire of his heart that all Israel might be saved; again he declares that all Israel will be saved. We might enlarge upon this point, but we forbear. Due consideration is only requisite to make it apparent to every reasonable mind that the Bible teaches us of two distinct salvations; the one a reward, and enjoyed on earth; the other a free gift, and enjoyed in the realms of immortal bliss in heaven. Each of these are again referred to by the apostle Paul in the following language, "For therefore, we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe." ## A DREAM.

A Methodist preacher came into our place, and commenced his labors "for the salvation of poor immortal souls." Excitement soon made its appearance, and was fast waxing into a destructive flame, when, by the urgent solicitations of a professedly converted friend, I was induced to give my attendance at the meeting. It was in the evening. The preacher's subject was a frightening one, and most frighteningly did he handle it—it was "the misery of the damned in hell and the danger of sinners falling into it." And such a description of that imaginary "world of woe immortal," I never before or since, have heard or read! It was awful in the extreme; and, if such a thing were possible, it was more appalling and horror-striking than would be the death knell of our world, summoning the universe to its funeral.

At the conclusion of the services I returned home, tormented in mind with the most frightful images. From these I labored hard to rid myself, but in vain. I finally sought the bed, hoping that sleep would have pity on me, welcome me to his embrace, and, for a while at least, draw the veil of oblivion over that "pit of deathless agony and despair." In this I was not disappointed, for I very soon fell asleep, and had my mind refreshed with the following cheering, though singular dream.

I was suddenly taken ill, my strength rapidly declined, though I was not subjected to the suffering of a moment's pain. The physicians immediately pronounced my recovery hopeless; but this news caused no unpleasant emotions to disturb the serenity of my bosom. I had not the least anxiety to protract my life, not for a day or an hour even; and with respect to the future, "not a fear was there, nor thought foreboding." At this moment I heard a voice, soft and sweet as that of an angel, saying, all is well, all is well. The music ceased; and just as it did so, while my friends, all drenched in tears, were standing in the room about me, I saw the door gently open and there entered a being whom I instantly suspected to be superhuman. He proceeded immediately to the bedside and took me by the hand, saying, "thy Father hath sent for thee; arise, and go home." I replied, I am ready; but tell me first who thou art. "I am," said he "the angel of deliverance, but am known among men only by the name of Death. But I can not tarry; follow me." I reached forth my hand and respectively bade those around me farewell, and with joy started on that journey from whose bourne I expected never to return.

We did not proceed far before my angel-guide took leave of me, assuring me that the way was all bright before me, and that I could not err therein. As he disappeared, I looked around and discovered on either hand, an innumerable company, all moving on in the same direction with myself. A beautiful, sunny plain, as broad as the earth, and seemingly resting on it, and from it a little inclined upward, formed the road on which we were travelling. As we proceeded, I perceived that it grew narrower, until—as I afterwards learned—it reached the heavenly city, where it was of the same width with the gates which opened thereinto.

As I journeyed on, enjoying a degree of happiness unknown on earth, I was induced to observe the constantly increasing multitude around me, and see if they were as happy as myself; and behold! they were all shouting, "going home, going home." O, what a scene then burst upon my view, as the narrowing way brought us nearer and nearer together! Away, near the city's gates, whose splendor was above the brightness of the sun, I beheld Adam, and a long line of his posterity; below I turned and looked, and behold, earth's children had all forsaken her and all—not one was left behind—all were on their way to their final, glorious and immortal home! I was now approaching the gates, and saw written above them in characters of living light, "Enter ye; for all that the Father giveth me shall come to me." I entered. All passed through the gates into the city to go no more out. The gates closed—Christ, the Lord spake, and the ransomed universe were clothed with glory and honor and immortality. He then addressed his Father, saying, "Father I have finished the work thou gavest me to do; I have finished transgression and made an end of sin; all that in Adam died in me have been made alive; I have subdued all enemies unto myself, and all are reconciled unto thee; I now deliver up the kingdom unto thee, and become myself subject unto thee, that God may be all in all;" and suddenly every creature who had been in heaven, or on the earth, or under the earth, joined in the universal anthem, God is all in all, Amen and amen. And I awoke. My mind was rid of its troubles, and has been ever since.

LIFE.—We get satiated of life, because it never can satiate. Man has been compared to an ephemera, but wrongly, for the little creature of a day emerges from sloth and darkness to a brilliant existence, while we flutter round for a while like winged flies, and then grow dull and heavy, and turn to grubs.

GOOD NEWS FROM A FAR COUNTRY.

"Behold, I bring you glad tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people."

Thus spake the celestial messenger from on high! Thus speaks the Gospel to a world dead in trespasses and sins! Thus it speaks to the wretched wanderer who has lost his way, and is groping in the dark; it points him to Christ as the light of the world—as "the way, the truth, and the life." By the resurrection of Christ from the dead, we are begotten again into a lively hope—a hope which will enable us to triumph over death and the grave. Yes, it is this hope, this "good news," which is truly, like an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast; it was this hope that sustained our much loved, and faithful Br. Fuller, and if we truly believe this "good news," and rest by faith on this hope, it will enable us to live as devoted to the cause of our Master as he did, and die as triumphant and happy a death.

Here then, let us found our hopes for time and eternity, nor murmur at the rod of our heavenly Father—let us remember, that he is faithful that hath promised. He is more to us than all this world; our life, our health, our God! On this eternal rock let us rest—and O, dear brethren, let me entreat you to consider what persons we ought to be, in all godliness and honesty; for the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our law-giver, the Lord is our king. He will save us! The inhabitants of that world to which we are all hastening, shall not say I am sick; the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity, "for the Lord will not contend forever, neither be always wroth, lest the spirit should fail before him, and the souls which he hath made." Until some person, then, can give us as good a reason that the Almighty will cast off forever, as He has that He will not, let it silence every dissenting voice, and lead them to exclaim, "just and true are all thy ways O thou king of saints!"

And now let us ascend on the chariot of divine contemplation, near the throne of the great Jehovah, where we shall see no more as through a glass darkly, but face to face; where all are saved from sin, and made holy and happy. There are no childless mothers in paradise above; no sister weeps for sister, or father for his prodigal son; within these courts all oppression and strife is at an end, for all the nations of the earth have remembered and turned unto the Lord, and all the kindred of the nations worship before him. Here is assembling every nation, kindred, tongue and people clothed with white robes and palms in their hands; here every creature in heaven, on earth, under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, are ascribing blessing, and honor, and glory, and power unto him that sitteth on the throne, and the Lamb forever, while the veiled cherubim and seraphim, are continually crying, holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty!

ETERNITY.

It has been affirmed that the dogma of endless misery was believed by the Jews generally, and by the Pharisees in particular, in the days of the Saviour, and that his silence respecting the general creed, as then held is prima facie evidence of its truth, because not combatted by him, who professed to be the light, the instructor of the world.

Our ideas of eternity are purely negative; we have nothing positive respecting it, being in itself incomprehensible. Many nations have but few terms in language to express numbers; many have no terms in use beyond ten, when in counting they have to begin again, and record the number of tens, not by words, or terms, but by tangible substances, as stones, etc.

It is plain that the ideas which the Hebrews attached to the words "for ever," "everlasting," etc., were far different from those which we entertain on the same words; they meant only a long, undefined period of time, the exact extent of which, they did not profess to determine; hence the reign of the posterity of David was said to be for ever, and events of long duration expressed by, "as long as the sun, or moon endureth." The Hebrew language knew no more express terms—was understood to mean no more.

With the Jews, the mathematics, as a science, was little taught; and where they are not directly taught, the minds of nations, as of children, have no thought of infinitudes, or eternity; they have no terms in their vocabulary to express it; of course, their infinities must be limited in duration; they may use the terms, but their ideas must be limited to the extent of their knowledge.

The doctrine of infinities is purely mathematical; as a right line is said to be composed of points, so a right line extended by joining other right lines, gives a complex idea of infinitude, which extended, begets an idea too big for a finite being to grasp; which he can only talk about, not comprehend. It was this which composed a great part of the philosophy of Aristotle, and contributed to the refined darkness of the succeeding epoch of monks and jesuits.

It is well known that the Jews at the advent of our Saviour, did not cultivate mathematical learning or the science of geometry. The doctors who studied in the Jewish seminaries, aimed not at such lofty conceptions; they had no words in their language to record such learning, had they wished to cultivate it; they must have used the Greek or Roman language, had they attempted to study Euclid. As Astronomy, through the invention of the telescope, and the adoption of the Copernican system, was successfully cultivated, another idea, or rather term, became familiar, called "infinite space," a thing which certainly is, or exists, but of which we can form no accurate conception, except what the term "infinite space," conveys.

Hence we may infer, justly I think, that the ideas attached by Jesus and the Jews, to the terms which we doubtless properly translate, by, "everlasting," "for ever," etc., were not those which theologians, who are by education partly mathematicians, now attach to them. The doctrine of infinities, any more than of infinite space, was unknown to them, of course could not be taught by them. Let theologians blush if they are capable, at attributing to them, what they could not be said to teach. They asserted, in the language then commonly spoken, that eternal life, or happiness, was the consequence of obedience to known equitable laws, and that the infringement of those laws would for ever incur punishment—future to be sure, because felt, and inflicted after the commission. But they never could record for the use of posterity, an idea of endless misery as we understand it; they had no such term in their language, and be it remembered, the terms we say they used, are a translation of the original words used by them. The first teachers of Christianity with the divine founder at their head, no more taught the complex ideas of infinity, in connection with either happiness or misery, than they taught the doctrine of infinite space. These facts may perhaps account for the silence of Christ or his opponents, as to what is now the "big whole" of theology, eternal misery.

Christianity is a system of pure morals, capable of accomplishing the greatest of all events, viz: the renovation of a world. That great object is obtained, that most desirable end accomplished, only by the knowledge, and practice of its precepts. It is a pure principle, transmitted from the Father of light. Theology, which is the growth of ages of darkness, has no connection with it. By the admixture, Christianity partakes of an alloy, which obscures its lustre, and neutralizes its effect; it is like painting the diamond. How deplorable the thought that Colleges are maintained to teach theology to pupils; immense sums expended to teach theology to the people, while the teachings of Christianity are as rare to be met with, as it is pure in practice.

RELIGIOUS TRUTH.

"But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest; for as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against." ACTS xxviii: 22.

[Concluded.]

VII. When an individual is in error and in sin, it must be obvious to every person, that in coming to a knowledge of the truth and to the practice of virtue, a change must take place—for if an individual ceases to do evil and learns to do well, turns from error and embraces the truth, it implies that a change in his views and feelings has led to a corresponding change in faith and action. In this change we believe, and call it the "new birth"—a death to sin and error, and a "new birth" into the kingdom of truth and virtue. This change is produced by the operation of truth and moral principle upon the understanding and the affections. Hence Peter said, being born again, not of corruptible seed but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." 1 Pet. i: 23.

This change also implies "regeneration;" for the individual is regenerated from vice and error to the better condition of holiness and truth. And there is combined in it, the doctrine of "repentance"—for, when the individual so experiences a change as to realize his sinful acts, will he not repent him of his evil deeds? And will not the sincerity of that repentance be manifest in his future righteousness?

Therefore, rejecting notions of a mysterious, miraculous, instantaneous new birth, conversion and change of heart, we believe in the new birth and regeneration from sin and error to holiness and truth, produced by the power and influence of the "word of God;" and we believe in the necessity of true repentance; a "repentance not to be repented of," and which leads to more correct actions.

VIII. No careful observer of community, can fail of perceiving, that with multitudes, religion is a mere outside show; is implicit faith in a creed, or a bigotted adherence to a sect, or a practice of certain ceremonies, or a strict attendance upon multitudes of meetings. Nor is it an error to say that there are many, who are not circumspect in their lives, who exercise no benevolence, or liberality, yet who are thought to be religious because very zealous for the advancement of a particular sect. Now, the New Testament is very far different in its descriptions of religion, from the frequent errors which have obtained in community concerning it. It sets forth that religion consists of virtue and benevolence; in the steady discharge of moral duty; in the exhibition of a pure life; in constant exertions to obey the will of God; in such an excellent conversation, and purity of thought, and holiness of action, as to deserve the approval of a correct conscience, and the blessing of the divine word. Hence, the prophet inquires, "he hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" Micah vi: 8. While James no less distinctly affirms "pure religion, and undefiled, before God and the Father, is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." James i: 27.

Hence, rejecting all fanaticism, excitement or ceremonious form, which may be denominated religion, we believe in a religion of good works, pure lives and holy conduct—a religion of the golden rule, "whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them"—a religion of discharging the various duties of life with fidelity and vigor—a religion whose highest aim is to purify the thoughts of evil, the conduct of sin, the soul of revenge, the actions of hypocrisy, and to fill the mind with sublime affection which expands into supreme love toward God and universal love towards all men.

To sum up the various points which have been advanced, we find them to be, 1. Faith in the one, only living and true God. 2. In the divine authenticity of the Bible. 3. In Christ as the Son of God. 4. In the resurrection of the dead. 5. In the reconciliation of the world. 6. In the punishment for vice and the reward for virtue. 7. In the new birth, regeneration, and repentance, produced by the word of God. 8. In a religion of good works. These are the great principles of faith which form the Restitution, and characterize the denomination of Universalists.

In view of them, I put the solemn inquiry to my readers, what is there in these principles which is so very evil? Why should they lead us to be a sect every where spoken against? Can a reason be found in them, why the Restitution and its believers, should be the subjects of continued misrepresentation, and of idle stories and stale anecdotes, in almost every protracted meeting which is started? The only reason which can be given is, that this faith declares that Christ will actually be the "Saviour of the world." And yet, is it so very bad to believe, that the world will ultimately be saved from sin and sorrow, that it need be met with every stigma of misrepresentation! The plain fact of the case, is that we only preach what is prayed for by all other denominations; we only believe that God will accomplish the conversion of the world, which they beseech Heaven to effect, though they have no faith that Heaven will bring it about.

Go to an individual, and convince him, that the impartial grace of God will save him and all his family and unite them in heaven with joy, and he will not oppose it; he will rejoice in it. Why should he, the moment we extend that grace to all families and to all nations, take exceptions and oppose it, and say that he wishes not to go to heaven if all people will be saved? The fact is, that all persons are Universalists in regard to themselves and their own families, and believe that endless misery is for their neighbors only. The doctrine of the restitution is not thus self-righteous in feeling or cramped in extent. It extends the love of God to every son and daughter of Adam, and it represents the Messiah as enduring the untold horrors of crucifixion for the salvation of the world—it looks forward to the work of drawing degraded minds from error and sin and elevating them to the better and holier station of virtue and truth—and it holds up to our admiring view, the destruction of every evil to which human life is incident, and the introduction of the universal race of Adam into immortality and felicity. And as such, it is worthy of regard and reception, not only on account of its boundless and sublime views of another world, but also for its power to lead its followers to the purest and most elevated morality. G. W. M.

THE ONE THING NEEDFUL.

According to the combined teachings of the Bible, pure religion will be found to consist of faith, benevolence, and moral purity. I might be more extensive in my classification of these qualities, but the present arrangement will not do injustice to the truth, as all other qualities may be included in those mentioned. Let the reader, then, whether believer or unbeliever, follow me patiently in my remarks.

God, and his premises and purposes, are the objects of genuine Christian faith, that faith being exercised through Jesus Christ, the Sent of God. Concerning this faith, it can not be denied, there are many who have made shipwreck, and there are many others who have persisted in rejecting it from their hearts, from some cause or other. They are consequently destitute of one important portion of the one thing needful.

Now suppose these doubters should act upon the same principle towards their best earthly friend, that they do towards God. Suppose they hold themselves aloof from all his advances, and refuse to listen to his communications; or listening, impeach his veracity, and set down his proposals and advice as the deceptions of a hypocrite. Or suppose that they receive his communications, and set about misinterpreting and perverting them, so as to make out their author to be a cruel, fickle minded, and haughty tyrant—and all this in direct opposition to every fact connected with his treatment of them. Could they be happy? Certainly they could not. They could not regard as agreeable, any associations or business with which their friend might be connected. They could not respect that friend, because they have cherished a selfish and mean spirit; and for the same reason they could not respect their neighbors or themselves. They might have wealth and power—they might be crowned with fame, and greeted with popular applause, but their enjoyment of these would be incomplete, they lack the most needful thing of all. They lack that consistency which will enable them to receive that which recommends itself to their faith, by its own intrinsic merit. And is there not a paramount necessity for faith in God? Can man listen to, or peruse the instructions which our heavenly Father has been pleased to give us, and reflect how unspeakably are those instructions connected with his happiness, and reject them, or disregard them, and be happy? He can not live without the blessing of almighty God. Can he, then, receive and partake of the daily bounties of this Friend, while he denies, blasphemes, or slanders his name—can he do this and be happy—not feel that there is something unsatisfying in all he possesses? No.—Let him breathe the air of heaven, and taste the luxuries of earth, and receive the protection of him above, and if at the same time he denies or distrusts the Giver, his enjoyment of these bounties will be much like the false, guilty enjoyment of stolen bread eaten in secret. Facts tell us that all the enjoyments of man will prove hollow, unless his heart is beautified by a religion of faith.

Benevolence is the next characteristic of the one thing needful. We profess to believe—nor can we help believing if we consult God's providence—that our heavenly Father is infinitely benevolent, "good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." But when one of us gives way to the spirit of unkindness, and suffers himself to hate what God loves, he virtually dishonors his professions, and loses a portion of the confidence of his fellow-beings. Here is so much wanting to his prosperity and peace. Nor is this all. A spirit of unkindness weakens the influence of his faith, and prepares the way for him to abandon it; because while it should be adding directly to the happiness of the pure in heart, it is, in his case, needed and occupied in removing the faults which he cherishes. He feels that the ransomed of the Lord in heaven, are and must be imbued with the spirit of love and unity; but being himself of an opposite disposition, he regards his condition as opposed to the universality of that truth which constitutes faith within him, and can not easily see how that obstacle can be removed. The consequence is too often, a total abandonment of his belief, by which he loses the restraint which even a faith of the head exerted over his heart. Another truth is, that every time he injures, or attempts to injure, or wantonly slights a fellow-being, he lays the foundation for repentance. However much man may endeavor to flatter himself of the justice of such a course, he can not deny that he feels a sense of shame, and regret, and self-condemnation, even in the midst of his fancied exultation, every time he meets the object of his unkindness. If we could scan the real motives of the proud, or the pretendedly great, when they pass by and neglect the unfortunate and the suffering, under pretence that they are to mean, too much beneath the standard of respectability, to be worthy of their notice, we should often find that this is only a pretence to hide feelings which they are ashamed of, while the real cause of their superciliousness is, that they are anxious to avoid meeting, or associating with one whom they have injured.

Another peculiarity of religion which we have mentioned, is moral purity. By this is meant a love for the good, and the pure, and the holy. If a man does good as he has opportunity, he must do so because he loves to. To possess really the one thing needful to his happiness, he must act from high moral principle, and not merely because the world requires him to act. He must be charitable and benevolent because he loves to be so. He must worship God because it is consonant with his moral feelings. He must preach the word because he loves to preach it. He must support the preached word because he can do so freely, cheerfully and satisfactorily, knowing that the Lord loveth a cheerful giver. He must yield obedience to the divine law, because it is his meat and his drink to do the will of his heavenly Father. This worshipping God with the lips, and despising the influences of the truth with the heart; this preaching the Gospel, and teaching the creeds of men; this paying a shilling for religious purposes, and a dollar to get rid of it another time; this doing one's duty outwardly, and clinging to his bane with the whole mind; this giving to the poor with the hand, and cursing them with the lips, is not altogether consistent with that moral purity which says to a man, whatsoever thou doest, do with a pure heart and a clear conscience. Brethren, let us covet the best gifts in such a manner that, as we attain to them, we may be a blessing to ourselves and our fellow-beings.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

During the past month, I travelled upwards of 400 miles, attended four Associations, and preached 16 sermons—consequently was obliged to give many items of business the "goby." None was more neglected than the news department. I purpose now to bring up the arrears.

The Pennsylvania Convention met in Pottsville, May 20th. Appointed Brs. J. M. Crosland, Moderator, J. S. Palmer, Clerk, A. Moore, (Philadelphia,) Boon and Ashton, committee on fellowship and ordination; J. Kingsbury, (Sheshequin,) Eckstein and Crosland, committee of discipline; Palmer, Gallagher, Ames and Gihon, (Ministers,) and J. L. Gihon, of Philadelphia, Samuel Gregory of Montrose, J. M. Crosland of Pottsville, J. M. Keim, of Reading, J. Kingsbury of Sheshequin, and J. Grosh, of Marietta, (Laymen,) delegates to the United States Convention, with power to appoint substitutes; and Br. A. Moore to preach the next annual sermon. A resolution was passed recommending the brethren to stand or kneel during prayer, to secure uniformity of manner. [Suppose one half stand, and the other half kneel—what uniformity! In this section we all sit down.] Also, desiring friends where there are no societies, to make full reports of their condition and prospects at the next session—recommending the Associations to hold quarterly Conferences—and deploring the decease of Br. S. W. Fuller.

Adjourned to meet in Reading, Berks county, on the last Wednesday and following Thursday in May, 1841.

The Massachusetts Convention met in New-Bedford, June 3d. Appointed Brs. S. Streeter, Moderator; E. Hewit, and T. G. Farnsworth, Clerks; H. Ballou, Beede and Noyes, committee on fellowship; O. A. Skinner, Jewell and Norwood, committee on inquiry; H. Ballou, 2d, Cobb, and Tomlinson, on discipline; T. Whittemore, Austin, H. Ballou 2d, L. Willis, H. Ballou, S. Cobb, and M. Black, jr., Trustees to select site, etc., for a Theological Seminary—besides a few minor appointments. The following brethren were appointed delegates to attend the United States Convention:—Brs. R. Tomlinson, Plymouth; Hosea Ballou, Boston; S. Cobb, Waltham; R. S. Pope, Hardwick, (clergymen.) Brs. Samuel Pitcher, Hyannis; James Bartlett, Plymouth; A. B. Wales, Weymouth; Robert Bacon, Medford; Gardner Ruggles, Hardwick; Charles Shaw, Cummington.

Resolutions were passed in favor of a Theological Seminary—fellowship was extended to Br. W. Jackson, and the Winchester Association, and ordination conferred on Br. Jno. Prince—and resolutions on the subject of Slavery were debated and indefinitely postponed.

The following report of the Committee of discipline will interest many in this region who know Br. Gregory.

"The Committee of discipline, consisting of Brs. H. Ballou 2d, S. Cobb and R. Tomlinson, made a report, which after some amendment was adopted as follows:—Your Committee report, that they have examined Br. John Gregory's case, so far as time and means would permit. They find the facts to be the following, viz:—1. That his application, the last Spring, to the Courts of Vermont for a divorce, was not granted; and 2d. That he, thereupon, married another woman with whom he yet lives. These are the facts. Your committee further report that said Br. Gregory, alleges that notwithstanding he failed to obtain a divorce, he was nevertheless legally absolved from his first marriage before he contracted the second; but he has produced to this Committee no proof that such was the fact. Yet as he professes to have the means of producing such proof, if sufficient time be allowed him, your Committee would ask leave to have the case kept open for that purpose."

The same Committee were instructed to grant Br. Gregory a mutual Council in the case, whose decision should be subject to the revision of this Convention.

Adjourned to meet in Cheshire, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1841.

It may be worthy of remark as a new movement, that at the Massachusetts Convention, prayer meetings were held each morning at 5 o'clock, by some of the brethren.

The Central Association of Michigan, met in Columbia, Jackson county, June 3d. Appointed Brs. A. H. Curtis, Moderator; T. Wheeler, Clerk; A. H. Curtis, Stacy, Wheeler, Committee on fellowship; E. Gage, H. Barritt, A. Sweet, on discipline. Fellowship was granted to Brs. I. Smead, Dr. Thomas C. Adam, D. K. Lee, and — Hard. Sermons were delivered by Brs. Sweet, Smead, A. H. Curtis and Adam, and addresses by Br. Stacy. Adjourned to meet in Columbia, usual time in 1841. The Semi-annual session will be held in Albion, Calhoun county, on the fourth Saturday and Sunday in October next.

DUNNING.

One of the evils of this habit, is, that you can not quit when you would; for, in these hard times, the moment you cease to dun, many agents and debtors think you are out of your difficulties and cease all exertions to aid you. This notice, is to avoid dunning, and also to prevent our friends from supposing that we need no immediate aid. Every week we have workmen to pay and demands to meet—some of them deferred demands—and require, therefore, a large amount of money weekly. Let but our agents, and our subscribers who are owing for previous volumes, remember this fact, and act upon it as promptly as they can, and we will be saved the necessity of dunning. By their aid, we have been preserved thus far—a few more months, and we hope to be released from the pressing and threatening difficulties that yet surround us.

A. B. G.

THE TRUMPET—begins a new volume this week. Br. Whittemore, its proprietor, is probably the most industrious, and wealthiest man in our Editorial Corps, and makes his paper one of the very best in the order. There is a prospect of a discussion between him and Rev. Pearsons Cook, Editor of the Puritan, to be published in both papers. Mr. Cook, however seems unwilling to defend endless punishment, and therefore wishes to discuss future punishment only! This Br. W. declines, and very properly too.

A. B. G.

Br Gurley is informed that the plates of the Pro and Con are received. An edition will be issued as soon as a small quantity of the books which have been left for sale are disposed of.

REMARKS.

The weather during the meeting was pleasant, and congregations large, attentive and joyous. Sermons were preached by Brs. Gage, Whiston, Kibbe, Potter, Belding, Soule, Hathaway and Grosh. Addresses by Br. Marvin. The exercises of the sanctuary were heightened in interest by the spirited strains of "a host of singers." To sum up the whole in one sentence, we had an interesting, and we trust a profitable time.

Our thanks are due to the ministering brethren from neighboring associations for the aid they afforded us during the meeting, and to the society in Newville for their hospitality and Christian kindness.

HOPE.

The voice of hope still whispers peace
To him by anguish riven;
It still points upward to the sky,
And tells of bliss in heaven.

It frees the mind from slavish doubts,
It drives our care away;
Dispels the dark foreboding fears,
Which lead our minds astray.

When hope is based on God's decree,
That all shall see his grace,
That bitter tears shall soon be wiped
From every mourner's face,

Then Christians rest and trust in God,
To save from sin and wo,
To bless the whole of Adam's race,
Nor let a wanderer go.

Did not His hand our wants supply,
And grant us life's rich cheer,
And guard us when His watchful eye,
Saw dangers gathering near?

Yes, God protects his creature man,
With constant watchful care;
Though grief sometimes corrodes his heart,
Yet joy succeeds despair.

EVILS OF INTEMPERANCE.

SOCIAL EVILS.

[Concluded.]

Consider the social evils of Intemperance. A long, dark catalogue they are! It is a Bohemian Upas, that stands in the midst of our communities breathing death upon the atmosphere that passes through its branches and half-buried in the skeletons that whiten around its trunk. Take up a daily newspaper, and cast your eye over its items, and you shall hardly miss some record of wo or infamy that will testify as to its results. In what form would you see these results presented? For lo! their name is Legion, and they are many. Would you follow its footmarks to the haunts of dissipation, and have their dark, polluting vices revealed? Would you see it where dark-browed murder stalks at the heels of its victim—where shameless theft plunders in the eye of day? Would you hear it in the execrations and blasphemies of the streets—in the profane oaths that hurtle by the doors of the very sanctuary? Would you have its long array of crimes summoned and bid to pass in procession before you? No, I will not dwell now upon these more public evils, that darken and corrupt, and flow through the length and breadth of the land. I will not dwell upon these—but, I will take you to the home of the drunkard, where the influence of intemperance may be seen working at the very heart of social life and human affection—embittering the sources of joy and love at their very fountain, and if there its effects are so dark, so withering, what must be its results when it flows out into society, unrestrained by the strong ties of interest and of kindred? I take you to the home of the drunkard, then. I point you to the want and the sorrow that hover, ghastly, upon his very threshold. I point him out to you, as he lies in the stupor of the last stages of his debauch by his desolate hearth-stone. I bid you look at the tearful faces of his little children as they moan for bread. I bid you gaze upon the wan and feeble countenance of his wretched wife—the victim of his cruelty and excess. “But this,” you say, “is the hut of poverty—these are the rags and the ashes of utter destitution.” Yea—but that destitution has been wrought by intemperance! The means that should have made that home comfortable, those children happy, that wife joyous: have been wasted away for the deep and poisoning draught.

But we will take you to a scene somewhat different. We will conduct you to a dwelling of affluence. Who sits there so lonely and desolate? Who leans her hand upon her cheek, and heaves such bitter sighs, and sheds such scalding tears? A broken-hearted wife! A wife, for whom, a few months ago, were breathed vows of tender affection and promises of unchanging love;—for whom were given solemn pledges that he who uttered them would “cherish, support, comfort” her—that he would be her earthly shield and stay, through life's uncertain journey. And so he bore her away from the bright home of her girlhood—he took her from the protecting arms of her parents—and has brought her to this—to misery—splendid misery—misery made more hideous by the very circumstance of its splendor; it so mocks the darkness and coldness of her withered hopes! He will return soon. He will reel home to speak harshly to her—to threaten her;—he will reel home in all the delirium of utter drunkenness!

Trace it, then, where you will, amid poverty or riches, it presents the same fearful, appalling features—it is a Gorgon head, that rises up, whether helmed in gold or swathed with a bandage. Are these sketches only dreams? Is there no reality to answer to them? Would there were not! Would that I were mistaken! Would that this mass of evils had rolled off the earth this hour, leaving in their places joy and freshness and beauty. But it can not be so. It is too true; and could one family-group that is suffering this night from the effects of intemperance, stand here before you—could they tell their history—you would find how little imagination has exaggerated in this matter.

Young men;—to you I address myself—nay, to you of the other sex I appeal;—for you, you have much to do in this matter. You have been the keenest sufferers in this course of things. The ties that are woven in your hearts, are the chords that are crushed and bleeding. Woman brings her yearning sympathies, her pure affections, her devoted love, to the sanctuary of home, and there comes the destroyer and scatters and tramples them, leaving her lone, heart-sick and desolate. I call upon you, then, young woman, to exert your influence in this matter. I call upon you to aid in averting the tide that sweeps over the domestic altar and the green places of domestic happiness, and sunders the golden chain of domestic affection, and brings scathing misery and death. I call upon you to aid in averting this, as you would avert your own sacrifice? And I bid all, young and old, of both sexes, unite in the work. For “who hath wo? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babblings? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine.”

MORAL EVILS.

Let me refer you, finally, to the moral evils of intemperance. And let me remark that many, nay, we may say all, of the evils which we have already taken occasion to enumerate, end in moral guilt. These evils of the body, these intellectual injuries, this social guilt—have also a moral bearing—they are infringements of a Moral Law. They darken and oppress the soul—they quench its light, lead it astray from the path of Duty and Holiness and Peace. Let this vice become universal—let this nation be converted into a nation of drunkards—and what would be your Sabbaths?—where would be your Sanctuaries?—where the altars of Religion—where the Principles of Obedience to the Law of God? They would be swept, polluted, desecrated, trampled under foot! Your Sabbaths would be one wild jubilee of riot and debauch—the Sanctuary would be deserted or contaminated with profanity and sin—the Altars of Religion would be defaced and neglected, and the moral principle that binds society cut loose—or it would hang by a thread so slender, that a breath of excitement, an overt act of the delirious multitude, would snap it asunder. For, how can a mind that is deranged and perverted by this raging passion, be calm and true and pure? How can it discharge its duties and regard its obligations? Drunkenness is a temporary insanity, when the relations of things are disturbed, when all sense of right and wrong seems, often, to be swallowed up in the tide of burning excitement that throbs from the heart to the brain. If a man can be brought to murder his wife and children, to sacrifice his own life, under its influence—what ties will he regard?—what sense of propriety shall restrain him?—And so, I do not exaggerate when I point to such fearful results as the effects of a universal prevalence of this vice.

But, although it is not thus wide-spread in its action, what, I ask, is its natural influence upon the individuals under its sway? Is it not as dark—almost, if not quite as dark; as desolating, as hideous, for the individual, so far as he is concerned, and his connections with community, as it would be if it were universal, if it were national? Can you think of a good, consistent Christian, who is at the same time an intemperate man? As well think of a beautiful and healthy flower, that has within it, at the same time, the noxious seeds of poison and death—as well imagine a star shining with beauteous lustre, while it draws its light from fountains of chaos and darkness—as well imagine any paradox in nature. Well-meaning men—men that are penitent when their delirium is over, I believe there are—but I am speaking now of a good man—of a Christian—of one whose spiritual life is active, whose moral energies are brave and strong; and I ask you, can you conceive of the connection of such qualities with the vice of drunkenness—the union of vile passion with spiritual strength and light?

We must look, for spiritual darkness—for moral guilt—for obtuseness of moral preception, and stagnation and deadness of moral life—in the bosom of the habitual drunkard. Not only, then, do we discover the moral evils of intemperance in the dreadful havoc which it makes in community—in the black and scorching crimes which issues from it and swarm in the land—in the sundered fragments of the domestic chain, and the desolate ashes of the domestic hearth—in the broken hearts, the ruined hopes, the crushed energies, the perverted faculties of man;—but we also see them in the deep taint and corruption which it works in the heart of the individual—in the manner in which it leads him astray from the sunshine and peace of existence, from the path of virtue, from the Way of Legion, and makes him a guilty, wandering and erring transgressor of the Law of God.

Let the friend of human happiness—and certainly let the follower of Jesus Christ put forth his energies to destroy this giant vice. It is his duty—his bounded duty—as one who loves God and loves man—as one who would see Religion triumph, and evil pass away. And is not drunkenness a great evil?—For “Who? hath wo? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babblings? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine.”

Nothing should be more effectual in abating self-conceit than to look on people who evidently have as high an opinion of themselves in any given respect as we have, and to see that they are mistaken. It is very possible we may be so too.

MARRIAGES.

In the town of Stark, May 13th, by Rev. H. B. Soule, Mr. JOHN HOLMES, to Miss SALLY MARIA SLOUGHTER, both of that place.

In Clinton, May 16th, by Rev. T. Clowes, Mr. ANDREW J. CATLIN, to Miss SALLY E. MORSE, both of Clinton.

In Sharon, June 23d, by Rev. Job Potter, Mr. MOSES ENGELL, to Miss LUCINDA EMPLE, youngest daughter of A. Emple, Esq., all of Sharon.

DEATHS.

In Albion, Mich., December 9th, 1839, JULIA, only daughter of S. B. and Lucy Morehouse, nearly 5 years of age. The comforts of that faith which was once delivered to the saints, were offered to the truly afflicted family from Ps. cii: 1, 2. A large concourse of people came together to sympathize with the mourners. Although this affliction was great to our brother and sister, yet they do not mourn as those who have no hope. Their trust, and their hope, are in the promises of God, through Christ Jesus our Lord. J. B.

In Sempronius, N. Y., May 26th, Mrs. CAROLINE, wife of Mr. Jehial Mather, aged 27 years. Sister Mather was beloved and respected by all who had the pleasure of an acquaintance with her, and she yielded up her spirit to God who gave it, with perfect composure. Funeral services on the 28th, by T. J. W.

In Moravia, N. Y., May 27th, Mr. GAD CAMP, aged 83 years. Br. Camp was a Universalist, not only in theory but in practice. He has left a widow, several children, and numerous relatives and friends to mourn his departure. His funeral was attended on the 29th, and a discourse delivered in the Episcopal house to a large audience, by the writer. Our thanks are due to the Pastor and wardens of this church for their kindness and liberality in opening their house of worship for our accommodation, and also to the members of the singing choir, for their very acceptable services. May the mourning friends find the grace of God sufficient for them, and the blessing of the most High rest upon all concerned. T. J. W.

In Upper Lisle, May 20th, Mrs. SALLY HINMAN, wife of John Hinman, aged 63 years. Sermon by the writer. C. S. BROWN.

SERMON

Delivered at the dedication of the new Universalist Church, Henderson, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1839.

BY REV. P. MORSE.

"Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion; and unto thee shall the vow be performed. O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come." Ps. lxxv: 1, 2.

In this world of error and crime, where wisdom and folly, light and darkness, knowledge and ignorance, joy and sorrow, happiness and misery are provisionally commingled; where human desires are strong, and human efforts are unceasing to obtain enjoyment, without which life itself would be intolerable; a deep and general conviction has prevailed throughout all nations that some kind of homage and reverence, praise and worship, is due, and should be rendered to some power above us, to some being far superior to man. Hence the universal practice amongst the various nations of the earth, both ancient and modern, of maintaining religious worship. Hence all the extravagances and miseries of superstition, in regions, on which the light of eternal truth has never yet shone. Praised be the name of the Lord, that he has directed our minds to himself as the only proper object of supreme adoration, in whose sacred presence, before whose throne of light and mercy, we can prostrate our adoring souls with heart-felt delight!

On this most solemnly pleasing occasion, when this great congregation is assembled to consecrate this magnificent temple to the worship of Almighty God, let it be deeply impressed on every mind that no form of worship can be acceptable to the Creator, nor advantageous to us, in which the heart is not engaged. Let us all cherish the strong and ardent desire for the worship of the Lord, which was anciently expressed in glowing language by one of his devoted servants: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! My soul longeth, yea even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God."

When the Israelites were dwelling in temporary tents in the wilderness, journeying to the land of Canaan, the Lord commanded Moses to erect a tabernacle for religious purposes. A part of this tabernacle was called the holy of holies; adjoining this was the holy place, separated from the former by a veil; and connected with the holy place was a court where sacrifices were offered. At this tabernacle, and also in the splendid temple, afterwards built by Solomon, the renowned king of Israel, the numerous hosts of Israel assembled to worship God, according to the requirements of the Jewish law; and in those appointed places of religious worship, Israel's God manifested his presence and bestowed his blessing. And, now, while we proceed to dedicate this house to the worship of the living and true God, in the name of his Son Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, are we not conscious of the sacred presence of the Almighty? May we not confidently expect his blessing on the solemn and devout services of this day?

1. I shall endeavor to explain the general sense of the text. Its glowing language indicates that solemn and sincere religious worship was rendered to God in Zion, and there should the devotional vow be performed: that the Lord is all-gracious and merciful, a prayer-hearing and sin-forgiving God; and that all mankind shall worship in his holy presence, according to the following language of the same inspired writer: "All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name; for thou art great and doest wondrous things; thou art God alone."

Sion, or Zion, literally signifies a noise, a heap, a tomb, a fort in Jerusalem. It is variously used in scripture to signify Jerusalem, the land of Judea, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the people of Israel, or the true worshippers of the Lord in any nation. "The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob. Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God." "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion, I will declare the decree, the Lord hath said unto me, thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me and I shall give thee, the heathen thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth thy possession." That Zion refers to the subjects of salvation, for whom a Saviour died, is manifest from the language of scripture. "For the law shall go forth of Zion and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." "I will place salvation in Zion, for Israel my glory." "It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the end of the earth." "For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, nor unto blackness and darkness, and tempest, and the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which they that heard entreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more; but ye are come unto mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, and to the general assembly and church of the first born, which are written in heaven, and to God, the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel." "For the Lord hath chosen Zion: he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest for ever; here will I dwell: for I have desired it." "I will abundantly bless her provision; I will satisfy her poor with bread; I will also clothe her priests with salvation and her saints shall shout aloud for joy." So general has been the impression that Zion means the true worshippers of God, that the poet has said,

"O Zion, tune thy voice,
And raise thy hands on high;
Tell all the earth thy joys,
And shout salvation nigh:
Cheerful in God, arise and shine,
And wide extend thy rays divine."

2. I shall speak of the importance, nature and design of worship.

No language can fully express the importance of regular, established, consistent and rational religious worship in any community of rational beings.

Man is so constituted that he has moral, as well as natural wants which must be supplied, or he can be neither virtuous nor happy.

Reverence for the character of the supreme Parent of the universe, with consciousness of obligation to, and dependence on him, constitutes the basis of all integrity of heart and uprightness of action, and leads to the unhesitating and undeviating performance of duty when unperceived by any human eye. True morality is the practical part of genuine religion, so far as religion relates to our conduct with our fellow creatures. How, then, shall a proper sense of our obligations, both to God and man, be maintained without religious worship?

Injustice and oppression, fraud, violence, sor-did selfishness, prowling licentiousness, night-walking villany, general faithlessness and depravity, immorality and wickedness, with all the vices which degrade the character and destroy the peace of mankind, flourish most luxuriantly where true religion has been unknown—has fallen into contempt—or been perverted into the solemn mockeries of superstition.

Generosity and kindness, liberality and benevolence, charity and mercy, with universal virtue, and that unyielding integrity of heart, which constitutes the true dignity and honor of man—sheds a beautiful lustre on the moral world—and extends peace, harmony and happiness through society, are all called out, promoted, strengthened and encouraged at the altars of social and divine worship. Such worship is manifestly among the most efficient means of reforming and saving a sinful world. The pulpit possesses extensive influence in sustaining moral virtue and restraining vice. The time, place and circumstances are all favorable to this benevolent end.

"The pulpit, when the sat'rist has at last,
Strutting and vap'ring in an empty school,
Spent all his force, and made no proselyte;
I say the pulpit, in the sober use
Of its legitimate powers,
Must stand acknowledged while the world shall stand.
The most important and effectual guard,
Support and ornament of virtue's cause."

The nature of religious worship comports with the holy and adorable nature of the great and glorious Being to whom it is rendered.

True devotion has been, may be, and most naturally will be accompanied by some outward forms, or performances; and one form may be more rational, consistent, pure and edifying than another; but all outward forms are indifferent when compared with the great question, whether the best feelings of the heart are engaged in, or estranged from that worship. No form nor solemnity can avail any thing in the worship of that great Being who perceives every thought, unless accompanied by the ardent desires of the mind. "The hour cometh and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth."

"All beings his paternal care,
His love and goodness prove;
Through all the earth, the seas, the air,
Where countless myriads move.

His great compassion crowns the whole,
With favors rich and free;
And bids each doubting, trembling soul,
His great provision see."

But the acts of true devotion are not exclusively performed in the house of public worship. They also adorn and beautify the domestic circle.

"Does pure religion charm thee,
Far more than aught below?
Wouldst thou that she should arm thee
Against the hour of woe?
Think not she dwelleth only
In temples built for prayer;
For home itself is lonely
Unless her smiles be there.
The devotee may falter,
The bigot blindly roam,
If worshipless her altar
At home! dear home!
Love over it presideth,
With meek and watchful awe,

Its daily service guideth,
And shows its perfect law;
If there thy faith should fail thee,
If there no shrine be found,
What can thy prayers avail thee
With kneeling crowds around?
Go! leave thy gift unoffered
Beneath religion's dome,
And be her first fruits proffered,
At home! dear home!"

A large portion of the human race have not been benefitted, and many have been really injured by their worship, because they have not perceived, or have mistaken the true design of worship. They have worshipped to avert divine vengeance, which existed only in their own disturbed imaginations; or to produce some supposed change for the better in the object of worship. But if the infinite loveliness of the supreme Being had been revealed to their understandings, if the unalterable benignity, glory and excellence of the divine character had been perceived, they would have seen that the true design of worship is, to reconcile man to God, not to reconcile God to man; and that the worshipper should diligently strive to love, serve, and enjoy God forever. "Praise waiteth for thee O God in Sion, and unto thee shall the vow be performed. O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come;" and before thy throne of light, mercy and glory they shall everlastingly worship thee in the beauty of holiness, in the purity of heavenly love!

3. I shall speak of the supreme excellence of worship.

The moral excellence of the object of worship, forms the foundation of cheerful and sincere worship: hence if false, degrading or pernicious views be entertained of God, the worship rendered him will be servile, hypocritical, or otherwise injurious.

Idolatry, or the worship of false gods, in some form, has been the prevailing infirmity and general misfortune of the human race. Such worship has destroyed the peace of society and been productive of every species of crime. Hence the grand and primary design of all the religious instruction, which God was pleased to communicate to his ancient chosen people, was, to establish and perpetuate among them the knowledge and worship of the everliving Father of the universe, that all nations might finally enjoy that knowledge and worship—that "all flesh" should come unto God in the solemn acts of devotion. In conformity with this gracious design, "the image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature," has revealed the Father of mercies, in all the boundlessness of his never dying love; and we cheerfully worship him with all the best powers and faculties we possess, because infinite excellence is concentrated in his character, and no change in him is either desirable or possible.

Words can but imperfectly express the perfections of the Almighty; perfections which are distinctly written upon all portions of the universe; perfections which shine in the glorious gospel of our salvation; perfections which demand the most feeling and humble adoration of the soul.

God is infinite in wisdom. His wisdom sketched the original design of all the systems that compose the universe; all the glory that covers the heavens; all the life that has emanated from his power and love; all the successions of the seasons; all the regularity that pervades the laws of nature; all the connexion which subsists between cause and effect; all the revolutions of the uncounted systems of the heavenly world; all the blessedness and glory revealed in the vast plan of the redemption and salvation of a perishing world; and all that relates to the endless destiny of man. No accident is unprovided for; no event can delay its operations; no opposition can defeat its purposes. Blessed be the name of the Lord. "The wisdom that is from above, is first pure, then peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy."

God is infinite in power. All nature reveals the vastness, the almightiness of that power, from which a peopled universe originated; by which countless millions of creatures are constantly preserved. The extended plain, the lofty mountain, the flowing stream, the broad, majestic ocean, constantly restrained by his mighty energy; man, with his diversified and noble powers; beast, bird, insect, fish, and every living thing inhabiting the universe, all speak forth the omnipotence of divine power.

But when we look aloft with an astronomic eye, to the boundless concave of heaven; where sparkling worlds beam in fadeless splendor; where millions on millions of suns, moons, planets and systems majestically, harmoniously and eternally roll at the divine command, "all eloquent with life," all destined to a glorious end; we are struck with profound admiration, with nameless awe at the sublimity of almighty power! We perceive "there is no power but of God"—that no hand can prevail against him.

God is infinite in love. Summing up the supreme excellencies of the Father of mercies, an Apostle has said, "God is love." His love is written in flaming characters on all his works. It fills the universe with joy, and beams forth in everlasting splendor throughout all the heavenly world. "The Lord is good to all and his tender mercies are over all his works. All thy works shall praise thee O Lord, and thy saints shall bless thee." His love originated all life, preserves all created beings, provides for the salvation of all mankind, produces all the love that is cherished towards him, forms the broad, immovable foundation of universal, eternal gratitude and joy, and will everlastingly constitute the supreme felicity and unfading glory of the celestial world. God's love encircles the universe, is stronger than death, unchangeable as his own nature, unbounded as infinity, and endless as the ages of eternity. O! who can behold a boundless display of supreme and infinite excellence without love, adoration, and the sincere homage of the soul? "Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord."

"The glittering heavens refulgent glow,
And sparkling spheres of golden light
Jehovah's works and glory show,
By burning day and gentle night.
In silence through the vast profound,
They move their orbs of fire on high,
Nor speech, nor word, nor answering sound,
Is heard upon the tranquil sky:
Yet to the earth's remotest bar,
Their burning glory all is known;
Their living light has sparkled far,
And on th' attentive silence shone.
God, 'mid their shining legions, rears
A tent where burns the radiant sun;
As, like a bridegroom bright, appears
The monarch on his course begun.
From end to end of azure heaven,
He holds his fiery path along,
To all his circling heat is given,
His radiance flames the spheres among.
By sunny ray, and starry throne,
The wonders of our mighty Lord,
To man's attentive heart are known,
Bright as the promise of his word."

4. All flesh shall worship the true God. The Creator evidently did not speak into being a world of intelligence, to increase his own happiness, for that happiness was never deficient; that happiness always was and always will be, independent, perfect, infinite. Why, then, did God create mankind, instead of allowing them to rest in the endless night of oblivion, unconsciousness, non-existence? Surely he possessed both the right and the power to create, or not, as he chose. Surely man could have given no offence till he existed. Surely God was not ignorant of all that relates to human character or destiny. Surely the Almighty was not making any doubtful experiment, the result of which, was out of his own sight. I therefore, again ask why did he create? He created to bless, to render his creatures happy by the bestowment of his own paternal favors. No other answer is compatible with all the perfections of God—all the dispensations of his Providence—all the instructions of his word.

He must have created without any design; with an evil design, or, with a good design. Perfect intelligence can not act without design. Perfect goodness can not act with an evil design; and perfect goodness always acts with a good design. Existence is, therefore, on the whole, a blessing to every creature of God; otherwise it would never have been bestowed. God possesses the means of rendering every rational being endlessly holy and happy. This was his design in creation. This is the grand object of revelation. This is to be effected by the reconciliation of all things to himself through Jesus Christ. This is the highest end of rational existence, and all that renders it truly desirable. This is to be accomplished by universally inspiring the spirit of true devotion; for "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." This will completely and triumphantly fulfil our text; "O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come;" unto thee shall all created intelligences prostrate their purified souls in solemn and delightful homage, adoration and praise, in the empyrean climes of never ending bliss, in the bright, beautiful and glorious regions of unclouded and endless day.

For this splendid vision, which crowns the moral universe with imperishable glory, we are indebted to the revelation of God. Aside from that revelation, no satisfactory light dawns on the benighted pathway of mortals, or triumphantly shines beyond the dreary night of the grave.

Now, thousands and thousands of our guilty race know not God, possess no relish for his worship, disregard his law, despise his truth and grace, oppose his goodness, and madly rush onward in the broad road to destruction; the destruction of all that constitutes the true honor and enjoyment of man. O how consolatory is it to the true disciple of Jesus, who loves the worship of God, to believe that Almighty grace shall do away all unbelief, sorrow, sin, and death; produce universal reconciliation, obedience, holiness and joy; fill the moral universe with pure delight that fadeth not away, and cause "all flesh" to come unto God and worship him in spirit and in truth! This is required by the promise, the oath, the word, the truth of God. "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee." All the families, all the nations, all the kindreds of the earth are promised—positively and unconditionally promised, a blessing in the name of the Son of God; and this promise is sealed with the oath of the Lord.

By his ancient prophet, the Lord says, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth, for I am God and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength; to him shall come, and all that are incensed against him shall be ashamed."

Speaking of the blessed Redeemer, an Apostle says, "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." Amen! A redeemed universe worshipping God in the beauty of holiness; every knee bowing in humble adoration; every tongue confessing that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father. It is enough—our souls' best desires are fully satisfied. Let all people say, Amen!

"Round planets wander moons;
Planets round suns;
The armies of the suns do wander
Round a vaster sun,

Our Father who art in heaven,
In all these worlds illumining and illumined,
Dwell spirits, in powers unequal, and in forms;
But all believe in God, in God rejoice.
'Hallowed be thy name.'
He, the high exalted One,
Who alone can wholly know himself,
Wholly in himself rejoice,
Formed the proposed design
For the bliss of all who inhabit his worlds.
'For us may thy kingdom come.'
Well for them, that he, not they,
Ordered the present for them, and the future;
Well for them, well;
Well, too, for us!
'Thy will be done
On earth, as it is in heaven.'
He lifts with the stalk the ear on high;
Ripens the golden apple, the purple grape;
Feeds on the hillock the lamb, the roe in the forest,
And yet his thunder rolls along;
And the hail-stone destroyeth
On the stalk, on the branch, on the hill, and in the forest.
'Give us this day our daily bread.'
Can it be, that high o'er the thunder's path,
Sinners too, and mortals exist?
That there the friend is changed to a foe?
And friends in death's division part?
'Forgive us our guilt,
As we forgive our debtors.'
Various paths conduct to the lofty end,
On to felicity.
Some of them bend through solitudes,
Yet even in them, there gushes a spring of joy,
And the thirsty refreshes.
'Lead us not into temptation,
But deliver us from evil.'
Worship to thee, by whom the vaster sun,
With suns, and planets, and moons, was surrounded,
Who spirits created;
Their happiness ordered;
The ear doth uplift,
Who commandeth death,
To the end through solitudes leadeth, refreshing the wanderer,
Worship to thee!
'For thine is the power and the kingdom,
And the glory! Amen.'

5. I shall state some of the reasons for the erection of this house of worship. 1st. It was erected that we may enjoy the richest intellectual and social blessings, which the Almighty has been pleased to bestow upon sinful man in this changeable world of care and want; blessings, the right to enjoy which, is providentially guaranteed to us, in common with all the citizens of our free and happy country, by the most excellent constitution under which we live; blessings connected with the unmolested worship of that God in "whom we live, move and have our being," according to the dictates of our consciences. A large and respectable portion of this community do not believe the Almighty is either partial or cruel; or that he is clothed in the habiliments of immortal vengeance; or that he will hurl the thunder-bolts of endless wrath on millions and millions of our guilty race: yet they believe in God, in the mission of his Son, in the salvation of the world, and the importance of maintaining good works, and promoting virtue and peace. All such will be accommodated in this house of worship.

2d. It was erected that we may be instrumental in redeeming our fellow creatures from the bondage of ancient human traditions and superstitions; which, though they may possess some good qualities and do some good, have no power to satisfy the enlarged desires of the benevolent soul. All the best and purest feelings of all holy beings throughout the universe, are concentrated in one ardent wish, one fervent prayer, that virtue and holiness, purity and happiness may be universal; that the knowledge and glory of God may everlastingly crown creation with joy. But why molest others, if they are satisfied? Because it is our duty, in a rational, consistent and decent manner, to molest all who are in the mad career of folly, error or crime. Why had Jesus compassion on the ignorant and those that are out of the way? Why did he make a single effort for the salvation of the world? Because he felt a deep interest in their welfare. If the doctrines of barbarism and partiality have no soul satisfying, no saving power; if they possess an influence positively deleterious and destructive; and those whom we are bound to love are oppressed and afflicted with them, let us give them the knowledge of something better if possible.

3. This house was erected, that as instruments in the hand of the Lord, we may shed the beams of heavenly light, knowledge and truth throughout this community; that all may be instructed in the law of the Lord, in the gospel of his Son; that parents may discharge the duty they owe their children, to train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; that if any thoughtless, inconsiderate, obstinate and headstrong youth should hereafter shut his eyes against the eternal distinction which exists between good and evil; cherish no respect for age, wisdom, experience or knowledge; set parental authority at defiance; despise the laws of God and man; form early habits of vice and persist in the way of sin and crime; yield to an ardent imagination without judgment, and float on the tide of existence under the influence of unguided, licentious and selfish passions, till he has blasted every reasonable parental hope; made shipwreck of virtue and happiness; clothed himself with infamy and shame, and wrung his soul with agony, the deep agony of guilt that no words can fully describe, he shall not be able to say, "Alas! I have never had the means and opportunity of instruction in morality and religion; I have not had suitable examples in the practice of virtue;" or exclaim in the bitterness of his soul,

"No mother's care.

Shielded my infant innocence with prayer;
No father's guardian hand my youth maintained,
Call'd forth my virtues, or from vice restrained."

In short, this house was erected for all the purposes of social and religious worship; and neither cold and heartless unbelief, nor angry and spiteful bigotry, nor wickedness of any description, will find the least countenance or encouragement in the labors or duties of this place. May the stated and faithful worship of the Lord hereafter to be performed in this house, be rational and consistent, spiritual and edifying, solemn and devout to the effectual up-building of this part of the Zion of our God.

The Profession of Belief adopted by our denomination thirty-six years since, and which continues unaltered amongst us, is the following:

1. We believe that the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contains a revelation of the character of God, and of the duty, interest and final destination of mankind.

2. We believe there is one God, whose nature is love, revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.

3. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected; and that believers ought to maintain order, and practice good works, for these things are good and profitable unto men."

With these views we sincerely worship God; these views we are happy to have others receive, but we neither expect nor wish all who meet to worship with us to adopt or profess these views, unless they are so happy as to perceive the evidence of their truth; for this house is designed as a house of prayer for all people, whose convenience or inclination may prompt them to meet here to worship in the name of the Lord. Amen.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXXII.

John xx: 23. "Whosoever sins ye remit," etc.

The apostles received from our Lord the doctrine of reconciliation. They who believed on the Son of God in consequence of their preaching had their sins remitted, or forgiven, and they who would not believe were declared to lie under condemnation, or to retain their sins. Hence our Saviour says, "He that believeth shall be saved and he that believeth not shall be damned," or, condemned, as the meaning is.

This passage therefore gives no countenance to the absurd doctrine that man has power to forgive sin. For a clear exposition of this, see Clark's commentary on Matthew xvi: 19, and xviii: 18.

Dr. Lightfoot supposes that the power of life and death, and the power of delivering over to the adversary, which was granted to the apostles, is here referred to; but if this be so it was a power which the primitive apostles alone possessed, and never was delegated to their successors as some pretend.

John xx: 28. "And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God."

These words are usually understood as a confession, but Beza says, that "they are an exclamation—My Lord and my God how great is thy power." And Wakefield says, "the original words are in the vocative case, and signify a note of exclamation or surprise." See also Newcomb's Translation—Imp. Version—Kneeland—and for examples of the use of such words see Matthew xi: 26. Acts i: 20. Eph. i: 19, 20. See also Whitby's last thoughts, 2d edition, p. 78.

Matthew iv: 8. "And sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world," etc.

This scene must necessarily have passed in a vision and not in reality. For we must know that there is not any mountain from which all the kingdoms of the earth, and still less the glory of them—i. e. their riches, power and splendor—could be seen. It is possible, and not at all improbable, that nothing more is meant by this account, than that certain evil suggestions occurred to our Lord's own mind upon his being declared to be the Son of God, and after having received divine communications to qualify him for his office; and if he were a man, it is impossible but such thoughts as these must have occurred to his mind though from a principle of piety he rejected them. Let it not be said that this is degrading his character, for so far from this it adds to his virtue, in that he did not give way to temptation. We read that "he was tempted in all points as we are, yet without sin." Indeed the whole scene proves that Jesus was properly a man, exposed to the same temptations with other men, and liable to be influenced by them, and that he was neither God nor any superior being, the maker of the world and all things under God. For what would the offer of the kingdoms of this world have been to such a being as this. And besides, who has them in his possession to give? Not an evil, malicious, and wicked being as the devil is supposed to be, surely.

John i: 30. "After me cometh a man who is preferred before me."

It is evident from this that John the Baptist had no idea of Jesus being any other than a man, and that he was so termed by the divine Being from whom he received his mission—"a man," says St. Peter "approved of God." See Acts ii.

ADDRESSES.

1. To the Society.—Christian friends, and fellow-citizens, whose means and exertions have been united in the erection of this commodious house for public worship, whose presence in the solemn and delightful services of this day, has sanctioned its consecration to the pure worship of the true God—permit me to express my felicitations on the completion of this noble work.

Your exertions in defence of the Gospel of universal reconciliation have been fortunately called out by attempts of its enemies to overthrow it. Those exertions have thus far been crowned with complete success. Throughout this whole region of country round about, a more convenient house for public worship, including its appendages of a spacious and beautiful public common and ample sheds is not to be found.

Great credit is unquestionably due to the contributors for the work, without whose assistance it could not have been accomplished; to the building committee by whom it was planned, designed and directed; and to the builders, whose diligence and skill, with some very small exceptions, have scarcely been surpassed in any work of the kind. But "except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it."

Nearly twenty years since, in the early part of my ministry, when I first passed this street, I had no reason to expect ever to see what my eyes now behold. Universalism, then comparatively but little known and every where spoken against, has now gained a rank among the most respectable theories of Christianity; is extensively countenanced and believed by the wise, the learned and the good.

This is the second valuable house of worship in this county, owned exclusively by Universalists, and erected by them during my ministry with them. "This is the Lord's doing; it is marvelous in our eyes."

When I remember that I was providentially detained in this place, contrary to all human calculation or expectation, to defend and build up the sacred cause of Gospel truth and grace; I humbly and thankfully acknowledge the hand of the Lord, in the part I have been enabled to take in this extensive work of public utility; in the erection of this noble edifice for the worship of God.

In this community, Universalism has been proclaimed, established and defended. Encountering difficulties and removing obstacles, you have diligently toiled up to the commanding eminence you now possess. You are now like a city set on a hill whose light can not be hid. The powerful and dangerous current of popularity now runs strong in your favor. Be careful that you are not corrupted by that current. Be careful to preserve humility and produce all the fruits of the spirit of God. Be careful to illustrate the superior excellence of your doctrine by the practice of universal virtue, that even your enemies may be at peace with you.

Remember that your elegant house of worship will be useless to you, unless you meet in it to worship God in spirit and in truth. Remember that the most faithful exertions of a minister of righteousness will fail to sustain the cause of God in any community, unless aided, supported and countenanced by his friends; especially by their presence in the house of worship. I do not ask you to be fanatics, or to neglect the necessary business and duties of life to attend a great number of religious meetings. One part of a command of God is as sacred as another part of the same command. Ordinarily it is as necessary to labor six days, as to rest from that labor on the seventh, and devote that rest from worldly cares to spiritual improvement.

See that you appoint suitable officers—that they perform their duties—and that all your social obligations are faithfully discharged. Preserve the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.

Remember that in a free community, possessing enlarged and enlightened views, the voice of the majority is the supreme law of that community; and therefore no one can set up his wish or will in opposition to that law, without a violation of the important obligations he is under to those with whom he stands connected.

Remember that every individual is of importance in the social relation, and if every individual in a society, (waiting for somebody else to bear its necessary burdens,) neglects to attend to its interests; those interests will speedily run to ruin, and that society will be clothed in the garments of shame!

You have begun a glorious work in this community; let there be no shrinking from due responsibility. Jesus said, "No man having put his hand to the plough and looking back is fit for the kingdom of God."

If any one who is growing richer every year he lives, richer in this world's treasure, will do nothing for the support of this now flourishing society, for no other reason than because he can not afford the expense; let him ask himself whether he is not annually laying out more expense, than is required in this case, on less valuable objects. Let him also remember, the time will come, and that too, speedily, when he must and will die, and leave all his worldly treasures, on which his heart is so much set; he knows not to whom. Can it be that there is a single individual in this society, who is fully determined at all hazards, and at all sacrifices, to scrape together a pile of dollars, large enough to ruin all his heirs when he is dead and gone? The Lord forbid. I do not mean that wealth is necessarily a curse; for it is not; though it may be converted to a curse, and it always is, when idolized. The worship of money is one (certainly not the only one) of the most prevalent and alarming sins of this age. There are higher, nobler, purer, more exalted, more refined, more excellent purposes of rational existence, than merely to gather those riches, which can never satisfy the wants of a reasonable soul, and which often take to themselves wings and fly away beyond our reach.

I do most earnestly entreat you, my Christian friends, to remember that the spirit of devotion is the very soul of a religious society. Without that spirit it presents a form without a reality, a shadow without a substance. O! cherish, fondly and ardently cherish that divinely peaceful spirit!

If you would render your children and the rising generation prosperous and happy even in this world; if you would save them from the whirlpool of folly, the vortex of crime, the abyss of infamy and misery; strive to make them intelligent, moral, virtuous, and truly religious.

In the name of all that is sacred I entreat you to remember, that under God, it now depends on you to say whether the pure Gospel of universal love shall long be dispensed from this pulpit; whether these consecrated walls shall resound with the language of cursing and bitterness, of endless death, hell and damnation; or whether this beautiful house shall be abandoned to utter desolation; become a standing monument of your disgrace; or be inhabited only by moles and bats!

O Lord God of Hosts! Whether I shall be permitted to continue to share in the social privileges of this society, or am destined to labor in some other portion of thy vineyard; whether I am to live or die; let thy choicest blessings forever rest upon this place and this people! And when my bones shall rest in death; when my body shall lie mouldering in the cold and silent grave; when this mortal frame shall be clothed in the garments of immortality; when eternal realities shall dawn on my enraptured vision; may a long succession of generations heartily worship thee in this place! And may thy children be successively removed from thy service in this earthly tabernacle, to thy pure worship in that building of God, that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

2. To the Choir.—How delightful is that religious service, in which the noble powers of the human voice, constitute the vehicle by which the soul seems to ascend in melody to God! To have given so much pleasure to the hearers, you must have had all the advantages of art, or must have sung under the influence of inspiration. In behalf of this worshipping congregation, I return you sincere thanks for the part you have so effectually taken in the services of this occasion. Sacred music well executed, possesses attractions calculated to lead to the practice of virtue, and prepares the way for the joys of heavenly love. If it is so pleasant to chant the praises of God in his earthly courts, surrounded by all the circumstances of mortality; what extacies shall fill the soul when a redeemed and congregated universe, shall join the celestial choir above, lift their voices in immortal strains, and sing the ceaseless praises of the God of universal love!

"Let all the powers below, above,
In one harmonious anthem raise,
The honors of the God of love,
And fill the universe with praise."

3. To the Congregation.—Fellow-Citizens—All ages, classes and conditions, now congregated in the worship of God, now capable of activity in all the cares and duties of a transient life; whose swelling and mingling emotions of love and gratitude to God, and benevolence to man, on this joyful occasion, exceed the power of language to describe; whose participation in these gratifying services can never be effaced from your memories; will soon disappear from the busy scenes of this life, and go to swell the vast congregation of the dead! O! how fleeting are the purest joys of mortality! O! what an impressive lesson is thus furnished to sinful man! What is the amount of all the instructions of divine wisdom? "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter"—let it be imperishably impressed on every mind, "Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man." By the faithful observance of these plain and simple rules of life, which are sanctioned by reason and propriety, as well as by divine authority; your lives will pass pleasantly and usefully along the rapid current of time, and you will be prepared to take your final departure from all the scenery of mortal life in peace, and in the full assurance of the never-changing protection of the God of all grace.

"And when nature's temple, this shadow of glory,
Whose lamps are the stars, and whose curtains the skies,
Shall pass and dissolve as a dream or a story,
Then we, from its ruins, eternal shall rise."

And in the bright and beautiful regions of unclouded celestial day, a redeemed universe, all for whom a Saviour died, shall meet in one holy, triumphant, indissoluble congregation, to praise, adore, and enjoy God, world without end, which may He graciously grant in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ. Amen.

DEDICATION.

Now, to the devout worship of Almighty God we solemnly dedicate this house. May it be none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven. Here may the word of truth, life, peace, and salvation, be faithfully dispensed.—Here may humble prayers from contrite hearts ascend like morning incense before the throne of eternal mercy. Here may ministering servants, commend themselves to every man's conscience, and declare the whole counsel of God. Here may the youth be instructed, the middle aged directed in every duty, the aged comforted on the borders of eternity, the miserable consoled in affliction, the unbelieving brought to the enjoyment of the Gospel, and all classes enlightened with the knowledge of eternal truth. Here may successive generations worship God in the beauty of holiness.

O! thou, who dwellest not in temples made with hands, whom the heaven of heavens can not contain! "Let, I beseech thee, thine eyes be open, and let thine ears be attuned to the prayer that is made in this place. Now, therefore, arise, O Lord God, into thy resting place, thou and the ark of thy strength; let thy priests, O Lord God, be clothed with salvation, and let thy saints rejoice in goodness." "Praise waiteth for thee, O God," in this temple of "Zion, and here shall the solemn vow be performed. O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come," and rapturously exclaim, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory;" and the whole moral universe shall bend in humble and everlasting adoration before his throne of light and glory, in the peaceful realms of never-ending purity and bliss!

"To thee, whose temple is all space,
Whose altar, earth, sea, skies,
One chorus let all beings raise,
All nature's incense rise."

O! God—

"Thou from primeval nothingness didst call,
First, chaos; then, existence—Lord, on thee,
Eternity had its foundation: all
Sprang forth from thee: of light, joy, harmony,
Sole origin—all life, all beauty thine.
Thy word created all, and doth create;
Thy splendor fills all space with rays divine,
Thou art, and wert, and shalt be glorious, great;
Life-giving, life-sustaining Potentate."

Unto thee be ascribed immortal honors, through the Redeemer's name. AMEN.

ESSAYS ON WAR. NO. XIII.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"For I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help us against the enemy in the way: because we had spoken unto the king, saying, The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him; but his power and his wrath is against all them that forsake him. So we fasted, and besought our God for this; and he was entreated of us." EZRA.

We have in our former numbers gone over the causes and the results of war. We now propose to meet some of the objections, beginning first with the Old Testament, and then turning to the gospel dispensation, and closing with a refutation of those objections which are the most popular, but which are not drawn from either of the above sources. But the reader can only expect a limited view of the whole ground. It is much easier to present objections than to answer them.*

We are inclined very much to the opinion that the popular view of the wars of the Old Testament is erroneous. We have supposed that the doctrine of utter extermination is taught there. But a more careful examination must convince any one that this was not the case. True, the language is strong, but then the whole ground must be gone over in order to have a fair view. We will now refer to the passages containing the leading directions as to the disposal of the Canaanites, Exod. xxiii: 23-33. xxxiv: 11. Deut. vii: 16-25. ix: 3. xxxi: 3-5. The terms here, are, "destroy," "drive out," "consume," "utterly overthrow," "put out," "dispossess them." The Hebrew word Horam signifies national, as well as individual destruction; political existence, equally with personal; the destruction of governmental organization equally with the lives of the subjects. But if we interpret the words, "consume," "destroy," etc., what meaning shall we give to the expressions "drive out before thee," "cast out before thee," etc.? A few passages may enable the reader to understand the whole subject: "I will destroy all the people to whom thou shalt come, and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee." Exod. xxiii: 27. Here, "all their enemies" were to "turn their backs," and "all the people" to be "destroyed." "Does this mean," says a writer, who is disposed, however, to display more wit than suits the gravity of the writer or the subject, "that God would let all their enemies escape, but kill all their friends, or that he would first kill, 'all the people,' and THEN make them turn their backs in flight, an army of runaway corpses!" The word "backs," is in the original, "necks." The passage may mean subjection as tributaries; that is, their civil polity, state organization and political existence should be destroyed; in a word, they should become denationalised. If utter extermination was commanded, then what mean all those benevolent provisions relative to the treatment of native residents and sojourners? "The stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself." See Numb. xxxv: 15. Lev. xix: 9. 10. Exod. xx: 10. The Israelites did not understand individual destruction to be required. If so, then Joshua disobeyed in every instance; for at his death, they still dwelt among the Canaanites. Judges i: 5. Again, we are certain that where the offer of peace was accepted the inhabitants became tributaries. Deut. xx: 10, 11. But this part of our subject is too extensive to be followed out. We have only, therefore presented a mere outline, and, after presenting a very concise paragraph from a critical writer, we shall leave the reader to follow out the subject at his leisure. "The great design of God seems to have been to transfer the territory of the Canaanites to the Israelites, and along with it, absolute sovereignty in every respect; to annihilate their political organization, civil polity, jurisprudence, and their system of religion, with all its rites and appendages; and to substitute therefor, a pure theocracy administered by Jehovah, with the Israelites as his representatives and agents. Those who resisted the execution of Jehovah's purpose were to be killed, while those who quietly submitted to it were to be spared. All had the choice of these alternatives, either free egress out of the land, or acquiescence in the decree, with life and residence as tributaries under the protection of the government; or resistance to the execution of the decree with death. 'And it shall come to pass if they will diligently learn the ways of my people, to swear by my name, the Lord liveth, as they taught my people to swear by Baal: then shall they be built up in the midst of my people.'"

THE LOVE OF GOD.

Perhaps there is no subject that stands connected with the evidences of Christianity, to which allusion is more frequently made, both from the pulpit and the press, than "the love of God;" and more especially do we find this to be the case among those who are the true and the sincere advocates of God's impartial goodness. Now I apprehend that the reason why this is so, is because you may search in vain, for a subject among those who would limit the great I AM, that will afford such ample satisfaction, and useful reflection—such profound meditation and sublimity of thought, for the sincere and devout believers in the divine authenticity of revealed truth, while contemplating upon the perfections of infinite wisdom, goodness and almighty power—as the love of God.

If there is any apology due for the frequent allusion that is made to this heart cheering and soul inspiring subject, it may be found in the fact that its fountain is inexhaustible. You may eulogize upon the merits of the wisdom and goodness of God—admire the beauty, the order, the harmony, and the never varying regularity of the revolving seasons, and "the rolling year" which "is full of" God—yea you may expatiate with wonder and admiration upon the mystery of the unsearchable ways of Omnipotent power, and dwell with pleasure and delight while you contemplate the ten thousand demonstrations of mercy and grace, which were exhibited and exemplified in the life and character of Jesus Christ, and in his Gospel; and when you have done all this and much more, you will fall infinitely short of comprehending any thing more than that which was adopted by the Apostle in the single phrase, "God is love."

Oh! how vast the theme! how sublime the contemplation! Surely there is no subject which the mind can grasp, or the heart conceive, that is so well calculated to soothe the anguished heart, remove the "aching void," reclaim the wandering prodigal, and satisfy the unyielding thirst for life and immortality, as to have a full and perfect confidence in the unchanging love and goodness of God our heavenly Parent. For to believe with the prophet, that "we have all one Father, and that one God hath created us;" to reflect that it is by him that we live, move, and have our being, and to realize, that our present and future existence is, and will continue to be, the result of a Being whose name, whose nature, and whose very essence is love, fills the soul with love and adoration; and while the better faculties of the mind become absorbed in the contemplation of so grand and glorious a subject, you can give the hearty response to the exclamation of the poet,

"Father, and shall we ever live
At this poor dying rate,
Our love so faint, so cold to thee,
And thine to us so great."

In the language of St. Paul, you may exclaim, "For I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

MARIUS.

Hamilton, N. Y.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

"May God bless the truth which has been spoken consistent with his will, and save you all, is my prayer for Christ's sake."

The above is a prayer, which was offered as the closing words of a sermon preached not long since, to a congregation of which the writer was a member; and that too, by a man who, in the course of his sermon, had not been over nice in the choice of the epithets which he had applied to those who advocate the doctrine of God's impartial love for his creatures. Poor man—I could not help exclaiming within—you are in a sad dilemma; you have been, since you took your text, almost incessantly engaged in trying to disprove a doctrine, for which your better feelings constrain you in the end to pray!

Now I wonder if this is not the condition of nine tenths of the opposers of Universalism. And if it is, I wonder if they have never read Rom. xiv: 23, where Paul says, "whatsoever is not of faith is sin." If they have not, I advise those under whose eye this may come, to read the word of God from Genesis to Revelation, and see whether they find such odious epithets as Atheist, Infidel, as profusely heaped on those who trust in the living God as the Saviour of all men, as they do in the writings of some who are better acquainted with such language than they are with their Bibles. Peradventure they may derive some information on the subject, that will enable them to exclaim with the apostle, "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have men all to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." When will men learn to think of our heavenly Father as they ought, and to know that he is not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent, but that he is able to purify and save the vilest of the vile, and bring to pass that which is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory"?

WATER.

Water is a figure of divine truth. Hence Jesus said to the woman of Samaria, "Whosoever drinketh of this water," (in Jacob's well,) "shall thirst again; but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."—John iv: 13, 14. As a poet has sweetly said—

"Thou art the Life—the blessed Well,
With living waters gushing o'er,
Which those who drink, shall ever dwell
Where sin and thirst are known no more;
Thou art the mystic pillar given,
Our lamp by night, our light by day,
Thou art the sacred bread from heaven—
Thou art the Life, the Truth, the Way."

This truth, thus prefigured, will cure souls of the mortal thirst of sin and error. The Revelator has recorded the beautiful promise, "I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely."—Rev. xxi: 6. The water of truth is pure, because John declares that the "pure river of water of life," proceeds "out of the throne of God and the Lamb."—Rev. xxii: 1. Christ affirms that whosoever drinks of this water, "shall never thirst." And, also, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."—John xii: 32. And when the world shall be drawn to the Saviour, will he not give the water of truth to all its members freely?—and will they not receive it?—and receiving it, will they thirst again?

That the water of truth is sufficient for all people, is evident from Ezekiel's vision of the holy waters, which emblemize the rise, progress and extent of truth.—When the individual who was showing the holy waters to Ezekiel, brought him forth, "he," says the prophet, "measured a thousand cubits, and he brought me through the waters; and the waters were to the ankles." Ezek. xlvi: 3. This depth of the waters of truth, corresponds with the beginning of the Gospel, when comparatively but few came to Christ to have their moral thirst quenched. "Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through the waters; the waters were to the knees. Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through; the waters were to the loins."—Vs. 4. This increase of the waters of truth, corresponds with the accumulating number of believers in all ages. The next view is most glorious. "Afterward he measured a thousand; and it was a river that I could not pass over; for the waters were risen; waters to swim in; a river that could not be passed over."—Vs. 5. Here the waters of truth are increased to meet the wants of the world—for the love of God, more boundless, shoreless and extensive than the ocean, has poured out the waters of salvation without measure, that when Christ shall have saved "his people from their sins," God "may be all in all."—

"His own soft hand shall wipe the tears
From every weeping eye;
And pains, and groans, and griefs, and fears,
And death itself shall die."

Observe the effect of these waters. "Then said he unto me, these waters issue out towards the east country, and go down into the desert, and go into the sea; which being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed. And it shall come to pass, that every thing that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the waters shall come, shall live." Eze. xlvii: 8, 9. The holy waters are to purify the sea. Hear what Isaiah says—"But the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it can not rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt." Isa. lvii: 20,

This is the impure sea—sin poisons man's happiness—the waters of truth flow into the sea of sin, bearing adequate punishment to each sinner, and when the sea is purged, and sinners are subdued and reformed, then the waters of truth, filling their souls with praise, cause them to confess, that in the Lord have they righteousness and strength. Then shall come to pass the great promise made to Abraham, that in his seed, (Christ,) shall all the families, kindreds and nations of the earth be blessed.

REV. M. H. SMITH.

I have incidentally given a passing notice of the movements of this man, thinking that would be sufficient. But his movements since then have been so singular, and our opponents seem so anxious to make capital out of him, that it will probably interest many to hear them narrated. Be it remembered that Mr. Smith once before renounced Universalism, and after several days declared himself unconscious of all that had occurred, and was received back again. Be it remembered, also, that he has confessed himself guilty of "flagrant and repeated falsehoods," and of writing an anonymous letter to injure a brother in the ministry; and was under discipline for these acts just before he withdrew from our fellowship.

After leaving the society in Salem, he attempted to get up an independent society of believers in universal salvation, and failed—to join the Unitarians and failed—and then he went over to the Calvinistic Congregationalists, and on June 3d, he renounced Universalism, giving his reasons therefor, in the North church in Salem. So far I have condensed the statements. Br. Everett, of the Connecticut Universalist, says in his statement—and he was on the ground at the time.

"On Thursday evening an extra meeting of the Orthodox Association was held, for the purpose of examining the state of Mr. Smith's mind; at which it was, with entire unanimity, resolved, that such were the evidences of the genuineness of his conversion, that all the rules ordinarily observed by that denomination should, in this instance, be dispensed with, and that he should, as soon as he could be admitted into some one of their churches, be licensed as a preacher of their order. That no time might be lost, a special meeting of the members of the Rev. Mr. Session's church was called, and held on Friday evening; when it was resolved, that all their rules should be dispensed with, and that Mr. Smith should be admitted as a member of that church, on the morning of the next Sabbath, so that he might preach in the afternoon of that day, and in the evening, clothed with his sacerdotal honors, repeat the discourse delivered by him on the previous Wednesday!"

Well—the Sunday came, and Mr. Smith was among the missing. It appeared on the next day, that he left Salem early on Sunday, and went on foot to his father's house, in Boston—professes unconsciousness (!) of his doing so, till his arrival in Boston, but never sent word to his wife and friends where he was, after he became conscious. The man's veracity is so doubtful, and his insanity is so methodical and convenient, that we know not what to think of the affair. The Congregationalists, however, have had him examined by physicians, who testify that he is now sound in mind, and by their clergy he is pronounced sound in faith, so that it is very probable they will keep him among them as a convenient person to preach against Universalism and Universalists. They may live to rue the day—for certain it is, we have reason to rejoice at our riddance.

Mr. Smith's renunciation was replied to in Salem, by Br. Everett, and has since been published in pamphlet form for circulation. It holds up Mr. Smith's moral character in this affair, in no enviable light, and exhibits the want of candor and of fulness in the arguments used by him to disprove Universalism, and to slander the character of Universalists. If Mr. Smith used the arguments attributed to him, he has shown plainly his conviction that he can not refute the faith he now renounces; for he is careful to select only a distorted and partial view, in some cases, of our arguments and testimony.

Since the above, he has delivered his renunciation in Beverly, and is now preaching among our opposers.—Time will show the results of this singular movement on the part of Mr. Smith and his new friends.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

The Glad Tidings, published in Akron, Ohio, is now Edited by Brs. S. A. Davis, and E. R. Crocker; Br. Doolittle having retired, and Br. Crocker, formerly of Elizabethtown, Va., taken his place.

The Evangelical Universalist has changed its name to Southern Evangelist, and assumed the folio instead of the quarto form. It is now a large sheet, Edited by Br. P. Brownson, of Macon, Geo., assisted by Br. Albert Case, of Charleston, S. C., and published in the former place at three dollars per annum in advance, or three dollars and fifty cents if not paid within three months.

The Star in the West will contain, during the present volume, a discussion between Br. Gurley, and Mr. Cribfield, the Editor of the Heretic Detector, a Campbellite paper. Mr. Cribfield has undertaken to prove Universalism to be no better than Deism. We would pity the man, but he is used to being beaten by Universalists, so needs no pity!

It is astonishing what a number of converts have lately been made from the Partialist ranks to Universalism.—During last Winter, about 200 were added to the Universalist Society in Cincinnati, Ohio, many of whom were recent converts from other churches; and since then the work seems going on among Partialist laymen and preachers on every side. Within two or three weeks past, we have read accounts of conversions of probably not less than 100 lay brethren and sisters, (not to enumerate several clergymen,) and by a letter received a few weeks ago, we were furnished with a list of some 20 more in the writer's own neighborhood. I venture to say that if we practised the plan pursued by our opposers, of publishing in our papers every converted Partialist, (as they do every converted Universalist, whether a real or a fictitious case!) we could give a weekly list of at least more than one hundred names, and all of them actual personages, with names, dates and places. Why the number of Partialist clergymen converted to Universalism, is greater than the number of lay converts made by all our opposers united from our ranks. We can prove this to be a sober fact, if they will give names, dates and places as we do in every case. Truly "Universalism is declining" rapidly—rapidly!

At the recent session of the Connecticut legislature, a bill abolishing capital punishment passed the lower house by a majority of 26 votes, but was passed by in the senate. This is very encouraging for the first trial.

Sunday school celebrations, exhibitions and excursions are becoming so numerous among our friends in Massachusetts, that we have not room to notice them in our news department.

The Merrimack River Association met in Manchester, N. H., and among other items, resolved that its preachers then present would preach to destitute friends in their vicinity on application, if the friends applying would pay the actual expenses.

The Southern Association met in Stratford, Conn., May 27th, and among other items, altered their Constitution so as to require every preacher and society to obtain its special fellowship, and to claim jurisdiction until they were released by regular dismissal signed by the Standing Clerk.

NEW PREACHERS.—Rev. Stephen Goodale, Baptist, formerly of East Randolph, and now of Tunbridge, Vt., an able preacher, sustaining a good moral and Christian character, has embraced and commenced preaching Universalism. Rev. Peter Runnels (or Reynolds), a Freewill Baptist preacher near Macon, Geo., has commenced preaching Universalism. He is a man of strong mind and good character. Br. Joseph Clark, late a Baptist, has commenced preaching in Washington county, Ohio. And Br. Walter Harriman, of Warner, N

H., having learned Universalism by a study of the Bible, has commenced preaching it. Dr. J. W. Ford, of Claremont, N. H., has resolved to devote himself hereafter to the ministry of reconciliation. A young man of good abilities and character, named Patterson, is pursuing his studies with Br. Marvin, and has commenced preaching the everlasting Gospel to good acceptance in the neighborhood of Duanesburg. Preachers are increasing, but not fast enough to meet the wants of our denomination in this and several other States. Let the young men press forward in their preparatory studies, and let our societies exert themselves to support well their preachers, and soon will our Zion increase and prosper beyond all former precedent.

Br. W. H. Griswold was ordained in North Reading, Mass., June 17th. Sermon by Br. A. C. Thomas. Br. George Proctor was ordained in Sterling, Mass., June 10th. Sermon by Br. T. J. Greenwood.

Br. C. S. Hussey has removed from Brooks to Newport, Me. Br. J. E. Burnham to West Scituate, Mass.

Br. A. Williams has left Chester, Vt., in consequence of ill health, and removed to Ellsburg, N. Y., where he wishes to be addressed in future.

Br. G. Noyes from Southbridge to Hyannis, Mass. J. G. Burt, to Orleans, Mass. Br. A. Pingree to Be fast, Me.

DEDICATIONS.—A new Universalist meeting house, (of brick, 36 by 40 feet,) was dedicated, May 28th, in Elkton, Md. Sermon by Br. I. D. Williamson. The new Universalist house in East Lexington, Mass., was dedicated, June 10th. Sermon by Br. A. C. Thomas. Br. E. G. Brooks, B. Whittemore, J. G. Adams, T. Whittemore, and L. Willis took parts in the services; and Br. H. Ballou preached in the afternoon.

Br. J. K. Ingalls was ordained in Southold, Long Island, June 17th. Sermon by Br. W. S. Balch.

The society in Louisville, Ky., have purchased an Episcopal meeting house, and are now prepared to sustain the preached word regularly.

The second Universalist Society in Cincinnati, Ohio, (called the First Restorationist Society,) have lately refitted their house of worship.

The First Universalist society, (Lombard street,) in Philadelphia, are prospering greatly under the pastoral labors of Br. A. Moore.

The Tract society in Lowell, Mass., are aiding greatly in prospering the cause in that city. A Mr. Blanchard has commenced a series of lectures against Universalism, to which Br. Thomas replies to crowded houses. The Trumpet says that "hundreds of converts" have been made, and that a third house, if one were now erected, would be filled with stated hearers.

THE UNITARIANS IN UTICA.

In the Utica Observer of June 30th, an article signed "W" appeared, praising very highly, and probably very justly, a sermon which had been delivered in the court house in this city on the preceding Sunday evening. The following is an extract from said article.

"The Rev. Mr. Lothrop, pastor of the Unitarian church in Brattle Square, Boston, preached a sermon last evening, (Sunday evening,) in our Academy to a large and highly respectable and intelligent audience. Application had been made by several of his friends to at least one of the Orthodox churches in our city, for the use of one of their pulpits for his accommodation, in order that all who had known him in boyhood, and his excellent father and family, long residents among us, should thus have an opportunity of hearing him. But no permission could be obtained on the ground that 'a minister whose religious creed denies as we conscientiously believe the fundamental doctrines of the sacred Scriptures, can not be admitted into our pulpit.'"

The refusal of the pulpit of one of our "Orthodox" churches for a stranger in good standing in his own denomination, and the virtual denial of the Christian name to that denomination, is truly discourteous and illiberal; and more especially so, as said denial was given to those who, it is believed, have always supported said "Orthodox" churches with their money, their countenance, their attendance and their influence.

But I am unwilling to have the question unanswered, why was not another church procured?—seeing there is at least one church in this city which professes some liberality. I wish therefore to examine the complaint here preferred.

There is a small, but in a worldly point of view, a very respectable number of Unitarians in this city.—They have no place of meeting, or preacher of their own denomination. And although the Universalists of this city reject all that the Unitarians deem peculiarly offensive in the systems termed Orthodox, and advocate and teach only what Unitarians deem truth, with the exception perhaps of a common and glorious destiny for all our race, yet very few of them stately, or even frequently, attend on our meetings. Nor is this all. Not only do they absent themselves from the only meetings in this city where the unity of God is expressly acknowledged, and prayer offered only to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; but they attend on, and bow in worship at, meetings where the trinity is acknowledged and taught, and where all prayers are expressly offered up to "God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost—three persons in one Godhead—the trinity in unity," etc. And to this trinitarian (and, in their estimation, idolatrous) worship, they lend the full influence of personal attendance and pecuniary support!

Nor is this done only in reference to the Universalist clergymen, who, at various times have officiated in this city. For on several occasions Brs. Skinner and Cook have exchanged desks with the venerable and Rev. Mr. Pierce, pastor of the Unitarian society in Trenton. This excellent man was neglected in like manner—the Unitarians generally going to worship, as usual, in the Presbyterian or Baptist churches, or to read the Trinitarian liturgy in the Episcopal church!

These are melancholy facts—facts which we deem so disgraceful (in a moral and religious point of view) to the otherwise estimable individuals guilty of this monstrous inconsistency, and spiritual cowardice, and virtual aiding and abetting of idolatry, that I sincerely wish I had it not in my power to record them—but facts which I solemnly feel bound to hold up before our Unitarian brethren at this time, that they may compare their conduct, with that complained of in our "Orthodox" brethren. Will they not look at it, fairly, candidly and seriously, for a few moments? What affinity of faith exists between them and the churches on which they attend, and whose meetings they support? What disagreement in sentiment is there between them and the Universalist church in this city? None—none whatever, as respects all that is important in the mode of God's existence, his character, and the character and nature of his government; the nature, character and operations of God's spirit; the nature, character and offices of Christ; the moral nature of man; and the character and general teachings of the Scriptures. They can not but know these facts—and yet in defiance of all consistency, of all conscientious feelings of pure devotion to God and faithfulness to his truth, they have countenanced and attended stately on, and supported the ministrations of a system "in which they have no more faith, nor as much faith, as in Mahomedanism." And after having thus extended its influence, and filled its coffers, and given it power and efficiency, they complain that its friends will not allow them to introduce one of their clergymen into its pulpits! What else could they expect? If they give error means and influence do they suppose that it will not use them in its own favor and defence? If they put a club into their opposer's hands, do not they expect that opposer to use it?

But I have not yet done with this complaint. There are some other facts which show some of these complainants to be as bigoted and illiberal as those of whom they complain—or else, to be more cowardly and false to their convictions of truth than even the foregoing facts prove them to be.

Last Fall or Summer, Dr. William E. Channing was in this vicinity, and a very great anxiety naturally existed to hear a man whose literary fame is not confined to this land alone, and whose eloquence has long been the theme of unqualified admiration and praise. It was understood that he would preach in Utica, if a church could be obtained for him—and some Universalists informed those who were endeavoring to procure a church for that purpose, that the Universalist church could doubtless be had by applying to the trustees. Yet, although no other church could be obtained, no application was made for our house, and consequently the Utica people lost the opportunity of hearing Dr. Channing! And now again, though no other church could be obtained for Mr. Lothrop, yet his friends would not apply for the Universalist church; although they must have known that in all probability it could have been obtained!!!

Would they court favor with the "Orthodox" by affecting equal horror with them for Universalism? I much doubt whether the Orthodox are not led by these samples of Unitarian moral courage and religious consistency to hold in greater contempt and in equal horror a system advocated by such friends.

To conclude—there are a few who call themselves Unitarians, who must be excepted, from the above statement—who have ever been consistent in profession, and in personal example and influence—who are free men, mentally, morally, socially and religiously. Such must man respect, and such does God approve. But those who would not apply for a church they could have obtained, and yet complain of being refused another church whose owners are conscientious believers in what these Unitarians deem idolatry, are in my opinion, entitled to far less credit for true liberality, or moral courage, or Christian consistency than those we term Partialists, and they, "the Orthodox." Br. Drew.—Br. Sadler is somewhere in Pennsylvania, or New-Jersey, if he has not gone to some other State since we last heard of him. His health was good when I saw him last; but whether he would be able to settle in Bangor, and remain there through the Fall and Winter, I can not say—I think not. A. B. G.

FAITH IN DEATH.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

Rich floods of glorious sunlight now allume the burnished west,
And piles of fleecy drapery hang o'er the ocean's breast;
Gorgeous with gold and purple, like the banners of old time,
When knights in tilt and tourney met, at the trumpeter's martial chime.

The evening breezes gently steal from the far western bowers,
And dallying with the silken leaves, and brightly blooming flowers,
Gull from their tiny incense-cups rich odors and perfume,
And through the open lattice, fling them o'er the sick one's room,

Blest ministers of heavenly love, like cherub bands they come,
To fan the fever'd brow of death, and woo the spirit home!
To hush each dark, bewildering fear, and from aerial wires,
Waken such thrilling strains as flow from seraph's lofty lyres.

The bright, warm rays of sunset play over the marble brow,
And tinge the pallid features with a faint unearthly glow;
The soft light through the crimson screen, seems as an angel's brush,
Striving to paint Death's ghastly face, with morning's rose-ate blush.

But oh! the spirit radiance that lights the fading eye,
Like the rainbow's brightest splendor when storm clouds veil the sky;
And list, the low, faint music of that much loved voice again, E'en from the dim vale's misty gloom it chants an angel's strain.

Death, death, where is thy victory, thou conqueror of kings?
Why should we fear to sleep beneath the shadow of thy wings?
Jesus, the mightier conqueror, hath rent thy mouldering crown,
And with immortal glory, gilds the horrors of thy frown.

See yonder through the pearly gates, how the rapt myriads throng,
Where the long line of harpers pour the ceaseless tide of song!
They bear the golden censers, filled with thankfulness and praise,
White o'er them the love-banners float in glory's dazzling blaze.

Earth's ransomed millions quench their thirst where truth's glad fountains spring,
And learn to tune the harp's soft wires, to Christ, the mighty King;
Who through dim vistas, taught our souls on the far shore to see
The living streams, the fadeless bowers, of immortality.

And soft as fall the evening shades upon the sylvan dell,
So closed upon that spirit's glance death's dark and fearful spell;
But joyously on faith's strong wing it dared the mystic way,
To seek in brighter realms above, the light of endless day.

ANECDOTE OF OLDEN TIME.

Mr. S——, a respectable and thrifty merchant of the last century, possessed of a great deal of natural shrewdness together with a tact of turning every circumstance to his own advantage. We have heard many anecdotes of him and among others the following, which perhaps, will better show off his peculiarities than a labored description. He kept a grocery store near Spring Hill, which like the grocery stores of that period, was fitted with a variety of notions; among other things, he was famous for the good quality of his cotton, an article, which at that time was very scarce and high. One day a customer from the country drove up to his door and inquired the price of cotton.

"Three and sixpence per pound," replied S——.
"Weigh me a dozen pounds," says the countryman, at the same time, stepping into the store with a large bag to put it in.

The cotton was weighed and put into the bag, and Mr. S—— stepped into the Counting Room to make a bill, leaving his customer busily engaged in tying it up.

Now it happened, there was a small lot of good looking cheese near the spot, and the countryman, though right from the land of milk and honey, could not resist the propensity to crib one of them. He accordingly took one up, and after looking about to see that none were observing him, slid it into the bag, which he immediately tied up, and patiently awaited the return of S——, who soon after came out and presented the bill, which the countryman paid.

Now Mr. S—— was one of the most polite men of the age, and, moreover, his quick eye had detected the abduction of a cheese. He was at no loss to account for its disappearance, and instantly prepared himself to act as circumstances might require. The countryman, after one or two unimportant observations, was preparing to depart. S——, who we before observed was excessively polite, would by no means suffer him to carry his own bundle, but offered his services, and at the same time took up the bag to carry out. He had proceeded nearly to the door of his shop when he stopped.

"This bag is very heavy—I must have made a mistake in the weight of the cotton."

"I—I—I guess not," says the countryman.

"But I have, certainly," says S——, "I can hardly carry it—we must weigh it again."

By this time, S——, had it brought back to the counter, and was preparing to untie it. Here was a dilemma. If the bag was untied, the theft would be discovered, and if weighed as it was, it would be paying monstrously high for the cheese. The countryman hem'd and ha'd, and scratched his head, but without getting out of the difficulty. To complete his consternation, at that moment another person entered the store—this decided him, and after drawing a long breath he stammers out—

Mr. S——, don't trouble yourself to untie the bag; it weighs just a pound—I've weighed it a hundred times."

"No consequence," said S——, and he put the whole into the scales—"I knew I must have made a mistake. It weighs thirty-eight pounds—blockhead that I am! Let me see, twelve that you paid for, one and for the bag, is thirteen—thirteen from thirty-eight leaves twenty-five. Twenty-five lbs. at 3s. 6d. is £4 7s. 6d. Wait a moment, I will make another bill."

The countryman did wait, received the bill and paid £4 7s. 6d. for his cheese. He then flung the bag into the wagon; jumped in, and drove off, with a face glowing like ignited charcoal. Mr. S—— remained in the door until he had bowed his customer out of sight, then turning round, he coolly observed to the person within, "Our friend there has a fine horse; Good George! how fast he trots!"—N. H. Gazette.

EDUCATION.

It was finely and forcibly said in the rhetorical language of the venerated Stoughton, "that God sifted a whole kingdom for the wheat which was sown in the American wilderness." That seed was not confined to New-England. It has been scattered broadcast over the now fair and flourishing domain which we proudly call our Country. It has shot up, not thinly, but luxuriantly, and in evidence of its effect, we have only to point to the innumerable seminaries of elementary and general instruction; to the schools and academies, the colleges and universities, which, dispersed through the Republic from Maine to Florida, constitute the glory of our beloved land.

Nor are they less our defence than our glory. Knowledge is power. A people generally enlightened can not be enslaved. Other eyes may look with complacency upon our national fortresses; upon our armaments, naval and military; for my own part, I contemplate with livelier satisfaction, and more assured convictions of their efficiency to the end in view—our security and repose as a people—the institutions of learning, which, in every gradation of excellence adapted to the age, the capacities, the wants of the rising generation, abound in our land. I am no enthusiast; I am neither a pedagogue nor bookworm.—But I hazard nothing in saying, that the humblest village school-house is a little bulwark of our country's liberties. Our seminaries, small and great, for the diffusion of useful knowledge among all classes of the community, collectively present an impregnable wall of defence. Whilst these remain, no Agamemnon, no Achilles will be able to take our city. It will abide in fearless security, and unshaken, indissoluble strength.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED. TO WIVES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Chap. VI.—Home.

"It was her smile that made the house so gay,
Her voice that made it eloquent with joy,
Her presence peopled it. Her very tread
Had life and gladness in it."

Woman is the presiding genius of home. These words, woman and home, are almost synonymous. What husband can think of his home without his thoughts at the same time resting upon that wife who is or who should be its light and its joy? What child can think of home, without his mind fondly reverting to that mother who watched over him in his days of helplessness, and who was the guardian angel of the family circle? Home should from the centre of a wife's affections, plans and thoughts. She should view it as a little kingdom, in the ruling and managing of which, she must act the most important part, and assume the greatest responsibility—a kingdom which will altogether the most sensibly feel her influence, and which will exhibit such characteristics as she pleases to enstamp upon it.

Home is the sphere in which woman can exhibit all the valuable traits of her nature—in which she can prove herself to be a model of all that is good and lovely—and in which she can cause peace, harmony and happiness to prevail. Is a wife economical, industrious and tasty? In what place can she more visibly or more successfully display these qualities than at home? Is she ambitious? There is no ambition so worthy a woman, as that which prompts her to discharge faithfully and efficiently her duties as a wife, a mother, and the mistress of a household! Let no wife despise this ambition. It is one altogether worthy of her pure and exalted nature, and far more commendable than that which fires the bosom of the conqueror of kingdoms? Alas! that woman's ambition should ever be perverted from its true and natural objects! Alas! that her's should ever be an ambition to shine before the public—to display like the peacock, her gaudy plumage to an envious multitude—that she should aspire after no distinction more noble than to be arrayed in flaunting colors, and flutter in lace and ribbons! When woman exhibits these inclinations, she is swayed by a sickly ambition, totally unworthy of her. Home is the only proper theatre for the display of a wife's ambition. And I repeat, let not woman despise this ambition. The Creator has evidently designed the sexes for different spheres of action, for the general good. To overlook this design, to confound these spheres together, is to destroy the blessings which a kind Providence designed to confer upon us. If women were to go out into the world—if they were to mingle in the strifes of public life, and devote their time and attention to business concerns equally with the men—in what condition would be our homes?—where would be those domestic comforts and enjoyments which now render our firesides so dear?—and who would watch over, and nurture, and protect our offspring in the days of their helplessness? If it would be wrong—if it would be a violation of the self-evident laws of nature, for the whole sex thus to forsake the sphere for which they are so peculiarly fitted, and in which they are so eminently useful, then it would be equally wrong for any thus to do, unless such a course is imperiously demanded by uncontrollable circumstances. And on the other hand were the men to change their habits and abandon the occupations and business affairs which have hitherto engaged their attention, and retiring to their habitations, devote themselves exclusively to household pursuits, the change would be equally ridiculous, and equally disastrous to the welfare of the general whole! This conclusion will not be doubted. And yet why would there be any more impropriety in a change of the latter character than the former!

I can repeat, then, as an admitted truth, that God has designed the sexes for different spheres of action; and it is the duty of all to be contented with the allotment which he has bestowed upon them, and to strive to qualify themselves for the discharge of the duties which are thus made to devolve upon them. The duties and avocations which pertain to one sex, are equally valuable, equally essential and praiseworthy in the sight of God and all the honorable minded, as those of the other. I insist that the duties of the statesman and the warrior, although perhaps leading to results more direct and more open to the observation of the world, are still no more honorable or essential to the welfare of mankind, than those discharged by the wife and the mother. Has not woman the care and direction of the whole race of man, during those years when the human mind is susceptible of the strongest and most lasting impressions? The acts of the statesman or warrior, often produce consequences of but a few years duration. But the impression which woman enstamps upon the mind in the days of infancy and childhood, will endure throughout life. How honorable, how important and responsible are the duties of woman!

And where is the field in which woman discharges these momentous duties! It is not in the crowded thoroughfare—it is not in the fashionable circle—it is not in the thronged assembly—it is not in the arena of public life—but it is within the hallowed precincts of home! This is woman's province, this her field of action, this the scene of her highest usefulness. Who—oh! who—does not remember with delight, the home of his childhood? Who does not often allow his thoughts to run back to it as a bright spot in a world of darkness? Who does not allow memory fondly to linger around the hearth-stone where passed the days of innocency? Who does not preserve in his soul one sacred recess, where he garners up as a priceless treasure, the kind advice, the well-timed admonition, the wise precepts, which from time to time dropped upon their childish ears from the lips of loved parents! Whatever may befall man in after years of life—however high he may ascend in riches, in rank, and honors—however low he may sink in poverty, ignominy and disgrace—however far he may wander away from the place of his birth, though it be to the ends of earth—wherever and whatever he may be—we shall find in the secret depths of his soul, when we penetrate the outward covering of circumstance and character, and probe the inner man, fountains of emotions planted there by parental hands; we shall discover feelings, tastes, principles, forming an under current of his nature, which were acquired at the home of his childhood. My venerable father!—my dearly beloved mother!—your heads are now silvered over by the frosts of more than three score years and ten, and many long, long years have fled away forever, since I left your parental roof, flushed with the eager hopes of youth. But when I can forget you—when I can forget the home which you provided for myself and my dear brothers and sisters, or the care and faithfulness with which you provided for us and watched over us, or the oft-repeated admonitions which you instilled into our minds—memory must be paralyzed and refuse to do its office, and gratitude must flee from my heart!

St. Paul says that young wives should be "keepers at home." And this admonition should be particularly heeded by those to whom it is addressed. All other things being equal, the young wife who loves home, who prefers it to all other places, and who occupies the greater portion of her time in attention to domestic concerns, will succeed much better in house keeping, and in making her husband and family happy, than she who is in the habit of absenting herself much from home. The former can see that every household duty is discharged in an efficient manner. But when a wife is fond of leaving home on the most trifling pretexts, making calls and visits to all the town, her domestic affairs must suffer—inasmuch as she must entrust to others who are less interested, those duties which should be discharged directly under her own supervision. And whoever depend upon hired domestics to do what they should attend to themselves, must labor under the disadvantage of having things but poorly done. There can be no possible objection that a wife should spend a suitable portion of her time in social intercourse with those with whom she associates. But she should choose a proper time for this, when it will not interfere with her domestic arrangements, or cause her to neglect any of those duties which it is important she should fulfil. When a wife is more fond of gossiping with her neighbors than of attending to her household affairs, her home will exhibit the fruit of her negligence—disorder, confusion, wastefulness, will reign throughout the house. Alas! for the poor man who has such a wife!—To him married life presents any thing but a pleasing aspect. It sounds strangely in his ears to hear others speak of the enjoyments of domestic life. His home has few attractions—his fireside few joys. When his wife is absent, his household interests suffer—when she is at home, perchance a scolding tongue drives him away. For I have noticed that women who are fond of gadding abroad, are great talkers—and great talkers are generally great scolders. To a man in these circumstances, we may well apply the couplet of Burns—

"Sic a wife as Willie had,
I wad na gie a button for her."

In a preceding chapter, I have written to husbands on the enjoyments of the domestic circle. But these enjoyments depend very much upon the disposition of the wife to render her abode agreeable. It is entirely within her province and her power, to make the home of her husband an earthly paradise, and the happiest spot on earth to him, or to make it the most unpleasant and gloomy. And in proportion as he views it in the one light or the other, will he be a home man, or one who loves all other places better than his home. Hence I have urged upon wives the immense importance of striving to make their abodes as agreeable as possible, as much, very much indeed, of the enjoyments of life, depend upon their disposition and their efforts in this respect. This subject is one of so much importance that I will introduce some judicious and valuable observations from other writers. In Abbot's "Path of Peace," we find the following sensible remarks:—

"When, wearied and excited by the harassments of the day, your husband has returned to his home, he has not been met with a smile of welcome, and a placid heart. The parlor is in a clutter, the children are neglected, his wife is fretful. Love, even the most pure and the most fervent, can not long survive such encounters. The tavern keeper will bid him welcome. He will have the little snug parlor, for the whist party, neat and in order, and his associates will be careful to avoid offence. They will greet him with the open hand and the smiling brow. Is it strange that a man who is not governed by Christian principle, should, under such circumstances, forget his wife and forsake his home? Is it strange that he should live with those who are careful to minister to his pleasures?"

Let us look at another picture which the same author presents us:—"He comes home at night, worn down with the toil of the day, and a cheerful room and a cheerful heart embrace him. His troubled spirit is soothed by the quiet influence which she throws around him. Perhaps he is naturally a passionate man, and comes home vexed and petulant. But the neat fireside, the pleasant table, the peaceful home, the soothing tones of his wife's voice, calm his perturbed spirit. He feels that home is indeed a blessed retreat from the turmoil of business, and he will not leave it until duty compels him." To those remarks Alcott adds—"I do not believe one woman in a hundred has any conception of the good which divine Providence, by appointing her to be a help-meet of man, puts it in her power to do. It is not in humanity to resist, wholly, the silent influences of voice, tone, look, step, gait—every thing, in one word, which constitutes example—in those whom we love. Happiness begets happiness; and domestic happiness is peculiarly prolific. He must be a brute who does not heed, feel, yield to the force of its heavenly influence, and become thereby modified, improved, adorned, exalted."

James in his Family Monitor, adverts feelingly to this subject:—"To ensure, as far as possible, the society of her husband at his own fire-side, let the wife be a 'keeper at home,' and do all in her power to render that fireside as attractive as good temper, neatness and cheerful affectionate conversation can make it, let her strive to make his own house the soft green on which his heart loves to repose, in the sunshine of domestic enjoyment. O woman! thou knowest the hour when the 'good man of the house' will return at mid-day, while the sun is bowing down the laborer with the fierceness of his beams, or at evening, when the burden and heat of the day are past—do not let him, at such a time, when he is weary with exertion, and faint with discouragement, find upon coming to his habitation, that the foot which should hasten to meet him is wandering at a distance—that the soft hand which should wipe away the sweat from his brow, is knocking at the door of other houses; nor let him find a wilderness where he should enter a garden—confusion where he should see order, or filth that disgusts, where he might hope to behold neatness that delights and attracts. If this be the case, who can wonder that, in the anguish of disappointment, and in the bitterness of a neglect, sad and heart broken husband, he turns from his own door for that comfort which he wished to enjoy at home, and that society which he hoped to enjoy in his wife, and puts up with the substitutes for both which he finds in the houses of other men, or in the company of other women."

"How sweet to the soul of a man, (says Hierocle,) is the society of a beloved wife, when wearied and broken down by the labors of the day, her endearments soothe, her tender cares restore him. The solicitude and the anxieties, and the heaviest misfortunes of life, are hardly to be borne by him who has the weight of business and domestic cares at the same time to contend with. But how much lighter do they seem, when, after his necessary avocations are over he returns to his house and finds there a partner of all his griefs and troubles, who takes for his sake, her share of domestic labors upon her, and soothes the anguish of his anticipation. A wife is not, as she is falsely represented and esteemed by some, a burden and a sorrow to a man. No, she shares his burdens, and she alleviates his sorrows, for there is no difficulty so heavy or insupportable in life, but it may be surmounted by the mutual labors and affectionate concord of that holy partnership.

The influence which a cheerful and pleasant home exercises in urging man to toil and hardship, is most beautifully described in the following extract from the Rose of Sharon. "The hardy laborer, far from his lowly cot and humble family, toils on from day to day, and from week to week, that at the last he may return to his home, and make it glad with the scanty reward his labors have won. And when the great sweat drops, wrung from his brow, plash on the ground, and his giant limbs tire with long continued exertions—when his zeal grows cold, and his heart becomes heavy with weariness—what is it that then renews his arm, warms again his heart, and animates him with redoubled freshness and industry for his task? Thoughts of his loved ones—visions of his dear, dear home! In fancy, the lonely hut rises before him, calling for repairs without, and replenishing within, that it may resound with the shouts of infantile gladness, and the songs of comfortable and contented industry. He sees his faithful companion providing comforts for his return, his children looking out on the far spreading plain, or to the distant hill-top, to catch the first glimpse of their weary father, that they may hasten to welcome his return, and rejoice with noisy glee over the fruits of his hard-handed toil. And as these visions flit across his mind, they so fill it with joy, that weariness flees before them, and the wearied arm feels a strength unknown before." But the home of the laborer presents not this pleasant aspect to his vision—if his wife instead of "providing comforts for his return," is wholly negligent and indifferent to his weariness and his wants—if she meets him with a scowling countenance and a scolding tongue, instead of a cheerful smile and a pleasant greeting—will he put forth these hardy exertions in behalf of his family? Alas, no! The spirit that nerved his arm and strengthened his sinews, would soon be broken; and if he labored at all, more than likely he would soon begin to squander the greater part of the fruit of his toil, in procuring that destructive "spirit" which would speedily transform him into a demon, and make his approach at his home a source of alarm and terror, to those who should hail it with pleasure!

There is perhaps no season of the year when it is more highly important that the wife should strive to have her home present its most pleasant aspect, than during the long winter evenings, when men in a great variety of occupations, have much leisure time at their disposal. These hours are dangerous to the habits of those husbands whose homes are distasteful to them. Few young wives need complain of their husband's absence on these seasons so favorable to social and domestic enjoyment, when they take proper measures to make their abodes pleasant and attractive. Several hours can be passed each evening most delightfully, if the wife but takes the lead in so arranging every thing that a feeling of comfort and enjoyment pervades all hearts. Cowper beautifully alludes to scenes of this nature, in his apostrophe to Winter.

"Thou holdst the sun
A prisoner in the yet undawning east,
Shortening his journey between morn and noon,
And hurrying him, impatient of his stay,
Down to the rosy west; but kindly still Compensating his loss with added hours
Of social converse and instructive ease,
And gathering, at short notice, in one group,
The family dispersed, and fixing thought,
Not less dispersed by daylight and its cares.
I crown thee king of intimate delights,
Fireside enjoyments, homeborn happiness,
And all the comforts that the lowly roof
Of undisturbed retirement, and the hours,
Of long uninterupted evening, know."

But I must repeat, that to have these evenings pass away so pleasantly that the family group will prefer home to all other places, very much depends upon the wife. It lies within her province to see that all the attractions of home are brought out to win her husband and family to her fireside. And so mild, so cheerful, so attentive and agreeable should her deportment be, so gentle and so captivating should be her influence over her husband, that in the fulness of her domestic enjoyments, he can repeat the poet's language:

"Every home-felt bliss is mine—
Every matron grace is thine;
Chaste deportment, artless mein,
Converse sweet, and heart serene.
Sinks my soul with gloomy pain?
See, she smiles!—'tis joy again!
Swell a passion in my breast?
Hark, she speaks! and all is rest."

When the short wintry day has run its course, and the husband, who may, perchance, have been exposed to its chilling blasts, is expected to return, the wife instead of being absent at a neighbor's talking over the scandal of the day, or entrusting her duties to a domestic, should herself see that all things are made ready to give him a warm and cheerful reception. And as she busies herself in these preparations, she will perhaps repeat the sweet words of Akenside—

"How thick the shades of evening close!
How pale the sky with weight of snows!
Haste, light the tapers, urge the fire,
And bid the joyless day retire."

Tell me not that a reception of this nature, will not produce a most salutary influence upon the husband's heart!—tell me not that it will not attach him by indissoluble ties, to his home and its inmates! These, O woman! these are the golden opportunities to make your home a paradise!—these the seasons to cause your husband to be all you can wish him, by becoming yourself, and making your home to become, all that he can desire! A cheerful and pleasant home will make a contented and happy family.

How readily does the mind bring fresh to recollection, scenes of this nature participated in during former years. It seems but as yesterday, since in childhood, I formed one of a happy family circle, now alas! scattered wide and far! Oh, those pleasant winter evenings, which memory now faithfully and brightly paints before my vision. The fire piled high with well-seasoned fuel, sends out a mellow light and a grateful heat, throughout the apartment. Around in social circle sit the united family—father, mother, brothers, sisters, and may be a neighbor, or one or two young associates.—Away sorrow—care begone! Ye are not there known. Cheerfulness smiles upon every countenance, and pleasure beams from every eye. How swiftly pass the happy hours, in social conversation, in perusing some interesting work, or in chaunting those old and sacred melodies, the sound whereof will even now, bring the unbidden tear to my eyes! The narration, the anecdote, intermixed with well-timed admonition and precaution from parental experience, affording all that pleasing variety so grateful and captivating to the tender mind—fills up the hours till the time of rest. Oh, happy evenings! gone to return no more!—or to return only when myself, and she who is the sharer of my joys and sorrows, bear the part of Mentors, under similar circumstances.

In scenes of this description, woman displays her brightest excellences—and upon her taste and skill, her faithfulness and love, they chiefly depend for their most attractive features. Would that she could realize how entirely it is in her power to make the saying true, "that the fairest known type of the bliss beyond the grave, is the little world of bliss which woman forms around the domestic fireside."

HEARING OF THE WORD.

BY REV. MOSES BALLOU.

CHAPTER IV.

There is still another class deserving of attention, which I shall denominate,

IV. Indifferent hearers.—This term may not exactly define my meaning, as those to whom I allude can hardly be said to hear at all. They are such as deem it a kind of duty to attend meeting; as the customs of society will hardly allow them to transact their ordinary business on the Sabbath, and so "they bring their bodies to church, and leave their thoughts at home." They have become so wholly engrossed with their cares and pursuits, of business and pleasure, that they hardly realize a word that the preacher utters, and during the exercises of worship, their minds are away in their counting rooms and workshops, or in chase of some phantom of interest or amusement. How many there are, especially of the younger portion of community, whose thoughts during the hour of worship, are any where but on the theme of the preacher, and who leave the house without even reflecting on a word which he may utter. I believe that I am not mistaken in this matter, for I well remember when this was the case, to some considerable extent, with myself. I went to meeting because others went: and because the day wore off heavy if I did not go; and during the time of service, allowed my attention to be occupied with a thousand frivolous things wholly foreign to the true object of devotion. So it is, I am confident, with a great many others: and with, not only the young, but some of all ages and conditions.

Now this is a most ruinous habit, and one which every hearer should cautiously guard against. As beings who have important spiritual interests to attend to; on whom there are high and responsible duties that devolve, respecting the Author of our being, as well as the members of our race; the Sabbath is a day that ought, by no means, to be lost. It has been set apart by custom, and consecrated to religious instruction, meditation, and the worship of God, and should never be perverted to other objects and uses, if these can be possibly attended to. It is but little time that is asked of us, at most, and that little we should cheerfully dedicate to him who has "given us all things richly to enjoy." Circumstances may deprive many of public worship on the Sabbath, but to those thus situated my remarks do not apply. It is those who can, and do attend, of whom I speak, and to all such let me say emphatically, "take heed, therefore, how ye hear." Let the time you are together be sacred to the object for which it was instituted, and let every hearer endeavor to shut out from his mind, as far as possible, all subjects of thought that do not have immediate reference to the exercises before him. It is a profitable exercise to examine one's self closely on entering the house of worship, to question carefully the motives, and endeavor to realize the object of those services which claim their attention. Then let it engage the whole mind and affections for the time being, and depend upon it, the blessing of God will rest on the heart thus dedicated to his service.

ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATION.

Met in Canton, June 24th, 1840. Prayer by W. H. Waggoner. Chose Br. J. Simonds, moderator; Br. Z. N. Ellis, clerk; Brs. L. Buck, A. P. Conky, Z. N. Ellis, and F. J. Briggs, committee to arrange public services; Brs. M. Jennison, F. J. Briggs and Z. N. Ellis, committee on fellowship and ordination; Brs. F. J. Briggs, L. Buck, and M. Jennison, committee of discipline; Brs. F. J. Briggs, and W. M. Fuller, (ministerial) and Brs. Chester Betts, and Z. N. Ellis (lay) delegates to the State Convention with power to appoint substitutes; Br. F. J. Briggs to preach the next occasional sermon; and Br. Waggoner to prepare the minutes; and invited all ministering brethren to act as members of the council.

Whereas this council is fully convinced that the conduct of E. A. Garfield, who has had the fellowship of this body, as a minister of the Gospel, has, for some time, been disgraceful to the Christian, as well as to the ministerial character, to such an extent as to admit of no defence; and whereas said Garfield has absconded from the limits of this Association, and from the United States, under strong suspicions of forgery, therefore, Resolved, that this body withdraws its fellowship from him as a preacher of the Gospel.

Granted fellowship to the first Universalist society of Oswegatchie; and voted, that three quarterly conferences be held during the ensuing year: 1st. At Potsdam, the last Saturday and Sunday in September next. 2d. At Fowler, the first Saturday and Sunday in January next. 3d. At Depeyster on the last Saturday and succeeding Sunday in February next.

Adjourned on Thursday, to meet at Massena on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1841.

J. SIMONDS, Moderator.

Z. N. Ellis, Clerk.

MINISTRES PRESENT.—F. J. Briggs, W. M. Fuller, J. Simonds, W. Sias, P. Morse, W. H. Waggoner.

DELEGATES.—L. Buck, Z. N. Ellis, Canton; Chester Betts, Robert Conant, Gouverneur and Fowler; S. Hazeltin jr., C. B. Goodrich, Little York; M. P. Crowley, R. Squires, Massena; L. Haley, S. Walrath, Oswegatchie.

REMARKS.—The Association was blessed with the most excellent weather. Not a cloud obscured the glory of either day. The sun of heaven shone out with all his rays, and with the Sun of Righteousness, caused light to beam on the inner and the outward man. All saw, all felt that this was truly a happy season. On the second day about two hundred communed. This was a matter of much interest, and told out plainly the deep feeling that pervaded the great congregation. Of the singing I can not speak too well. It was very evident that a nice ear, and a skilful hand was there. Br. Ellis deserves all praise—with his young choir, he performed to the rich satisfaction of all present. Oh, may he and they never have occasion to hang their harps on the willows—may they long be permitted to sing the songs of Zion, and gladden the hearts of paster and people!

The hospitality of the friends, their kindness and unwearied attention, will long be remembered by those who participated in the joys of that happy occasion.

[Here follow a few remarks which are liable to be misunderstood by the reader; as the words can be fairly construed in two very different senses. I therefore omit them.—A. B. G.]

Per order, W. H. WAGGONER.

THE CAUSE IN CHAMPION.

BR. GROSH—"It being quite customary," as Br. Manley says, "for our preachers to let the public know where they preach, and the success of their labors," I will fill out the remainder of this sheet, with a very brief account of the past and present state of our cause in this place.

I visited this people for the first time, on the first Sunday in August, 1839, and preached two discourses to full Congregations. I made, by request, another appointment for the first Sunday in September which I fulfilled. At this time, I found a strong and ardent desire, manifested by a very few of our friends to establish the regular preaching, of the Gospel of impartial grace. I say, this desire was manifested by a "very few of our friends"—for they were few indeed.

However, a subscription was commenced, to support preaching one fourth of the time, and to continue as long as the means should hold out. On the strength of this little encouragement, I came here to reside, September 10th. But our friends soon began to feel that if the doctrine of God's changeless and impartial love contained any spiritual nourishment worth having, being fed with it only once in four weeks, was not the most expeditious method of advancing their growth "in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ;" and they accordingly decided to have the rich provisions of the Gospel spread before them on each alternate Sabbath. For the last nine months, I have preached here one half of the time, to respectable and increasing congregations,

Of course, we have much opposition to contend with—for where does not the truth find enemies? During the past winter, our Presbyterians neighbors, in the plenitude of their "love for souls," got up a protracted meeting, for the purpose of giving the "poor Universalists an opportunity of getting religion" an obituary notice of which, was furnished for the Magazine by "Luke." Their converts were "like angels visits few and far between." In fact, it proved a "total failure," so far as making converts was concerned—they having claimed but two or three. We understand that it did cause one church member to acknowledge himself guilty of beastly drunkenness; and another of petty theft, and to promise reformation. We pray that their reform may be lasting as their existence, and that the sacred admonition may be duly regarded, "let him that stole, steal no more."

On the 7th of the present June, we organized the "First Universalist Society in Champion," consisting of 21 members. The cause is evidently onward—and we feel certain, that if the walls of our Zion are again suffered to be broken down, it will be in consequence of carelessness and a criminal neglect on the part of its professed friends.

Brethren, pray for us, that no root of bitterness may ever spring up among us, to trouble and disturb the peace of Zion.

HENRY L. HAYWARD.

THE EXPOSITOR

For July is a very interesting number. The first article is a cursory examination of the doctrine of a general judgment day, by Rev. H. Ballou. The second article is a finished and very superior Essay on the Scripture usage of the words death, second death, quick and dead, by Rev. T. B. Thayer, of Lowell. Then we have two articles prepared by Rev. T. J. Sawyer, of New York, giving a statement showing that Universalism is embraced by all so-called "Rationalist" Christians in Germany, as well as by many of the so-called "Evangelical" party. In this article the "Rationalist" Christians are freed from the charge of skepticism which has been brought against them, by opposers giving them this name in common with others who were skeptical. The other article is a full statement of Dr. Olshausen's views on the eternity of punishment; in which it is shown that even this "Evangelical" theologian, the chief of German believers in endless woe, is very doubtful in regard to the truth of that doctrine—thinks there is nearly as much testimony in the Bible in favor of Universal restoration, as there is in favor of endless sin—and advises caution in the positive declaration of either! Br. Sawyer has done justice in this article to the grounds assumed by Olshausen; and deserves the thanks of every reader of the Expositor for these interesting articles. The remainder of the Expositor is filled with literary notices of several valuable works; and the last page has a beautiful and touching poetic article from the pen of Mrs. J. H. Scott, entitled, "the power of prayer." Again and earnestly do we commend the Expositor to the favorable attention and substantial support of every Universalist—every lover of sound theology—who is able to spare two dollars per annum for such a work. As a doctrinal article, Br. Thayer's Essay alone is worth the price of the number before us. A. B. G.

PHRENOLOGY.

Messrs. O. S. & L. N. FOWLER, known to the scientific world as able, practical phrenologists, will deliver a lecture on phrenology in the Mechanics' Hall in this city on Monday evening, July 20th. Phrenology is attracting so much notice, that we are certain, very many will deem this a favorable opportunity to inquire into the matter. A. R. B.

ESSAYS ON WAR. NO. XIV.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"Thou shalt not kill." JEHOVAH.

Our last number was devoted to an inquiry whether the Old Testament actually taught the doctrine of the utter extermination of the Canaanites and other idolatrous nations, by the Israelites. We do not think it proper to extend that inquiry, but we will admit all the objection claims, that war was sanctioned under the Mosaic dispensation. So were other practices permitted; such as polygamy, the buying of wives, divorces etc. But this does not prove such things to be right now. Besides, under the old dispensation, the Israelites were to consult God when they went to war. Do Christians take this course? No. They consult their own passions. An objection may be presented here by the infidel, which is, that the Old Testament appears contradictory, for wars were permitted, and yet the command was given, "Thou shalt not kill." In reply, "God, it may be supposed, gave his people to understand, that the prohibition of the sixth commandment was binding upon men, to whom it was directed, and not upon himself; that no man was at liberty to destroy the life which he could not give; and that consequently it could not be taken in any case whatever, without his express permission." Let Christians then show that under a better dispensation, which requires "love to enemies," they have a command or even permission from on High, to take life in any case whatever. We maintain that God is the only being in the universe that has a right to take human life. He has this right because he gave life in the first place. True, he may delegate this right or power to human beings or governments. But then who will have the effrontery to say that such a right now rests with any individual or government now in existence? I know the plea that will be urged. It will be said, "self-defence is the first law of nature." It may be "the first law of nature," but it is not the first law of Christianity! "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you," is the first and great law of Christianity. Can we obey this law and kill our enemies? Is this the way in which Jesus carried out his own precepts? Hear him, when expiring on the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But more on this point under the reply to the doctrine of self-defence.

We are prepared to admit wars to be right in only one instance; that is, where they are expressly authorized by God himself! We religiously believe such was the case with many of the wars recorded in the Old Testament. We say many, for it is evident that some were undertaken voluntarily, upon some national account, such as most of those were in the times of the Judges, when the Moabites, Philistines, and other neighboring nations invaded the country of the Israelites; and such as that of David against the Ammonites, whose king had affronted his ambassadors. We think two reasons may be assigned for this mode of punishment in the ancient world. 1st. It is well known that the people who then existed, were affected by no proof of the power of the gods which they worshipped, so deeply as by their giving them victory in war. The God of Israel, therefore, took this method to convince the neighboring nations of his supreme power, and to show his deep abhorrence of the vices which prevailed in the land of Canaan. 2d. The Israelites were mere instruments in the hands of a righteous Providence for exterminating a people of whom it was necessary to make a public example to the rest of mankind. It might have been accomplished by an earthquake, by pestilence, by fire, but, infinite wisdom chose this as being the clearest and most intelligible method of displaying his power and righteousness; his power over the pretended gods of other nations, and his righteous hatred of the crimes into which they had fallen. Such a doctrine is distinctly revealed in Revelation. A single citation must suffice: "O Assyrian! the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their hand is mine indignation. I will send him against a hypocritical nation, and against the people of my wrath will I give him a charge, to take the spoil, and to take the prey, and to tread them down like the mire of the streets." Like the Assyrian, the Israelites were employed against hypocritical nations, and yet the command "thou shalt not kill," remained unbroken—that is, thou shalt not kill without divine permission. It appears to the writer that Christians can not present such a permission under the gospel dispensation, and therefore war of every description must be wrong.

But it is worthy of notice that while the taking of life and the practice of war were permitted during the periods of the Old Testament dispensation, we have repeated intimations at the same time of a better state of things; of a day when war and its attendant miseries shall cease. Yes, the day of aggression will come to an end. It has been foretold by prophets, and sung by angels. To manifest this truth, the earth was lulled into quietude, and embassies of angels lighted down from heaven, sung in audible songs, "On earth PEACE!" The whole ceremonial institution and rites seem to have had a meaning prefigurative of that better, purer, and more peaceful state. A millennial day will finally come when all wars shall cease, when contentions shall exist no longer. We love to linger upon this beautiful thought. It calms every passion of the soul. It purifies the affections. It gently warms and gladdens the heart. It is like finding a pure, refreshing stream in the desert. It is like the soft zephyr. It is like the quiet, beautiful morning star ushering in an eternal day of righteousness, gladness and joy. It is like the sun bursting forth in all his splendor from some opening cloud amidst storms and tempests. Happy day! My soul longs for its approach. A very beautiful writer whose soul had been, drinking at the pure fountain of truth, thus speaks of this delightful and happy period as shadowed forth in Revelation: "Sometimes we see it under the type of a wilderness newly clothed with bud and blossom; sometimes we see it under the type of a city descending from heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband; sometimes we behold it as a great temple arising out of the earth, and capacious enough to contain all nations. This temple is not built of earthly materials that will perish with the using, but is supported on immutable columns. Every great moral and religious principle is a pillar in the millennial temple. * * * The doctrine of the absolute inviolability of human life is one pillar; this is in a state of preparation, and will soon ascend and stand uprightly and majestically in its place; and principle after principle will be established, column after column will be erected, till the spiritual house of the Lord shall be established in the tops of the mountains, and shall expand upon the eye of the beholder, far more beautiful than the Pantheon. And what then will be wanting? Only that the nations, in the language of prophecy, shall flow into it; only that the people should occupy it and rejoice in it, and this is millennial glory."

In closing, we need hardly cite the beautiful language of prophecy. But we can not forbear giving a single passage and then we shall close with the rich and beautiful language of Isaiah as presented by the poet: "And he shall judge among the nations and shall rebuke many people, and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my Holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

"Beneath its trees that spread their blooming light,
The spotted leopard walks; the ox is there;
The yellow lion stands in conscious might,
Breathing the dewy and illumined air."

A little child doth take him by the mane,
And leads him forth, and plays beneath his breast.
Nought breaks the quiet of that blessed domain,
Nought mars its harmony and heavenly rest;
Picture divine and emblem of that day,
When peace on earth and truth shall hold unbounded sway."

UNIVERSALISM EXAMINED AND REFUTED
BY LUTHER LEE.

Under the 80th page of a book now before the public, bearing the above title, we find the sentiment that the atonement is both conditional and unconditional—that the unconditional atonement is sufficiently efficacious to completely save a part of the human race, and also to aid the other part "to a certain extent," but their eternal destiny must turn at last on a conditional atonement.

To this we object on the ground that there is not enough of God in it—that is, it is all alpha and no omega—all yea and nay, but no "yea and in him amen," 2 Cor. i: 19, 20. Again, under the 115th page we read thus—"Let it be understood we do not admit that all punishment is corrective." To this we reply, if punishment is not corrective, then nothing can be amended or improved by it, hence must be not only useless but cruel and revengeful.

Page 255 the author says—"Rev. Mr. Morse, in a controversial letter published in the Christian Advocate and Journal, Vol. viii: No. 2, holds the following language, 'the attributes of God form the basis of religious truth.' To this we object and make our appeal to the word of God for a decision on all points of faith and practice. This we do on the ground that the attributes of God, aside from revelation and matter of fact, do not furnish sufficient data from whence to deduce conclusions concerning man's future destiny."

We reply, if Rev. Mr. Lee can set "the attributes of God aside from revelation and matter of fact," we think he will be perfectly justified in adopting the attributes of Rev. Mr. Wesley as "the basis of religious truth;" for revelation is nothing more or less than an exposition of the attributes of God. For when Abraham, Moses, Jonah, Job, or David, are mentioned in the Scriptures, it is only to show how the divine perfections have been brought to bear upon them.

On pages 256, 257, he says, "Now will Universalists pretend that they can discover what is truth and what is error, from their knowledge of the divine perfections? If they can, then all those portions of the Scriptures which do not relate to the attributes of God, are not necessary in order to a correct theory of religion."

Surely, if Mr. Lee will point out to us any "portions of Scripture" which do not either directly or indirectly "relate to the attributes of God," we will expunge them from the sacred canon, as of human origin—the same as we would the sacred use of corporeal bread and water, was it embraced in our confession of faith.

Again, under page 257 he says, "This throws the argument into our side of the scales, for matter of fact says that it is consistent with the divine perfections that sin and misery should exist, while matter of fact can not be brought to bear on the other side of the question."

We answer, if Rev. Mr. Lee can prove by matter of fact that he is either a Jew or a Gentile, and consequently under the influence of sin and death, and will not allow us to prove by that which he considers so far preferable to the divine perfections, the book of Revelation, that "death is to be swallowed up in victory," he must consider himself eternally a subject of death's dreary dominion. Again, if Rev. Mr. Lee can prove by matter of fact that the sting of death is not yet extracted, and can not prove by revelation, 1 Cor. xv: 55, that it ever will be extracted, he may set his heart at rest; he must be eternally goaded by it, notwithstanding all his writhings to meet the conditions. Again, as Mr. Lee will bring all matter of fact to bear on his own side of the question, if he can prove by matter of fact that it was once consistent with the divine perfections that he should be dead in trespasses and sins, and if it is consequently consistent with the divine perfections that he should eternally remain so, then surely he has never been "quickened" or raised to newness of life, and never will be, as it would be inconsistent with the divine perfections.

On page 264, he says, "We admit that God wills the salvation of all men on Gospel terms, but all men as moral agents do not comply with the terms of the Gospel."

We quote Rom. iii: 9-12, 19, "Jews and Gentiles all under sin—there is none righteous, no not one—there is none that seeketh after God—there is none that doeth good, no not one—that every mouth may be stopped and all the world become guilty before God." In view of these, together with hundreds of similar texts, might not Mr. Lee better have said, no man as a moral agent has ever complied with the terms of the Gospel? For salvation implies a new creation, which is as much the entire province of God as it was to call man into being at first. Eph. ii: 1, 5, 10. "You hath he quickened, even when ye were dead in sins—for we are his workmanship created in Christ Jesus."

Page 297 he says, "All other denominations are making praiseworthy efforts to bring the heathen under the influence of the Gospel, whilst Universalists instead of coming up to the work, so far as they have done any thing on the subject, have actually opposed."

Modern Universalists have as yet generally confined their ministerial labors to Christendom—i. e. to "Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children," Gal. iv: 12; and doubtless for the same reason that Jesus said to his apostle, "go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not," Matt. x: 5. For why go abroad to preach, so long as there is far more bigotry, hypocrisy and error of every kind, to rebut at home among the pharisaical sects, than there is in the whole pagan world? And why send our little spare money away, no body knows where, as if sounding a trumpet before us whilst our own poor, which we always have with us, are suffering by scores for want of the necessities of life?

IS IT CONSISTENT?

Our attention has recently been called to the inconsistency of the following paragraph, recorded in a political paper entitled, "The Rough Hewer," dated at Albany, March 12, 1840, p. 3.

"In Senate, Tuesday, March 3, 1840. Mr. Young presented a petition from the citizens of the town of Oswegatchie, (St. Lawrence co.) of the Universalist denomination of religion, for the establishment of a school in which their own faith might be inculcated."

Mr. Young very properly remarked in presenting the petition, "that it probably arose from a suggestion in the annual message of his excellency the Governor."

Now our inquiry at this time, is not whether a petition from the Universalists of the town of Oswegatchie, praying for legislative aid in the establishment of a sectarian school, originated from any thing which his excellency, Gov. Seward, may have said in his annual message; but it is to inquire how and in what way such a petition can be reconciled and made to harmonize and agree with the well known and long established views of Universalists on this subject.

Does not every one who has been an attentive reader of the Magazine and Advocate, since its first appearance, know that Br. Skinner labored with zeal and energy in arresting and exposing the sectarian designs of the notorious Doct. Ely, and his self-styled Christian party in politics; and that the truths he advanced, and the crafty inventions and sectarian plans he exposed, were among the prominent and efficient means of putting an effectual veto upon the artifice and cunningly devised scheme of the said Doctor, and his would-be Christian party in politics? And can it be said that the present editors have been remiss in their duty, in not bringing the subject before the people from time to time, as occasion and circumstances required? Certainly not. Both Brs. Grosh and Bartlett, have furnished articles which are replete with instruction and the necessary information on this subject. Indeed, does not every well informed Universalist, know that such an idea is inconsistent, and at war with the doctrine of Universalism, and the spirit and genius of Republican principles? The moment that legislative aid is interposed as a direct and immediate auxiliary to favor and support the Universalist denomination, that moment the Baptists, Methodists Presbyterians—in short all denominations ad infinitum, of whatever name or sect—may and of right ought to have the same privilege of legislative protection. We need not add, that such a result would be the uniting of Church and State, and the downfall of American rights and liberties. A word to the wise is sufficient. "Whoso readeth let him understand."

EXPLANATION WANTED.

BR. BARTLETT—There are certain sentiments developed in your "remarks" relative to the doings of the Central Association recently holden in this place, which, in my opinion, and likewise in the estimation of some of our lay brethren in this vicinity, require some explanation; unless you intend to attribute designed neglect to the brethren of this Association, which I can not, at present, believe is the case.

That the visitors from abroad, who attended here, were "cordially welcomed and kindly entertained during their stay," you have frankly, and, I doubt not, honestly acknowledged. I am most sincerely thankful and happy that our attentions to the wants of the clergymen and laymen who attended, should merit from you this acknowledgment. The brethren here, when they invited the Association to meet at Hamilton Centre, expected, of course, that it would devolve upon them to make this provision. They accordingly did it, and I doubt not, did it freely and in good faith; and, I presume, they considered that when this duty was done, their whole duty was performed, and that too, to the utmost satisfaction of all concerned. It is not probable to me, that a single man in this society went to his home at the close of the meeting, with a distant thought in his mind, that there was any dissatisfaction on the part of clerical brethren, "concerning the things whereof they are accused" in your "remarks." Being somewhat a stranger in this region, I have taken the liberty to inquire, and find that every thing was done on the part of the lay brethren according to former customs and usages of the Association.

These things being so, I am totally unable to understand wherein our brethren were to blame for not taking up a collection during the session of this body at Hamilton Centre, to defray the expenses of the preachers. If I understand you, and I think I do, your plea is, that Associations are both "useful and necessary"—that "preachers should attend"—that "they are poor"—and that "many would gladly contribute something if a collection was taken up for the preachers." Now suppose this to be the best policy which could be adopted, is it not the duty of the preachers to inform the brethren of their wants before they censure them for not doing what they have not asked at their hands?

But, Messrs. Editors, I would ask your indulgence while I express "mine opinion" upon the question, "what shall we have therefor"? I will illustrate my views by supposing that a collection had been taken up in behalf of the preachers at the last session of the Central Association. Now if this had been the case, who would have paid the preacher's expenses? Would the societies which they represented, have borne them equally? Most certainly they would not. Who, then, would have been compelled to have "borne the heat and burden of the day"? As the majority of the meeting was composed of people from this town and immediate vicinity, it requires not the wisdom of the wise to see where the money would have been raised.

Is it said by the objector, that this town had the principal benefit of the public services, and ought therefore, to defray the main expenses? I reply that the object of our Association is not merely to preach, and pray, and sing, and afford our lay brethren an opportunity to decide who among the ministers is "the greatest in the kingdom of God." No. This is but a small item contrasted with other matters for which the Association was formed, and has been sustained.

The ecclesiastical business of the council is of equal importance to each and all of the societies within the bounds of the body represented.

Do the preachers then ask the society of the place where the Association is held, "what shall we have therefor?" (that is, in consideration of their attendance, and for preaching when called upon during the session.) I answer, "kindness and hospitality, and happy greetings which (in mine opinion) will pay them well."

Do they ask "what shall we have therefor?" to defray their necessary expenses to and from the meeting; let them ask the societies with whom they are settled, and if they are "poor and needy," I doubt not a collection will be taken up for them at home where their wants are known, and also where the expenses ought to be borne.

Thine truly, D. ACKLEY.

Hamilton, June 18, 1840.

REMARKS.—The above should have been entirely addressed to Br. Bartlett, who was appointed by the council to pen the remarks, and whose remarks they were. But as one who coincides in opinion with Br. Bartlett, and during his temporary absence while the printers are wanting the article for copy, I will offer a brief reply.

The remarks complained of, had not any reference to the members of the society who had entertained the ministers and delegates—at least, those members were not expected to contribute to the collection. But on such occasions there are always numbers present from a distance of from three to ten or fifteen miles, who with the ministers and delegates, are entertained by the brethren living on the spot, and who are willing, and some even anxious, to contribute their share, and to whom the collection would have afforded such an opportunity. I would also remind Br. Ackley that the subject of a collection was named to him, as the pastor of the society, and as the proper person to name it to the congregation.

Again—the collection would have been for the benefit, principally, of ministers from other Associations, whose societies could not be expected to defray their expenses to attend our Association. There are also preachers who laboratedly with no society in particular, or none in our Association, who have no where to apply for aid in such matters. And even if the business of the council is so important to the preachers in our Association as to demand of them the labor, loss of time, and expense of attending along with the lay delegates, I see not why services should be required of them, which are not demanded of the lay brethren—i. e., if they are to pay their own expenses, as do the lay delegates; nor can I see what interest brethren from other Associations have in the matter, to pay them for their attendance and extra services. Our Association surely will not say, we do not want the presence of any preachers, save those whose societies will defray their expenses, or who will come at their own cost. If not, let some rule of action be followed up, by which we will speak plainly our wishes. And if we want only such preachers present, let the course at Hamilton Centre be continued, and soon we will be left to preach, sing, pray, deliberate and enjoy our happy meetings, without any foreign aid or participation.

But Br. Ackley is mistaken as to former usages.—Collections are generally taken up in all our Associations in Central and Western New-York. Of the four I have attended last month, the Central Association is the only one that did not remunerate preachers from a distance for their extra services, by at least paying their travelling expenses. And it was not done grudgingly in any case; nor have I heard that the mite given by each, has impoverished any of the givers.

In conclusion—Br. Bartlett acted consistently in making the remarks he did—he did his duty, as conscience directed, and deserves the thanks, not only of the preachers from a distance, but of all in our Association who love to have the advice of our distant ministering brethren in the council, and of their prayers and sermons in our happy meetings. No censure was intended by him on those in Hamilton who did their duty in providing, save that they gave no opportunity—made no call on others who were present and had not contributed their share, and thus left a heavy burden rest on ministers who had been at considerable expense to attend. I hope such remarks will not be again called for in our Association; but that hereafter we will do as all sister Associations around us have done. A. B. G.

RETALIATION.

There are, without doubt, persons of a querulous disposition who are ready to take advantage of every one who, they think, is weaker than themselves. The disposition to impose upon those who are afraid, or unable to defend themselves, is a species of cowardice very common in the world. And it is by far too common, that men in the ordinary affairs of life, are quick to discover and improve every advantage which they may gain over a fellow-being. And this state of things shows that we should hold ourselves in readiness to defend our rights. But the important question is, how shall we do this? If we understand our rights, and those rights are infringed upon, we certainly can not defend them by retaliation. Suppose my neighbor attempts by false representations, to deprive me of a piece of property which I honestly own; could I vindicate my ownership from his false pretensions by practicing the same imposition on him that he contemplated upon me? There is but one answer to this question. By retaliating upon him, I acknowledge that I, at least, am ready to commit the very same sin that I condemned in him. Instead, therefore, of defending myself, I actually encourage him to injure me.

Much is said about self-defence, but there is not half as much solicitude felt about understanding what is necessary to self-defence. One man says he has been abused and insulted. And because he has a right to at least a reasonable share of respect, he feels it a duty to defend himself against the assault of his enemy. In maintaining this defence, whether he adopts the same conduct which the other has done or not, he proceeds upon the principle of retaliation. He abuses and insults his enemy because his enemy has abused and insulted him. The fair inference from this conduct is that he has no particular objection to abuse and insult, but is only angry that they should be practiced upon him. One man burns down another's barn—he retaliates upon his neighbor and burns down his dwelling. In his estimation, incendiarism is not the crime which should be punished, if it was only against some body else, but practising incendiarism against him is the thing which he thinks calls for self-defence. This looks like rather a singular method of vindicating one's rights, or establishing one's claim to respect! Yet this is according to the principle of retaliation.

Now if one man calls another a scoundrel, we should think that the best way the latter could defend himself would be to show the other that he was mistaken. If Partialists call Universalists liars and thieves, we should not think it a very proper method of defence, to turn upon them and call all Partialists liars and thieves. No, we would treat their slanders with that contempt which innocence always feels for the libeller, while we would show them that we know what are our rights, and our deserts, and what is our strength. And this is the way we would use all enemies. If they did not know any better than to do us an injury, we would teach them better, and show them that we know what our rights are, and how to defend them without setting an example of vice to others. This is the best general plan of self-defence. We shall not be at a loss how to supply the particulars. A. R. B.

REV. S. W. FULLER.

The amiable but decided manners, and strong, well informed mind of our departed brother, made a deep and favorable impression on all who were well and intimately acquainted with him—whether Universalists or Partialists. In the city where he resided for several years previous to his death, he had taken an active part in promoting the cause of general education, and was a member of several associations formed for this purpose, and that of mental improvement. The Northern Lyceum, (in connection with the Philadelphia Lyceum,) of which he was an active member, and one of its favorite lecturers and orators, held an annual meeting, and took a holiday excursion on the 30th of May last; and in its proceedings, repeatedly testified the deep regret of its members for the early departure of their fellow member. And what is more remarkable, and must be peculiarly gratifying to Br. Fuller's numerous friends, these testimonials all came from those who were not Universalists, but were in fact opposers of that system of Christianity. Having mislaid the copy of the United States Gazette in which we first read the account of these proceedings, we are obliged to quote from a more detailed statement given in the Nazarene of June 13th. After speaking of the oration by J. T. S. Sullivan, Esq., in very high terms, the writer says—

"After a lapse of five or ten minutes, an essay, by a lady, on the character of our departed friend and brother, Savillion W. Fuller, was read from the stand. This was the first rural celebration, the writer remarked, at which Mr. F. was not present. His absence was deeply felt she was assured, by all. They missed his kindly smile and hearty greeting, but they had the consoling reflection that he was joining in prayers and praises around the throne of the great Fountain of Intelligence. Although afflicted with an infirmity and compelled to perform many arduous religious duties in his capacity of pastor, he seldom absented himself from the regular meetings of the Lyceum, a sphere for which his extensive information, and ready command of language peculiarly fitted him. So great was the confidence, continued the essay, reposed in the impartiality of his decision, that nearly all questions of a religious nature were referred to him, and as the writer could testify, this confidence was never abused. On one occasion the question, 'Is justice incompatible with mercy?' was referred to Mr. F. He rose and remarked that as that question involved his peculiar religious views, he, from feelings of delicacy, declined answering it further than to state that he believed mercy in the Divine character, to be consistent with justice, and that justice would never demand what Divine mercy could not sanction. The man lived not, continued the essay, who was more beloved and respected by all within the circle of his acquaintance, and whose heart was more completely filled with good will towards all mankind; his feelings of benevolence knew no bounds; in life and in death he was a Christian indeed. Here the writer stepped aside to attack the doctrine of Universalism, which she did by stating her conviction that the actions of Br. Fuller were not to be attributed to his religious views, they merely 'played around his head,' they affected not his heart! A remark that, in the opinion of many, was wholly uncalled for, and any thing but felicitous.

"Uncalled for," indeed, and manifestly untrue; for what doctrine did heaven is better calculated to beget "good will towards all mankind," and boundless "feelings of benevolence," and to make "a man a Christian indeed," "in life and in death," than is Universalism? And can it be believed that a man of such a character, could believe with the understanding in God's universal paternity, man's universal fraternity, and the ultimate holiness and happiness of the whole intelligent universe, and not have his actions influenced by his faith—have such a glorious doctrine "play around his head" and not affect his heart! Nothing but ignorance of the doctrine of universal benevolence could thus doubt or deny its holy and effective power.

But this was not the only tribute. After Professor Sanderson had lectured on the subject of musical elocution, a recess was had, and then a poetical essay was read in which reference was made favorable to Br. Fuller. The United States Gazette, of July 4th, contains a copy (probably) of this poem. Extracts are given here—we have no room for more.

It will be seen from the mode of dating, that the writer was of the denomination of Friends, or Quakers, as they are commonly termed.

Yet here! on my native soil,
The wildwood home of Penn,
The memorial pillar—the trophy and spoil
Of Peace, and "good will to men,"
The beautiful pinions are widely outspread,
And her lip is free and bold—
She glides along with no muffled tread,
But lifeth on high her majestic head
When her eloquent truths are told.

Here, the Lyceum opens wide
To HER its beautiful gate,
Where the wayfarer pondereth side by side
With the gentle and the great.
If on his forehead he bear the seal,
The inscription of MORAL WORTH,
In the Lyceum shades he may proudly feel
That man was not fashioned to cringe and kneel.
That his only peers on earth,
Are they whose goings more strongly prove
That men are brethren—and God is love.

* * * * *
Comrades! our loftiest Porch
Holdeth a vacant chair,
And he who held Truth's burning torch
No longer sitteth there—
And his will be long an empty place,
Tho' the gifted may come in,
To take his seat—and fill the space
His footstep leaveth in the race,
To stand where he hath been;
Yet where that pure, mild radiance shone
No earthlier light will be ever known.

It saddens us this day,
And checks joy's rushing tide,
To feel that one has passed away,
Our Lyceum's boast and pride.
Oh, we loved about his skirts to cling,
And to gather at his feet,
Whom we think of now, as listening
To the glorious song the angels sing
Around the mercy seat,
As pouring for us in beatitude there,
A purified spirit's availing prayer.

And should our Temple fall
When its builders all are taken,
Should column, arch, and pedestal,
Like its human props be shaken.
As the good man leaves, when he goes from earth,
In the hearts where his seed is sown,
His enduring and changeless record of worth,
To shame the marbles of rank and birth,
Let its empty place be known
By the beautiful language of every lip
That has held in its courts high fellowship.
Philadelphia, Fifth Month, 29.

After some further exercises, Joseph R. Chandler, Esq., Editor of the United States Gazette, closed the services of the day by an Address on the importance and utility of Lyceums. We quote an extract from a brief report of the Address as given in the Nazarene.

"Here he said social intercourse was encouraged, the Christian feeling of love to all mankind fostered; by frequent communion, the spots that we supposed to be upon the character of our neighbor were found to have an existence only in our own imagination. Here we knew, and therefore loved each other the better, and here jealousy found his antidote. From this general greeting one<sup>a</sup> was absent; one who possessed every thing lovely in his character, whose delight it had been on all similar occasions to minister to the gratification of those around him. He, alas! had departed, and left a void not soon to be supplied. There were those present who were pressing nobly forward in scientific, literary and moral attainments, but they were yet young. His was the matured mind, a mind formed in no common mould. "Few men," continued Mr. C., entertained such opposite opinions on religious subjects as Mr. Fuller and myself, but thanks to the meetings of the Lyceums, I have been permitted to know him as my friend, whose heart was warmed and enlightened by the benign influence of Christian love."

Such was the estimation in which Br. Savillion W. Fuller was held by those whose different views in theology rendered them unlikely to be partial in his favor, until an intimate study of his character had first dispelled their prejudices. And yet, where is the preacher among us more decided in expressing his opinions—more positive in preaching them—more plain and clear in dissenting from and arguing against the views he deemed erroneous, than was Br. Fuller? I know of none. Let us then learn from this, that plain truth, if spoken in love—that decision of manner, if tempered with kindness and courtesy, will not lessen the respect of opposers for us; but that a craven spirit and a trucking manner—an unmanly desire of "pleasing the Orthodox," is contemptible in a Universalist preacher, and will be despised by our opposers.

N. B. The Memoir and Writings of Br. Fuller, are out of press. Br. Hutchinson will have some for sale in a few days. Price 63 cents single. The work is prefaced by a strikingly accurate likeness of Br. Fuller, a beautiful engraving. A. B. G.

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

REMOVALS.—Br. Alonzo Williams, in consequence of ill health, has been obliged to leave Chester, Vt., and wishes to be addressed in future at Ellsburg, Jefferson county, N. Y. We are happy to learn that the society in Binghamton, have engaged the services of Br. W. M. DeLong, for the whole time, during the ensuing year. Br. DeLong wishes to be addressed accordingly, instead of at Oran, or Lebanon, N. Y., as heretofore. Br. A. A. Davis, late of Marion, Ohio, has accepted an invitation to settle with the society at Danvers, New Mills, Mass. Rev. E. M. Stone, (Restorationist,) of Beverly, Mass., has removed to take the pastoral charge of the new society in Cincinnati, Ohio.

We notice the name of a Br. Gaylor as preaching in Kentucky—another new preacher.

Br. Gurley advertises a lot of the most popular and recent Universalist works as for sale at the Office of the Star in the West, in Cincinnati, Ohio.

The children, teachers, etc., of the Sunday Schools of Malden, East Cambridge and Cambridgeport celebrated independence day in the latter place. The meeting house was crowded, and the tables, capable of holding from 350 to 400 persons at a time, were repeatedly filled. The Trumpet speaks of it as a splendid and highly gratifying sight. Such celebrations are becoming very common at the East.

The Universalist Sabbath School Association of Massachusetts has in its fellowship 41 Sunday Schools, embracing about 700 teachers, nearly 4000 scholars, and owning in all about 8000 volumes in their several libraries. The largest school has 319 scholars—the smallest 20. There are several that have upwards of 200 scholars. There are, also, a number of schools not yet connected with the Association.

The Maine State Convention of Universalists met in Albion, June 24th. Chose Br. Bates, Moderator; Brs. W. R. French and R. Blacker, Clerks; C. C. Burr, G. W. Quinby, T. P. Abell, W. A. Drew, (ministers) and six laymen, delegates to the U. S. Convention; and

D. Forbes, Standing Clerk. Meetings were held in the Universalist and in the Congregational meeting houses; and these being found insufficient to hold the audiences, a third meeting was held in the open air on Thursday forenoon and afternoon. Ten sermons were delivered, Br. A. Moore, of Anson, was ordained, and a Conference meeting was also held. Forty-seven preachers were present, and forty-seven lay delegates from six Associations. Adjourned to meet on the last Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1841, at such place as Br. Drew may designate.

The New Hampshire Convention met in Weare, June 17th. Brs. C. Woodhouse, N. Gunnison, L. C. Browne and R. O. Williams, with six laymen, were appointed delegates to the U. S. Convention. A Resolution of condolence with the family of Br. A. L. Balch, deceased, was passed. Adjourned without day or place.

TRUTH ITS OWN APOLOGIST.

Some people seem determined to take up, in their own minds, with any excuse, rather than believe a doctrine, the truth of which they can not overthrow. One excuse has become quite common among the determined opposers of Universalism, notwithstanding it has been noticed and answered repeatedly by Universalists. It is alluded to now, not on account of any weight that is to be attached to it—for those who use it care nothing about the consistency or inconsistency of it, and never urge it against any other subject—but it is alluded to here in order to make the objector answer himself in relation to his only resort when argument fails him.

"If Universalism is true what is the use of preaching it?" This is the excuse which is so frequently used with what I call a sort of mock triumph. We may labor as we please to convince our opposing brother of the truth of Universalism; we may show him that God has implanted principles in his very best nature, and enjoined duties upon him, which give the lie to the doctrine of endless misery; we may remind him that the serious believer in ceaseless woe can not pray in faith for all men, can not desire their salvation, and the accomplishment of the will of God at the same time, can not consistently love the very enemies whom God will hate through an endless eternity; we may remind him that the unavoidable love for his offspring and friends, which God has stamped upon his nature, is continually seeking for some exception to what he believes to be true; we may show him that he can not be as benevolent towards his fellow being as God has commanded him to be, without being himself miserable as long as the misery of the object of that benevolence shall last; and we may show, in addition to all this, the express declarations of holy writ, that "the Lord will not cast off for ever," that "though he cause grief yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies," and in fine that God "will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth;" and after we have done all, we shall be met with the childish, foolish question, "If Universalism be true what is the use of preaching it?"

Partialist brother or sister, this has been your resort. Now suppose I should admit that the question can not be answered—that the particular quality attached to the reasons for preaching Universalism can not be specified, even though that may be true. In proposing your question, you have admitted, for the sake of the argument, that Universalism is true, and you have attempted to draw from that admission the confession that it is useless. If, then, Universalism be true, the doctrine of endless misery must be false. Now, even admitting that your question can not be answered, is it not plain that the truth should be preached and believed, in preference to a falsehood?

But the objection can be avoided; and in showing this I design, that you shall be a weapon against yourself by answering your own question. The science of Geology is true. The labors of scientific and experienced men have established this point beyond controversy, and accordingly it is already being brought down to the comprehension and within the reach, of the tyro at school. But I ask, if Geology is true what is the use of teaching it? Because, I hear you reply, Geology, being true, explains many wonderful phenomena of matter, the changes which the earth has undergone since the morning of time, the laws by which it has been governed, and the regular succession and appearance of inert, vegetable, and animal matter. In view, therefore, of the revelations of this true science, say you, it is calculated to instruct the mind in wisdom, and lead it to reverence and admire the power, wisdom, and goodness of the great Creator—therefore it should be taught. This is your answer. It implies thus far, that truth is calculated to promote the highest good of man.

Astronomy, as a science, is true, as far as it goes with any considerable degree of certainty. Of this you are so fully persuaded, that you would think him almost unqualified for usefulness who is ignorant of the elementary principles of astronomy. But answer me. If astronomy is true what is the use of teaching it? Because, say you, it unfolds the mysteries of the heavenly bodies; reveals to your comprehension the everlasting bounds of heat and cold, day and night, Summer and Winter; pierces the invisible regions of space, that it may mark the pathway of the comet, whose visitations you have never seen and may never behold; and thus while it lifts the soul in aspirations and emotions too big for utterance—too grand and imposing to be earth born—enlightens and purifies the judgment and leads it to reverence and adore the great Controller. You have answered truly, and your answer is an admission that man's highest good rests in a knowledge of the truth.

The science of moral philosophy is true. You have studied it when you strove to know yourself, your susceptibilities, your capabilities, and your responsibilities. You have studied it when you have sought to become acquainted with human nature, its virtues, and its frailties. You have acknowledged its truth, when you have scolded yourself for neglect of duty. You have preached it when you have warned the transgressor to beware of his iniquities. But I urge the question—if moral philosophy is true what is the use of preaching it? And I hear your answer. You tell me of the faculties with which God has endowed me, and the laws by which they are governed. You tell me of the spiritual blessings which surround me, and the exalted station which I may occupy if I will. You tell me of the unavoidable, and natural consequences of sin. You tell me that by a knowledge of these, the mind is enlightened, the soul increased in reverence and devotion to God, and the heart made better and happier. You have answered truly, and your answer is an admission of the fact that the highest good of man consists in a knowledge of the truth.

Yes, dear, opposing brother, in answering my questions, you have answered your own; and more than I required of you—you have been preaching Universalism! "Give instruction to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser; teach a just man, and he will increase in learning."

EVENING DEVOTION.

Oh! Father! bless me now,
At evening's twilight hour,
While at thy feet I humbly bow,
Oh! may my words have power!

Oh! wilt thou look on me,
And rest a blessing here;
And while I now commune with thee,
Banish each doubt and fear.

Father! forgive each thought,
Unworthy thee or thine—
And may Religion's brightest flowers,
And purity be mine!

Teach me thy wisdom, Lord—
The wisdom that is love,
Till I become in thought and word,
Fit for thy home above!

Father! I lean on thee,
My Helper and my Friend!
And while thy goodness here I see,
My love shall never end;

And when thou call'st me home,
Oh! may I come in peace,
And meet thee in that happy land,
Where all our sorrows cease!

THE CLEMATIS.

BY L. E. L.

Around the cross the flower is winding,
Around the old and ruined wall;
And with its fragile flowers, binding
The arch with which it soon must fall.
And two before that cross are praying—
One, with her earnest eyes above;
The other, as the heart, delaying,
Bleat heavenly with some earthly love.

St. Marie's shrine is now laid lowly,
Shivered its windows' rainbow panes;
Silent its hymn;—that pale flower solely,
Of all its former pride remains.
Hushed is the ancient anthem, keeping
The vigil of the silent night;
Gone is the censer's silver sweeping;
Dim is the sacred taper's light.

True, the rapt soul's divine emotion,
The desert wind to heaven may bear;
'Tis not the shrine that makes devotion,
The place that sanctifies the prayer:
But yet I grieve that thus departed,
The faith has left the fallen cell;
How many, lorn and broken-hearted,
Were thankful in their shade to dwell!

Not on the young mind, filled with fancies
And hopes, whose gloss is not yet gone;
Not on the early world's romances,
Should the cell close its funeral stone!
Still is the quiet cloister wanted,
For those who wear a weary eye;
Whose life has long been disenchanted,
Who have one only wish—to die.

How oft the heart of woman, yearning
For love it dreams but never meets,
From the world, worn and weary, turning,
Could shelter in these dim retreats!
There were that solemn quiet given,
That life's harsh, feverish, hours deny!
There might the last prayer rise to heaven,
"My God! I pray thee, let me die!"

DIAMONDS.

Diamonds! what a strange passion; what a curious disease; what a topic for speculative curiosity, is the thirst which some women feel for these precious articles! And as if it were not enough to spend thousands of pounds on what paste and glass may be made to imitate, they must needs have better than their neighbors, and in the desire to outshine, for every thing else. Many a handsome woman enters a room, far prouder of the stones in her hair and on her bosom than all the real advantages Nature has given her; and many an ugly woman has ruined her husband, and starved her trades-people, that she might have a larger drop to her necklace, than Lady Ballyna. Why? Is the handsome woman happier or even more admired; is the ugly woman less ugly with her diamonds than without them? Of all the different madresses and false tastes created by idleness and luxury, this is the most unaccountable! A certain lady of fashion was for years in the habit of collecting emeralds, pearls, and other precious stones, one by one; and after she had a sufficient number for a necklace, she would request her husband to "set them." Extravagance in proportion with this branch of expenditure, gradually consumed what had originally been a splendid fortune; the lady sighed over the increasing embarrassment of her circumstances, but continued her collection of jewels. At length the day arrived when they were pronounced ruined, who had long been so in reality. The lady behaved beautifully on the occasion; agreed to every species of retrenchment, but refused to give up her jewels, which would have covered almost the half of their debts. Tempted some time afterwards by a jeweller's advertisement, she went out, succeeded in bargaining for the most pure and perfect emeralds, and, on her return, found that her husband, who had long been in low spirits, had shot himself through the head. The jury brought in a verdict of lunacy—and all his friends went about regretting that they had not foreseen and prevented his melancholy end—but no one saw madness in the lady's conduct; and she afterwards made a rich banker (her second husband) set that very emerald as a drop to the most superb necklace ever worn at court by any one under the rank of a royal Dutchess.

AFFECTING ANECDOTE.—A circumstance of a very interesting kind occurred some time since at one of the Greek isles. A number of the islanders, terrified at the approach of a Turkish force, hurried on board a large boat, and pushed off from land. The wife of one of them, a young woman of uncommon loveliness, seeing her husband departing, stood on the shore, stretching out her hands towards the boat, and imploring, in the most moving terms, to be taken on board. The Greek saw it without concern or pity, and, without aiding her escape, bade his companions hasten their flight.

This unfortunate woman, left unprotected in the midst of her enemies, struggled through scenes of difficulty and danger, of insult and suffering, till her failing health and strength, together with a heart broken by sorrow, brought her to her death-bed. She had never heard from her husband; and when wandering among the mountains, lying down in some wretched habitation, or compelled to urge her flight amidst cruel fatigues, her affection for him, and the hope of meeting him again, bore up her courage through all.

He came at last, when the enemy had retreated, and the Greeks had returned to their homes again; and hearing her situation, was touched with deep remorse.—But all hope of life was then extinguished—love had changed to aversion, and she refused to see or forgive him. There is at times, in the character of a Greek woman, as more than one occasion occurred of observing, a strength and sternness that is remarkable. Her sister and relations were standing round her bed; and never in the days of health and love did she look so touchingly beautiful as then; her fine dark eyes were turned on them with an expression as if she mourned not to die, but still felt deeply her wrongs; the natural paleness of her cheek was crimsoned with a hectic hue, and the rich tresses of her black hair fell disheveled by her side. Her friends with tears entreated her to speak to and forgive her husband; but she turned her face to the wall, and waved her hand for him to begone. Soon the last pang came over her, and affection conquered; she turned suddenly round, raised a look of forgiveness to him, placed her hand in his, and died.

WHY MAY NOT I TOO?

"Father," said a young man once, to a patriarch of the mountains, who is still living, (after being told that he must not go with half a dozen idle fellows, who had come to invite him,) "father, why is it that you deny me those privileges which other parents grant so readily to their sons of my own age?" "David," said the father, after lifting up his head and leaning his head upon the top of his hoe-handle, "I have lived much longer in the world than you have, and I see dangers which you little suspect. These young men are in a bad way. Such habits of idleness, and this going about to frolics and horse-races, will ruin them. You will see, if you live, that some of them will get into the State's prison, by and by, and it is well if they do not come to the gallows. These are my reasons for wishing you to have nothing to do with them." David was satisfied. Years rolled away. Those young men soon spent their patrimony, and fell into dissipated habits. From step to step they went on, till the prediction of the patriarch was literally fulfilled. Two or three of them were sent to the State's prison, and one at least was hanged.—Dr. HUMPHREY.

TOMATOES.

A celebrated writer observes, that "the common tomato, made into a gravy, by stewing over the fire, and used as a sauce for meat, has been known to quicken the action of the liver and bowels, better than any medicine he ever made use of." He states further that—"When afflicted with an action of the bowels, head-ache, a bad taste of the mouth, straitness of the chest, and a dull and painful heaviness of the region of the liver, the whole of these symptoms are removed by Tomoto sauce, and the mind, in the course of some few hours, is put in perfect tune."

To make them into catsup, use one pint of fine salt to one peck of Tomatoes; bruise them and let them stand two days; then strain them dry, and boil the juice until the scum stops rising, with two ounces of black pepper, the same quantity of pimento or allspice, one ounce of ginger, one of clove, and a half an ounce of mace.

THE DEATH OF THE YOUNG.

Beautiful is that season of life, when we can say in the language of the Scripture, "thou hast the dew of thy youth." But of these flowers, death gathers many. He places them upon his bosom, and his form is changed to something less terrific than before. We learn to gaze and shudder not, for he carries in his arms the sweet blossoms of our earthly hopes. We shall see them again blooming in a happier land.

Yes—Death brings us again to our friends. They are waiting for us—and we shall not be long. They have gone before us—and are like the angels in heaven. They stand upon the borders of the grave, to welcome us with the countenance of affection, which they wore on earth—yet more lovely—more radiant—more spiritual.

"A man who, to good nature, adds the general rudiments of good-breeding, provided he rest contented with a simple and unaffected manner of behaving and expressing himself, will never be ridiculous, in the best society."

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION...NO. XII.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"Knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord: (for we walk by faith, not by sight;) we are confident, . . . and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord."

In our last number it will be recollected we introduced a scriptural incident, with some remarks thereon, in disproof principally of the doctrine that the spirits of the departed are all sleeping in unconsciousness. In the present number we shall present some additional evidence against the doctrine, and shall examine certain arguments advanced in its support.

There are certain passages of scripture which teach unequivocally that in that state of existence which succeeds the death of the body, at least some of mankind go, or have gone, to be with Christ. Some of these passages we will now present; and along with them some few remarks, designed to show that those with Christ are in a conscious state.

When Jesus was discoursing with his disciples respecting his being about to leave them, he said, "Let not your heart be troubled: . . . In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." John. xiv. 1-3. Now I can not think that the Saviour here meant, that in his Father's house are many sleeping-rooms, and that he was going thither to fit up an apartment for his disciples to repose in through the long, long night of unconsciousness, which according to this doctrine, was to intervene between the time of their deaths and the far-off morning of a yet future resurrection. To me, he seems to promise that there they should enjoy his society, (and be awake of course.) For certainly these words of the Saviour were designed to be words of comfort; and the disciples' trouble obviously arose from what he just said to them, "Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek me, and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go ye can not come, so now I say to you." Chap. xiii. 33. How cheering then the assurance that though they were unable to go to him, he would come to them, and conduct them to his Father's house, that they might again be with him. And that the first Christians did not expect to remain in an unconscious state for perhaps thousands of years before being received by the Saviour, is at least indicated by the circumstance, that Stephen, while being stoned, exclaimed, on being favored with a view of him in heaven, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." I can not believe that that desire remains yet ungranted.

Some, however, are very sanguine in the belief that none of the departed are yet with the Saviour, and that none will be till all are raised from the dead. Let such then consider the words of Paul in Phil. i. 23-25, "I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far [the] better; nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you. And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide," etc. While he should abide in the flesh, he of course would not depart from the flesh; but he rather wished to depart, for the reason that he wished to be with Christ. Did he not then expect that when he left the flesh he should be with the Saviour in a different sense from what he could be while in the flesh.

The apostle John speaks of having "fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ," whilst in the present state; and we suppose it will not be doubted that Paul, while here, enjoyed the same, as also what himself denominates "the fellowship of the Spirit," to which may be added what is usually called the fellowship of the saints. Would he then consider it so very desirable to depart hence into a state of profound and dreamless sleep, to be indeed with Christ in the sense of locality, but enjoying nothing, being totally unconscious of the Saviour's presence, and indeed of his existence, yea of the existence of God, and even that there was such a being as himself? Would he say that this was "far better" than to abide in the flesh a while first? especially with the idea that he should not awake till morning let him retire to rest ever so early? I confess I think not. A state of know-nothingness I can not prefer to Christian enjoyment, and I think Paul could not.

The same apostle declares in 2 Cor. v. 6, "Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord." The word "whilst," as all are aware, signifies so long as. The doctrine of Paul is here in direct terms expressed to be, that we are absent from the Lord Jesus so long as we are in the body. And as in the passage from Philippians, so in this, it would seem to be also implied very clearly, that when, or as soon as we leave the body, we shall be not absent from the Lord, but with him. This, however, is not left to stand upon the ground of implication or mere inference; for he adds at verse 8, "We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord."

But we cite this passage principally for the purpose of proving more directly that when we come to be with the Saviour we shall be aware of the fact, and consequently be in a knowing state. The 6th verse, as we have seen, mentions being at home in the body and absent from the Lord, while the 8th verse speaks of being absent from the body and present with the Lord; and between these, in the 7th verse, is the following parenthesis, "For we walk by faith, not by sight." Observe here, it is whilst we are absent from the Lord that we walk not by sight but by faith; that is, we do not now see the Saviour, but only believe in him. And why should the apostle throw in this remark—what pertinency can there be in it, unless he meant to teach that when we come to be present with Christ we shall see him? Now we walk by faith; then, as John expresses himself, "we shall see him as he is." If we see, we shall know something; if we know any thing, we shall be in a state of consciousness. Away, then, with that cold and cheerless doctrine which teaches that when we leave the body we shall enter upon a state of total insensibility; shall sleep, and sleep, and sleep on, through unreckoned ages, not knowing enough to know that we ever were in a knowing state.

The query will now arise, Does not the writer know that the Scripture declares, in so many words, that "the dead know not any thing?" Eccl. ix. 5. I answer that I am perfectly aware there is such a text, and that in view of it I have given to the last two sentences of the preceding paragraph their peculiar phraseology, so as to make my own language suggest to the reader's mind what I suppose is considered the strongest text in the Bible, in proof of the doctrine which I am laboring to disprove by proving its opposite. For I am certainly willing that every argument, for or against, should strike the mind of the reader with its full force.

There is danger, however, of being led into erroneous conclusions by the mere sound of words. Thus the same Bible which teaches unequivocally that all shall be made alive, that there shall be a resurrection of all, also, declares, respecting certain persons, "They are dead, they shall not live: they are deceased, they shall not rise." Isa. xxvi. 14. Now does not this sound as though some shall never be made alive, or raised from the dead? And yet I am not aware that this text is ever urged against the universality of the resurrection, or indeed, to show that the Bible teaches contradictory doctrines; the reason for which I know not, but it certainly is not difficult to perceive that the passage may have reference merely to living on the earth, or rising to mortality, in which case the sense would be, simply, that the persons were actually dead, and of course beyond the possibility of resurrection by human means. So, in Ps. xxxviii. 10, it is asked, "Shall the dead arise and praise thee," the implied answer to which is that they shall not; for it is clear from the context, that the question is not a call for information, but is a form of speech equivalent to a negative assertion. And if this text refers to a rising to immortality, then it certainly denies that there is any such resurrection at all—a conclusion which Christians will be slow to adopt. It is plain, however, that the rising of the dead here is the same as in the passage just quoted from Isaiah.

In a number of texts it is denied merely that the dead praise the Lord, or that they can praise him; and these are quoted, and this along with them, to prove that the spirits of the dead are asleep, (also to prove that the spirits of the dead are dead.) Thus in Isa. xxxviii. 18, we read that king Hezekiah, when he "had recovered from his sickness," said, "The grave can not praise thee, death can not celebrate thee: they that go down into the pit can not hope for thy truth." This latter part of the sentence shows that the terms death and the grave are used for persons dead and buried; hence that the sense is, Those that are in the grave can not praise thee, those that are dead can not celebrate thee. And this is further shown by the next words, "The living, the living, he shall praise thee." Yet that this passage does not teach that the departed can not praise the Lord in another state of being, either because they do not exist in any such state, or if they do, are not aware of it, will be evident by considering the 19th and 20th verses: "The living, the living, he shall praise thee, as I do this day: the father to the children shall make known thy truth. [They that go down into the pit can not hope for God's truth. Verse 18.] The Lord was ready to save me [from dying]: therefore we will sing my songs to the stringed instruments all the days of our life in the house of the Lord." Here the manifest reference is to praising the Lord in the manner practised among mortals on the earth; ("as I do this day," etc.) hence it is quite evident to my mind, and I should think it might be so to others, that as the worship or praise which is here spoken of is the visible or sensible worship of God, so the dead here mentioned are the visible dead, that is to say, corpses, which do not, and can not, take any part in such worship.

In Ps. vi. 5, it is said, "In death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?" As the passage last quoted from Isaiah, teaches that persons dead and buried do not praise nor celebrate the Lord after the manner of the living, so this, I conceive, asserts merely that such do not in like manner give thanks to, nor remember Him. The like may be said of Ps. cxv: 17, "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence."

But to return to the text from Ecclesiastes; "the dead know not any thing." I am convinced that the meaning of this is similar to that of the passages we have been considering; namely, that dead bodies know nothing. In the verse preceding it, we read, "For to [rather, of] him that is joined to all the living, there is hope;" which clearly implies that to or of him that is not thus joined, there is not hope. To be joined to all the living, is to be alive on the earth, for life is the very thing that thus joins us. The reference of this passage I consider to be the same as of that where it is said, "There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again. . . . but man dieth and wasteth away. . . . man lieth down and riseth not." See Job xiv: 7-12. And we say respecting the passage from Ecclesiastes, much as we did in a previous number respecting this one from Job. If it has reference to any thing beyond this world, then it teaches what is manifestly at variance with the teachings of Christ, with the Christian hope; and in such case, I, for one, could not receive it as of divine authority. I say if, for I am perfectly convinced that it has no such reference. For, aside from all other considerations, only observe how the passage closes, verse 7, "Neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun."

Again, if the phrase, "the dead know not any thing," is to be understood of the minds or spirits of men after death, then the phrase which follows it, "neither have they any more a reward," must be understood of men's minds or spirits also. And this last text must therefore be, what some indeed, consider it to be, and quote accordingly, proof positive that there is no such thing as reward beyond this life, in either a happy or an unhappy sense. Now, I have nothing to do with this question, as it does not belong to my subject—what I am endeavoring to show, is the true reference of the passage which these texts form a part of. Solomon assigns a reason why the dead have no more a reward; and the reason assigned by him, is, "for the memory of them is forgotten." Forgotten by whom? The proper answer to this question depends upon the reference of the passage. If it refers to the condition of departed spirits, then the meaning can not be that they are forgotten by men upon earth, for this is no reason for the absence of reward in another state. The answer then must be—if the passage teaches, and truly, that departed spirits know nothing, it also teaches, and just as truly, that the memory of such spirits is forgotten by Him from whom they proceeded, and to whom, as even Solomon himself teaches, they are destined to return. Eccl. xii: 7. I therefore conclude that the passage in question does not relate to the minds or spirits of the dead.

As a further proof that our view of the reference of this passage is correct, let us attend to verse 10, which commences, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Now does it not really seem here, as though Solomon were exhorting to diligence in the ordinary business of life? I think the unprejudiced reader must say yes. Well, he adds, as an incentive to diligence, "for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest;" as if he had said that the common laborer, the mechanic, the professional man, and the philosopher, all cease their pursuits at death. And yet this text also, has been quoted in proof of the position that the spirits of the departed are in a state of inactivity and utter unconsciousness.

We will now transcribe the whole of the passage embracing the text in question, Eccl. ix: 5-7. "For to him that is joined to all the living, there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward: for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun." The sense of the above, as I understand it, omitting one clause, the exact import of which is perhaps doubtful, and probably not essential to the subject in hand, is as follows: So long as a man has life, there is some hope of his usefulness; for as a dog that is alive is better than a lion that is dead, so the most insignificant of our race, if living, is of more consequence in the world than the carcass of even the greatest monarch. For any live man knows enough to know that he shall die; but a corpse knows nothing; neither are such the subjects of either blame or praise. * * * * Also the likes, and the dislikes, and the desires, common to men, they are destitute of; neither have they any part, or interest, or concern, in any of "the business that is done upon the earth."

If it be objected that by the dead here can not be meant the bodies of the dead, because Solomon says they have no more a reward, no more a portion, thus implying that they once had, which is not properly true of the body—I reply, that scarcely any thing is more common than, by the use of a figure, to speak of a corpse as a person. Thus if some one were to say respecting the illustrious Washington, "I never saw him but once, and that was at his funeral," it would be but a customary mode of speaking; yet we should not understand him that he ever really saw Washington at all, but only his corpse. And if he were to add, "Yet even when dead, his countenance indicated a great mind," he would still speak intelligibly; yet we should understand merely that the countenance of the corpse indicated that it had been the residence of a great mind.

If it be thought unlikely that Solomon should have put forth so obvious a truism as that dead bodies know nothing, we would ask what else but truisms are a very great many of his observations, scattered all through the book of Ecclesiastes? See particularly, chap. iii: 1-8, where may be found truths that are new to nobody. But how do we know that this was so much of a truism in those days? Even now, in some Christian countries, a corpse is buried with a small piece of money in its hand, to pay its admission-fee with at the gate of heaven!

To conclude our remarks upon this passage, I observe that Solomon is set forth in the Scriptures to have been a wise man, but he is not there declared to have been a prophet. He was unquestionably a philosopher, but certainly was not an apostle. I must therefore, consider it quite unlikely that he should have undertaken to describe the condition of departed spirits. And if he did attempt this, and was divinely inspired so to do, is it not truly remarkable that his teachings on the subject are not once quoted in all the Christian Scriptures, and that neither Jesus nor his apostles ever taught any thing resembling it?

There is one passage more which demands a brief consideration, as it is thought to be the next to the strongest proof-text found in the Bible, in support of the doctrine under examination, as also of the doctrine that the whole man perishes at death. We are informed in the Scriptures, say the advocates of these doctrines, that man's "thoughts perish" at death—and from this each proceeds to argue the truth of his doctrine. But as I have before observed, there is danger of being misled by the sound of words. By a man's thoughts are sometimes meant his calculations, expectations, or desires. Thus in Prov. xvi: 3, it is said, "Commit thy works unto the Lord, and thy thoughts shall be established." So in Ps. xlix: 11, it is said of some, "Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling-places to all generations." Such a thought must inevitably perish, sooner or later, yet it by no means necessarily follows that the individual will stop thinking. So a man may think or calculate to leave, when he dies, a vast amount of money to his children, but he may die penniless, or childless, and his thoughts or calculations will fail of course, and that too in the very day that he dies; and yet the faculty of thinking in him may be neither destroyed nor suspended.

The passage embracing the text alluded to reads thus: "Put not your trust in princes, no in the son of man, in whom there is no help. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish. Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the Lord his God." Ps. cxlvi: 3-5. Now why not trust in man? Because in man there is no help. And how no help? Answer, man dies, returns to dust, and "his thoughts perish." What then? "Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help," etc.

The sense of the passage, to my understanding, is this: We should trust in God rather than in man, for even princes die, and when dead can do no more for us. Death destroys their calculations. Now the fact that men's calculations fail or perish at death, seems to me to be a very good reason for not trusting in man. But to say, Trust not in man, for when he dies he stops thinking, is, to me, no reason at all.

It will now be asked, Do we not read in the Scriptures of persons falling asleep, sleeping, and being asleep, when the meaning is that they died, or were dead? I answer yes; and the fact so far from proving the doctrine under examination, goes rather against it.

In John xi: 11-14, we read that Jesus being away beyond the Jordan, was sent for to visit a sick friend at Bethany, near Jerusalem; and for reasons then known to none but himself, delayed setting out on the journey for two days. He then proposed going, and said to his disciples, who tried to dissuade him from visiting that part of the country, "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep." Then said his disciples, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. Howbeit, [adds John,] Jesus spake of his death; but they thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep. Then said Jesus plainly, Lazarus is dead." In like manner, when Stephen was stoned, it is said of him, "he fell asleep." Acts vii: 60. But the next words are, "And Saul was consenting unto his death." So also in 1 Thess. iv: 15, this same Saul, alias the apostle Paul, speaks of "them which are asleep," and places them in contrast with those "which are alive," thus clearly evincing that by those asleep he means what he afterwards calls "the dead," (verse 16,) which also he places in contrast with those "which are alive," (verse 17.) Thus it is easy to see that falling asleep, sleeping, and being asleep, mean nothing more than dying and being dead, and that these expressions relate only to the death of the body. If, then, in the Scriptures, to be asleep signifies only that the individual has undergone the death of the body, it seems rather improbable that the sleep of the spirit after the death of the body, is really a Scripture doctrine.

Another fact well worthy of notice, is, that we nowhere read in the Scriptures, that the spirits of the dead either sleep or die, at least literally. Thus, Stephen when being stoned, beheld the Saviour in heaven, and said, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." And we are directly told—not that his spirit fell asleep, but that he fell asleep, that is, as we have seen, he died the death of the body. To sleep, and to die, are convertible expressions, and relate merely to bodily death. More anon.

TOTAL DEPRAVITY.

The reader need not indulge in any fearful apprehensions because our motto denotes such a hackneyed subject, for it is not our design to impose a great tax upon his patience. We know that this doctrine of late, like the chameleon, has assumed a great many colors; some tell us they mean by total depravity that man is wholly averse to all good, and inclined to all evil; others, that he does not naturally love his Creator with all his mind and might and strength; and others say that all they intend by it is, that no one lives and sins not—that sin prevails universally.

To whom shall we go to learn what the doctrine is? To unimportant individuals, or to some of our erudite professors in theology? If we go to the creeds which are used by most Partialists—creeds to which all, to be admitted into the church, let their belief be what it may, must assent—creeds which men are given to support let the Bible teach what it will, and professors are sworn to defend—if we go to these, we are taught that “man is wholly unlike and opposed to God and true holiness.”

The facts around us, that stand out in bold contradiction to this horrid sentiment, are so many, that we have not the charity to think that near all who profess it, do actually believe it. To such of its sincere believers as are disposed to think, we would propound the following questions:

If man is naturally “wholly unlike and opposed to God and true holiness,” is he an accountable being?

Should he be punished for proceeding according to the dictates of that nature implanted within him by his Maker? Were not the primitive professors of this sentiment driven to the expedient of adopting it, to avoid coming to the scriptural conclusion, that “the way of transgressors is hard?” that sin is here punished? that the government of God is perfect in this state of being?

If man is not “totally depraved”—does not delight in sin, and “there is no peace to the wicked,” does it not follow that he is equitably rewarded and punished in this mortal state? Will there be any necessity of adjudging him to undying agonies in the world of spirits?

If he is inclined to all evil, what good can preaching do? Why send missionaries to the heathen? A wrong construction will be put upon all their teachings—they can do no good.

Dr. Wayland, President of B. U., and a staunch defender of this doctrine, says in his “Elements of Moral Science,” that “there is in man a natural desire or thirst for truth.” If this is true, can he be “totally depraved?” Would he not possess a “natural desire or thirst” for falsehood rather than truth?

I once heard a renowned Presbyterian preacher attempt to prove the doctrine, by saying, that it was proved true from the fact that all men sinned. To effect this, I ask this question: Is it not as conclusively proved, that man is wholly inclined to virtue from the fact, that all men do sometimes perform virtuous deeds?

If it is true that man prior to a radical metamorphose is not capable of doing right in thought, word or act, whence comes the virtue in the world? can any of it be attributed to him?

Finally, if it is in accordance with man's nature to roll in sin, and if sin of all kinds conduces to his happiness, should he not be sentenced to the abode of the damned? Would he not be as happy there in proceeding according to his nature as are the saints in heaven in proceeding according to their natures? “I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say.” F. W.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Allegany Association of Universalists, for 1840.

Convened at Ellicottville, July 1st, 1840, and organized by choosing Br. C. Morton, Moderator, and R. Thornton 2d, Clerk.

Appointed Mrs. J. Lewis, L. Vinton, and Quartus Rust, Esq., committee on discipline, fellowship and ordination; R. Thornton, L. Vinton, and — St. John, committee on conferences; J.

Lewis, J. B. Sharp, (clerical,) A. Dygert, — St. John, (lay) delegates to the State Convention in 1841, with power to appoint substitutes.

Heard the report of the committee, appointed at the last session of this body to collect and arrange some records which were deficient relative to the formation of this Association, and its then condition; ordered that the report be attached to, and preserved with the records of the proceedings of this body. The committee on Conferences for the past year, reported that conference meetings had been held in Independence, Philipsville, and Hume. The committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of granting a letter to Br. Isaac George, which after proper consideration was granted. The committee on fellowship and ordination for the past year, reported that Br. Judah Babcock did, immediately after the close of the last session of this body, return his letters of fellowship and ordination to them, and that they were then in their possession subject to the action of the council—and, whereas he now requests the same to be returned to him, stating that he never designed to withdraw from the denomination, or place himself beyond the reach of its discipline—and as in the opinion of this council, the said committee had no authority from the constitution to receive and retain the same—therefore,

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to return his letters, in compliance with his request. Whereas, none of the committee on discipline for the past year are present, and it appearing that several reports unfavorable to the moral character of Br. Babcock, were put in circulation soon after he returned his letters, therefore, Resolved, that the committee of discipline now chosen, be requested to inquire into their truth or falsity, and report to this council. The committee accordingly reported, that on investigation they were satisfied that the reports which had been in circulation, implicating the moral character of Br. J. Babcock, were not founded in truth. The council, after further examination and discussion, agreed unanimously to concur with the said report.

After several remarks by various brethren on the subject of temperance, it was Resolved, that we disprove of the use of ardent spirits as a beverage, and therefore will not countenance its use in community, and especially by the clergy.

Appointed Br. Isaac George to preach the next occasional sermon, and Br. R. Thornton to prepare the minutes for publication.

Adjourned to meet in Pike, on the fourth Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1841.

C. MORTON, Moderator.

R. THORNTON, Clerk.

Ministering brethren present.—S. Adams, T. C. Eaton, J. Eaton, L. Paine, C. Morton, J. Lewis, J. Todd, S. Remington, D. Van Alstine, I. George, R. Thornton, J. Babcock.

Lay members present.—L. Vinton, Q. Rust, Ellicottville; S. Cowley, Conewango; — St. John, Otto, A. Dygert, J. Wilcox, Ashford; E. G. Leavens, J. P. Swift, Rushford; Charles Williams, Ellicottville.

REMARKS.—“Every where we have cause for rejoicing and cause for weeping.” We came up to a feast of fat things. The presence of the mighty God of Jacob was with us. The banner of pure and undefiled religion was unfurled, the glorious faith of the Gospel with its blessed influences, was portrayed, our hearts were warmed with the genial beams of the Sun of Righteousness, the balm of Gilead proved its healing power in reconciling differences and removing unkind feelings, and we were brought to know how good and how pleasant it is, for brethren to dwell together in unity.

Seven sermons were preached on the occasion, and twelve ministering brethren, besides some who but recently commenced, were present; but the number of lay delegates in attendance, was unusually small. Only eight or nine, and not all of these properly delegated; whereas, there should have been from forty to fifty. It appears seven societies were represented by their delegates at the formation of this Association; viz: Ashford, Belfast, Canada, Centerville, Friendship, Nunda and Pike. The church in Ellicottville and the society in Hume have since been received. Besides, there are congregations of believers, where societies (rather churches) should exist, and in several of which they have once been formed; in Amity, Friendship, Freedom, Portage, Rushford, Yorkshire, Angelica, Franklinville, Randolph, Clear Creek, Conewango, etc.

Most of these places include within their bounds from 15 to 30 or 40 males who profess to be believers in the “great salvation,” yet nearly all are destitute of, or have only occasional preaching. The principal exceptions are, Hume one half, Amity and Friendship each one fourth, and of late Freedom one half, and Yorkshire one fourth, and a few other places have had regular preaching a part of the past year. Further statistical information, we are not prepared to give. Most of the societies have neglected to keep up their organization; and throughout the bounds of the association, a great apathy and indifference to our glorious cause, prevails among its pretended friends. Many are but lukewarm, and at every trifling obstacle or opposition, become discouraged. But may we not hope that this state of things will not long continue, and that the time is not far distant when the Great Head of the church will deign in mercy to revive his work in this portion of his moral heritage—when sleeping professors shall awake from their heavy-slumbers, and clothe themselves with righteousness and girt themselves about with zeal, and come up and possess the city of our God? Let every one who professes faith in our Lord Jesus Christ as a universal Saviour, but act as becometh his disciples—manifesting their faith by their zeal and good works, and the Father of spirits will assuredly bless each humble endeavor to build up and spread the great and glorious cause of universal holiness and happiness. By order of the council, R. THORNTON 2d, Clerk.

PERSECUTION.

BY REV. W. N. BARBER.

"Then said Jesus unto him, put up again thy sword into its place."—MATT. XXVI: 52.

I have sometimes wondered that mankind have been so long basking, as they supposed, in the sunlight of Christianity, and have not as yet learned the fact, that retaliation is an anti-Christian principle. From its earliest infancy, when it lay enwrapped in that unnoticed scene which transpired in the obscure village of Bethlehem, as the future giant oak lies enveloped in the seminal germ; Christianity has ever raised its voice against the principle of rendering evil for evil.

The words of the text fell from the lips of him who spake as never man spake. The circumstances that called them forth are as follows. Before the crucifixion of Jesus—or before Judas used the kiss of friendship to designate him to his enemies, Christ left his disciples in Gethsemane, and went away to pray. While his disciples slept, he went and prayed three times, that the Father would let the cup of death pass from him if it was His will. But the hour that he was to be betrayed had not arrived. "Forthwith he (Judas) came to Jesus, and said, 'Hail, Master!' and kissed him. And Jesus said unto him, friend, wherefore art thou come? Then they came and laid hands on Jesus, and took him. And behold, one of them which were with Jesus, stretched out his hand, and drew his sword, and struck the servant of the high priest, and smote off his ear. Then said Jesus unto him, put up again thy sword into its place, for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." This was the doctrine of Christ. "Put up thy sword"—lay down the weapons of war—"overcome evil with good."

Such is the spirit of that Christianity which stands between man and the indulgence of human passions. But that spirit has been egregiously corrupted. In casting an eye back upon the history of the past, it requires but a slight glance to perceive, that almost every nation on this little oblate spheroid, have from time to time persecuted for opinion's sake. It is almost enough to make one faint, to take the history of the Catholic persecution, and read of the horrors that have visited Holland, France, England, Ireland, Scotland, Spain, etc. Let any man of ordinary feelings, read of those fifty or a hundred thousand, who once suffered by the hand of the executioner in Holland—of those protestant martyrs that have died in France; of Coligni who was basely murdered in his own house—of his body, which after his head was severed from it, was hung up by the feet upon the gibbet—of the innumerable multitude of men, women, and children, who were imprisoned, killed, and dragged through the streets, under the reign of Charles IX.—and if his heart's blood does not chill within him, he is made of sterner stuff than my humble self. The persecutions which took place in the reign of Louis XIV, are also horrid to relate. Mothers were tied to posts, with their infant children starving, languishing, and mourning in their sight. Young women were hung on hooks by the hair, smoked, burned and suffocated.—Some were "stripped naked, stuck with pins and needles from head to foot," while fathers and husbands were tied to their bed posts and their wives and daughters insulted and tortured "before their eyes." Those who endeavored to escape by flight, were pursued by these fiendish Catholic persecutors, and hunted down like wild beasts of the forest. "With these scenes of desolation and horror, the popish clergy feasted their eyes, and made only matters of laughter and sport of them!" Ireland has been the abode of much persecution also. It has been drenched with the blood of protestants. Many here, in the year 1641, were whipped to death—driven from their comfortable habitations; some were to perish with cold and hunger in the forests and mountains—some were driven through the primeval woods and tangled swamps, as naked as they were born. Scotland and Spain, have been visited from time to time by this fell destroyer of prosperity and happiness. Says a writer—"Scotland for many years, has been the scene of cruelty and bloodshed till it was delivered by the monarch at the revolution," and "Popery has had the greatest hand in this mischievous work." It hardly seems necessary to speak of England. True, Wickliffe sunk peacefully to his grave—but his bones could not be suffered to rest.—They were taken up; burnt to ashes, and thrown into the brook of Lutterworth. But is this all? Has England done no more than to burn the bones of the dead—those who are beyond the reach of human power? Let her Hooper and her Rogers answer—her Bilney and her Bayman, who perished in the flames; and they will tell the tale in touching solemnity. It is really serious to read the history of the Popish persecution. Latimer's was a hard fate. He was burnt with Ridley by a slow fire. "Taylor was put into a barrel of pitch and fire set to it." Saunders, Philpot, Bradford and others shared no better fate than did Latimer and Ridley. It is enough to say of England, that in the "year 1556 eighty-five persons were burnt."*

Great God! Is man actually by nature a totally depraved being? Is there nothing good about him? Man is not totally depraved, but he is bad enough in all conscience. He is indeed, a curious being. One moment he is engaged in destroying his fellow-man—wielding the sword of persecution—breasting the flaming lines of battle—going amidst blood, dust and smoke; the next he is found relieving suffering humanity—healing the wounds that he has made. A wonderful creature! A tissue of contradictions! A strange combination of qualities!

In glancing an eye over the history of the past, and contemplating the awful persecutions that have visited the world—to the reflecting mind, the query immediately presents itself, what is the cause of all this bloodshed and slaughter? It has been attributed to Christianity; but this is wrong. It is not Christianity that has done it. No! It is anti-Christianity—it is the corruptions of the thing that have been substituted for the thing itself! Let Christianity come with her peaceful virtues bearing the freshness of a May-day morning upon her cheeks, with the long blaze of glory that lingers in her train, and her language is "put up thy sword—put up thy sword!"

The statement may sound somewhat harsh, yet it is no more harsh than true, that all those churches which have persecuted for opinion's sake, have had the doctrine of endless burning incorporated into their creeds. This doctrine was never taught by Christ or the primitive Christians. Christ came to bring "good news," "glad tidings," etc.; and if he taught the doctrine of endless wo, it was most certainly very bad news. Again, if Christ taught the doctrine of endless wo, he did not teach any thing new. The Heathen mythologists taught it before he came. And Dr. Channing said, when speaking of future wo, "It is not a new doctrine brought by Christ into the world. Though darkened and corrupted, it was spread every where before he came. It carried alarm to rude nations which nothing on earth could terrify. It mixed itself with all the false religions of antiquity."†

And what if I should add, that this doctrine of future, endless torment, has been the cause of all the persecution that has attended the Christian church? All persecutors that I ever read of, believed it. The Roman Catholics believed it, and they put hundreds to death for heresy. Our New-England fathers believed it too, and they executed "peaceful Quakers." John Calvin believed it, and he burnt Servetus at the stake by a slow fire.

Partialist, dost thou say that Universalists persecute? Look back upon the history of the past. Did Origen, Cheyne, Hartley, Chauncey, and others, who taught the Universalist doctrine, hang and burn heretics? "Physician, heal thyself." "First cast the beam out of thine own eye, then thou canst see clearly to cast the mote out of thy brother's eye." Reader, hast thou a disposition to injure a man, or mar his happiness because he does not see as you see? "Put up thy sword again into its place, for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

HEARING OF THE WORD.

BY REV. MOSES BALLOU.

CHAPTER V.

The next class to which we ask attention, is, V. Those whom the apostle denominates, "hearers only." It is a painful sight to the true Christian, to look back upon the fearful estrangement from duty, which has characterized so many professors of Christianity in all ages since its introduction into the world. As we pore over the details of crime and bloodshed that stain the records of their lives; as we trace the history of the deep wrongs committed and suffered; the persecutions that from time to time have arisen against supposed schismatics and heretics; the fiendish cruelties practiced by the old mother church upon dissenters; and also by many of her protestant daughters, who, having cast off her bodily likeness, still retain her ungodly spirit; when we trace the accounts of the martyrs, whose torn and quivering limbs have decked the wheel of torture, whose heads have graced the guillotine—whose bodies have been consumed, inch by inch, at the stake, by fire—whose groans of agony have so often rolled through the gloomy vaults of the inquisition, and whose prayers for mercy have fallen unheard except at the throne of God; the heart sickens and recoils at the contemplation, and the question comes up from the full soul, can this be the spirit of Christ, or that of his teachings? It is in vain that we turn to the precepts or example of that holy teacher for an affirmative answer. We learn from him that all duty is comprised in the two great corresponding affections, love to God and love to man—that we should love all men, even our enemies, and bless them that curse us; that he died to manifest God's love to his foes—that we should be "kind, tender-hearted, and forgiving," and this not to extend to seven offences merely, but to "seventy times seven"; and that the forgiveness of his enemies was sealed with his dying prayer; "leaving us an example that we should walk in his steps." Consequently we affirm, that the authors of those deeds of wickedness were devoid of the spirit of the Gospel; that they "stole the livery of the court of heaven to serve the devil in"; and that those evils are in no respect to be charged to the Christian system. The Gospel would make men good and kind, would they but obey its heavenly teachings; but this they have in many respects, utterly failed to do. They have been "hearers only," but not "doers of the word;" and it is only when this conduct has conformed to the Gospel, that its consequences can be charged upon that pure system. The Gospel finds men bad, and all that can be asked or expected of it, is, salvation for those who obey it. The plain reason that it has not done more, is because hearers have not been doers; and here is the root of the evils to which we have alluded. Bad men have listened to its divine teachings in ages past, only to go away and violate them, and how far this may be the case now, we ask the conscience of every individual who has been accustomed to hear it taught. It is true, that there may be few great evils in community now. Society in general may seem to be living in bonds of peace and amity; still how many little evils there are transacted behind the curtain which shuts them out from the world, and which, though hidden in some degree from the public eye, are nevertheless productive of a thousand disquietudes, and open avenues to continual petty broils, vexations and sorrows. The fit of anger, jealousy, or envy; the unkind word, look or act; the whispered suspicion; the cherished prejudice, and a thousand other nameless evils, still lurk like contagious diseases in various portions of community; occasionally breaking out, and, like the wasting plague, carrying ruin and blight to the joys of all within the reach of its influence. Let any individual seriously propose the question to himself, whether most of the ills he meets with in his pathway, with the exception of sickness and loss of friends, do not originate in, and proceed from, those little sources to which I have referred; and then let him reflect for a moment, how easily all these might be swept away, did each but become, as far as possible, a doer of that word which he is ever so ready to hear. It is most wonderful that so many should listen weekly to the precepts of Christianity; give all its requirements their cordial sanction; pronounce its rules of duty most wise and judicious; admirably adapted to promote our welfare, and yet, live on in daily violation of some of them at least. But this inconsistency, may, perhaps, in part, be accounted for in the next chapter.

THE MIND.

What is it? A something—mysterious, incomprehensible; indefinable; unknown, and yet known—unseen, yet seen—imperceptible, yet felt at all times and under all circumstances—here a moment—then perhaps, having passed through infinite space, visited the old world, crossed the mighty deep and surveyed the shores of eternity—it returns to earth again, all in the next moment of time! O, what is it? What this mysterious faculty? From whence is it derived, and to what is it tending?

Mystery! this world is all mystery! Turn which way soever we may, our eyes are fixed on mysteries still. The very power which now moves my hand at the wish of my heart, is a mystery entirely unaccountable. The mind desires the hand to perform such an act—it does it as quick as that desire is felt. It weighs, compares, and reasons on subjects however dark and unsearchable; it comprehends the most exalted ideas; it rises from finite to infinite, and surveys at a glance the universe.

But who possesses this mysterious faculty? Is it the creature man, whom we see so often sunk to a level with the brutes of the field? Yea, verily, it is! Blush, O, ingratitude; and be ashamed, O, vile man, thus to deface and pollute thy nobler powers—powers which exalt and assimilate thee to the moral image of the great I Am!

SUBLIMITY OF THE SCRIPTURES.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

It has often been said, that no book affords specimens of truer sublimity, than are to be found in the Bible, and I have often thought the remark a just one. Indeed, I am sure, that an appeal to the Bible will fully substantiate the fact. No man, be he Jew or Gentile, Christian or Heathen, theist or atheist, can read this book without finding some of the grandest conceptions—the sublimest descriptions ever penned by mortal man! Nor can these descriptions fail to interest the feelings—to touch the finer sensibilities—to awaken the stronger passions of the soul, of every one that has a soul to be excited, capable of being aroused to a sense of what is truly grand, and majestic!

I have not time, and therefore forbear to particularise by pointing out a variety of passages in the Bible, such as I esteem specimens of pure sublimity. But I would here remark, that the book of Job abounds with no mean specimens of this sort. Many parts of that book, (when viewed by the eye of him, whose mind has been rightly cultivated, in whose soul, are the principles of true greatness—so constituted, that it bears affinity to that which is grand and magnificent,) can not fail to awaken the deeper, the loftier, holier emotions, and cause the mind to glow with holy enthusiasm, as it mounts upward toward the fountain of power, purity, and blessedness.

Who, unmoved, can read the answer of the Lord to Job, as it came from the whirlwind!—There you behold a grand assemblage of creatures, powers, principles, elements, and manifestations! There the neck of the horse is clothed with thunder! There you behold the swift hawk spreading to the south; and the swifter winged eagle soaring aloft toward heaven! There clouds are made as a garment; and thick darkness a swaddling band; the sea is shut up with doors, and a voice with authority and effect, says, thus far shalt thou come and no farther. The way of light is sought out; the treasures of hail and snow are opened, the morning is commanded, and the day spring knoweth his place! Mazoroth, Orion and Arcturus are in their pathway high amid the heavens—the line is stretched upon the earth—the foundations thereof are laid; and all the sons of God are shouting for joy!

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXXIII.

JOHN III: 33. "He that cometh from heaven is above all."

Although these words were spoken with reference to Christ, we are not to understand or infer from such expressions as these, that Jesus had pre-existed and had been in some other world or state before he came into this. What is here said of Jesus coming down from heaven, relates to the heavenly doctrine which he taught, and which he received from God, the intimate presence of God with him, and his communications with God who is always represented as in heaven. Hence Christ is said to come down from heaven—yea, as it is expressed in verse 13th, was then in heaven. See this verse, which of itself is a sufficient commentary on this text. See also Imp. Ver., note, and Kneeland.

Matthew viii: 17. "Himself took our infirmities and bear our sicknesses."

These are the words of Matthew after relating the remarkable cures performed by our Saviour, "healing all that were sick." See verse 16.—The manner in which Matthew applies this prophecy of Isaiah, shows in what sense Christ is said to bear the sins of men, viz., by bearing them or taking them away, not taking them on himself and thereby becoming liable to punishment for them, for certainly, he did not take the bodily infirmities or diseases of men on himself, but removed them by his power. So likewise he removes the moral disorders of men, the diseases or vices of the mind, by the power of his Gospel.

It is frequently asserted that "no sinner could be forgiven but through the blood of the atonement," and this atonement is supposed to have been made by the death of Christ; but it needs no proof that many sinners were forgiven, and their moral as well as physical maladies removed before the death of Christ, and before this atonement was ever made. Christ does not save from punishment, only as he saves us from meriting it by saving us from sin; and what better can we ask than to have our sins removed far from us. Thanks to the Gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation.

Slanders are like flies; they leap over all man's good parts, to light upon his sores.

THE REPORTED CONVENTION, AGAIN.

Many of our readers will remember that, in volume 10, for last year, Nos. 35 and 39, we noticed a story reported by Alexander Campbell and Silas E. Shepard, in relation to a Universalist Convention, in which all the preachers were infidels, and voted to declare themselves such to the world. A few weeks ago, we pledged ourselves to publish any proofs Mr. Shepard could furnish to support his story. The following letter is in reply. Let the reader turn to, and carefully read the articles above named, and then read the following (not proofs of the truth of the story—but) accusations of me, and an attempt to prove that Mr. Shepard's informant did preach, and that one man heard him twice, and thinks he preached Universalism! After this, read my reply. All I ask is a fair hearing of all parties. If the story can be proved in its main particulars, let Mr. Shepard do so, or acknowledge his inability. If his only witness is his deceased brother, let him prove that brother's credibility if he can, or acknowledge that, as that witness was not a man of veracity his testimony should not be taken.

S. E. SHEPARD'S DEFENCE.

MR. GROSH—I have a few things against you, and as they are of the nature of public offences, I wish to rebuke you in a public manner, and therefore solicit a publication of this article in your paper. The following are the offences of which I complain, and on account of which I desire you to make suitable retraction.

1. You charge me of having circulated a report that there had been a Convention of Universalist ministers held in Rochester, the object of which was to deliberate on the expediency of publicly renouncing the Scriptures. This charge is untrue, so far as it relates to the place of holding the meeting. I never said, nor heard, that any Convention of that sort had been held in Rochester, until after you had publicly castigated me for having told such a story. Mr. Gurley stated, that Mr. Campbell had said, that Rochester was the place where this Convention met. But Mr. Campbell corrected that statement in his reply to your letter, by saying, "I think he said his brother had published it in Rochester." "But of this I am not certain." Now, Mr. Grosh, is it fair and honorable, for you to continue to affirm that I said that Rochester was the place where this Convention met? And then proceed to prove that no such Convention had ever been held in that city, and constantly insinuate that I had falsified in relation to the place? No man, living or dead, ever heard me say, that a Universalist Convention, of any sort, ever met in the city of Rochester. Why then do you continue to speak of "Mr. Shepard's Rochester Convention"? After requesting Mr. Campbell to correct Mr. Gurley's statement, if it needed correction; and after receiving a corrected statement from Mr. Campbell, why did you not attack me on that statement, if you wished to destroy my reputation? Was it because a corrected statement would not furnish the means?

After you received Mr. Campbell's reply to your letter, you wrote to me informing me that you had received his statement in relation to the case, and asked "is there any mistake in Mr. Campbell's statement?" In reply to which I gave you a full statement of all that I knew concerning the affair, and informed you that "I did not interrogate him (the Dr.) as to the time, nor place, of the aforesaid meeting, as I expected he would make a full disclosure of the whole affair." Mr. Gurley, in his notice of this report, which is the foundation of all you have said and done in relation to this Convention, stated that he did not pretend to give Mr. Campbell's words; Mr. Campbell clears me from the charge of saying that said Convention met in Rochester, and I told you that I never inquired where the Convention met, because I expected to be informed by a published statement, and after all this, you proceed to prove me a liar, by proving that no such Convention had ever assembled in that city! Mr. Grosh—is all this in accordance with that "spirit of candor, and desire for truth only" which you professed in your letter to me?

I can find an honorable excuse for Mr. Gurley and his informers in the fact that the Dr., from whom the report of this Convention originally came, resided in Rochester. From the statement of this fact they might have understood that said Convention met there. Such a mistake might easily occur. But how to excuse you, Mr. Grosh, for reiterating, time after time, this false charge, with as much confidence, and display of certificates, as if Mr. Gurley had said, "I give Mr. Campbell's exact words," and Mr. Campbell had affirmed, that, "Mr. Shepard told me that the Convention met in Rochester," and I had said Rochester was the place of said meeting; I say, Sir, I can not perceive any excuse for you; but must regard you, as having been under the influence of the most malignant feelings, arising from a thorough conviction, that I had, in my discussion with Mr. Montgomery, most thoroughly and triumphantly refuted your doctrines, and that unless you could destroy the confidence of the Universalist community in my integrity, they would be likely to read that discussion and be convinced of their errors.

2. You charge me with saying that that Convention consisted of fifty Universalist preachers. This charge is also false. The Dr. never told me, nor did I ever tell Mr. Campbell, neither did he, in his correction of Mr. Gurley's statement, allege that I told the number of preachers in said Convention. This must have been apparent to every critical reader of your paper. But notwithstanding these facts, you proceeded as if the whole world had testified that I had fixed the number at "fifty" and sometimes at "fifty-two," to prove that no body of fifty Universalist preachers had ever met West of Utica. Why, Sir, do you lay so much stress on these two points, when it is not in evidence that either the Dr. or myself ever said one word in relation to either of them? And why are you so very careful to say that I gave a "dead man" for my author, but for the purpose of destroying the confidence of your readers in me that they may thereby be prevented from reading my refutation of your doctrine? Ah, this is "a common trick among some polemics, when beaten in fair controversy," and well you know it, Sir.

3. You charge me with giving a "dead man" for my authority, intimating thereby that I was the author of the story, and in order to avoid detection, I gave the name of a man who could not deny it. Mr. Grosh, this is exceedingly unkind, illiberal and unjust. When I gave Mr. Campbell my authority, in June 1836, the Dr. was living in Rochester, and did not die till the 20th April, 1837, nearly a year after I gave him as my authority. Why, then, do you with these facts before you, represent me as contriving to throw the responsibility on him after his death?

4. You deny that the Dr. was ever a Universalist preacher. In this I believe you deny the truth. I say, I believe, because I do not know that he ever was. He told me in presence of witnesses, that he had been a preacher of your order, and the evidence of that fact has been forwarded to you with a request that you would publish it. And although it was forwarded to you months since, by Mr. J. C. Rockwell, of Granville, Pa., you have never yet laid it before your readers as I can learn. You have, through the whole of your management of this case, shown a determination to make your readers believe me to be a liar. For what other purpose did you withhold the certificate of Mr. Rockwell and his lady? It was directed to the Editor of the Universalist paper, Utica, N. Y., with great care, and there is an allusion to it in your last notice of this affair. Mr. Grosh, why did you not do me the justice to lay that certificate before your readers, and thus clear me from the charge of falsehood; and if the Dr. had lied in relation to his having been a Universalist preacher, let him bear his own sin? My intimate acquaintance with him ended when he was a lad of about thirteen years of age, as I left home at that time. I saw him frequently, however, until he was about sixteen years old. From that time I do not know that I heard from him for nine years. And since that time I have only seen him a few times and at very short intervals, as we lived in different states all the time except during the short period which elapsed from my going to Auburn to the time of his death. I had no means of knowing whether he had been a Universalist preacher or not. But, Sir, I can prove that he not only regarded himself in that capacity, but that he was so regarded by the public in Dryden, Tompkins county, N. Y. The following questions were proposed to Mr. Wood, a resident in that town, and the following answers returned.

Mr. B. Wood:—Are you a citizen of Tompkins county, N. Y.? "I am, and have been for nineteen years." Was you ever acquainted with Dr. L. Shepard? "I was." Did he ever reside in your county? "He did several years." Was he ever by common report, a Universalist preacher? "He was." Did you ever hear him preach? "I have, twice." Did he advocate the doctrine of the universal salvation of all mankind? "He did in private, and I think he did in public." Dr. Shepard said he had been a Universalist preacher—Mr. Wood says he heard him preach twice, and he thinks he advocated Universalism; and that he had the reputation, and that by common report, of being a Universalist preacher. The case stands thus, then, Dr. Shepard said he was a Universalist preacher—Mr. Wood heard him and thought him to be such, and the public said he was such; but Mr. Grosh, says, "Dr. Luke Shepard never was a Universalist preacher." Query, which is to be believed?

It appears, from the above testimony, that the Dr. affirmed the truth in relation to his having been a preacher and that you denied it. And I have no doubt, Sir, infidel, and wicked as he was, but if he was now living, he would prove the fact that such a Convention as he mentioned was really held.

5. I complain of you for attacking my reputation in your paper, and neglecting to furnish me with a copy of the paper containing the attack. It is not gentlemanly neither is it editorial courtesy. Please publish this article in your next paper and forward it to me, and I will accept it as a further engagement, on your part, to publish what I have yet to say on this subject, for I have yet much more to say. But I will engage to occupy no more room in your columns than you and your assistants have filled, and may hereafter fill, on the subject of the aforesaid Convention.

Yours in all honesty,
Troy, Pa., July 6, 1840. S. E. SHEPARD.

REPLY TO MR. S. E. SHEPARD.

Sir—So far as I deem your rebukes applicable, I will endeavor to profit by them; and considering your superior claim to be rebuked, I will endeavor to deal justly with you in return.

1. Your first complaint is, that I have always accused you of saying, that the pretended Convention was held in Rochester. I reply, that this was the form in which I stated the report to Mr. Campbell and yourself, and that so far from correcting this point, both of you tacitly admitted its correctness. You quote Mr. Campbell's remark, that he thought, you said your brother had published it in Rochester—and you, (not Mr. Campbell,) italicise "published." True; Mr. C. used these words; not to correct my statement, however, but to inform me where Dr. Luke Shepard published "The World as it is." On the other hand, Mr. Campbell's entire silence on the subject of the place where the Convention was held, is a virtual admission that my statement on that point was correct.

In my letter to you, I asked—"When this meeting was held in Rochester, the title by which it was known, and the house in which it met." You never stated that the Convention was not held in Rochester—but, as I and others understood your language, in reference to the time and house, say you did not interrogate your brother closely as to the time and place of the meeting. I see now that you may have meant differently from what I understood you—but your entire neglect to correct me plainly and expressly until now, and Mr. Campbell's admission that I had so far stated the report correctly, is the apology I offer for calling it, hitherto, the Rochester Convention. Consequently all the bad motives you ascribe to me, are as gratuitous, as the reason you allege for their existence in me, is founded only in your own blind self-esteem.

2. You accuse me of unjustly charging you with reporting that there were "fifty" or "fifty-two" preachers present at said Convention; and urge in "disproof" that neither yourself nor Mr. Campbell in your corrections, ever gave that number. I gave the number "fifty-two," in my version of the report, and requested both of you to correct what was amiss in it—and as neither of you corrected that particular, I was, of course, left to infer that that part of the report was correctly stated by me. "Silence" in all such cases "gives consent." Besides, Mr. Campbell speaks of "an overwhelming majority" of those preachers; implying that the number was not very small. These are the reasons why I laid so much stress on (not that particular number, but on) a large number of preachers—"fifty," or "fifty-two." You see, then, that again is your ascription of bad motives to me, useless and uncalled for.

3. It is rather amusing, after these two exhibitions of assumed arrogant superiority and gratuitous uncharitableness, on your part, to have you complain of my "exceeding unkindness, illiberality, and want of charity!" However, to be frank and candid with you, I acknowledge, that I did think it very fortunate that you and Mr. Campbell kept the story until your alleged author was out of the reach of inquiries! I wish I could add, that all suspicion of your cunning in this delay was now removed from my mind. But, Sir, I can not say so in truth, and prefer that you should cry out "unkind" and "illiberal," to earning a different cry at the expense of truth.

4. I have once acknowledged, and do now again confess my neglect to publish a letter signed by a Mr. Rockwell and his wife, certifying that they heard Dr. Luke Shepard inform you that he (Dr. L. S.) had preached Universalism. That letter is lost, or I would have published it some weeks ago. The reasons why I did not publish it on its reception, were—1st, I had no knowledge of the writers—it might have been a forgery, or a hoax. 2d, Even if a genuine letter, I had no evidence of the character of the signers. The whole letter was rather a singular one, and singularly directed. 3d, As Dr. Shepard had been proved to be deficient in character for veracity, his mere word that he had preached Universalism could not be testimony that he had. And 4th, Whether he said so or not, did not prove him a Universalist preacher, nor that he told you the story about the Convention—far less did it prove, that that story was true. But I now perceive that you feel your veracity called in question on the unimportant point that Dr. S. told you that he had preached Universalism; and though I never accused you of falsehood in saying that he had so informed you, I now regret that I did not give you all the benefit you could derive from that certificate.

I now tell you, and the world, again, that Dr. Luke Shepard never was a Universalist preacher. This I know and can prove, as well as any negative can be known and proved under the circumstances of the case. For had he ever received a letter of fellowship, the fact would be recorded on our records, and published in our minutes. Even had he preached with the sanction of any of our societies, or friends generally, for any time, as a candidate for our fellowship, his name would appear on our lists of preachers, recorded on our records, or published in our periodicals. Yet it is a fact, that there is no mention of his name, even—whether as a clergyman or layman—on either the records of the Association where he lived, or in any of our periodicals.

You bring forward Mr. Wood to prove the affirmative. But he does not testify that Dr. S. ever preached Universalism. He thinks so. Far less does he prove that he was in our fellowship, or ever acknowledged as a candidate for it, by our denomination. Rev. J. Chase, now of Rochester, on the contrary, testifies that he was well acquainted in Dryden, Tompkins county, and frequently preached there from the Spring of 1829 to the Fall of 1835, (the period in which Dr. S. lived in Dryden,) and never knew or heard of Dr. Luke Shepard's preaching as a Universalist.

You speak as if "the public" testified that Dr. L. S. was a Universalist preacher; and oppose this "public" to my testimony. Sir, you know that your "public" is but one man, so far as yet appears; and you know that my denial is not mine only, but is backed by all our records, periodicals, and by other testimony. But Mr. Wood speaks of "common report." What is "common report?" How many persons are included in it? Who and what are they? Are they persons who are well enough acquainted with Universalists and Universalism, to speak knowingly on the subject; or are they such as, from sheer ignorance and prejudice, would declare any man to be a Universalist who merely rejected the dogma of endless misery? Bring forward your witnesses in their own persons, and let each one testify for him or herself, giving name and residence, and then Sir, we will attend to them, and either prove conclusively that Dr. Luke Shepard never was a Universalist preacher, or acknowledge that he told you the truth when he told you he was one.

5. You consider me heinously guilty for calling your veracity in this story in question, and not furnishing you with a copy of the charges. Sir, of what crime, then, were you and Mr. Campbell guilty, when you withheld from the accused persons, your story, asserting the infidelity and hypocrisy of a number of Universalist clergymen, until after the death of the alleged witness—when, even then, you circulated it at a distance from the accused, for the purpose of casting suspicion on all the Universalist preachers in this state, and odium on the whole denomination—and when, after the report reached us, Mr. C., deigned no reply to the first and second inquiries made of him respecting it? I am astonished at your impudence in reading me a lecture on this subject, all guilty as you must feel yourself to be, of a greater crime—committed with far less provocation, and in a far more cowardly manner—than any you can justly charge me with! I never attacked your veracity except by showing the falsity of your story, and the cunning you evinced in circulating it only after your alleged informant was dead, and then only through a co-adjutor, and at a distance. These very suspicious circumstances, and not my assertions, are the cause why your character has suffered in the public estimation. That I did not send you a copy of the papers containing my remarks, and my regret therefor, I have already acknowledged, and again acknowledge. Base as your conduct may have been, it does not justify my neglect to do so. Forgetfulness is my only excuse, bad as it may seem to all who are unacquainted with the many cares and duties resting on me at that time, and my great liability to forget some of them.

And now, Sir, I beg of you to forward your proofs, if any you have, that I may publish them as I have promised to do. Remember, I want your proofs—not your accusations of me, nor your complaints and rebuke of my conduct. I feel no disposition to allow you to kick up a dust into the eyes of our readers about foreign and personal matters and then make your escape in the smoke. You have plainly given your opinion of my conduct; and, as plainly, I have given you mine of yours. I think we understand each other—and that our readers understand us both—and that they desire to hear no more from us on those subjects. I therefore tell you plainly, that while I feel disposed to allow you every accommodation in your attempt to prove your story, I can not give you room to enable you to erase the duty of proving it. Give us your proofs—the public demands them, and our columns are waiting for them. I entreat you, by every feeling of candor and honesty which should exist in the soul of a gentleman, a Christian, and a preacher of the Gospel, either prove your foul charges against us, that the world may no longer be deceived by us; or admit that you have been guilty of circulating charges which you can not substantiate—charges which should never have been made without full and positive testimony.

To aid you in your offer of proving your story through your columns, I hereby offer you any documents you may want, if in my power to procure them for you. The published minutes of the State Convention, or of Associations in which your brother resided, or the lists of our preachers which have been published, shall be mailed for you, whenever you call for them. Or, if you prefer to examine our manuscript Records, Mr. Montgomery of Auburn, is the Standing Clerk of our State Convention, and of the Association in which your brother resided. You lived in Auburn, and are enough acquainted there to procure some one in whom you can confide, who will examine those records for you. Mr. Montgomery will allow any respectable individual to examine them, and take a copy of any of their proceedings for your use. Come up at once, then, to the task you have undertaken, and prove your brother to have been a preacher in our denomination, or abandon that position—prove his character to be good as to veracity, or abandon him as a witness sufficient to criminate numbers of your fellow Christians as infidels and hypocrites —or prove your story true in any other manner, or confess your utter inability to do so. TO THE PROOFS.

With all due respect, yours in the Gospel.

A. B. GROSH.

UTILITY OF UNIVERSALISM.

The question has often been asked the writer, whether Universalism is calculated to make a man better. It has even been asked by those who professed to be Universalists, implying that they might be just as good without this faith as with it. This is singular. He who has felt the power of that faith which has for its foundation the promises of God, and which enters into every bright and cheering, and consistent prospect of the human heart, can not but know the answer which belongs to every question and inference involving a defalcation of his religion. Ignorance on this point implies ignorance of the sacred principles of Christianity. If our brother can not find room for important self-improvement, he may be sure that he would be worse without his faith; and if he can, his faith is doing a good work in comparing the progress of his past life with what it should have been, and showing him what he may do in future. Kindly be it said, it will not be amiss for every one who can seriously doubt the utility of his faith, to examine his religious experience, and the state of his heart.

But those who are unacquainted with Universalism may more consistently ask the question, especially if they do so with a serious desire for information. And yet it is almost certain that if they appreciated or understood that system of religion, they would never propose such a question. Whether Universalism is regarded as a system of faith or good works—and it embraces both—it can not but benefit him who receives it. The Scriptures warrant the belief that faith and good works are mutual strengtheners and promoters of each other. The true faith is said to work by love and purify the heart. It works; and it works by the highest of principles, and in accordance with a pure heart. Surely, if it works in this manner, the works of the creature must partake of its character. If it "purifies the heart," there is no longer any motive in the heart to do wrong, but rather the reverse.

We are told by the apostle James of a very important influence which works exert upon faith. "Was not Abraham our father, justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar? Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" Universalism as a system of works will produce a similar effect. It recognizes all the rules of action laid down in the Bible. It admits and urges the necessity of strict obedience and all that the divine law enjoins upon us—virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, charity. Now suppose that a man should practice according to the injunctions of holy writ, by doing good as he has opportunity; it is not natural for him to do so without inquiring into his motives, and the more he inquires, the greater will be his confidence in that source from whence his obligation proceeds, until by the practice of good works, his experience teaches him, that the law is good, and both the Lawgiver and the Teacher worthy of his highest faith. Many a man has thus been led to discover the beauty and justice of the divine law, to respect its authority, love its influence, and confide in its Author.

Now take the other view. We have briefly shown from Scripture that good works are promoted by faith—in other words that faith is a purifier—makes man better. Will the Universalist faith do this? We say not that it will, but that it must, if it is not dead. What are the foundations of this faith? God's character, will, and promises; Christ's reign in the power of eternal truth; and man's universal brotherhood. "God is love," he "will not cast off forever"—unto him "every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Therefore, we unavoidably infer that God, who hath promised to bless "all the kindreds of the earth" in Christ, "will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth" that "He is good unto all," and that "his tender mercies are over all his works." Can a faith that includes this, result otherwise than in a love to God and obedience to his laws? No! Christ, as the "propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world," must reign till he "shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." Can faith include this, and not result in an invitation of so glorious a character as that which he exhibited among men? Impossible. Jesus, on one occasion, said to the multitude and to his disciples, "be not ye called Rabbi, for one is your Master even Christ, and all ye are brethren." And once before that, in teaching how to pray, he instructed men—sinners—to address the divine Being by the endearing appellation of "our Father." Let the inquiry now be seriously made, what would be the effect of a true faith in the universal brotherhood here inculcated? The fraternal relationship is among the nearest that can be acknowledged. Will two brothers, who constantly realize the relationship in which they stand, deliberately defraud, and abuse, and hate each other? Even if you answer me that it is possible for such a thing to occur, you will be compelled to acknowledge that the occurrence is very rare. You can generally discover that in such cases they have forgotten the ties that should bind each to the other. But suppose it were possible—yea, if you please, suppose it were common. By recollecting that the universal brotherhood is a subject included in that faith which works by love, you readily perceive that under the influence of such a faith, recognizing such a relationship, man would be industrious in doing good as he had opportunity. This then is the answer which belongs to every question involving the utility of the Universalist faith. Wherever there is prejudice, and bigotry, and hatred, there is the absence of Universalism; or in other words, of Gospel principles and truths upon which Universalism is founded. Wherever an instance occurs where vice or unbelief prevails, there is an instance which calls loudly for the counteracting faith and power of Universalism. Wherever true zeal and spiritual devotion are felt, there dwells the spirit of Universalism. Wherever benevolence to man and love to God prevail in the heart, there is the triumph of Universalism, however much the prejudices of men may dislike to own it. O, that men might acknowledge the influence of the spirit of God, and feel the power of that truth which maketh free indeed! Brethren, "examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves."

TO MY MOTHER.

Mother! I left thee with a pang
Of silent, deep regret,
And though another now I love,
I can not thee forget!

Forget thee mother! deeper still,
The love I bear for thee:
For oh! the tie that binds our hearts,
Is stronger still with me:

And now though we are separate far
My thoughts around thee cling—
The happy hours I've spent with thee
Are round me lingering.

My mother! oh, how many thoughts,
Are linked around that name,
Thoughts too, which to my young heart give
A never dying flame.

You taught me first of all to prize
Religion's lovely flowers,
That I might walk in Virtue's paths
Nor heed affliction's showers.

That precious faith to me has given
Comfort and joy divine;
It teaches me to lean on Heaven,
And happiness is mine!

And now farewell! I may not meet,
Thy form again on earth,
But where our heavenly Father dwells,
Our joy shall know no dearth!

THE STORY OF DAVID DUNBAR.

It was a mild evening in August, neither cold nor warm; we had been journeying through North Wales, and had selected, as our abiding place, the little inn of Tany Bwlch. Resolved to see as much as possible of the surrounding country, in our own way, we strolled up the path leading to the Hall, and looked from the terrace along the picturesque Vale of Festiniog. Each moment of our stay added to the beauty of the scene; a soft mist, so transparent that every object appeared through it, was creeping up the opposite mountains, as it were from the depths of the valley towards the clouds that seemed to hang on the projecting or towering rocks, as if weighed down by the purple and gold of heaven's abundant treasury. The sun was sinking below the trees, and its lights, broken into a thousand different tints, flashed across the valley, creating beauties, and producing effects which, though I well remember, I may not attempt to describe.

At last, and more quickly than I desired, these enchantments vanished; the mist thickened, though all immediately around us remained clear—the clear gray tint of an autumnal twilight. We followed the upward path that wound and wound, now round a gigantic tree, now circling the base of some slaty rock, every fissure of which was garlanded by creeping plants. Suddenly, we emerged on a platform of soft green turf, commanding another view of the valley, more limited than that we had gazed upon a few minutes before, and of altogether a different character of beauty. The moon had risen, but its light looked to us so thin and pale, as hardly to deserve the name; and we were half inclined to murmur at the change, when the tones of a voice, once familiar, and still well remembered, made me look round. A gentleman and lady were seated on a grass bench, a little below the spot on which we stood; the gentleman had just inquired of his companion,

"And what in the perspective?"

There was nothing remarkable in the words; they might relate to the landscape, or I might have wrongly caught the sound, and they had reference to those prospects of the future which we create, and Time destroys. And yet what a multitude of memories they brought upon me! The speaker, I knew, could be no other than David Dunbar, whom I had known about five years before, and who, every one said, would hereafter rival Turner, and paint as well as Claude. Whethersuch anticipations were just, I could not say; I thought his pictures beautiful, but admired still more the honest, true enthusiasm, and warmth of his nature; a bosky dell—a noble tree—a bounding deer—a waterfall—a light—or the shadow of a cloud upon a hill—were to him sources of exquisite enjoyment; there was no affectation in this, it was genuine joy that illumined his fine eyes and made his whole countenance radiant—flushing his cheek and brow. He luxuriated in the beauties of creation—Nature was not only his every day, but his holiday book; he read it—felt it—understood it—loved it—illustrated it—and all was hallowed by his fine susceptibilities of the good, as well as the beautiful. His religion had found its temple in the universe, and never did he point out a beauty, or direct attention to a particular object which attracted his admiration, without adding, "And this enjoyment is given me by the Almighty!" He never prayed but to praise, and was abundantly grateful for the power of noting the graces or glories of creation on his canvass. How delightful to meet him at such a time, on such a spot! The anticipation of hearing him speak of the wonders we had both seen to pass over the valley, prompted the joyful exclamation of recognition that commanded his attention. He rose—advanced a step to meet me—held out his hand as frankly, as kindly as ever; the smile on his expressive mouth was unchanged—but his eyes! I looked up to meet their welcome—alas! the eyes of David Dunbar were sightless. I was shocked beyond the power of utterance. He felt my hand tremble. "You did not hear it then?" he said, as we all sat down on the green bench from which he had risen.

I could not speak, but I looked mournfully into his face; I dared not ask, "How was it?"— to him whose life was light!

After a pause, his companion said, "You have not introduced me." How glad I was she spoke! the silence of those few moments had grown insupportable. "My wife, my Mary," he answered, and then continued, "When this affliction came, she would have me—I told her it was very foolish; but I suppose she thought a blind husband would be easily led. And she does lead me," he added, in that tone of deep tenderness which goes straight to the heart—"She does lead me—she is, as much as mortal can be, eyes to the blind." How hard it was to look at him and command words. I had seldom seen even a picture of more than ordinary interest, that the idea of what David Dunbar would say or think of it, had not occurred to me. I had never looked upon a beautiful scene without wishing his return; for though he had been abroad for three years, the remembrance of his relish for all things excellent was fresh in my memory.

He was totally blind—no ray of outward light illumined him: the sun—the moon—the river—the ocean, hill, dale, tree and forest, were to him but history. And yet how happy was it to feel, while looking on his sightless countenance, that though sorrow and pain had been there, their bitterness was past; every feature expressed not only resignation, but cheerfulness; and when I turned my gaze on her, who, to use his own beautiful application of the holy passage, "had been eyes to the blind," I blessed her with my whole heart, and could not wonder that, stricken as he had been in the days of his youth, he was still the happy spirited being, I had so long known, so highly esteemed.

She seemed a fitting object for a painter's love—her beauty was unobtrusive but insinuating without design; one glance told me there was much to see, and much to note; for every emotion vibrated through her features; and yet it was a pencilled, rather than a painted, loveliness—a beauty, shadowy enough for dreams, yet endowed, as I afterwards found, with tenderness, truth, and virtue; the three best and truest attributes of women—the first being the foundation of all gentleness—the second, of true bravery—the third, a circle of glory over the domestic hearth—her true throne. I could not allude to her husband's misfortunes; but he told the tale himself as one tells of a fearful trial, not only past, but overcome.

He had been but a few weeks returned, rich with the accumulated knowledge of the south—his folios filled with sketches, his brain with high ideas and fine imaginings, which he was only restrained from working out immediately by his desire to visit "his Mary," a young lady whom he had long and deeply loved.

He found her unchanged in mind, improved in beauty; they talked of the future—and before he went out of the father's house to sketch a scene which the old gentleman wished to possess—she had whispered her consent to become his wife—he said, when better days should come and he should gather in the golden harvest of a noble fame. At which she laughed, and promised to tell him that evening a secret he little dreamed of. He bounded across the lawn, full of life and hope—then paused to sketch her figure as she sat under the verandah, intending to read—time out of mind, one of love's sweet deceptions—to seem to read—when we were watching, ay, with a beating heart, every movement of the one we love. I saw the sketch—it was his last—by the time he had reached the point from which the view was to be taken, it suddenly began to rain, and some few mutterings of thunder, sent him to take shelter in a fishing cottage, that overhung a lake—the object of his excursion. It was strange, he said, that the disturbance of the clouds hardly deserved the name of a thunder-storm; a few were of a heavy leaden hue, edged here and there by a dark copper color, as if some malignant fiend had flung that peculiar glare from his torch upon them. There was no wind among the trees, no ripple on the river—all was hushed—and as he sat watching the heavens, and calmly speculating upon the power which impelled the dark clouds towards each other, he heard distinctly the splashing of the huge drops of rain as they fell, slowly, and almost singly into the water. A thrush continued to pour her gushing tide of song from amid the foliage of a white thorn tree, regardless of the rain and darkness. "I never," he added, "could wish a storm to terminate; the beautiful variety of the tints it throws upon the earth had for me an ever changing, yet perpetual charm; and the luxurious tranquility of my mind—the blessed confidence in my Mary's love—the success far beyond my hopes, which had already crowned my exertions, made me as assured of happiness as human being could be. My dreams were of the future—of the perfecting of love, and the achievement of fame! How delicious to an enthusiast in both! It is impossible to trace the progress of the lightning—yet certainly, before it struck—at the moment when the clouds sprang apart, I saw the flash, which deprived me of sight forever, and of consciousness for a time.

"Do not speak of it, dearest," murmured his wife; "it does you harm."

"No, no, it does me good. I am wiser—better—happier—than I was then. It taught me a knowledge, which else I should never have acquired—a knowledge of the unfathomable depths of woman's love."

Mary blushed; but it was not in nature not to feel gratified at such a tribute. She thanked him by a pressure of the hand which he felt and understood.

"We will talk of it no more," she said.

"But we may talk of happiness," he answered; "I must tell the secret which Mary promised me on my return; that she had been made rich by the death of a distant relative, of whom I had never heard—that she—"

But his wife would not suffer him to continue.

"Well," he exclaimed, "for this one evening I must be an egotist. I must tell my friends of the advantages of blindness. Sounds have become to me even as sights. I see a landscape in the voice of every bird that sings; the nightingale is my moon; the blackbird, my thicket; the plover, my wild unencultivated heath; the robin, my English cottage; the sparrow, my pert wayside school-boy; the very grass hopper my fresh green meadow. I associate other sounds with Italy; and each natural perfume peoples my world with fresh creations. My ideal beauty is never destroyed by unpleasing reality. I shall never think my wife grows old, or my friend ugly. If I can not see new objects of interest, I can imagine them without the danger of having the ideal destroyed by the real. I can tell the tree under which I stand by the rustling of its leaves. Believe me, the world has no blank for a well regulated and industrious mind—nor is there any darkness so profound which the imagination can not illuminate. I bless God for the past; I bless Him greatly for the present; and I know I shall have to bless him for the future; I visit the most beautiful spots in the world; and if to my inquiry of 'What in the perspective?' Mary should be compelled to answer—'Nothing striking,' I create something that shall please me."

DEATHS.

In Bambridge, June 27, Wm. H., son of Wm. and Eunice Corbin, aged 6 months. This is the second child with which brother and sister Corbin, have been called to part, within a short time. But though they are afflicted and deeply mourn their loss, the comforting assurance is theirs that neither life nor death, nor things present nor things to come can separate them long from the objects of their affection, and the society of the blessed. The funeral was attended on the 29th, and a discourse delivered by W. M. D.

SECTION V.

THE MINISTRY OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

The time that John commenced his ministry.

LUKE iii: 1. Now in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cesar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea; and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee; and his brother Philip, tetrarch of Iturea, and of the region of Trachonitis; and Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene.

2 Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests, the word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness.

Verse 1. In the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cesar. Roman historians inform us that Tiberius Cesar reigned conjointly with his predecessor Augustus about three years before the death of the latter. And these three years must have been included in the fifteen referred to above, allowing John to have commenced his ministry at the age of thirty, which was probably the time, since the Jewish priests entered upon their public duties at that age. See concluding remarks.

Pontius Pilate. That he was governor of Judea in the fifteenth year of Tiberius is evident from Josephus' Ant. 6, b. 18, c. 4, s. 2, where he uses the following language, "So Pilate when he had tarried ten years in Judea, made haste to Rome, and this in obedience to the orders of Vitellius, which he durst not contradict; but before he could get to Rome Tiberius was dead." From this language it appears that Pilate had reigned in Judea ten years before the death of Tiberius. And as that event occurred March 16, A. D. 37, Pilate's administration would have commenced in the beginning of the year 27, which would be in the 16th year of the reign of Tiberius—and by supposing that some few months intervened between the administration of Pilate and the death of Tiberius, which the account of Josephus renders probable—or by supposing that Josephus uses the word ten as denoting the years of Pilate's government, as a whole number without reference to the additional months that might have belonged to that term, we bring the commencement of Pilate's administration within the year 26, the 15th of Tiberius' reign, as he commenced his reign August 28, A. D. 11. Pilate therefore might have been governor of Judea at the time stated by Luke, having recently commenced his administration.

Herod. This was Herod Antipas, to whom, together with Philip and Archelaus, Herod the Great had left his dominions. That this Herod was tetrarch of Galilee at the time stated by Luke is evident from Josephus—Ant. b. 18, c. 17, where Josephus speaks of "that Herod who was tetrarch of Galilee;" and that Caius "took away his tetrarchy and gave it by way of addition to Agrippa's kingdom." Having reigned over Galilee therefore, from the death of Herod the Great, from whom he received it, till the time of Caius Calligula the successor of Tiberius, he must of course have been tetrarch of Galilee in the 15th year of Tiberius as Luke states.

Philip. Josephus states that "Philip, Herod's brother, departed this life in the twentieth year of the reign of Tiberius, after he had been tetrarch of Trachonitis and Gaulonites, and of the nations of the Battineans also, thirty-seven years." Ant. b. 18, c. 4 s. 6. Hence he must have been tetrarch at the time stated by Luke.

Lysanias. That Lysanias was tetrarch of Abilene may be inferred from the language of Josephus, who says, that Claudius (the second emperor from Tiberius) gave "Abila of Lysanias," to Agrippa, giving us to understand that Abilene of which Abila was the capital, had been under the administration of one Lysanias. Ant. b. 19, c. 5, s. 4. He also says, in defining the possessions that Herod the Great left to his sons, that "a certain part of what was called the house of Zenodorus, (that is Abilene) paid tribute to Philip," giving us to infer that the other part of this house (or possession) was under the government of some other person, which may have been Lysanias as it was spoken of at a subsequent period as belonging to Lysanias, as it had been before to Zenodorus. See Ant. b. 17, c. 11, s. 4.

There is indeed a little variation between Luke and Josephus as to the extent of the tetrarchies here spoken of; for while Josephus names Gaulonites and Battinea as belonging to Philip's tetrarchy, which are omitted by Luke—the latter mentions Iturea omitted by Josephus, as belonging to the same. But such omissions are easily accounted for without impeaching the veracity of either historian. Even Josephus himself has similar variations in different parts of his writings.

2. Annas and Caiaphas. Annas, here mentioned, seems to have been the same with Ananus mentioned by Josephus (Ant. b. 20, c. 9, s. 1) as a very good man, and having been high priest for a long time. He was not high priest at the time mentioned by Luke, but was substituted for Caiaphas, who filled that office. He was called high priest, because he had formerly been such; and we find that after his time, though not before, the high priests were called such after their term of service had expired.

That Caiaphas was high priest in the 15th year of Tiberius, is proved by the following language of Josephus: "He (Tiberius) was now the third emperor, and he sent Valerius Gratus to be the Procurator of Judea, and to succeed Annius Rufus. This man deprived Ananus of the high priesthood, and appointed Ishmael, the son of Phabi to be high priest. He also deprived him in a little time, and ordained Eleazar the son of Ananus, who had been high priest before, to be high priest; which office, when he had held it for a year, Gratus deprived him of, and gave the high priesthood to Simon, the son of Camithus; and when he had possessed that dignity no longer than a year, Joseph Caiaphas was made his successor. When Gratus had done these things, he went back to Rome, after he had tarried in Judea eleven years, when Pontius Pilate came as his successor." Ant. b. 18, c. 2, s. 2.

It appears from this, that Caiaphas was made high priest a short time before Pilate became Procurator of Judea, which we have seen was in A. D. 26—hence he must have been high priest as early, at least, as the year 26, which was the 15th of Tiberius' reign. That Annas was associated with Caiaphas, may be seen from John xviii: 13, 24.

Prophecies respecting John.

Matt. iii: 1. In those days came John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness of Judea.

2 And saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

3 For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his path straight.

Mark i: 1. The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the son of God,

2 As it is written in the prophets, Behold I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee.

3 The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his path straight.

Luke iii: 3. And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins.

4 As it is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophets, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.

5 Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low, and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways shall be made smooth,

6 And all flesh shall see the salvation of God.

Matt. iii: 1. In those days. This phrase, made use of by the Evangelists, must be understood in a more extended application than is common with us at the present day. We might infer from it that the events about to be recorded, took place immediately after those mentioned in the previous chapter: but such was not the case. The ministry of John commenced about twenty-eight years after the return of the Saviour from Egypt, the last mentioned event in the previous chapter.

Preaching. Proclaiming. John, the Baptist, may have preached discourses as long as modern sermons; but the original term here rendered preaching, was not intended to convey the idea which we attach to the term at the present day. It means merely to proclaim like a herald, and was spoken in allusion to the fact that heralds were frequently employed at that day, both among the Greeks and Romans, to go into the streets, or to places of general resort, and proclaim what they had been instructed to do by the public authorities.

In the Wilderness. This is probably to be understood in a moral sense. John is compared by the prophet, to a herald or crier, who goes in advance of his sovereign, to prepare for him a convenient and easy passage; in allusion to eastern kings, who usually sent heralds before them for this purpose. And as the open, cultivated country would need but little or no preparation, while the wilderness would require much, so it would be with John the Baptist. The moral wilderness would be the principal scene of his labors.

2. Repent. Reform would have been a better rendering, as that term always implies an improvement, a change for the better, while the word repent has not always this meaning, but is sometimes used in a bad sense. The original term (metanoeo) always implies a change of mind, and a corresponding change of conduct for the better.

Kingdom of Heaven. This evidently denotes the Gospel kingdom on earth.

3. Esaias. This is another name for Isaiah. Proper names found in the Old Testament, are often so changed in the New. For example, Jeremiah, Jeremias; Elijah, Elias; Uriah, Urias; Hezekiah, Ezekias, etc.

Mark i: 1. The beginning of the Gospel. This verse is obviously intended as an introduction to Mark's Gospel.

2. The Prophets. Mark quotes two prophecies respecting John, not only that found in Isa. xl: 3, and which is quoted by Matthew and Luke; but also one found in Malachi iii: 1; and this may have been the reason why he uses the plural. But it must still be recollected that one portion of the Old Testament was called by the Jews, The Prophets; and that a single prediction found in that portion was said to have been spoken by the prophets, though but one prophet uttered it. A consideration of this fact would have saved some commentators much trouble in searching for predictions, where only a prediction could be found, or in endeavoring to convert into a prediction, a plain historical statement.

Luke iii: 3. Baptism of repentance. This must denote the cleansing or purifying effect which reformation would produce in the conduct of men. Of this baptism of repentance, (or "washing of regeneration," as the same thing is elsewhere called,) the baptism of water was merely an emblem or figure. John did not preach the baptism of water, as many preachers do at the present day, though he adopted it as an appropriate ceremony. He preached the baptism of reformation.

5. Every valley shall be filled, etc. What is here stated was almost literally verified by eastern sovereigns. It is said of Semaramis, "wherever she went, she ordered the mountains and precipices to be levelled, raised causeways in the plain country, and at a great expense made the ways passable." See Clarke in loco.

6. All flesh shall see, etc. Every obstacle in the way of fulfilling this prediction is to be removed, and then it will be accomplished—all mankind will enjoy the salvation of God, for this is the sense of the prediction.

John's food and apparel.

MATT. III: 4. And the same John had his raiment was clothed with camel's of camel's hair, and a leath- hair, and with a girdle of ern girdle about his loins, skin about his loins, and he and his meat was locusts did eat locusts and wild and wild honey. honey.

GENERAL REMARKS.

The impression has been imbibed by some readers of the above language, that John adopted the kind of dress and food he used, for the purpose of being singular, but nothing can be more untrue. A desire to be singular, though not always as pernicious, is as worthy of condemnation as pride. John was not influenced by so unworthy a motive. The articles of food and clothing which he used, were common in that country among the lower classes. And the object of the evangelist in informing us of John's mode of living, seems to have been to point out a trait in his character by which he was distinguished from the proud and vain of his day.

UNIVERSALISM A LICENTIOUS DOCTRINE.

There is nothing more common among the opposers of the doctrine of Universalism than the assertion that it has an immoral tendency on the character and conduct of those who profess to believe it; and certainly nothing would be more effectual to their purpose "in putting this doctrine down," than to make good the assertion by convincing a wise and intelligent community that this is really the case. But to what extent they have succeeded in this particular, can be determined by the favorable reception which this doctrine has met with since its introduction into the United States and else where, together with the fact, that the people have advanced in virtuous habits, and moral usefulness, in the same ratio that these sentiments have been inculcated, and received among them. These are facts which we think none will be disposed to deny, except those who can be prevailed upon to perform virtuous actions, only through fear of endless torment for neglecting them.

Nothing can be expected, therefore, from such individuals, but that they will condemn Universalism as a base, licentious doctrine, which is destitute of all moral restraint in reclaiming the sinner, and which, in consequence, ought to be rejected as being wholly unfit to be proclaimed among men. Such, indeed, has been the prejudice of some on this account, and so great has been their attachment to their own preconceived opinions, that they have declared that the doctrine ought not to be preached, even admitting it to be true. And doubtless many are now engaged in consequence of this erroneous objection, who might have done honor to the cause of truth, in perverting reason, nature, and revelation, for the purpose of conforming them to their own narrow views of the divine government.

Those characters, who reject Universalism on account of its licentious tendency, do not draw their inference so much from facts as they exist, as they do from their own feelings on the subject; and hence they condemn it, not for what it has done, but for what it might do, providing they should be led to embrace it. This is evident from what they are frequently heard to declare—viz: that if they believed that all mankind would be saved, they would indulge in all manner of vice—rob, steal, murder, and finally commit suicide, and thus rid themselves of the cares and perplexities of a troublesome world.

Now it is a fact well known to them, and to the world so far as a knowledge of Universalism extends, that the amount of crime committed by Universalists, is proportionally small, compared to that committed by those who believe in an opposite doctrine. So if their conclusion in regard to this particular, is not drawn from their own feelings, we are unable to discover from what source it is drawn: for should they resort to facts as they really exist, instead of horrible conceptions of their own corrupt imaginations, the result of their investigation would be directly the reverse, and they would have to acknowledge that it is not Universalism which has caused so much evil and misery in the world, but Partialism.

According to their own statement, then, nothing short of suicide is able to satisfy that insatiable thirst for sin which rankles in the bosom of some, if not all, of our Partialist brethren; and nothing short of the fear of being consigned to the dismal abode of an endless hell, is able to restrain them from perpetrating that awful crime. Now aside from their own feelings, what reason have they to suppose that they would be more likely to commit suicide, if they were to become believers in Universalism, than thousands of others who have already embraced that doctrine, and who manifest no disposition either to take their own lives, or the lives of others? For although we frequently hear of suicide being committed, in consequence of insanity produced by the overwhelming doctrine of endless misery, yet never has a single instance come to our knowledge where an individual has taken his own life because he believed in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind.

It appears to us singular that if Universalism has a tendency to cause its believers to commit this crime, they are not sometimes found guilty of it, especially so when we reflect that a goodly share of the denomination is composed of converts from that system, the belief of which, as its adherents declare, is the only protection which can be safely relied on to guard against it. We see individuals all around us who were once believers in the Partialist system, but who now rejoice in the hope of a world's salvation. And the question naturally arises: Why do not these individuals carry out those principles in practice, which some of their former associates say they would if they were to become believers in that doctrine; and thereby fall murdered victims by their own hands?

One or more, of the four following reasons will answer this question:

1st. Because they were those who could not conscientiously endorse the above statement, but belonged to a class whose dispositions were naturally better; or,

2d. Because their former friends have exaggerated their real case, by representing their dispositions worse than they really were; or,

3d. Because they were as bad as they represented them to be, but by becoming Universalists, have become better; or,

4th. Because they say they are Universalists and are not, but remain as formerly, under the restraining influence of Partialism.

Which of these four reasons, will our Partialist brethren, who declare that Universalism leads to murder and suicide, assign, why those who have already embraced it from their order, do not carry out those principles in practice? Will they say that it is the first—that it is because their dispositions were naturally better than the great mass of that order from which they have emerged? If they do, then it follows that it is only the best of Partialists that can become Universalists, and that the worst of Universalists are as good as the best of Partialists—an argument not very unfavorable to the moral tendency of Universalism.

But perhaps they will attribute it to the second reason—that their friends, who made the assertion, are not so badly depraved as they have represented themselves to be. These same individuals, then, may become Universalists, and manifest no disposition to take their own lives, but live patiently their appointed time upon earth. Well, if these characters have represented their dispositions worse than they really are—exaggerated what they ought to be ashamed of at best—for the purpose of proving that "Universalism is a licentious doctrine," and that Partialism has a salutary and moralizing influence—and that too in the full belief of the truth of the latter—they have succeeded I apprehend, but very poorly in their attempt. We envy not their position. They are welcome to all they can make from this ground.

But perhaps we have not as yet found the true reason. It may be attributed to the third—that they were as bad as they represented themselves to be, but by becoming Universalists have become better. We do not doubt but what this may be the case; for Partialists frequently commit suicide, in consequence of religious excitement. Universalists never do. What stronger reason then can be adduced why those Universalists who have been converted from Partialism do not sometimes, at least, commit that awful crime? Individuals of that class can every where be found; and if we will take the liberty to consult them, we shall find that no immoral tendency is exerted in consequence of their religious belief, but on the contrary, every thing which is calculated to promote virtue, and render them reconciled to the various vicissitudes of life and the dispensations of Providence. No one can be found that is willing to declare, that because he has become a believer in Universalism, he is prepared to take his own life. No such sentiment comes from him, either in word or in action, but the language of his heart is, that until he became a believer in that doctrine he was "a stranger to that faith which works by love and purifies the heart;" thus proving what he before supposed to be "a savor of death unto death," to be "a savor of life unto life."

We now notice the fourth reason, which no doubt some of our Partialist brethren consider a very favorable one for the promotion of longevity with the Universalist. I have frequently heard the sweeping declaration that no one ever believed that all mankind would be saved. Their consciences, we are told, would not allow them to indulge in such extensive views. Hence it is very easy for people who make this charge, to assign a reason why Universalists converted from their order, do not, after perpetrating all other crimes in their power, commit suicide, the most awful and desperate of them all. Believing, as they do, that Universalists are hypocrites, they suppose that they remain, as a matter of course, under the restraining influence of Partialism—thus proving the cause of hypocrisy to be a debtor to Partialism, for the lives of some of its noblest advocates. Charity prompts us, however, to believe that there are but few who occupy this extreme of inconsistency; for we cannot believe but what the most of our Partialist brethren are more philosophical, than to suppose that all manner of evil is the legitimate effect of a cause which they acknowledge never existed.

But notwithstanding the folly and injustice of the last assertion, it is a fact, deeply to be regretted by every candid Universalist, that there are some among us, of that description, who have crept in unawares from the Partialist order. An instance occurred not long since to the observation of the writer, which will serve to illustrate the fact. An individual, who also was a teacher in the Partialist Israel, declared on a public occasion that he once tried to be a Universalist, he studied and advocated the doctrine for two years, but during this time he did not believe a word of it. His conscience would not allow him to entertain such an idea for a moment. Here then we have the bump of Partialism in its naked deformity. We see that an individual in the full belief of that sentiment, can advocate for two years what he considers, at the same time, to be the most licentious and dangerous of all doctrines: thus urging people on with all his might, in that way which leads, as he believes, to hopeless and never ending despair. What a salutary influence must that doctrine exert upon the mind of an individual, which allows him only two years to advocate the most pernicious sentiment in the world!

The above example is not a solitary one to prove that there may be wolves among us in sheep's clothing. Others frequently make the same concessions. And we have much to learn from these facts, not only in regard to the moral bearing of Partialism, but also concerning much of the evil complained of in our own denomination. By supposing that these characters, while professing Universalism had committed some of the most flagitious crimes, we shall see that the odium would not have been heaped upon the doctrine which they really believed; but upon the one which they were advocating. Thus might be fathered upon Universalism the offspring of Partialism, without affording the former the least opportunity of disabusing itself from the imputed guilt, unless these characters, like the individual mentioned above, should at some future period, be disposed to acknowledge it. And this perhaps they would never do; for if they could advocate as a true doctrine, what they believed to be false, for two years, they might by the same principle advocate it for three, four, or five years, and finally for life.

Thus have I endeavored to notice the objection that "Universalism is a licentious doctrine." And while I would say, in conclusion, to our Partialist brethren, that from the view which I have taken of the subject, better evidence will be required to sustain their hypothesis than confessions of their own depravity, I am also constrained to remind our own friends, lest advantage should be taken by means of foreigners and hirelings, of the admonition, "Beware of wolves in sheep's clothing." Louville, May, 1840. H. #### A PLEASANT SIGHT.

BY S. JENKINS.

There is one sight, among all those on which the eye rests with pleasure, and in the contemplation of which the mind delights, which is more pleasing than any other; viz: to see a Universalist meeting well attended, especially by young people. It is pleasant to see those more advanced in life in the house of worship, inasmuch as it shows, that though, with them, "the heat and burden of the day" is past, the same enlivening draughts from the never-failing fountain of divine munificence, which invigorated them in youth, still smooths the path-way of life, as it verges to the tomb. It has a salutary effect too, on the young, by showing them, that religion neither removes nor beclouds their pleasures, but refines and purifies them—dries up all that is sinful, wherein there is no pleasure, and establishes the soul in virtue, where are pleasures unalloyed. One of our preachers once remarked to me that "those advanced in life always seemed more interested in the subject of religion than the young." Now the reason why it is so, is plainly this, they have found by experience, that "all her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

But the reason why I like to see Universalist meetings well attended by young people is, it looks consistent. It looks as though the withering blasts of bigotry and superstition had not yet scathed the soul—prostrating its ennobling powers—straitening it upon the narrow couch of sectarianism. It looks too, as though their minds were benevolent, and in their desire for human happiness, they could grasp "to earth's remotest bound."

Again. It is pleasant to hear a youthful choir tune their voices in imitation of that great concert, when "every creature which is in heaven and on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," shall be "heard saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." All who can, should take part in this delightful exercise. While the soul is enlivened by its charms, and borne on seraphic wings to heaven's gate, it is prepared to receive instruction from the preacher's lips. Under its inspiring influences, the cares and sorrows of life are forgotten, and when they return we can bear them with patient resignation, and thank our Creator for the hope of a higher and holier state of being, where they can no more annoy us.

It is pleasant too, to hear a consistent song. Take, for a contrast, one of the hymns of Watts, and see if that is consistent.

"Far in the deep where darkness dwells,
The land of horror and despair,
Justice hath built a dismal hell,
And laid her stores of vengeance there.

Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
Tormenting racks and fiery coals,
And darts 't' infect immortal pains,
Dyed in the blood of damned souls.

There guilty ghosts of Adam's race,
Shriek out and howl beneath thy rod;
Once they could scorn a Saviour's grace,
But they incensed a dreadful God."

What think ye, my young friends; could ye sing this "with the spirit, and the understanding also?" Could you tune your voices in such a song as this, without letting fall the tear of pity for the poor objects of such suffering, even if you believed the sentiment true? Take another stanza from the same hymn, in which the miseries of the prince of darkness himself are described, and see if a feeling of pity does not arise in your hearts for even him.

"There satan, the first sinner lies,
And roars, and bites his iron bands;
In vain the rebel strives to rise,
Crushed with the weight of both thy hands."

I will leave this, after asking one question, do not such horrid, revolting descriptions, palmed off upon the world as the doctrine of the benevolent Jesus, make more infidels than all other causes combined?

Now take a verse from another hymn, and see if you can sing that.

"His own soft hand shall wipe the tears
From every weeping eye;
And pains, and groans, and griefs, and fears,
And death itself shall die."

I believe that every one can sing this with the whole soul—that while they are singing it, their faith will be expanded, and they can embrace in their hope for happiness, the wayward sons of earth, and trust, that they, in the morning of the resurrection, will come forth in the likeness of their Master. Sing on then, my young friends—sing, till you reach the gates of paradise, and then, join with the ransomed throng in a hymn of praise around the throne of the great I Am.

H A T R E D .

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

The conclusion is unavoidable to one who has thought upon the subject, that the universal prevalence of hatred, would render the earth one wide scene of ruin and desolation. Its tendency is to generate strife and confusion—to cause tears to run, and blood to flow. And still it exists even in Christian communities, marring the peace of society, and hindering the onward march of truth and righteousness in our world.

It is cherished by one Christian denomination toward another; and such is its influence over the mind, that the members of different churches can not associate together as a band of brethren, united together in Christ—can not all come around one table and celebrate his death, calling to mind his sufferings and agony in behalf of a lost world, and his great love for sinful and alienated humanity. If they would do this, there would be no such thing as hatred or animosity among them; they would lay aside all malice and evil speaking, and heart would be linked to heart, and shoulder would be put to shoulder, and the work of moral regeneration and improvement would go on, and all would be harmony, and all would be peace!

Is it not one of the strangest things in the world, that, because an individual does not wear a coat of the same color that another does, he must become an object of hatred and scorn? But so it is. Let a person embrace what is conceived to be error, and you will see him forsaken by his former companions and associates—you will see him shunned as a hated thing, and in many instances injured in his reputation and business. He is not loved and respected by his brethren as formerly, (for love worketh no ill to his neighbor,) but he is cast out from their fellowship and communion, and made a bye word and a reproach. How far this from the spirit and tendency of the religion of Christ!

As has been well and truly remarked, There is nothing which so strikingly marks the character of the Christian world in general, as the want of candor, the spirit of jealousy, and the evil surmises which the different denominations of religionists manifest toward each other. (Dick.) And thus it is that the great and important law, which says, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," is violated; and violated continually; and the same spirit is exercised that has brought thousands, and hundreds of thousands, to the prisoner's dungeon, and the martyr's stake.

UNIVERSALISM OPPOSED.

Universalism in this vicinity, as doubtless is the case in most places, has to encounter a strange opposition. The rigid, stiff-necked Calvinist hates Universalism because his favorite creed teaches him so to do. The haughty and overbearing, look with a most contemptuous scowl upon it, and even apply to it the vilest epithets, because it places him on a level with the common people in a future state of existence. The Arminian rejects it, either because he has not the sagacity to perceive, or the honesty to confess, that it gives the only consistent idea of free grace, and that his own doctrine is in reality no better than downright Calvinism. Hypocrites rave against and denounce it, because it exposes their hypocrisy and fraud. The officious complain of it because it holds up their true character as in a mirror, and assures them that they are constantly sinking deeper and deeper in woe, where they have no rest day nor night—and lastly the honest but ignorant part of the people do not embrace it, because they do not know what it is. We must expect now and then a shot from the Orthodox rans of course, although attacks from this quarter are less frequent and less dangerous than they were formerly. It is true that our Unitarian brethren generally appear to be mightily concerned about the welfare of their fellow travelers to eternity, and manifest much zeal in rescuing them from the tiger like ferocity of our common Father in heaven. This we know is a natural consequence, but former heightened, feverish attacks on Universalism I seldom hear of in this place.

MOSAIC ACCOUNT OF CREATION—NO. III.

In this number we shall proceed to notice the "generations of the heavens and the earth," or rather the six days or periods in which they were generated. In the first verse of Gen. i; we are only assured that these were created in the beginning. In the second verse we are carried back to the period when the earth was without form and void, "and darkness was upon the face of the deep," and the divine spirit or energies commenced the formation and arrangement of the solar system. The first day's work must have immediately followed (or perhaps been simultaneous with) the moving of the spirit of God on the face of the waters, for we read, "And God said, Let there be light; and there was light." This we understand as referring to the creation of the sun and moon, called the "two great lights," in the 4th day's work of creation. And we come to this conclusion from what follows, "And God saw the light, that it was good; and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light day; and the darkness he called night." "And the evening and the morning, (or between the light and the darkness,) were the first day." Now two things are essential in producing day and night, viz: the sun to shine on the earth, and the diurnal revolution of the earth. Without these day and night can not exist. Moses does not speak according to modern philosophical rules, when he uses the words "to divide the light," etc. The phrase "to divide," does not imply that light and darkness existed as substances in a mixed, confused state, before God divided them. But that all was darkness until God said, "Let there be light;" and when light was created, it would appear to divide the light from the darkness, when indeed this alternation was really produced by the rotation of the earth on its axis. Now we are aware that some have supposed this light to mean only the original "elements of light, heat and fire," which were every where diffused on the first day. This is done to harmonize the work of the first day with that of the fourth, when God made the sun and moon. Does the fact that light is emitted from the glow worm, is induced by friction, or that there is a subtle, undefinable, universal fluid called heat, fire, caloric, electricity, account for the existence of day and night? Is it also true that Moses meant to designate this fluid or substance by the term "day," and its absence by the term "night." If he did, it must have existed before God said "Let there be light," as the earth could not have existed in either a solid or fusible state, as a sphere, without this electric fluid or principle. And it did so exist, when "darkness moved upon the face of the deep." It must then have been subjected to the law of cohesion. We understand that Moses, in giving an account of the first day's work, only affirms that God first produced or formed the sun, which he calls light, and that its existence divided the day from the night. This would naturally be the first day's work, or the first object to be generated, after the earth, as an opaque body, was created. The phrase "first day," verse 6, can not mean that it took just twenty-four hours for God to "form light," for it might have been formed in an instant, or in a thousand years. It only means that this light then produced day and night; and time has so been measured ever since.

Second period or formation. See verses 6-8. This embraces the formation of the firmament, to "divide the waters from the waters," or the fluids that were "below the firmament" from those that were "above the firmament." That is, appointed stations were assigned to the water, the air, and the ether; and through the influence of the sun, rains and clouds and dews were produced for the benefit of the earth, and the promotion of vegetation. Now Moses represents these as being produced by miraculous power, whereas they would naturally result from the law of gravitation and the influence of the sun. This shows that the sun was first created; for why should these phenomena be produced on the second day, and the sun and moon not until the fourth?

Third formation, or arrangement. This embraces the dividing of the "waters" from the land; which waters are called seas, and the land earth. God is said to do this, when it is the result of a natural law which must before have existed, and also of the previous arrangement of the firmament. The word day here would seem only to mean succeeding event; for we are not to suppose that it took just twenty-four hours for the waters to subside. It might have required a much longer period for the sun to produce these atmospherical and aquatic arrangements.

After the dry land appeared, vegetation would naturally commence. Hence in this day or period is embraced the command for the earth to bring forth the "grass," the "herb," the "fruit-tree," etc. "And the earth brought forth," etc. Now could the earth bring forth all these in one day? Trees were brought forth before "the evening and the morning were the third day." Were the seeds deposited in the earth on that day? No; each tree had the seed "in itself," or in the earth before. How natural is the Mosaic account of these arrangements! Vegetation would naturally succeed the events previously mentioned in this day, and in the second, and the first. But whether the earth was originally a mass of melted metals or a rock, the formation of earth on its surface must have been very gradual, and consequently, of vegetables and plants.

Fourth period or generation. In this period God "placed lights in the firmament to give light upon the earth." These are called "two great lights," the sun and moon. These were placed there "to divide the light from the darkness," the same as the "light," (or sun in the singular) created on the first day. Hence we think Moses has gone back to give a more full account of the first day's formation. He now speaks of "light," in the plural, and for the first time refers to the moon and the "stars also." Thus, the formation had so far progressed, and the earth become beautified and variegated with seas, rivers, land, mountains, vallies, trees, plants, and herbs, that the full orb of day, and the silver queen of night, and "the stars also," are represented as pouring their mellow rays on the earth. Now why should we admit that these fixed stars of other systems were created millions of ages before the sun and moon of our system, and that these last were formed about 6000 years ago? And is it not manifestly absurd to give the vegetable kingdom an existence before these "great lights" existed?

Fifth day or period. In this period animal existences commenced; that is, those of the aquatic and aerial kind. Fish "multiply in the sea," and "fowl in the earth." This agrees with geological facts. The remains only of marine animals are found in the transition rocks. To suppose that all the various kinds of fish and fowl began their existence in one literal day appears to be inconsistent with the analogy and fitness of things. Fish might exist before the earth was in a state to sustain fowl. Fowl might exist before other land animals, while vegetation was in its inceptive state, in consequence of the slow formation of soils by the disintegration of particles from the solid rocks, or "crust of granite."

Sixth, and last formation. In this we have an account of two formations. 1st, "Every creeping thing after his kind, and cattle after his kind," 2d, And lastly, man, in the image of his Maker. See verse 24-32. The time that elapsed between the formation of animals on the fifth and sixth periods must have been great, from the fact that the transition rocks, in which the lowest order of marine animals are found, "were once the uppermost strata." In the next series the remains of species now extant appear. Hence the conclusion of Buckland that "existing species have had a beginning, and this at a period comparatively recent." Hence also the conclusion of all celebrated geologists, that man, whose remains are not found in the lower strata, did not exist contemporary with extinct species, but is of a more recent origin. This not only confirms the whole Mosaic account, but also our position that these days mean indefinite periods. K. H.

EXERCISES OF A MIND UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF SKEPTICISM.

For some time past, my mind has been tossed to and fro with overwhelming doubts respecting the existence of a Supreme Being; by reading the sentiments of Mr. A. Kneeland, I have at times, almost embraced Atheism! But yesterday as I was musing, and looking at my infant child, I was very sensibly surprised in beholding the structure of her body. Surely, (thought I) she must have been made by some being possessing forethought and power. I observed that every member of her body appeared to be made for a particular use—I was, for the first time in my life, sensibly surprised in thinking of the use of her eyes and ears—I thought I could plainly see that they were made for the very purpose of seeing and hearing; which also appeared to be a proof of kindness in the Maker of the body—for had she been made without eyes and ears, she could neither hear the consoling voice of her friends, nor see their faces; but now she can hear the voice of speech, and the melodious sounds of nature, and she can see the glorious objects which appear to be made to please the eye. I observed that she had a mouth which appeared to be made for the purpose of conveying food into the body—it is true, as yet, she has no teeth, neither does she require any, so long as she is nourished with milk; but, thought I, when nature requires more substantial food, it is probable she will have teeth given her for the purpose of chewing her victuals which also will be a great favor; for should she be without teeth, she would suffer a great inconvenience in eating different kinds of food. And from this circumstance, I could plainly see a forethought, economy, and kindness, in providing teeth for the benefit of mankind. I observed that my child had two arms and two hands, with just as many fingers on one hand as on the other; and also a thumb which assists the fingers in holding whatever I put into the hand. I noticed that each finger had three joints, which are of great use, for by means of the joints she can shut and open her hands at leisure, whereas without joints her fingers would be useless. Her hands also without fingers, would be as useless as an arm without a hand, so that in the construction of the arms and hands, I thought I could plainly see a particular design in the Maker, which appeared to be for the benefit of the child. I observed that the feet of my child appeared to be made for the purpose of walking; and what is worthy of notice, her feet are turned so as to walk directly forward, the same way that her face and eyes are made to look. Her hands also are formed so that she can place her eyes on them and see what they are doing. All this, surely, thought I, is a mark of economy in the Maker of the body; and certainly it is a proof of kindness in forming two hands and two feet, for had she been made with but one hand and one foot, she would be almost helpless. Surely, said I in my meditations, the Being who formed her must be possessed of economy something like the economy of man. But I am sure it was not a man who formed her. Then of course she must have been made by some other power—and where, said I, is that power? At first I thought it was only in the heavens above—there seated on some majestic throne; but on taking a second thought, I perceived that the same power which made my child, is with us wherever we are, and it is in that Power we "live and move, and have our being."

For a short space of time my mind was overwhelmed with wonder and astonishment. I thought that God was all around me, even in ev-every thing my eyes beheld. Now, said I, I do know, from the construction of my child, and from the works of nature, that an invisible power exists, which is superior to the power of man, and I am also convinced that that power is possessed of a principle of kindness; for what else but a principle of kindness would create my child, apparently for the very purpose of enjoying felicity? Behold she is placed here with parents and friends to protect her. The earth on which she is placed is continually bringing forth all kinds of nourishment to supply her various wants. Had the Ruler of the universe consulted no more than the mere existence of man, it is probable he would have provided no more than bread and water, but in addition to this he has provided all the luxuries of nature, apparently for the purpose of pleasing the taste of his beloved children. The fields not only produce the various kinds of grain, but the trees are often laden with different kinds of fruit; and the trees from which the fruits are produced, are made to grow so low that mankind can gather the fruit with perfect ease, which circumstance, I think, is worthy of notice; for should the fruit trees grow as tall as other trees, people would suffer great inconvenience in gathering the fruit. The bushes which produce the berry are made to grow so low that children can pick the fruit with ease and pleasure, and certainly all this is a proof of kindness in the Benefactor of mankind.

After thus meditating on the works of nature I was thoroughly convinced of an Almighty, Omnipresent power, and that that Power possessed a mind, and that mind is disposed to do good unto the children of men. I then looked at my child, and thought I could see her embraced as in the arms of surrounding love. Yes truly, said I, the Being who formed her with such perfectness, and placed her here with parents and connexions to protect her, and provided the luxuries of nature to please her taste, can be no other than a God of love and kindness. He has indeed, evinced a principle of kindness to her in this present state of existence, and I cannot believe he will ever suffer her to be miserable any more than will terminate for her good. But how do I know, thought I, that she will exist in a future state? How do I know but that she will one day drop into oblivion, and be annihilated forever? For a moment my heart shuddered at the idea. Indeed, said I, if the Maker of my child, has half the love for her that I have, he can never—no, never—suffer her to fall so as to rise no more, but he will one day place her in a situation far superior to this. Yes, if she is as dear to him as she is to me, he will always keep her in his embrace, and will in due time place her beyond the reach of all pain, either of body or mind; and could I be persuaded this would be the situation of my child, I think my mind would be at ease. The thought then occurred to my mind, what have I done, either for the existence, or the support of my child? Indeed I can not cause her to draw even one breath of life, and I can not cause even a grain to grow for her support; and surely the love of her Benefactor is as great as mine, because he has provided all things necessary for her support and happiness in this life.

I then cast my mind over the earth, and thought I could see that every mother is possessed with a principle of love for her children. Yes, said I, even the most profligate of mankind have a principle of love implanted in their nature, which causes them to protect their little ones from want and distress; and they can not endure the thought that even one of them should be lost so as never to be found again! And from whence proceeds this great principle of love which pervades the whole earth? Does it proceed from a good fountain, or an evil one? It can not proceed from an evil fountain, because there is not any evil either in the principle or its consequences. Then it must proceed from a good fountain; and so every mother, and every son and daughter, are embraced in the fountain of love, and as love can not endure the loss of even one dear soul, so I think it can not be otherwise but that all will be raised to a paradise beyond this earth, and that all will be made holy and happy in a celestial state of existence. And thus I concluded my meditations.

A MOTHER.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXXIV.

MATTHEW VIII: 29. "What have we to do with thee, Jesus thou Son of God," etc.

In this place we have an account of the miraculous cure of the demoniacs. To many who are not acquainted with the peculiar opinions of the Jews on this subject, the accounts of the demoniacs are very difficult and inexplicable. But let it be noticed, First, that the Jews in our Saviour's time did, and do still think that all the diseases to which mankind are subject, are to be ascribed to the agency of evil spirits—the spirits of dead men—who take up their abode in the person diseased and torment him as a punishment for his sins. Second, all the actions, words, or deeds of the man, thus possessed, were ascribed to the evil spirit, hence whatever he said is represented as being spoken by the evil spirit. Third, a deranged or crazy person was supposed to be afflicted with an evil spirit of the very worst and most malignant kind. Fourth, the word translated devil, diabolian, is a word which is never applied to the supposed evil being called the devil, but signifies a human ghost or spirit. Fifth, this opinion respecting demoniacal agency has no foundation in Scripture, but on the contrary all our diseases and afflictions come from God alone. Sixth, all the heathen nations believed and taught this doctrine respecting demons, and the Jews are well known to have derived it from them. Seventh, as it was a current opinion among the Jews that madness was owing to a possession with an evil spirit, therefore the madmen themselves who once had their senses, must of course have had the same notion. Eighth, these mad men, as is not uncommon, knew themselves to be so, and therefore thought themselves to be possessed, and spoke in that character.

Now taking these things into consideration, the subject is easily understood. As Jesus cured the disease by removing it, or as in this case, by transferring the disease to the swine, he is said to have cast out the demons, and sent them into the swine. That these swine were supernaturally seized with madness is evident from their running headlong into the sea and being drowned there.

The words ascribed to the demons, verse 29, were spoken by the demoniac himself, but as the evil spirit was supposed to influence his speech, they were ascribed to it. "Art thou come hither to torment us before our time?"

Luke says, "They besought Jesus that he would not command them to go out into the deep." From this we may infer that, in the opinion of the Jews, all these demons were to be sent, in due time to some place of punishment under the earth, or under the sea; but that they were to rage at large for a given time.

Matthew xii: 27. "By whom do your children cast them out?" Many Jews practiced exorcism, or religious jugglery, in order to expel demons, and to this our Saviour refers.

Matthew xiii: 19. "Then cometh the wicked one and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart." By the evil one may be understood any evil propensity, habit, or inclination, as pride, ambition, or worldly cares and honors.

John vi: 62. "What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before."

In this chapter we have many similar expressions to this. But let it be observed, once for all, that our Saviour was discoursing to the people, and to his disciples, in highly figurative language, representing his doctrine by the figure of bread, and the bread by himself. See verse 39.

All that is meant by his coming down from heaven, is that he received his commission and doctrine from heaven, and enjoyed the peculiar influences of God's spirit. And indeed, he might be said to be in the presence of God, for God was with him. These passages are fully explained by reference to the third chapter of John, where Christ says, "He that cometh down from heaven is above all," and explains by saying, verse 13, "The Son of man is in heaven." See more in Imp. version, note.

THE SUBJECT OF PRAYER—AGAIN.

BR. GROSH—It was not my intention, in propounding those questions to you a few weeks since, to present your readers with my views upon the subject of prayer; but, the only object which I had in view was, to call forth from your pen an article upon that subject for the benefit of the public. My views of prayer are, and ever have been, similar to those expressed in your answer, and I had supposed the phraseology of that article to be such, that you would not consider it an implication of my sentiments. Indeed, the very question which you quote to show that I supposed God to be represented by the man in bed, carries quite a different meaning. It is a self-answering question in the negative form—"Is this a just representation of the character of God?" The answer implied is—no! If I had intended an affirmative, I would have put the word not in the question, thus—Is this not a just representation, etc. Upon the same principle, and with the same propriety I might argue that it was "right to pervert the parable from its true meaning," because you ask, "Is it right to pervert the parable?" #### RENUNCIATION OF UNIVERSALISM.

Rev. William Whittaker, pastor of the Fourth Universalist society in the city of New-York, addressed a letter on July 22d, to the trustees of that society, reminding them of his labors for two years past, and stating his want of success in "promoting practical piety among" the congregation, or in inducing "them to become a deeply religious people—a praying people." He then comes to the conclusion that if Universalism was the truth of God, he ought to have experienced a different result—and, therefore, declares Universalism not a doctrine of the Bible.

This is jumping to conclusions with a vengeance. Because a man preaches in a manner more to display his talents as a reader and speaker, and to show off himself, and therefore does not succeed in making his congregation what he is not himself, therefore the doctrine he preaches is false! I confess my want of logical discernment to perceive the connection between the premises and the conclusion.

But Mr. Whittaker says "I now see and feel the importance of personal religion in a manner that I have never done before"—and I hope therefore that the denomination which he may hereafter join may not have cause to regret the soppery and inordinate vanity in him which we have always lamented—and that his next failures to do good may with more justice be laid on the doctrine instead of the preacher!

It is worthy of remark that Mr. Whittaker, in leaving our ranks, deals largely in exhortations to his late congregation to beware of Universalism as "a sentiment which is dangerous and licentious in its tendency"—and tells them "By renouncing it, you lose nothing, for if it is true, you, in common with the whole world, will be saved—but if it is false, Oh! remember—remember the awful consequences!" But he in no case deals in arguments addressed to the reason, or to the religious feelings, or in proofs from nature or Holy Writ. As to the appeal above quoted, it is well calculated to beget a belief that he would have men renounce Universalism, even though they still continued to believe it true, merely because, if it should not be true, they will suffer dreadfully for their honesty in professing what they believed. We hope that every Universalist who can be moved by such an unmanly and unreasonable appeal to the basest animal passion, (fear), will immediately follow Mr. Whittaker. We give Br. Sawyer's remarks on this affair, together with Mr. W.'s renunciation in full.

REV. MR. WHITTAKER'S RENUNCIATION.

We avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity to announce to our readers the renunciation of Universalism by the Rev. William Whittaker of this city. The subjoined letter, addressed to the trustees of the Fourth Universalist Society, of which he was pastor, contains a statement of his reasons for this strange, and, notwithstanding his assurance to the contrary, we can not but think, very rash and hasty step. We offer no comments. The course of Mr. Whittaker has to us, at least, been unexpected, though not inexplicable. The following letter contained the first intimation that we ever had of his swerving from the faith which he has for several years professed and preached. Towards him personally we now entertain, as we have ever entertained, no other sentiments than those of the most friendly character, and however much we may regret this and many other instances of his frailty, we shall ever wish him well. If he can find in any other faith higher incitements to virtue and a holy life, or grounds for a purer joy or more soul-sustaining hope, we not only pray that he may enjoy it, but we would be the last to disturb him in its peaceable possession. Of this, however, we indulge no expectation. We are convinced that he has made a bitter exchange, and we fear that it has been made hastily, under the influence of merely temporary and local circumstances. We fear indeed that it is the result of disappointed hopes and wounded vanity far more than of sober inquiry and deep-wrought conviction.

We can assure our friends abroad, who are not familiar with our affairs in New-York, that Mr. Whittaker's renunciation will exert no unfavorable influence upon our cause generally in this city, or even upon the interests of the society over which he presided as teacher. We not only have an unwavering confidence in the truth that God will overrule all events for good, but in the present instance, we can distinctly trace the incipient lines of that working.

T. J. S.

New-York, July 22, 1840.

DEAR BRETHREN—I hope you will pardon the liberty which I have taken in addressing to you these few lines, in relation to a subject which I deem of infinite importance.

It is now about two years since I first commenced my labors in this city, and I think you will not deem it an evidence of vanity when I say, that my efforts to advance the cause of Universalism have been generally approved and signally successful.

To this you have frequently borne testimony, and for which, you have had my warmest acknowledgments.

But in looking calmly and dispassionately at the result of my ministrations, there is one drawback to my happiness—one source of disquietude, which weighs heavily upon my mind.

I have recently been led to ask myself the following important question—What have I done towards promoting practical piety among my congregation? Have I induced them to become a deeply religious people—a praying people?

Alas! I am constrained to answer these questions in the negative, and to take unto myself shame and confusion of face.

Now if the doctrine of Universalism be the truth of God, ought I not to have expected a different result?

What then is the inference? Why, that it is not a doctrine of the Bible.

Perhaps you may think this an hasty conclusion, but I will assure you it is not so.

I have been led to investigate its claims—I have prayed to the Almighty that he would enlighten my understanding, and lead me to a knowledge of the truth; and blessed be his holy name, he has heard and answered my petition.

I can truly say, that I now see, and feel the importance of personal religion in a manner that I have never done before, and I ardently beseech the "Giver of every good and perfect gift," that he would open your eyes, and give you to see that Universalism is but a "cunningly devised fable," calculated to darken the mind, harden the heart, and induce mankind to wander from the paths of righteousness and peace.

Such being my convictions, I can advocate it no longer, and I beseech you as you hope for mercy at the hands of the Almighty, to renounce it immediately.

Do not, I pray you, suffer yourselves to be deluded by a sentiment which is dangerous and licentious in its tendency. By renouncing it you lose nothing, for if it is true, you in common with the whole world, will be saved—but if it is false, Oh! remember—remember the awful consequences!

But I must close, and may the Lord grant that you, together with my dear congregation may soon be led to see, and feel the necessity of an interest in the atoning blood of Jesus, which is the ardent prayer of

Your sincere friend,
WM. WHITTAKER.

RENUNCIATION OF UNIVERSALISM.

So common is it for the criminals in our state prisons, and those who are capitally punished, to be believers in the doctrine of endless misery—and so desirous are some of our opposers to prove the doctrine of Universalism to be licentious in its tendency—that we must expect daring efforts to shift the responsibility of making such hardened wretches on to our doctrine, whenever an opportunity offers.

A man named Noah M. Thomas, was lately executed for murder, in Fonda, Montgomery county. During his confinement under sentence of death, he was visited by many humane and religiously zealous persons, for the gratification of their various feelings. The prisoner manifested considerable indifference and hardness. It was not long before a report was started by some of those opposed to Universalism, (but, we would charitably hope, utterly ignorant of its teachings,) that the prisoner was, or had been, a Universalist. Rev. P. Hathaway, of Amsterdam, hearing of these reports, visited the man in company with witnesses, and without disclosing to the prisoner the religious views of his visitor. It appeared from the conversation, that the man was hardly entitled to the appellation of a Christian believer—that he was a believer in the existence of a Supreme Being, but knew little, and cared less, if he believed any thing about the Bible. At that visit he made the declarations which will be found in the certificate last annexed. After this, the prisoner was further importuned by our opposers, and was finally persuaded to give the certificate first annexed hereto—which certificate, since the execution of Thomas, they have been busy circulating in the secular and religious papers in the land, for the purpose of prejudicing the credulous, ignorant and indifferent of community against the doctrine of universal salvation.

The certificate of Thomas was published in the Amsterdam Intelligencer. The following week, Rev. Mr. Hathaway requested and obtained permission to publish in the same paper, his remarks and the counter testimony. The editor of the Intelligencer is a Presbyterian and deserves credit, for his fairness and liberality in allowing both sides to be fairly presented in his columns. We hope that all Editors who publish Thomas' certificate will imitate so good an example, and at least, follow the bare with the antidote. Then will the public readily perceive that Thomas was a man of no veracity, and that, in reality, his supposed renunciation of Universalism is only a renunciation of his "strong doubts" of its truth, for a confirmed belief of its falsity. Hence the man, as Br. Hathaway well and truly observes, was a strong doubter of Universalism before he committed murder—in its commission—and after his conviction—and finally died a believer in endless misery; as he had lived—an unbeliever of Universalism!

Our honorable opposers in Fonda and vicinity, had better "try again;" and when at last (if ever) they do succeed, we will furnish them with a list of a hundred Partialists who were hung, for every Universalist they can find that has thus suffered the penalty of our laws. But let them not attempt to palm off their brethren in the faith, as believers in Universalism. A. B. G.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE PUBLIC.

Thinking it might be of service to the cause of truth, I feel constrained in this public manner to say, that for many years past I have been a professed Universalist; have often spoken in favor of it to others, and urged its belief upon them, though at the same time it never influenced me to refrain from intemperance, and opposition to personal religion.

I have at no time been without strong doubts as to its correctness, and now in the absence of all intimidations and undue influence of any kind, from any person, with full possession of my reason, and in view of standing at the Bar of God, I make this dying and public declaration, that I have found it insufficient for death—opposed to the word of God; and from my own experience I solemnly warn all from embracing it. And also to avoid intemperance by which I have been brought to my present painful situation.

NOAH M. THOMAS.

Being a believer in the doctrine of Universal salvation, I feel it my duty and privilege to defend that faith against the pretended and inconsistent renunciation of Noah M. Thomas, and his advisers, who, with better fame and less honesty, are endeavoring to make sectarian capital of the unfortunate and degraded man.

If the declaration of Thomas would only be made where the facts are known, I would never have stooped to notice the disgraceful subject. But as it is published to the world, and as the author has thereby brought himself before the public; in justice to all concerned, I present the following affidavits and facts, "that the world may know" not what the character of Thomas has been, (about that, there is but one opinion,) but what his present character is, for truth and honesty.

Fonda, Mont. co., July 3, 1840.

We hereby certify, that we were present on or about the first of June last, in the jail at Fonda, when the Rev. Phineas Hathaway held some conversation with Noah M. Thomas, on the subject of religion, in which the said Noah M. Thomas made the following statements:

"I am not, nor ever was a Universalist. I never was good enough to be one. The doctrine of Universalism is a good doctrine—if I had lived as it required, I should not have been where I am. I believe I am the son of perdition. If the man I murdered is lost, I am willing to take his place in hell, if it will make any satisfaction."

Subscribed and sworn to this 8th day of July, 1840, before me,

JOHN MORRELL.

Commissioner of Deeds.

GEORGE WESTINGHOUSE.

JOHN C. COOK.

The candid reader will perceive that the above affidavit refers to statements made by Thomas after his conviction, which forever puts the question beyond a doubt of his ever being a Universalist.

Indeed in the absence of this testimony, that fact appears from his renunciation, in which he says, "I have at no period been without strong doubts as to its correctness." It is a matter of astonishment to me, that the author of that exorted renunciation, did not see that his production would, like "Achilles' spear, heal the wound it made." It is too late to take back this sentence; the stupid brain of its author, should have withheld it for his purpose. It is an important truth unwittingly published, and therefore, does no honor to its author. To make the matter plain, let us state a case. Suppose an individual should present himself to the Presbyterian church at Fonda, for membership, and after hearing the articles of faith read, should say, "I have at no period been without strong doubts as to their correctness;" would he be admitted as a member? Most certainly not. Who, with these facts before him, will have the unblushing impudence to affirm that Thomas was ever a believer in Universalism, when he, like Thomas of old, had strong doubts as to its correctness?

Does the reader inquire after the cause of his intemperance and opposition to personal religion? It will be found in his strong doubts and unbelief. Does the reader again ask what Thomas found to be insufficient for death, and opposed to the word of God? I answer, his strong doubts of, and unbelief in, the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

PHINEAS HATHAWAY.

LETTER WRITING.

There is something peculiarly gratifying to all men in receiving a raey, intelligible letter from a friend. There are cases however, where these qualifications unluckily are not deemed necessary. For instance; a letter from some old torment, whose sickness is the only hope you have of peace, informing you that he is—very well; but obliging you to traverse three pages of foolscap to find it all; and when you get through, leaving the impression that your correspondent is either an eavesdropper in knowing, or meaner still in guessing, so much about the exclusive affairs of his neighbors. This would be about as agreeable as it is to be fastened by the buttonholes of your coat to some old proser's digits, while he enlightens you with reference to some new wrinkle which he has discovered, in that species of common property, his neighbor's character.

Or, if you prefer it—we like extremes in a contrast—suppose you have placed in your hand a dun—not done, for you may be sure that, as short as it is, it will never be finished so long as you are but just able to pay your month's board bill, and kick your debtors who have done you the kindness to evade your duns. It would be easier measuring a man's reflections by the bushel, than estimating their quality at this precise juncture. It is useless to escape reading the little black and white missile; it is not so easily put off. Almost any other letter you can return to the writer with the seal unbroken; or if broken with your compliments at the beginning of the epistle. But think of sending back a dun unread, and after you have paid the postage on it, too—the thing is impossible. Like the charmed eye of the serpent, the more you hate it the more intensely you gaze upon it.

Next to the dun, and the last in the list of our exceptions, is the—really, reader, I do not know what to call it. I will describe it to you. You have a letter in your hand, written by one whom you have felt it your duty to reprove, for cheating you out of forty or fifty dollars of your honest property. In this letter he attempts to prove that he is one of the most honest men living, and that he has cheated you for your especial benefit. Having, as he supposes, explained this matter satisfactorily to you, he closes by giving you a lengthy piece of advice and instruction about the nature of moral honesty, and wishing that you enjoyed it as well he does. Ten chances to one, if, before you get through the letter, you do not conclude that your very interesting lecturer is troubled with absence of mind, or that he is in a condition similar to that of the inebriate who fancied that every body staggered but himself.

I say then, that there are cases in which the privilege of perusing an epistolary correspondence is not very gratifying. We can generalise as to the most desirable qualities of these letters, but it is hard to specify particulars. Among all the treatises on rhetoric, elocution, composition, etc., which have fallen in our way, we have never seen any directions for making these letters agreeable. We shall not therefore hazard our reputation as an adviser, otherwise than by saying that the shorter they are the better.

With the exceptions already named, there is real pleasure some way or other connected with the perusal of an epistle from a friend. This is evident from a multiplicity of circumstances. There is perhaps nothing which will produce the alienation of two friends more effectually, than the neglect of writing. In this age of steam, when you can visit a friend a hundred miles off in a few hours, you may pass by him, into his neighborhood, and all around him; and if a call is merely inconvenient, you have but to write, and your apology will be irresistible. And then, to sit down and con over the ever welcome messenger from the friend of your youth, or from dear relatives who have been long absent from you—this is the way to live over again the halcyon days of olden time. I think it is a true sentiment, that he who has felt the influence of friendly correspondence will not hazard its loss by neglect to return the favor. And then for an editor, to sit down to such a feast of rich dainties as may be spread out before him by his kind correspondents—O, if you could see with what eagerness he goes to the post office with every arrival of the mail, (and especially if he expects a remittance, by way of preface to the practicability of his correspondent's remarks,) I imagine you would almost wish to bring your own letter, that you might witness his joy. At least, if you could not do this, you could pay the postage, as coming the nearest to it.

We said that with the exceptions named, there is real pleasure some way or other, connected with the perusal of a letter from a friend. We came very near getting drove from this position once, but we very fortunately escaped. It might have been by a sort of legal quibble, such as lawyers sometimes make, but no matter.

Less than twenty years ago, we received a letter from a distant friend, from the closely written pages of which, we expected to derive much satisfaction. To make expectation doubly sure, we first glanced at the writer's name, and having greeted a favorite name with cordiality, we sat down to the perusal. We read it through—but mercy on us! we had liked to have ceased breathing forever, and when we did catch breath, we did so without knowing whether we stopped in the right place or not. The punctuation was a mere incidental matter, thrown in by way of marking the thinking spots, I suppose; sometimes into the middle of a sentence, sometimes between two syllables of the same word, and once thrown together in promiscuous confusion, leaving the succeeding half page entirely destitute. Besides this, about every other common noun, adjective and preposition began with a capital letter, except where they should have commenced a sentence; there the capital was missing. What could I do? If I punctuated it one way it gave him one meaning; if I punctuated it another, it gave him a different meaning—sometimes punctuate it as I would, it gave him no meaning at all. What to do I could not tell. My favorite theory was at stake, and I should have to modify it by adding another to its list of exceptions; for as yet I had found no gratification in this letter. At last after reading it three times, and suffering my destructiveness to become considerably aroused, I bethought me of a method by which I could make even this letter add to my gratification; and that was by burning it. I held it in my hand a moment enjoying the outward qualities of my victim. I looked at the superscription—the postage was paid; I thought that if the writer had ever once read two pages in the latter part of his spelling book, his letter was an unjustifiable evidence of his carelessness—if not, it was time he had; I tore his name from the bottom of the letter—I could not burn that; and the rest—became ashes.

Ever since that I have had but little difficulty in enjoying the letters of that friend. Do you ask me why? He looked at the spelling book before he wrote me another.

THE UNIVERSALIST PULPIT.

I should have stated some time since what I now state—that we have not received a sufficient number of subscribers to defray the expenses of this proposed publication—that many friendly to such a work, and myself among the number, are unwilling to have the design abandoned totally, and think that during the ensuing fall many who are now unable to pay down for it, will be glad to subscribe and pay for it.

This, then, is to give notice that in due time, we will again propose the work, the publication of which is postponed until the first of January next. Persons who have subscribed, will still be considered as subscribers, unless they signify to the contrary. And those few who have paid for the work, and do not wish to wait for its appearance, will have their money returned to them, or otherwise applied, as they may direct. Those who have aided us by word or deed, will please receive our thanks for their kindness.

A. B. G.

THE ROSE OF SHARON for 1841 is now in the press, and will be ready for subscribers by September 1st. It will be got up in a style superior to the last number, bound in Morocco, and sister Sarah thinks, better filled—all at the same price as last year. Let all those who want copies speak in season. Br. Hutchinson, General Agent, receives subscriptions. He has a few copies of the last number yet for sale. Are all supplied? Speak soon.

THE N. Y. CATHOLIC HERALD.

The second volume of this well conducted weekly has commenced, after an enlargement to double the former size. It is published every Thursday, on a sheet nearly twice the size of ours, in quarto form, at three dollars per annum, payable in advance. The matter contained in it must be useful and interesting to our brethren holding that faith—more so, probably, than it is to us—and the paper is conducted with spirit, and neatly printed. Gallagher and Smith, Publishers, 168 Fulton street—Rev. Felix Varela, Editor.

Some of our readers may know Catholics in whom a love of reading would be cultivated, if they knew of this paper and would subscribe for it—and thus some good might be performed, and some evil eradicated, by making them acquainted with the above notice. Though opposed to many of the doctrines inculcated and held by the Catholics, yet it is believed no Universalist would object to aiding their neighbors of that faith, by giving them information of this kind.

A. B. G.

Br. H. Bacon, of Marblehead, Mass., and Editor of the Ladies Repository, proposes preparing and publishing a small volume for the peculiar use and benefit of the afflicted and bereaved. It will undoubtedly be a good book, well suited to the end designed; for Br. Bacon is well able to prepare such a one.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. A. O. WARREN, in McDonough village.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in August, by Br. Cook in Troy, and Br. D. J. MANDELL, in this city—Br. A. O. WARREN, in Baldwinville, four miles east of McDonough village—Br. Grosh, in Bridge-water, and in Winfield at 5 P. M.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in August, by Br. A. O. WARREN, in Pharsalia West Village, near Crain's tavern—Br. Grosh, in Lee, and in Delta at 5 P. M.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE LIGHT OF CALVARY.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

Darkness, and gloom, and terror,
Have shrouded Palestine;
The heavens are veiled in sackcloth,
The sun forgets to shine;
For he, the loved and sinless one
Hangs on th' accursed tree;
And to attest his Father's love,
Pours out his life-blood free.
Yet light is dawning 'mid that gloom,
To gild the darkness of the tomb.

A blank, and deathly silence,
Prevades the murky air,
The song-birds fold their pinions,
The wild beasts seek the lair.
But hark! what thrilling accents
Of wailing agony!
"My Father, why, my Father
Hast thou forsaken me?
Why in this dark, this dreadful hour,
Hast thou withdrawn the spirit's power?"

Nature, through all her caverns,
Responds that fearful moan,
The adamant rocks upheave,
At th' earthquake's thunder-tone;
The towering billows lash the cliffs,
Earth's deep foundations rend;
Dim horror broods with boding wing,
Heaven's lofty arches bend;
And an unseen hand hath rent in twain
The veil of Zion's holy fane!

When in the gloomy garden
Of sad Gethsemane,
The man of many sorrows,
In anguish bent the knee,
Praying the mighty Father,
This chalice to remove—
The bitter seal that must be set,
Upon his deathless love;
Even then, his spirit joy'd to see
The dawning light of Calvary.

How oft the weary wanderer,
Toil'd o'er Judea's hills;
Pray'd on the misty mountains,
And by the crystal rills,
Spake words of life and glory,
To the heartless throng around,
While scorn and cold ingratitude,
Mock'd the seraphic sound,
Wept o'er Jerusalem's dark fall,
And mourn'd the godlike spirit's thrall!

He saw life's gloomy valley,
With darkness overspread,
And the groveling dupes of folly,
In sin's hard fetters led,
And yearn'd to loose the captive,
To set hope's prisoners free,
Pour music on the deaf, deaf ear,
And give the blind to see,
How rich, how radiant was the light,
Which faith could shed on Time's dark night!

When sorrow's whelming billows
Have o'er my sad heart roll'd,
And wrung the fainting spirit
With anguish deep, untold;
When wildly on my pathway
The storm cloud fiercely frown'd,
And the spells of dark enchanters,
Were on me and around,
How has my soul leapt up to see,
The light that beams from Calvary.

O, glorious, glorious splendor!
More cheering than the light,
That on the sandy desert,
Gleamed through the live-long night,
When Israel's trembling footsteps,
By Pharaoh's host pursued,

Sped fainting on their weary way,
Till by the sea they stood,
Whose waters roll'd in wonder back,
Where Jacob's God mark'd out the track.

What though in gloom and sorrow
We tread life's thorny waste!
The wild and pathless mazes
Of time, will soon be past,
Faith, with her dazzling halo,
Will guide us safely through,
Till o'er the rolling Jordan,
We gain the heavenly view
Of the light that through sin's clouds has beamed.
Whose rays so bright on Calvary gleamed.

TERRIFIC PREACHING.

Many preachers appear to use their utmost exertions to frighten their hearers; and in this way they become exceedingly popular. What but this has contributed to the fame of such men as Burchard, Finney, and the like? They seem to suppose that all hearers are like the man, who desired to hear such preaching as would make him shrink into a corner of the pew, lest the devil should catch him, and, truly, very many are of this class. They most highly regard those who excite their fears most violently. The description given by SELDEN, in his "Table Talk," is true to the life, concerning multitudes.

"If the physician sees you eat any thing that is not good for your body, to keep you from it he cries 'tis poison; if the divine sees you do any thing that is hurtful for your soul, to keep you from it he cries you are damned.

"To preach long, and damnation, is the way to be cried up. We love a man that damns us, and we run after him again to save us. If a man had a sore leg, and he should go to an honest judicious surgeon, and he should only bid him to keep it warm, and anoint with such an oil well known, that would do the cure, haply he would not much regard him, because he knows the medicine beforehand an ordinary medicine. But if he should go to a surgeon that should tell him, your leg will gangrene within three days, and it must be cut off, and you will die unless you do something that I could tell you, what listening there would be to this man! Oh, for the Lord's sake, tell me what this is, I will give you any content for your pains."

The application is so perfectly obvious, that it needs no comment. How despicable is the conduct of those who would frighten others out of their senses, merely be "cried up" as powerful preachers.

Trumpet and Magazine.

Mr. Holmes.—The following anecdote is selected and communicated by a boy 12 years old. It is to be hoped this lad will ever remember and improve the precept it is intended to inculcate, namely, a temper thoroughly imbued with good nature and patience on all occasions. He will find such a temper to be of incalculable service to him as he advances in the thorny road of life. Very probably some wives and misses would do well to take a lesson from it; and finally, we all would do well occasionally to think of Dame Grundy's great good nature and heed it.

[Maine Farmer.]

GOOD NATURE.

Dame Grundy was the most good natured woman alive. Come what would, every thing was right, nothing wrong. One day Farmer Grundy told a neighbor that he believed his wife was one of the most even tempered women in the world, for he never saw her cross in his life, and that for once he should like to see her so. "Well" said his neighbor, "go into the woods, and bring home a load of the crookedest wood you can find, if it don't make her cross nothing will." Accordingly to try the experiment he teamed home a load of wood every way calculated to make a woman fret. For weeks or more she used the wood copiously, but not a word of complaint escaped her lips. So one day the husband ventured to inquire of her how she liked the wood. "Oh, 'tis beautiful wood," said she, "I wish you'd get another load, for it fays round the pole completely."

VERY GOOD.

A Universalist of C—, used to lend his paper to Mr. F—, (a Methodist, and liberal minded withal,) who one day left the paper at home, and his daughter, Miss A—, (a strict Methodist,) happened in, and seeing the paper on the table, took it up and finding it very interesting, read it for some time before her father came in. She says to him, "Papa, you have a good Universalist paper here, where did you get it?" He said "it was neighbor A—'s." She replied, "Why papa, it is a Universalist paper, and I do not see any harm in it." Ever since the lady has been a constant reader. This is the right way to act. People should read all sides, and see if any good can come out of Nazareth. By so doing they would have less prejudice. Try it and see. Never condemn any person unheard.—[Southern Universalist.]

POWER OF INDUSTRY.—It is a beautiful expression of a Chinese sage, that, by time and industry, a mulberry tree becomes a silk shawl. If the following statement it be correct, it affords a still more striking proof of what human ingenuity can accomplish. In the manufacture of steel, an article may be raised from one half penny to thirty five thousand guineas! A pound of crude iron cost one half penny; it is concerted into steel, that steel is made into watch springs, every one of which is sold for half a guinea, and weighs only the 10th of a grain; after deducting for waste there are in a pound weight 7,000 grains. It therefore affords steel for 70,000 watch springs the value of which, at half a guinea each is thirty five thousand guineas.

SELECT SENTENCES.—Prosperity is not a just scale, adversity is the only balance to weigh friends. Religion is the best armor; but the worst cloak. Liberality is not in giving largely, but giving wisely. He who makes an idol of his interest, will make a martyr of his own integrity.

Pliny says "Nature has some flowers for pleasure; these last but for one day." She has trees for use, which last for years, as if she intended to intimate, that whatever is splendid passes away, and soon loses its lustre."

DEATHS.

In Lafayette, May 6th, Mr DANIEL COLE, aged 83 years. The subject of this notice was born in the State of Rhode Island—was a soldier in the armies of the Revolution, and for many years a member of the Baptist Connexion. In the providence of God he was led to embrace a more liberal, and enlarged system of faith. He acted upon its principles, and died, rejoicing in its triumphs.—Sermon on the occasion by the writer. Also—In Jamesville, Onondaga county, N. Y. May 9th, SILAS RUD, aged 61 years. The deceased was born in the State of Connecticut—was, for many years previous to his death, a resident of this State; and although a member of no society or church, still cherished the sentiments of Universalism in his soul. He lived the life, and died the death of a Christian. May God console all who have been called to mourn by these dispensations of his providence, through the power of his faith. A. C. B.

In Antwerp, Jefferson county, July 18th, after a distressing sickness of one week which he bore with unusual patience, JOSEPH, son of Benjamin and Lucinda Cook, aged 10 years and 6 months. He was an amiable, intelligent, promising child; of course the loss is most severely afflicting. His funeral was attended on the 19th in the Methodist Chapel, where a very numerous congregation of relatives, kind neighbors and sympathizing friends, manifested their interest in the scene while the writer attempted to point them to the superintending power and goodness of our Heavenly Father, from Job i: 21st. A. WOOD.

In Albion, Orleans county, N. Y. July 16th, WALTER RUNCIMAN, aged 25 years, 2 months and 16 days. He was cut down by the unsparring destroyer—consumption, in the midst of youth and usefulness. He possessed a very amiable character, and a warm attachment for his friends. He died as he lived, a believer in the final emancipation of all intelligent beings from sin and all its consequences. His zeal was exhibited in a manly and dignified defence of the sentiments he avowed and cherished. He has left a near and dear companion, a small babe, and aged father and mother, four sisters and two brothers, and other dear relatives; but they do not mourn as those without hope. May the Lord sustain the bereaved and comfort them under the sudden stroke of divine providence, and administer unto them the Gospel of reconciliation and peace. A large concourse of sympathizing friends and mourners convened at the Methodist Episcopal church on the 17th inst, to pay their last tribute of respect. Sermon delivered by Rev. Mr. FULLER, Methodist. J. G. BROWN.

INNATE, CONNATE AND INBORN DEPRIVITY.

BY REV. W. H. GRISWOLD.

ORIGINAL SIN.

"Undoubtedly it is one of the grand pillars on which the Andover Institution rests."—Dr. Dana's Letters to Prof. Stuart.

Total depravity is a stale old subject. But one of the grand pillars of the Theological Seminary at Andover may be something new to the mass of readers. It seems to belong to an order of architecture very seldom modelled after or treated of, by those who pay any regard to the Five Orders of the ancients; and one too, which prophets and apostles knew as little about as they did about the grand superstructure that now rests upon the same. It is not noted for its Tuscan simplicity, its Doric boldness, or its Ionic excellence; neither has it the delicacy, richness and ornamental beauty of the Corinthian or Composite orders; but seems to be an order destitute of all virtue, all beauty, all symmetry, and all taste, and is venerated more on account of its age than its elegance, and is preserved rather as a relic of antiquity than as a specimen of the fine arts. I have said it is venerated more on account of its age than any thing else; but it can not claim much even in this respect, for it has not the stamp even of Grecian or Roman sanction, to say nothing of times still further back, to recommend it as a relic of old. It is not generally known perhaps, as it should be, that native depravity in all its deformity, is yet considered one of the "grand pillars" of the Calvinistic order of architecture; and when it is known that this is the case, we doubt not that a few particulars relative to its present proportions, its crumbling aspect, its obnoxious appearance, the importance of its preservation, the prophecy for and against its speedy downfall, and the tenacity with which it is still clung to as the chief pillar of the three brick buildings where Orthodoxy dwells, will not be wholly uninteresting, especially if presented in a few very short articles, which articles shall present a faithful and true delineation of this grand column in the words of its present admirers, sustainers and supporters, and according to the latest edition of the Andover press.

With permission of the editor therefore, the writer will present such a series to the readers of the Magazine and Advocate. His object in doing this is two-fold: first, to let the general reader behold some of the lights and shadows of this dark region of the earth; and secondly, to while away some of his idle hours in some harmless, if not useful employment. The readers will therefore, understand that it is not the writer's intention to pull down the old edifice, but only to lay before them the evidence he finds, that it stands on a perishable foundation and is destined ere long to fall by its own decay.

To show that the subject is not without importance, or, rather, that it is thought not to be so, the words of one of its chosen disciples, who wears the mark of the old school, have been placed at the head of this article. This will be adopted as a kind of motto, that we may all be reminded at the commencement of each article that our subject is an important one. Dr. Dana, of whom there will be frequent occasion to speak, is not a Professor in the Seminary; but a Rev. D. D. of Newburyport, who, during the last year took it upon him to say some sharp things to one of the Professors, (Stuart,) by way of admonition. He is so connected with the Seminary, that his words may be considered full as oracular as some of its Professors; and as such we would here introduce him to the reader, and would follow up the introduction with one or two questions from the letters above referred to. Speaking of Prof. Stuart's departure from the "old fashioned sentiments," he holds the following language: "Indeed, they (i. e. Stuart's ministerial brethren) may view it as among conceivable possibilities that you may abandon your present theory for one not less exceptionable. In this case it will surely be an unpleasant dilemma, to find themselves compelled either to forsake their guide, or to follow him in the dark." And again, in his last letter he writes as follows: "You can not be ignorant that many of the ancient heathen philosophers and poets had deeper, (I had almost said, more scriptural,) views of human depravity, than some modern preachers." These will serve to give the reader something of an idea of the man, and of the unceremonious and crusty manner in which he reminds his Reverend Br. that he may be going into the "dark!" The latter extract is undoubtedly a very true remark, and would have been equally as appropriate if the writer had included himself, as he evidently did Prof. Stuart under the term, "some modern preachers." We think the remark an excellent one and the application admirable.

Having thus formally made his "bow," the writer will in his next present the base of the "grand pillar," of which he is to speak and thereby exhibit

"What mighty difference there can be,

"Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee."

FACTS FOR LIMITARIANS.

BY REV. J. BOYDEN.

1. It is a fact, that the multitude of those who heard Christ preach, were astonished at his doctrine. Matt. xxii: 33. 2. It is a fact contended for by Limitarians; that the Jews of our Lord's time believed in the doctrine of endless misery. 3. It is a fact, that people are not often "astonished" at that which they see and hear daily. These three facts, added together, produce the result, or answer, that Christ did not preach the doctrine of endless misery.

Again. 1. It is a fact, that the Scribes and Pharisees were an exceedingly wicked class of people, notwithstanding their belief in the doctrine of eternal punishment. 2. It is a fact that Jesus rebuked them for their vices, and warned his disciples against their doctrine. Matt. xvi: 6-12. 3. The conclusion of the whole matter is, that Jesus neither believed nor practiced the principles of that doctrine, which proclaims the unending wo of a portion of the human family; and that said doctrine cannot be entitled even to the compliment which our faith has received—of being "good to live by."

HEARING OF THE WORD.

BY REV. MOSES BALLOU.

CHAPTER VI.

The last class I shall mention at present, is, VI. Hearers for others. It is a singular fact, characteristic of most people in some good degree, that each exempts himself from the general mass, when any thing is administered in the slightest degree unpleasant, when applied personally to one's own self; and the great reason that lies at the root of the matter, is, if I mistake not, the darling impression, cherished by almost every one individually, that he is a little better than his neighbors. At any rate, self is generally assumed to be immaculate, and of course, if an existing evil is pointed out, each, without ever examining himself to see if he is guilty, says without hesitation that it must have reference to some one else, and ten chances to one, he will immediately select a neighbor whose case it will fit exactly. If the exposure is accompanied by a word of reproof, that, of course belongs to the guilty only; and each turns it over to some one else. Thus the preacher may talk himself dumb, and find at last that he has accomplished little or nothing, as each has heard for his neighbor, and no one for himself. Thus it is that moral instructions lose most of the influence they are designed to produce. When an evil is held up by the preacher, if the hearer has any desire to profit by it, he will never ask the question, who is this for? but to his own conscience. He should never say, this remark is for that man; that for another, etc., for this is becoming judges of other people's hearts, which is out of our province entirely. No man can know another's heart, or read the secrets of his neighbor's bosom. These are known only to one's own self and the all-seeing eye. But each can answer for himself, and this is his duty. Let him ask the question, is it I? and attempt to profit by the answer. Were this but practiced, there is little doubt that the Sabbaths we spend in the house of worship would each leave us better and happier than they found us. And now let every individual who may peruse these chapters, remember, that though they may be applicable, in some respects, to readers generally, they are designed, and addressed especially to him.

SYLLOGISTICAL PROBLEMS.

BY REV. S. MILES.

Is it true that the Christians are made partakers of the divine nature, spirit and disposition of God? Is it true that God has a spirit and disposition to punish millions of the human family without end and without mercy?

If the reader admits the above propositions, then I would ask one question more; and that is, Are the different sects and denominations in this world the partakers of the spirit and disposition of the God they worship and adore? If they are, then there are many fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters among us, that have the spirit and disposition to punish their ungodly relatives and friends, without end and without mercy.

Once more. Is it true that those who read and contemplate a novel are made the partakers of the spirit and disposition of the novel? And is it also true, that those who read and contemplate the doctrine of endless punishment are made the partakers of the spirit and disposition of that doctrine?

Now if these things are so, how long must we read that cruel and unmerciful doctrine, before we can punish our children and neighbors as thousands were punished by the inquisition in Portugal, France, and Spain? Yea more, how long must we receive and adore the doctrine of endless wo, before we shall be prepared to see our dear children tossed upon the burning billows of an endless hell without its disturbing our peace and repose? Answer the above who can.

LA MARGUERITE. NO. V.

To the Young Ladies of the Clinton Liberal Institute.

DEAR GIRLS—The improvement of time, as a subject, affords me no hope of making my present communication an interesting one. It is so old, so familiar, so worn in its very sound; that an indifference steals over the mind, at the mere mention of it as an object of thought. Its importance makes no difference with this feeling; it is that very importance which has made it so common, and as a consequence, so wearisome.

In meditating the best means of securing your attention to this subject, the thought has occurred to me, that I am privileged to claim it of you in reciprocity; for whether pleasant or otherwise, you are continually forcing upon my reflections, the importance of the improvement of time. To some of you the past year has been rich in acquisition. And beautiful is the development of character, when truth after truth is treasured up in the mind, and the enervating fancies of an unregulated imagination, give place to the healthy energies of thought. Far be it from me, to claim the credit of your advancement in knowledge and virtue. I am happier in being able to ascribe it to your own improvement of time.

But this subject does not always come to me, associated with the good of others. It is often, very often, mingled with the most anxious solicitude. And then, perhaps, as one unpleasant thought is ever ready to awaken others; there may be many reasons, why the subject should be to me a painful one. Perhaps there are regrets attached to the memory of my own earlier years. Perhaps I too may ask

"——— To weep o'er hours that flew
More idly than the summer wind."

Yet not for this can I escape reflection. And were I to enumerate all the different and daily repeated occasions, upon which this subject is forced upon me, not to think of only, but to feel; I am sure you would listen to every thing I might say to you, upon the improvement of time, for very sympathy if for nothing else. But I have no such intention. I shall mention but one instance, and that for the purpose of eliciting thought rather than feeling.

I have found since I have had charge of the composition exercises in this school, that no subject is more frequently chosen than, the improvement of time. These papers have afforded me instruction, not because I have found in them much either new, or striking; on the contrary, they are generally careless productions, and written as often as otherwise, by those who are most prodigal of their hours; but the circumstance itself is an impressive one. We are not to suppose that young writers adopt the preceptive style, because it is best suited to them, but they must write as others do from impressions, and no impressions are to them more vivid than the admonitions of the friends they love. The circumstance proves, then, that most of those, if not all, who exercise the duties of guardianship, find it necessary to inculcate often, and forcibly the value of time. It proves that young persons are generally sensible of a tendency in themselves, to commit the fault of wasting time; and though not always disposed to correct it, yet with the quick susceptibilities of youth, they are ready to feel the exhortations which they hear or read, to the practice of industry.

I have but one use to make of this. I wish to inquire if we are to suppose indolence a necessary fault of the human constitution; or has it been superinduced upon our other evil dispositions by the errors of society, physical causes, and defective modes of education? To me the latter appears far more probable. He who gave us existence, made exertion necessary to the satisfying of the most simple wants of our nature. He gave us physical frames, with the different parts so nicely adjusted to each other, and the whole so beautiful in proportion; so filled with "the buoyant sense of being," that to chain it down, into useless inactivity would be disease and death: but to move and to be free to move are life and health and happiness.

Our intellectual constitution is parallel to the natural. If we allow those powers of mind which make us but "a little lower than the angels," to rest unused, we involve ourselves in the degradation of ignorance, and the darkness of moral death; while to think, to know, to believe, and to adore is life; a life even, over which death has no power. It cannot be that nature is at fault, or at least irremediably so, in those instances of stupid inactivity of mind or body, or both, which we so frequently meet. I have already mentioned as more probable causes, physical evils, errors of society, and defective modes of education. I shall do but little more than to mention them again as I wish not so much to lead you into a full reflection upon this subject now, as to engage you to think of it again, and often.

There is no part of what is essential to a good education, more generally neglected, than a practical knowledge of the laws which govern our physical nature. Yet there is nothing more necessary to enable us to pass life pleasantly, and actively, than this. Nature has given us rules for the preservation of the health of our bodies, and unless we are willing to be obedient to them, we shall be unable to form very effectual habits of industry. It is true that there are frequent instances of the performance of bodily, and mental labor, when the corporeal system is in a state of derangement, and even when suffering under the paralyzing hand of disease; but these are forced efforts, and though they may claim the credit of triumph over depressing circumstances, they weaken the powers of action; and by so doing generally detract from the amount of usefulness. Nature is arbitrary in her government, and if we would make the most of life, we must attend to her requisitions.

At your period of age, the mind is not apt to be conscious of the importance of this subject. In early life, the constitution like the heart is elastic. It does not feel so immediately, and so powerfully, the effects of violating the laws of organization as in after years; though the consequences may be even more fatal. It is not my purpose to allude to these consequences, except in relation to your present pursuits, as school-girls; and I shall confine myself in that, to a few suggestions for your future reflection. May not the reason why the task which is so light at one time, is so difficult at another, or why that mood of feeling, in which, though sufficiently sensible of the importance of knowledge, we yet want the mental stimulus necessary to obtain it, is of such frequent recurrence; be simply, the result of some imprudence which has disordered, and weakened that delicate physical arrangement, with which the mind is so mysteriously connected? May not much of the dullness which we usually ascribe to some defect of the intellectual nature, be more probably the consequence of an ignorance, or a disregard of the principles of health. The corporeal and mental systems exert over each other, a strong and reciprocal influence. While purity of mind, proper objects of pursuit, the encouragement of the cheerful virtues, the careful avoidance of ill-temper, and strong, and unnatural excitements; are great promoters of physical health: cleanliness of the body, and correct ideas and regular habits in regard to dress, and hours, and time, and exercise, must be equally conducive to the health of the mind; and it is only to the best health of both, that we can look for the most perfect tone of character, and the happiest ability to accomplish the purposes of life.

I have mentioned the errors of society, as a cause affecting the improvement of time. I mean simply, that as society can not be perfect in all its objects, and usages, the young are liable to be misdirected in relation to the exercise of their own power to act. We will go back for an illustration to the chivalrous days of our Gothic ancestors, when the knight had no better ambition, than to overthrow his equal in the combat; or to win for himself a wider vassalage, by deeds of arms: and the lady none higher, than to bestow the prize at the tournament, or to see the scarf which she had yielded as a parting gift, come floating back wreathed in the banner of a conqueror. And why for long years, was prowess in arms the highest attainment of manhood; and the best glory of woman her personal charms? It was because the page had been accustomed to gaze on the glittering array of the knight he served; and to hear blended with the stirring peal of the trumpet the cry of "honor to the brave;" and the maiden had listened in the castle hall, through all her young years, to the songs of the troubadours, telling only of "Knighthood's dauntless deed, and beauty's matchless eye."

And thus in every intervening period of time, has education been modified, and controlled, by the prevailing taste of society. Thus it is at present. We are indeed, very far removed from feudal days. We meet not now in our wanderings by hill and dale, the armed and errant knight; nor is the "queen of beauty" now necessarily "the queen of love." The nineteenth century, and our happy country, presents us generally, perhaps, as perfect a state of society, as knowledge and virtue have yet combined to form, yet no one can deny that it mingles with much that is good, much that is positively evil. But to the young mind, all is specious and beautiful; and it is not strange if its early views of life with its pleasures and duties should be such, in some instances, as to lead it into a course from which it must awake, in a few years, to the reflection that its energies have been misapplied; and in others even to destroy the motive to present action. Many instances might be given. I shall mention but one.

It has been the folly of all ages of the world, to attach an unreal value to wealth, as the means of purchasing splendor, luxury and ease. The consequence has been, by giving rank to indolence, and degrading labor into servility, to remove human nature from the only course in which it can expect to attain the perfection of its being. That course is one that will task your powers to their fullest expansion. Your onward pathway, is full of difficulties and dangers, and to meet, and overcome them, you are not already and invincibly prepared. You have no prophetic sense to foresee the evil before it approaches; no instinctive prudence to choose the right, and reject the wrong; and no angel's purity to shrink from the slightest contamination of vice. But you will have all that is necessary for your triumph, in the continual exercise of the powers that are given you for this purpose. The great work that we are to perform in this life, is to overcome, as far as possible, its evils. These evils may be classed: bodily sufferings, ignorance, and sin. You will readily perceive that there is no end to this work, for these evils will continue to beset us, to the last moment of existence. "Patient continuance in well doing" will make the path of duty easier; every triumph will assist us to gain another, and this is all the rest we can expect, all that we ought to ask. It may be a pleasant thing for the poet to dream of a life all painless and careless, "amid the bowers of earth;" but it is far nobler to bless the all-wise Creator, for making our happiness dependent upon our own exertions. Be it yours, dear girls, to separate indolence from all your anticipations of a happy life; and to learn at once, not only the necessity, but the best means for the improvement of your time.

PUNISHMENT CERTAIN.

"There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

Never was a truer sentiment uttered than this. Who has ever wandered from the straight and pleasant path of duty, and has not learned its truth by bitter experience? Who has ever transgressed against his Maker, and has not felt the scorpion lashes of conscience, reproving him for his wickedness! Look abroad in the world, and see the misery and wretchedness, which sin has produced. Go to the haunts of vice and dissipation, where iniquity is seen in all its haggard forms. See the wretched inmates, the victims of their own vices; see their bloated forms, covered with loathsome disease; see their poverty—their rags—their misery—their woe, and tell me if there is any peace for the wicked!

Go to the abodes of splendid iniquity, where vice is arrayed in garlands, and adorned with the choicest gems of earth. See her votaries lolling upon the couch of ease, and rolling on beds of flowers; see them feasting on the richest dainties that nature can afford, and quaffing the sparkling wine from the golden cup. Ask them if they are happy? If they enjoy all that heart can wish? And they will tell you that amid all their gaiety, and sensual pleasure, they feel the gnawings of that worm which never dies; they will tell you that keen remorse—bitter anguish—and gloomy forebodings lurk within their bosoms; that go where they may—do what they will, conscience with its serpent stings still follows them, lacerating their bosoms at every step—poisoning every joy that wealth can bestow; and that they feel the quenchless flames of hell, burning to the deepest recesses of their souls. O say! is there any peace to the wicked?

"There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked;" they are "like the troubled sea when it can not rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt." There is no escape from merited punishment; it will come sooner or later, "for God will by no means clear the guilty." You can not run away from conscience; it will follow you wherever you go; you may cross the foaming ocean's tide; you may wander in distant and foreign lands; you may roam through the wild wilderness of nature; you may scale the lofty mountain's height; you may take up your abode in the dark and dismal caverns of earth; but there will the stings of conscience follow you, and there will the sorrows of hell compass you about.

You may for a time sear over your conscience, so that you cannot feel its restraining influence; but it will be only to gather new strength, and to pour upon you like a flood; you may succeed in smothering its flames for a season, but depend upon it, they will burst out anew, and consume you with their burning heat. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked;" their bosoms are as restless as the ocean's wave, when the rude winds lift its waters to the sky. "Cease" then, "to do evil. Learn to do good." "Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man," and in so doing you will find a great reward. A. F.

BENEVOLENCE AGAINST THE CREEDS OF MEN.

The writer of this was once a frequent attendant upon the ministration of the Rev. Dr. Lansing, a man remarkable for his great talents, natural and acquired, and I may also add, equally as remarkable for his great fanaticism. I well remember a sermon which the Dr. preached one evening, upon what is generally termed the great day of the final separation of the righteous and the wicked—the great day of the wrath of God! "In that great and terrible day," said he, in a deep sepulchral voice, "terrible and awful things will be heard and seen. The son upon whom the awful and dire sentence of damnation has been passed, whose ears have been saluted with the dread and horrible words, 'depart, ye cursed,' will be seen rushing in awful despair to his righteous father, to him who begat him, exclaiming, 'Father! O, save or I perish!' 'No my son,' will the father reply, 'you can't be saved now; you had your day of probation! God wanted to save you and you would not let him, and now you are to be damned, and you ought to be.' The son upon whom the tempest of God's wrath has now commenced to blow, will rush in horrible despair, as his last, his only hope, to his dear mother, to her who bore, nourished, and sustained him, exclaiming in piteous accents, 'Mother, have you no pity for me? Save me, O, my mother, save me or I am lost!' 'No my son,' will the reply of the mother be, 'you can't be saved now, you are now beyond the reach of mercy. Once God wanted to save you, but you would not let him. He begged, he entreated you to be saved, and you would not—he stretched out his hand and you refused—and now, my son, you must be damned, damned to all eternity, never more to enjoy the company of your father and your mother while countless ages roll.' And after thus rejecting the Saviour, after thus sinning away, as you have done, your day of grace, your day of probation, it is right that you should be damned—you ought to be. Glory to God for his justice!" Never shall I forget the effect which that sermon had upon my mind. Born and brought up as I had been in the very midst of Partialism, I had not then seen it in all its odious forms. I had not then seen it representing the saints of God as demons, as devoid of even natural affection. But I have since learned that the Dr. was not alone or singular in his representation; that it was not peculiar to himself—have learned that but few Partialist writers of any eminence have written upon the future misery of the damned without advancing the same odious sentiment. McEwen, a very excellent writer, aside from his creed, advances the same odious thing in his essay on the "Misery of the damned." "How would it," says he, "stamp a bow in their cloud, to think there were an end! but in vain, should they shed an ocean of tears, and stretch out their suppliant hands, death will flee from them, consigning them over to flat despair. Have pity upon them, O ye their friends. Will no affectionate relation shed a compassionate tear? Alas! the father will not pity his children, and the mother will have no compassion on the son of her womb, for they will sing Hallelujah, when the smoke of their torment ascendeth." Boston, in his "Fourfold State," a work which formerly had an astonishing circulation, advances the same detestable thing. Says he, "None were so compassionate as the saints, when on earth. But now that time is at an end, their compassion on the ungodly is swallowed up in joy. No pity will then be shown them, from their nearest relations. The godly wife shall applaud the justice of the judge, in the damnation of her ungodly husband; the godly husband shall say Amen to the damnation of her who lay in his bosom; the godly parents shall say, Hallelujah, at the passing of the sentence against their ungodly child; and the godly child shall, from his heart, approve the damnation of his wicked parents, the father who begat him, and the mother who bore him. They (the wicked) will be unpitied. The punishments inflicted on the greatest malefactors on earth, do draw forth some compassion from them, who behold them in their torments; but the damned shall have none to pity them. God will not pity them, but laugh at their calamities. The blessed company in heaven shall rejoice. Natural affections will be extinguished; the parents will not love their children, nor children their parents; the mother will not pity the daughter, nor will the daughter pity the mother; the son will shew no regard to his father." Such is another feature in the revolting system of Partialism. Oh! how odious, how detestable, how utterly at war, with all we know, with all that we have experienced of a mother's love—that love which is so strong, so mighty and enduring. Would my dear mother, who died praising God, and blessing the name of her Redeemer, and who is now in the regions of never-ending blessedness—would she rejoice at my unending wretchedness and woe? Would she exult, and sing Hallelujah, to see me, her beloved though unworthy son, enduring endless, never-ending agony, woe and pain? Oh, no. Her love was strong. Oh, how strong! Death could not conquer it. Many waters could not have quenched, nor the floods have drowned it. And will that love which was so strong, so mighty, so unconquerable here, ever cease, ever become extinct, while immortality endures? Oh, no, for God who is rich, mighty, boundless love itself, is its author, and he never, never changes. Who can, what can separate us from the love of God? Nothing! Death can not, angels can not, principalities can not, powers can not, things present can not, things to come can not, nor height, nor depth; nor can any thing else in the vast universe separate us from the love of God. And that it is so forever praised be his holy name!

NEWS DEPARTMENT.

REMOVALS.—Br. H. Torrey, has removed from South Bainbridge, in this State. He will remain in Ravenna, Ohio, until the fall, when he takes the pastoral charge of the society in Pittsburg, Pa.

Br. T. C. Eaton has agreed to remove and settle in Hancock, Addison county, Vt.

NEW PREACHERS.—Brs. Timothy G. Senter, and Massena Goodrich, of Portsmouth, N. H., have lately commenced proclaiming the Gospel of impartial grace to good acceptance.

Mr. Amos W. Fisher proposes to publish a new Universalist paper in Lynn, Mass., to be entitled The Vindicator. It will never descend to personal invective and abuse. Terms one dollar and fifty cents per annum in advance.

THE UNIVERSALIST WATCHMAN—that trusty and useful sentinel on the walls of our Zion, has just commenced its twelfth volume. Br. E. Ballou, Editor and Proprietor, aided by several of our ablest twistering brethren in Vermont as Corresponding Editors. It has been considerably improved in general matter, and much in appearance. The unwieldy head, which occupied one third of the first page, has been changed to one more moderate in proportion. We wish it abundant success in its labors, and in its profits for the proprietor. Published in Montpelier, every Saturday, large folio form, at two dollars per annum; or one dollar and fifty cents if paid in advance. A. B. G.

TEMPERANCE REFORM.—The most wonderful movements have lately taken place on this subject among our Roman Catholic brethren. In Ireland, a priest named Matthew has entered the field and administered the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, to thousands, and tens of thousands, of the Irish—nearly all of whom faithfully continue to observe it. In one day, in Killaloe, he administered the pledge to nearly 20,000 persons. He enlists them by crowds. The example has been followed up in Philadelphia and Pottsville, Pa., and in New York and Albany, by the same denomination, and many hundreds in each place have taken the pledge. A. B. G.

BILLS AND LETTERS.

Grosh and Hutchinson are sending out letters containing bills, to all who have not yet paid what is due to that firm. Those letters are not mere forms, as many may suppose because they are printed, but earnest appeals for immediate aid. We are suffering very much by the dilatory movements of those who owe us—and they are making such a protracted agony of our sufferings that we are compelled to address them individually, and by letter. Will they not, therefore, heed our call? and heed it by speedy payment?

Our agents are requested to do what they can for us, at this time. Do, if possible, get every account closed—every sum due us paid—and as early as possible.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.... NO. XIII.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"Not for that we would be clothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." "If so be that being clothed, we shall not be found naked."

It is a commonly received doctrine in the Christian church, that the spirits of the departed are all in a disembodied state; and that they will all thus remain, either in happiness, or in misery, or in a neutral condition, from the moment of death to some period yet future, when all are to be furnished with bodies. In connection with this doctrine, as with the doctrine of after death sleep, and also that of total death, it is held that, except in the case of Jesus, and perhaps in a few other instances, there has been no resurrection yet; and that there will be none till the arrival of a time usually called the general resurrection, when all are to be organized anew, either at once, or at two successive periods. These two doctrines I deem erroneous for many reasons, a few of which will be here presented.

1. In 2 Cor. v: 1, the apostle says, as quoted in our third number, "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." And in verse 6, quoted in our last number, he speaks of being "at home in the body" for the present. This language of the apostle seems to me to be not such at all as he would have employed, had he expected soon to enter upon a disembodied state. Thus he obviously uses "house" for body, speaking of the body he then occupied as his "earthly house," representing it indeed as a "tabernacle," or place of temporary residence, but still a house, a "home" for the present, such as it was. Now if he was soon to be without a body, and to remain so for unknown ages, then, according to the figure he here uses, he was soon to be unhoused entirely, and was destined to remain for an indefinite time without house or home. But there is a notion of privation and discomfort attached to the idea of being left houseless and homeless, (see Luke ix: 58,) which accords not with the ideas generally entertained respecting the condition of departed saints, nor indeed with the spirit of the apostle's language. For viewing the dissolution of his body as an approaching event, soon to be realized, he looks forward to his condition at that time, apparently with confidence, satisfaction, and hope. (See the context, from chap. iv: 10, to v: 9, inclusive.) Hence I can not think that this notion of being without a body for a long indefinite time, dead or alive, asleep or awake, is any part of the apostle's doctrine. And rejecting this, I must, of course, reject the common doctrine of the general resurrection.

If it be said that the home of the disembodied spirit is in heaven, his residence is with Christ, and that therefore he needs not a body as a house, I reply, this is changing the figure. It is, in respect to propriety of language, as if one were to say, "My home for the present is on earth—my residence is with my friends—therefore my mind needs not a body to reside in." One side of the apostle's figure must correspond to the other. Earthly house is earthly body; hence house in the heavens must mean heavenly body.

2. If the apostle had represented his earthly body as a place of confinement, and had spoken of being liberated therefrom on its dissolution, as a prisoner released from prison, this would have been in perfect consistency with the doctrine of disembodied spirits. But instead of employing such language, which is so very common at the present time, he speaks of his earthly house, tells of being at home in it, and says, in effect, If this were dissolved, we know we have another—this is but a tabernacle; that, a place of permanent abode. "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of [or from] God," etc. This certainly sounds as though he expected to remove into the new house on quitting the old. Hence I must conclude that neither the doctrine of disembodied spirits, nor of a simultaneous universal resurrection, nor indeed the common doctrine of two resurrections, was believed by him.

3. He adds in verses 2 and 3, "For in this [house or tabernacle] we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven. If so be that being clothed, we shall not be found naked." Here the apostle superadds the figure of clothing, and expresses his very earnest desire to be clad with his heavenly body or house, (blending the two figures together) and not to be found naked or without such clothing. But if he had believed that in the economy of God all mankind are to become "undressed spirits," thus to remain for a long indefinite time, would he have cherished so strong a desire against such a state? "I trow not."

4. In verse 4 the apostle says, "For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." Here he represents his earthly body or clothing as being burdensome or heavy; yet he is careful to add once more, that he does not desire to be (as I understand him) in an unclothed state, but its opposite. I therefore can not think otherwise than that he expected to be clothed with another body on his laying down the one he inhabited here. And this conclusion may be strengthened in the mind of the reader by considering verses 6 and 8, in which the apostle tells of his confidence that when he should be "absent from the body," the earthly body evidently, he should be "present with the Lord," that is to say the Lord Jesus, who certainly is not in a disembodied state. Note. What great matter of interest can there be in being present with the Saviour, unless we are capable of enjoying his society? And in order to be properly fitted for this, seeing that He inhabits a bodily organization, may it not be requisite that we have bodies also?

5. The apostle in 1 Corinthians, arguing against those in that church who said "that there is no resurrection of the dead," specifies certain consequences which would result from the fact, if fact it were, that there is no resurrection; and of such consequences, as stated by him, the following is one: "Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Chap. xv: 18. This is certainly teaching that the resurrection is indispensably necessary to future existence; yet this can not be the fact if the dead are living without having experienced the resurrection. This passage, as I conceive, negatives the doctrine of disembodied spirits in the plainest manner. And, taken along with other passages, it also teaches very clearly, that the resurrection is in progress. Thus we have seen in previous numbers, that according to the Scriptures, the spirits of the departed are in a knowing state, and therefore alive, as a matter of course; yet Paul says they are perished if there is no resurrection; hence I deduce what to me is an unavoidable conclusion, that they are raised, "every man in his own order."

It will be seen from this number, that the writer holds that the resurrection of mankind is in progress. And we presume that the discerning reader, who has attentively perused the foregoing numbers, has for sometime ere this, perhaps from the first, anticipated what ground we were going to take. It has been no object with us to endeavor to conceal our views; but we did deem it desirable not to enter upon the affirmative till now; and in this we were influenced by other than selfish considerations. In stating objections, as we thought proper to do, against certain doctrines, we wished to present only those which are the least intimately connected with the doctrine we intended in due time to avow, advocate, and defend. We wished, as far as practicable, to consider the opinions of others apart from our own. Those proofs which are the most direct and cogent in favor of the doctrine we have advocated, are, as will appear hereafter, by far the strongest and most pointed objections which can be brought against the doctrines we have been laboring to disprove. Thus it can easily be perceived that as powerful an argument as could be adduced against the resurrection of the same body, would be one which should establish the doctrine that the resurrection is going on. The like may be said respecting the common doctrine of two resurrections, as also that of a simultaneous resurrection of all; with the one or with the other of which stand connected the popular doctrines of the judgment, and the sentencing of some of our race to unending torments, also the doctrine of annihilation in at least two of its forms. The literal death of the spirit, and its sleeping after the death of the body, would hardly have been credited, or even thought of, had Christians always believed that the resurrection is progressing. If the spirit is to live again so soon, why should it be put out of existence at all? And what signifies putting it to sleep, if it can not have somewhat of a nap?

To prevent misapprehension, we will here state that we believe the resurrection takes place with each individual immediately after the death of the body. But let it be observed that I use the word immediately with considerable latitude of meaning, as if I were to say soon, or presently, or directly, or before a great while, like as the word is used in Mark i: 12, as seen by comparing Luke iv: 1. I do not affirm that the process commences the very first moment after death, nor that when commenced it is effected instantaneously, nor that precisely the same rule in respect to time applies in all cases—I have not learned from the Scriptures either this, that, or the other of these positions. And it is for a similar reason that I do not deny any one of them.

Three objections against this view of the resurrection will be briefly answered in this number—others, in due time, when we shall have adduced more evidence.

1. It is argued that the resurrection is all future, because in certain passages of Scripture where the subject is mentioned, the future tense is used. To this I reply, that the tenses of verbs in the Greek Testament can not, with safety, be implicitly relied upon, in all cases, as a proper foundation for an argument; else the doctrine of a progressive resurrection might be proved in the easiest manner. For in such case, as I may hereafter show, the major part of the evidence afforded by the Scriptures, would be on that side of the question. But passing this, I observe that in at least two classes of texts, the resurrection is properly represented as future upon my view of the subject; as first, when it relates to persons then alive on the earth, as in 1 Cor. vi: 14, where we read, "And God both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us by his own power;" second, when all mankind are included, as where it is said, "In Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv: 22. Surely these texts do not disprove a progressive resurrection; and the greater part of those in which the future tense is used, which have any applicancy to the subject, may be classed with the one or the other of these. Other texts will be considered hereafter.

2. In those passages of scripture in which the present tense is used in speaking of the resurrection, it is contended by some that the meaning is future, though the language is present: for that in one instance where the subject is mentioned, we are informed that God "calleth those things which be not, as though they were." Specious as this may appear when thus stated, I have to observe that the passage does not say what the objection seems to claim: that God calls things thus when speaking of the resurrection; but it says that He "quicketh the dead, and calleth those things which be not," etc., which, as all can see, materially alters the aspect of the case; since the expression "quicketh the dead" (present tense) much more naturally imports that the thing is being done from time to time, than that it is all to be done some thousands of years hence. Note. The occasion of Paul's saying that God calls things which are not as though they were, was this: He had just adverted to the fact that God said to Abraham, "I have made thee father of many nations," when as yet not one of those nations was in existence. Rom. iv: 17. Gen. xvii: 5.

3. Paul in one of his epistles, tells of some who had erred concerning the truth, "saying that the resurrection is past already." 2 Tim. ii: 18. I learn that this passage has been urged against the doctrine of a progressive resurrection; hence it demands a passing notice. The apostle says in the same chapter, "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead." He elsewhere says, "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." 1 Cor. xv. 21. The resurrection, then, of at least the man Christ Jesus was past when Paul said some had erred as above quoted. We hence discover that their error consisted not in saying that the resurrection was some of it past, but in saying that all of it was; that is, that all was fully accomplished which is meant in the Scriptures by rising from the dead. How then does this passage conflict with our views?

In our future numbers we shall treat the subject for the most part affirmatively. The principal evidences upon which we found the truth of the doctrine that the resurrection is progressing, we shall commence laying before the reader in our next.

HELL.

BY REV. W. N. BARBER.

Don't start back with horror, respected reader, at this caption; for notwithstanding the frightful idea which is usually associated with the mention of this word, we do not mean to frighten the timid with any bug-bear stories about it—at least in this brief article. If we do not advance any thing good in our remarks, it is to be hoped that we shall not say anything that is very bad. At any rate we pray that the Lord may direct us in the way of truth, for we should hate most wretchedly to be caught in a —.

To begin with, then, we deem it expedient to remark, that it is very necessary that we understand what we read. Words are only the signs of ideas, and I have often remarked, that it makes but little difference what words writers use, if the reader only attaches to them the right meaning. That is, it is of but little consequence what phraseology a writer uses, if the reader be able to get the meaning that he desires to convey.

When the Ethiopian eunuch was reading from the prophet Isaiah, Philip ran to him with this question—"Understandest thou what thou readest?" This is a very important question—for it can, as I conceive, do a person but little good to read anything unless he understands it. This is more difficult than some imagine. Words are constantly changing their signification. Many words which we now use to convey our ideas, were once used in a very different sense. The word virtue, for example, once meant warlike courage and bravery. It now has a different signification. The man who is the best moralist in theory and practice—who loves God and man the best, we call the most virtuous. The word tyrant originally meant no more than monarch, but in the days of Grecian glory it was made synonymous with despot. In the days of Caesar, the word emperor meant no more than general, but it now has a different signification.

And thus it is with the word hell. That, among other words has changed its meaning. I think it was Dr. Doddridge who said, that in its original sense, it meant a dark, hidden state. The idea of misery was not necessarily attached to it, more than to our word tomb. This word, then, meant the state of all the dead, both good and bad. All who were buried in the grave—in the ocean—who slept in the tomb, or who had been burned on the funeral pile of their relatives, were said to be in hell. Hence, David, in the person of Christ, says—"Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine holy One to see corruption." That is, as I look at it, thou wilt not leave me with the dead to waste away and mingle with the dust, but I shall rise again. I shall not see corruption. He did rise on the third day. The word hell, then, once meant the state of all the dead—but it now has a most horrid and frightful import. Perhaps, however, that it does not have so tormenting ideas attached to it now, as it had a few years ago. In the days of the apostles and prophets, then, it meant a dark and covered, or hidden state; at the time when Calvinism was in its meridian glory, it meant a literal lake of fire and brimstone, as much hotter than Nebuchadnezzar's furnace as that was hotter than moonshine; but it has now got to be much more comfortable. Hell is now thought to be nothing more than remorse of conscience—a kind of dark prison house for the cruel monsters of the earth. There are some, yet, however, who stick to the old Calvinistic definition.

Hence, to give the reader a safe rule by which he can most generally arrive at its meaning, we may say that when you read in the Scriptures of this word, you may understand it, as meaning a dark covered state, as destitute of misery as the grave—i. e., generally. When you hear a hot-headed, Calvinistic preacher use it, you may understand it as meaning a burning world—hotter and more horrible than whole oceans of boiling oil. And when you hear the word used by a Unitarian, or a fashionable new "measure man," you may understand it to mean a kind of gloomy world—a land of ghosts, horrors, wonders and exclamation points!!!! As was before remarked, words are but the signs of our ideas, and when we hear a man speak, or when we are reading his writings, if we only attach the same meaning to his words that he means to convey to us, we are safe. There is, then, no danger of misunderstanding him.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXXV.

MATTHEW xviii: 10. "In heaven their angels do always behold the face of my father which is in heaven"—or, as Wakefield, Campbell, Kneeland, Priestly, and Improved Version render it—"Their angels in heaven are always beholding the face," etc.

This was spoken with reference to the apostles, and is an emblematical representation of the care of divine Providence over them. It signifies that God takes especial care of them. The Jews supposed that every man was attended by a guardian angel, and this figure is founded on the supposition.

Matthew xvii: 23, 35. In these verses we find the parable of the king and his servants. It is evident that the king in the parable, represented God, and his servants, the children of men. This parable demands our especial attention, as in it is contained the true doctrine of forgiveness.

We learn from it in the first place, that forgiveness on the part of God is free, properly and absolutely. The servant acknowledges his debt and promises payment; but his master, seeing his good intentions and inability, had compassion upon him, and forgave him the debt. Thus we see there was no interference on the part of any person—none to be surety for the debtor, nor any one to make the payment for him. How absurd then, and how unworthy of the divine Being, is the popular doctrine of atonement, which supposes that God pardons no sin, till a complete satisfaction is made to his justice by Christ, who takes upon himself the punishment of every such sin. Surely this could not be called forgiveness. Is a debt ever said to be forgiven when another pays it for the debtor?

We are required to imitate God, and forgive our enemies as he forgives us. But if we were to imitate him in forgiving according to the representation of the doctrine of atonement, we ought never to forgive, till our justice or vengeance, be satisfied; if not by the offender himself, by some other person. But what kind of forgiveness would this be, let me ask? And what would the common sense of mankind say to such conduct as this? Would they not declare it to be cruel and inhuman, and that such men were utter strangers to forgiveness and mercy? Far, therefore, be this conduct from the ever blessed God. According to the uniform doctrine of the Scriptures, God forgives freely in the proper sense of the word; requiring no satisfaction besides repentance, or reformation and amendment. See the parable of the prodigal son, as an illustration.

It is remarkable that this doctrine of atonement was not, like that of the trinity, started at an early period, and completed in the space of about 700 years. For it was unknown, in its full extent, till after the reformation, and was advanced in opposition to the popish doctrine of merit, which was the foundation of indulgences.

LOVE AND FEAR.

Many times has my mind been called up to the subject of divine things, and made to meditate seriously upon them. During the past year, religion has been a subject that has occupied my thoughts for a great portion of the time. And to give a description of the feelings that I have experienced, or rather endured, for the short space of one year, would call for a more able pen than mine. While attending a long protracted meeting, but a short time since, I heard the terrors of an endless hell proclaimed, and seemingly all things else that were terrific, or which had a tendency to excite the mind, and which were enough to convince men, I should think, that this could not be the way to worship God aright. And all these things had not a little effect on my mind. I have attended their prayer meetings when individuals were called by name, and prayed for, with all the sympathy imaginable, and told that they stood on the brink of eternity, just ready to jump into a never ending hell, there to roll and writhe in tortures, as long as God shall exist!

This, dear reader, is enough to chill the blood in one's veins! For who, possessing the feelings of benevolence, and guided by the just spirit of reason and humanity—who that has any conception of the character of Omnipotence, can gaze upon scenes of this kind, with any degree of approbation?

As for myself, I am led to believe that the love of God leadeth men to repentance. And I would ask whether those who preach so much fear, were led to repentance by the love of God, or by the fear of hell. If they say "the love of God," I would again ask if they have that perfect love which casteth out all fear. Now my humble opinion is, that that person does not exist, and indeed can not exist, who is induced to genuine repentance and pure worship through the fear of hell! For this is not a pure motive, it is like ancient heathens, worshipping night or darkness, in order that it should not overshadow their land continually—not because they thought it a good, but because they feared it.

We should love God because he first loved us, not hate and fear him, because he first hated us; for this is not Scripture. His bountiful love and goodness are manifested towards us every day of our lives. Our very being is the workmanship of love, power, and infinite kindness. On whatsoever we please to turn our eyes, we behold one immense and everlasting scene of loveliness and beauty. We may inquire what we are, and from whence we came, and the answer must be such as to cause us to reflect upon the infinite goodness of God. We may ask the cause of our existence, and by whom we are sustained; and we shall again behold the love and mercy of the most high God. We may gaze upon all material things, and we shall see printed on their fair countenances "God is love." If our reflections soar above, and we view the innumerable host of stars that bedeck the vault of heaven, and the vast multitude of worlds more magnificent than our own, we shall still be taught that love was employed in their creation. Why then, is it, that so many intelligent beings mistake the character of God, and allow themselves to be excited through fear, to praise him—not through love, but through fear, and thus trifle with divine things which should be treated with solemnity and candor? I will answer. It is because they picture out to themselves a different being from that described in the Bible as the true God. They worship a Being who will, if they do not immediately flee from the wrath to come, (as they express it,) send them down to an endless hell. And thus they fear God with a slavish fear, and praise him with the same motives. Now I would not carry the idea that we should not praise God, for all should praise him for his infinite goodness which is unto all, and not bestow upon him a kind of hypocritical praise, because they fear an endless hell if they do not.

THE GOSPEL INVITATION.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

"Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price."

What a glorious, what a heart cheering proclamation! How does the heart leap, and break forth into singing, as the joyous tidings float on the breezy air. The spirit mounts upward as on eagle's wings, it is ravished with the sweet cadences of seraphic melody, and in the high places of spiritual communion, it worships with the angelic throng, who, in humble adoration veil their glorious faces in the presence of the majesty of Heaven. What a life giving message! It is fraught with sublimity and glory, with joy and rich consolation.

And where shall we find those that thirst? Look abroad upon the vast arena of life; see the thronging millions hurrying to and fro, forever doomed to feel the pang of unsatisfied desire. Happiness is the object they are so eagerly pursuing; they toil unremittingly for wealth, and heap up boards of shining dress; they bend the heaven-born soul to the sordid worship of gold, and then turn away to bewail the aching void that earth can not fill. They are allured by the meteor lamp of ambition, and eagerly press onward to gain the glittering wreath of fame, but oh! how coldly does it press the brow that throbs responsive to the heart's yearnings for purer bliss. The soul has grown weary in pursuing the gilded toys, the flattering vanities of time, and pants for higher enjoyment. It longs to repose in the green valley of peace, and drink of the renovating waters of life. See the friendless, homeless wanderer, sitting by the grave of earth's last beloved one; shrinking from the varied past where phantoms of lost happiness seem to mock his bewildered vision, and dreading the gloomy future, illumined by no starbeam, gilded by no hope; where dread, eternal silence reigns, and the sluggish waves of oblivion glide noiselessly on.

But strike the glad harp of salvation; let the sweet pæans of love break on his ear, the songs of glory that tell of the unbought gift of life and immortality, and mark the glorious change. The spirit wakes from darkness and gloom; it leaves the lone desert of sorrow, and partakes of the life giving waters, that heal the wounds of sorrow and sin; despair and sadness flee away, and he can stand, even on the banks of the dark rolling Jordan of death, and chant the loud anthem of praise and thanksgiving, to Him who giveth us the victory over sin and death. O, that the weary would come and rest by this fountain. That the mourner would drink of its waters and be glad; that the wanderer would return from his transgressions, and wash away the dark stains of sin in the purifying wave. Dark and fearful are the passions that enthrall humanity, and terrible is the scorpion lash, with which they goad their deluded victims; and how shall poor, frail mortals escape their galling tyranny? Let them sit down by the fountain of life, and learn the mild precepts of Immanuel; let them follow after righteousness, and receive the great reward of a pure and quiet conscience, that crown of rejoicing, which can not be taken away. Then shall wisdom lead them in her blossoming bowers, where the nectarine fruits of peace and joy invite the weary pilgrim to partake their sweets, and seraph lyres are ever trilling the glad melodies of another clime.

SALARIED PREACHERS.

This is rather an unpopular subject; but that is one of the reasons why I select it. I do so with the full knowledge that many may turn away from it, or give in their verdict against me before they canvass the testimony. Talk or write of anything else as we please—urge the necessity of sustaining or supporting, with liberal compensation, the instructors of our youth; defend the propriety of remunerating, with a bountiful hand, the public officer; hold up to the contempt of community that niggardly spirit, which would grind the face of the poor, while it appropriates to itself the benefits of unrequited labor; and even with a certain class, urge men to send their thousands and tens of thousands by the missionary, to the "poor benighted Heathen," without knowing or caring how much he appropriates to himself—and it will all be well received. But come out in plain words, and speak of a salary for the preacher, and ten chances to one if you do not wound—I will not say full pockets—but—some men's sensitiveness, with the supposed enormous innovation. And especially would this be the case if a preacher should dwell upon the theme. He is called a hireling, a lover of money, and accused of caring more for the loaves and fishes than he does for the cause of religion. Nevertheless I shall venture.

In referring to salaried preachers, I allude to those who receive pay for their services, as a means of support and comfort. As to the merits of the question, I can see no difference between receiving, in the course of a year, a certain amount of money by Sunday collections, or the same amount by a stipulated yearly salary. Under some circumstances the former would be most convenient; under others, the latter would be both most convenient and most consistent. Be this as it may the preacher receives the assistance of his friends, not as the object for which he labors, not as a Gospel tax, but as a means of aiding him in his devotion to his calling; and the principle upon which he receives it, and upon which it is bestowed is the same in every case. Whether the preacher is paid so much a year, or a month, or a day—whether the amount is raised by church stock, or voluntary subscription, or occasional contribution, the giver acts upon the principle that he is rendering an equivalent for the preacher's sacrifice of time, and the means which he otherwise would rely upon for support.

There is another point which I will notice here.—There is an important difference between preaching for money, in the sense in which thousands labor for money, and receiving money in the capacity of a preacher, as a means of support. Many good people suppose that the prospect of pay for services rendered, in the case of the preacher, is a temptation for men to enter the ministry from selfish and corrupt motives. They would, or they pretend that they would, have him go from house to house, preaching the Gospel, living and eating where he happened to be received, and shaking the dust off his feet as a testimony against those who would not receive him. The fact that those who receive the largest salaries, generally, or at least frequently, soonest wear out their lives in the accumulated clerical and pastoral duties which devolve upon them, shows that this temptation is not so great in large salaries and indefatigable devotion and labor, as in no salary and no responsibility. Societies, too, become more active, more engaged, more vigilant and better able to appreciate the value of their privileges, in that for which they have laid a man under obligation to them, and of course require more at his hands.

Besides, most of our preachers have commenced young and poor. To adopt the rule, therefore, of allowing no definite compensation to the preacher, would be asking the young man to borrow money, with which to gain the time necessary to mental exertion and discipline, to acquire an education, and to discharge the many filial and social duties which devolve upon him. I say it would be asking him to borrow money for these purposes, without the most distant prospect of being ever able to pay it. In any other station but that of the minister, this would be considered downright dishonesty. The result would be that our respectable young men would avoid such a charge as this, and our ministry, if we had any, would be characterised by indolence, ignorance, ingratitude and depravity! Already has the cry gone forth that our preachers are not sufficiently educated to command influence, and it is thought that we must have a theological seminary. God knows I would gladly possess all the knowledge I am capable of comprehending; and I would devote all my life which I have at my command to its attainment—but the question is, where shall the expenses be met? Certainly not in the present general prospects of remuneration to the preacher, as liberal as that is accounted to be among us. I, for one, would not—could not conscientiously borrow one cent for this purpose, without I had the probability, at least, before me of being able to pay it.

I shall be told that this question does not turn upon expediency. It must be decided by divine authority, and apostolic usage. It will be asked, are not the invitations of the Gospel extended to all; that they should partake of it freely, without money and without price? Yes; and a part of the directions for the successful spread of this same Gospel is, "that they who preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel." Paying, or rather supporting the preacher, and enjoying the Gospel, are two things. Man pays his money as a matter of justice; he enjoys the Gospel as a matter of faith and practice. When our Lord sent out the seventy, he commanded them to "carry neither purse nor scrip, nor shoes. And into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, peace be to this house." It is evident, however, that he meant by this, that they should not burden their minds about such things, from the fact that in the same connection he taught them to rely upon those with whom they tarried and labored for the supply of their wants. "In the same house remain, eating and drinking such things as they give; for the laborer is worthy of his hire."

Paul congratulates himself upon his not having been chargeable to some of the churches. To the Thessalonians he says, "For ye remember, brethren, our labor and travail; for laboring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto you, we preached unto you the Gospel of God." See the 1st Epistle, ii; 9. He would not be chargeable unto them, implying that he might have been, and avoided it rather because he chose to do it through his desire not to be burdensome to them. See verse 6. Paul acknowledges the same course and the same motive with his Corinthian brethren.

rent; and he boasts of it too. Would he boast for refusing to take that which it were criminal even to desire, in this one instance, when his wants were already relieved by others? It seems that the Corinthians were somewhat offended because they could not have the pleasure of bestowing their bounty upon him. "Have I committed offence," says he, "in abasing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you, etc., freely? I robbed [or charged] other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service." This, then, was the reason why he was not chargeable to them. Not because it was wrong to receive pay, but because others had compensated him for the service which he did the Corinthians. "When I was present with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man [to none of you;] for that which was lacking to me the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied." See 2 Cor. xi: 7-10.

But I shall be told that none will deny the preacher a living, but he ought not to think of laying up any thing, by his services. Well, let us see. Here is a young man full of health and vigor, possessing a trade or faculties, which by industry and economy will place him in wealthy circumstances. But usefulness is the high aim of all his aspirations. He selects the Gospel field, under divine Providence, as the most likely to aid in the accomplishment of his object. He toils night and day, preaches salvation, searches out the neglected treasures of truth, strengthens the weak, comforts the afflicted, animates the despairing, and feels himself happy that he has preached the Gospel to acceptance. He thinks little of himself, and lives from hand to mouth, as the satiated may happen to think of his hunger. Thus he lives (if, indeed, he does not wear himself out in youth) till old age presents him to the world enfeebled in body and mind, incapacitated for labor, and with a family dependent upon him for support, and weeping in his poverty. Where he once labored for his bread, he can no longer labor to acceptance; and now, with all his other troubles, he is obliged to encounter the desertion and neglect of the world, and endure the painful conviction that he has denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel, in not having provided for his own household. Let him gainsay the truth of this sketch, who can.

Here I shall be told that no one will object to the preacher's providing against this emergency, or becoming as rich as he can, provided he does not do it by his profession. Paul says he was "made all things to all men, that he might by all means save some." As I understand it, he conformed to the general condition and interests of mankind. How shall the preacher do this? If the lawyer, the doctor, the professor, can not lay up a competency by their regular business, they can do it by devoting a portion of their time to trading, or speculating, or farming, or any other pursuit which they choose—if the farmer or the mechanic do not succeed in one business, they can unite half a dozen—no one will accuse them of betraying the interest of their regular calling. Not so with the preacher. He must abandon the one, or relinquish the others. How then, shall he do as Paul did? In no other way can he do it, than by devoting his heart, and soul, and mind, and body to the advancement of divine truth among men.

Consider the subject, then, with reference to expediency, justice, the prosperity of the church, or divine sanction, and we come to the unavoidable conclusion that he who preaches the Gospel must live of the Gospel. So thinks the writer.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS...NO. XIV.

"Give ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth; my doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass."—DEUT. xxxii: 42.

There is a beautiful allusion here, which is lost if we remain ignorant of the fact to which it refers. "My speech shall distil as the dew." In Palestine the dews are very copious—so much so, that in dry weather, the fields depend upon the dews for sustenance. Mr. Maundrell, a traveller in that country, says, "With this dew, even in dry weather, their tents were as wet as it is had rained the whole night." Quoted by A. Clarke on Ps. cxxxiii: 3. Now, the speech of Jehovah have as refreshing an influence upon the mind, as the copious dews of Palestine have upon the parched earth and its drooping vegetation. To contrite sinners, to searchers after truth, to mourning souls, the words of the Lord are rich with the truths of holiness and love; teaching them to look unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of their faith, who is salvation to the ends of the earth, and who will not give up his mediatorial reign, until he shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied.—There is another instance where the word "dew" is alluded to, as beautifully as in the case under consideration—one, too, in which a great and all-important sermon is compressed into a small space.

"Behold, how good and now pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard; that went down to the skirts of his garments; As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion; for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forevermore." Ps. cxxxiii.

CONSCIENCE.

How unwise the conduct of those who under value its approbation—who depreciate its rewards and consolations, and thus lead mankind to seek lower, less substantial and less enduring rewards. Without an adherence to the dictates of an enlightened conscience, no one can expect long to retain the confidence of others, the solid esteem of even the vicious, or the approbation of those whose approval is to be desired as truly valuable. So that even in a worldly point of view, for its external advantages in point of mere policy, those mislead youth who would lower conscience in their estimation.

But considered for its internal advantages, how valuable—how enduring are the approbations of a well regulated and well obeyed conscience. Let circumstances change as they may—let poverty gripe, sickness wither, the world frown, and clouds and darkness gather above and around the devoted being—the monitor within sits serene and calm on the throne of the mind, and sends a smile through every avenue of feeling, which causes the external circumstances to lose their power and their bitterness. One agony, at least, is spared to the unfortunate wretch—the bitter, burning blight of remorse. One cloud of darkening terror is lifted up from the soul—the gloom of guilt and the torturing apprehension of righteous, crushing retribution.

But it is very seldom, indeed, that all external things are dark and oppressive when conscience smiles within. God is the Ruler of the Universe, and all things are swayed by him in reference to the moral and spiritual. Hence the truly upright man scarcely ever finds the good arrayed against him, or the tide of temporal ruin rolling hopelessly over his head—or if, for a time, this is the case, he has the assurance that it will not be long before those who estimate worth by feelings, motives and conduct instead of earthly goods, will soon know him for what he is, and aid him in turning the tide, and mounting again on its reflux wave in peace and in safety.

Let us, then, endeavor to think more worthily of conscience, of its dictates enlightened by reason and revelation, and of its abundant rewards and sufficient consolations.

TO OUR PREACHERS IN THIS STATE.

Brethren—I am requested by several brethren to call your attention to the subject of a general—a universal attendance on the General Convention in Auburn next month. It is not probable that that body will again meet in the interior of this state for many years; and therefore not probable that so good an opportunity will again occur for all of us meeting together at any of its sessions. Let each one, then, make arrangements to be at its session, if possible, that we may see and become better acquainted with each other, and mutually greet with the hand of fraternal affection our brethren from other states—from the East and the West, from the North and from the South.

Our Western brethren, from Ohio, Michigan, etc., will probably be there in considerable force; for it is not probable that the Convention will soon meet as near to them again, as at this time; and there are some who will take that opportunity again to see the friends of their youth—their early co-laborers in the Gospel, by whose side they stood, when both were pioneers in this, and more eastern regions. Come one, come all.

POETRY.

[From the Philadelphia Saturday Courier.]
THE DYING STUDENT.

I go! Friends who have watched beside me long,
I leave you now for that unfathom'd gloom
Which has no morrow here: I hear the song
Of angels whisp'ring "sister spirit, come!"
I leave the green earth with its tender ties;
Its thousand charms which bind the soul to life;
I leave it, for a home in yon blue skies,
Beyond all turmoil, and beyond all strife.
Yet would I linger still a little while,
To me hath scienc'd spread her witching charms,
And wooed me onward with her winning smile,
To seek my dearest pleasure in her arms,
And I would fain drink deeper of her spring,
Ere yet I die, and strive to leave a name,
That should not perish as an useless thing,
Unmark'd, unnoticed, and unknown to fame.
'Tis this adds bitterness to death—to die
And leave no Mark for other years to bless,
Save what is stamp'd on friendship's memory.
In hues of dark bereavement and distress,
Farewell! my boyhood's long-tried friends farewell!
I leave you mourning, but we'll meet again,
Where we in bliss eternally shall dwell,
Untouch'd by sorrow, and exempt from pain.
I go! bright forms are hovering o'er me now,
Beck'ning my spirit to her skiey home!
I feel her strugglings to be free, and soar
With rainbows tinted wings, I come! I come!

THE TRAVELLER AT THE RED SEA.

BY MISS H. F. GOULD.

At last have I found thee, thou dark rolling sea!
I gaze on thy face, and I listen to thee,
With a spirit o'erawed by the sight and the sound,
While mountain and desert frown gloomy around.
And thee, mighty deep, from afar I behold,
Which God swept apart for his people of old,
That Egypt's proud army, unstained by their blood,
Received on thy bed to entomb in thy flood.
I cast my eye out, where the cohorts went down;
A throng of pale specters no waters can drown,
With banner and blades seem surmounting the waves,
As Pharaoh's bold hosts sunk in arms to their graves.
But quick from the light of the skies they withdraw,
As silent Omnipotence shrinking with awe;
And each sinks away in his billowy shroud,
From HIM who walked here, clothed in fire and cloud.
I stand by the pass the freed Hebrews then trod,
Sustained by the hand of Jehovah, dry shod;
And think how the song of salvation they sang,
While praise to His name, through the wilderness rang.
Our Father, who then didst thine Israel guide,
Rebuke and console in their wandering wide
From those gloomy waters, through this desert drear,
O, still in life's maze to thy pilgrim be near.
Whilst thou, day by day, with thy manna bestow,
And make, for my thirst, the rock fountain to flow:
Refreshed by the way, will I speed to the clime
Of rest for the weary, beyond earth and time.

VOLUMINOUS WRITERS.

The following list of long-winded authors may amuse some of our readers. They existed in those early and undegenerate periods when literary stature, as well as physical, had not yet shrunk to its present pigmy proportions.

Zeno, the Stoic, is said to have given the world 705 different works, on philosophical subjects.

Epicurus, the voluptuary, (whose system considered a dreamy state of idle vacancy, as the most godlike of all conditions,) solaced his indolence with the composition of only some 300 volumes. If such were the productions of a leisure-loving man of those times, what mountains of books must the more industrious learned have been accustomed to heap up!

Accordingly, we find the number of Aristotle's ascertained performances to have amounted to above 400 volumes; while common opinion attributed to him a vast body beside.

Of the precise extent of Cicero's productions we are unable to form any certain estimate. He himself seems to have had no very distinct idea of it, as he only tells us that he wrote a quantity almost incredible; inditing, with scarcely any intermission, whether by day or night, and often (not to lose time) dictating to an amanuensis while he walked for exercise.

Galen it is averred, wrote upon medical topics alone, above 400 tomes; and upon vulgar subjects, some 280 more.

Upon jurisprudence only, Servius Sulpicius left behind him 180 volumes; and as, in estimating legal lore, it is always necessary to multiply its length by the joint product of its absurdity and crabbedness, these 180 volumes may well pass for a very pretty bulk.

Theophrastus, also, upon jurisprudence, obliged the world with 300 volumes; a number which has induced some speculators to imagine that the legal multiplication of words, and the art of perplexing every thing by the multitude of explanations are inventions little less ancient than the law itself.

Didymus Grammaticus is said to have put forth 4,000 volumes! Some, however, averse to promulgate what might seem incredible, have diminished this number to the moderate quantity of 3,500. Small as this leaves his literary progeny, it seems that he was often found not to recognize the children of his own brain, when he met them; a failure of the instinctive feeling certainly even more singular, in the case of intellectual offspring, than of physical.

Eras, produced upon various topics of theology, 204 volumes; and upon Cabala alone, 72 more. Now a treatise upon such a theme as Cabala, usually compensates, by material bulk, for the airiness and impalpability of its subject. So that these 72 tomes, measured according to any reasonable standard of dulness and obscurity, may be fairly supposed to have equalled some twenty cart loads.

St. Jerome assures us, that not only had Origen written 6,000 volumes, but that he (Jerome) had read the same—a labor if possible, still more strange and incredible.

Mercury Trismegistus (to the reading of whom, though his works are lost, Milton seems to have been addicted) according to the tradition was the author of 6,425 books; a fecundity which has no parallel, except in the labors of that great miscellaneous Latin author, named "Opera," who wrote Virgil, and Ovid, and Quintilian, and Tacitus, and many more; and he, in his turn, is surpassed, in multiplicity of productions, by an outlandish Frenchman, called "Œuvres," a universal genius, who produces whole libraries, upon all sorts of subjects—prose and verse, tragedy and comedy, romances or politics; nothing comes amiss to his ever-going pen. He has written a single work, in 60 volumes, called Voltaire; others in 30, 40, 50 and 60, called Bossuet, and Rousseau, and Massillon, and D'Aguesseau, etc., etc.

WOMAN.—What lawyer has not observed this difference between the sexes, namely; if a woman is indicted for an offence, who attends her in the awful presence of justice, to console and cheer her, braving the stare of the gaping crowd, the humiliation of such companionship and such a connection? A mother or a sister! How seldom a father, a brother, or a husband! If a man is placed at the bar, who is sollicitous for him? Always his aged mother, his broken-hearted wife, or his sorrowing daughter. Shame, sorrow, degradation, contempt, are all forgotten in the strength of woman's love. How seldom in a man's! If he attends—and when does he? his look towards the prisoner at the bar, though his nearest relative, is often dark and scowling—asense of shame that attaches to himself, weighing on him at the very crisis of the prisoner's fate. A woman's look is that of compassion and sympathy. She thinks not of her own situation, or of the opinion of the crowd around her, as regards herself; if she glances at them, it is only when some part of the testimony makes for or against him, or the judge or the lawyers speak upon some strong point, that she may discern their opinions of his fate. She watches his eye every moment: if she is near him, she anticipates his every want—she hands him the glass of water to quench the fever that anxiety has produced—she walks by his side from the court to the prison and from the prison to the court—she sits as near to him in the court as possible—she would sit in the bar with him would they allow her—she waits for hours to exchange one word with him through the grated door—she rakes and scrapes all she can to make him decent at his trial, that his appearance may produce a favorable impression. If the awful verdict is against him, she forsakes him not though all the world have forsaken him. In the last extremity, she is by his side with a love that, like a noble arch, pressure strengthens. She attends to the very foot of the gallows—his ignominy, his ill treatment of her, are not thought of. Whose wail was that when the fatal drop fell, piercing every ear and every heart with the conviction that there was one whose pang was keener even than the dying convict's? 'Twas hers. And she will beg his body, and compose decently his distorted limbs, and bury him with care. The spot where he is laid, though known as the murderer's grave, which the world points to with horror, and where superstition says no grass will ever grow, is nevertheless, a hallowed spot to her, where she will even plant the flower and mature the grass, to induce the belief that if superstition is correct, the sleeper is innocent.—What the poet makes her say is true:

I know not, I ask not, if guilt's in that heart,
I but know that I love thee, whatever thou art!

AN EXCUSE.—Dr. Knox says, "that complaints have been made that, in the present age, marriage is not sufficiently prevalent, or at least, that good husbands are not numerous. The men who appear to be sensible to female charms, allege, in excuse for their not soliciting some lady in marriage, that such are the expensive manners, dress, and amusements of the fashionable part of the sex, so little their skill in conducting a family, and such their ignorance of economy, that to be married is often to be ruined in the midst of affluence." Ladies is this so?—is this excuse valid? If it is, you know it, and you must know the antidote. The happiness of thousands, the welfare of the public morals, the prosperity of our country, depends on a correct decision of these questions. Can it be, that so many of the beautiful and good—the accomplished in every thing, but the one thing so needful for the wife—domestic economy—are condemned, from this cause, to waste their sweetness on the desert air, and pine in single blessedness. That community, in which marriage is neglected or disregarded, no matter what may be the reason, is in the high road to ruin; and if our fair ones by the causes assigned, have frightened our bachelors into hopeless celibacy, there is a fearful responsibility resting upon them. Would it not be well to pause, inquire, reflect.—Genesee Farmer.

The power of Eloquence.—A ship-builder was once asked what he thought of Whitefield.—"Think," he replied, "I tell you, sir, every Sunday that I go to my parish church, I can build a ship from stem to stern under the sermon; but were it to save my soul, under Mr. Whitefield, I could not lay a single plank."

Anguish of mind has driven thousands to suicide; anguish of body, none. This proves, that the health of the mind is of far greater consequence than the health of the body, although both are deserving of much more attention than either of them receive.

DEATHS.

In Darien, Genesee county, N. Y. July 9th, of consumption, PLATT B. FLAGLER, son of Rev. J. S. Flagler, aged 22 years. The disease which closed his earthly pilgrimage, seems to have been induced by the almost unparalleled assiduity with which he pursued his studies, preparatory to entering the legal profession. Possessing naturally a vigorous mind, he ascended the hill of science with uncommon alacrity, and a disposition and moral character that might well be envied, he secured the love and esteem of all who knew him. The Bible was not so much his favorite study as was the Book of Nature. True science and philosophy, however, conducted him into the faith of christianity, the infinite goodness of God, and the endless joy of the immortal world. He calmly conversed upon death and the future, appeared to be fully reconciled to God, and sweetly fell into the arms of a crucified Redeemer. The funeral services were attended on the 10th, by a numerous congregation, and the writer. C. H.

In Ridgeway, June 26th, RAYMOND R. son of Col. J. Perry, aged 17 years and 10 months. Funeral Sermon, by the writer, on Sunday 28th, which was listened to by a very large congregation. C. H.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

BY REV. T. S. BARTHOLOMEW.

Preached at the funeral of Mrs. Naomi Gillis, Victor, May 18, 1840.

Convened, as we are on this occasion, to pay the last tribute of respect and friendship to a departed neighbor, it becomes us to possess that solemnity of thought and feeling which will prepare us for the proper performance of the duty of ministering the feelings of sympathy, and the expressions of our sorrow to those who are called to mourn. The ravages of death in this sublunary state of existence may be said to be universal; it is what we are all subject to, it is what we all dread. There is a feeling in our hearts which naturally revolts from the contemplation of the winding sheet, the coffin, and the narrow house, and which would place afar off, the day of death. But as we witness the triumphs of this universal destroyer, as we close the eyes of our friends and intimate companions in life, we can not avoid the requisition which is thus manifested to us, to consider our latter end. But a few months since, the person whose remains are now enclosed in that coffin, was in the enjoyment of health, and to appearances was destined to live to a good old age; but in the midst of her usefulness she has been called to "go the way of all the earth." The circumstances under which we are now gathered together, suggest a train of reflections upon the mutability of earthly things, and also upon the hopes and confidence which we may place upon the Father of our spirits, the Creator and Governor of worlds.

The triumphant language of the apostle when contemplating the same subject shall furnish a text for the guidance of these reflections. 1 Cor. xv: 54, last clause. "Death is swallowed up in victory."

I need not here repeat at length the circumstances, or the scope of his reasoning, from which this cheering conclusion is deduced, for it should be familiar to every one who has the means of access to the pages of Holy Writ, and I may have occasion to allude to it in the course of my subsequent remarks.

I shall speak in the first place of the nature of death, its introduction into the system of God's government, and the ends which it is calculated to subserve.

Secondly of the victory which the apostle affirms to have been attained over it, and the consequent state of moral intelligences when that triumph shall have been completely accomplished.

1. Death is the negative of life. In itself considered it is no other evil than the deprivation of existence. As a state it has nothing to excite the fear or the terror of mankind, any farther than to deprive him of those enjoyments which life confers upon him. That (even in the most unfavorable circumstances in which men are generally placed) the love of life is predominant, is a question which does not admit of a doubt, for it is a matter which all those who have encountered these circumstances, have experienced. It is a principle which forms a constituent part of our very nature as living beings. It is common to all living beings of which we have any knowledge; it is a distinguishing trait in the character of all animated nature. But while the inferior race of beings desire to live for selfish ends alone, man is surrounded with circumstances which render life, in very many respects, doubly a blessing.

Endowed with intelligence to appreciate the beauties of the works of God around him, with faculties to direct his thoughts beyond all these objects to their cause and origin, he seems fitted for a continued existence, for continued and constantly increasing progression in knowledge, in happiness and enjoyment of the Creator's gifts. He is surrounded by a world of beauty: and were he a solitary being—with the advantages which he has enjoyed of having his mind directed to the study of nature—if even under such circumstances he was made solitary and alone, there would be many ties which would bind him to life, and if he were informed that he must leave these joyous scenes he would receive the tidings with a heavy heart; he would be led to search all things within the reach of his intellect, in the fond hope that they would afford him an antidote to the poisonous reflection that he must die. And if he could find the evidence that though his body must mingle again with its native element, and there must be a negative of animal life, yet his mind is immortal and must live on unchanged in its nature and enlarged in its capacities—that though death may steal from these mortal eyes their brightness, yet the soul will but revel with a greater delight, in a more perfect state, upon the same or similar objects, and that new beauties should be continually opening to the view as he progressed in excellence and knowledge. I say could he find such evidence, it would allay in a great measure the fear of death, and would enable him to meet what he before considered his worst enemy with a smile of satisfaction, and say in the full assurance of faith, "Death is swallowed up in victory."

But we can not contemplate man thus alone. He is surrounded with his fellow men; there are almost infinite relations between men extending through the whole circle of acquaintances, and in every form of human face he beholds a brother. He is linked to his fellow men by a thousand ties of friendship, of affection, of consanguinity and blood.

Here is one whose holiest affections are bestowed upon a companion in life. Together they have passed many years of their pilgrimage, together for years have they shared the good and ills that checker life, and the one lives seemingly but in the happiness of the other. Is it to be wondered that to them the thought of death is revolting, and that the most strenuous efforts are made to keep in motion yet longer the wheels of life? Or look again at the parents, who, in their rising family, have placed their dearest hopes, their richest and holiest affections. When the weeping children stand around the sick bed, imploring that the Father of spirits will restore the kind parent to health and strength, and as he looks forward and beholds the dangers that attend their path, and the necessities that may exist for a father's counsel and a mother's watchful care, there is a sickening sensation of sorrow and of grief—there is a strong desire that, though perhaps subjected to the trials and seeming evils of an earthly existence, he might still live. So in all the various links of the chain of sympathetic feeling, there is a bitterness in the approach of death. Let the same mind that under these circumstances would be distressed and gloomy, be taught that in laying down this tabernacle of clay, it but permits the soul to expand its faculties, and to enjoy new scenes of delight, of pleasure and improvement—that the mind, the affections, the spirit, is immortal, indestructible, and that all minds are of the same general family, aspiring after and destined to perfection—that one day kindred spirits will again unite to be separated no more forever—and though his mortal nature and his connections in the world make death a momentary pang, yet he can see beyond, that which will buoy up his sinking spirits and allay his pains. Here then is the terror of death; it is the giving up of the joys, the pleasures of existence, the separating of those numerous ties which bind us to life, the renouncing of all the fine sympathies which have been the sources of satisfaction and delight.

Death, then, though it is in the last effort of human nature attended with a momentary pang, is more to be dreaded on account of the negation of life with all its blessings, than for any thing in its own nature dreadful. And though to him who, believing in the promise of God, can join in the exclamation of the text, its terrors are mitigated if not destroyed, yet what an hour of gloom, of sadness and despair, must it be to those who are without hope or God in the world, to whom the future is shrouded in the gloom of non-existence, who look forward to a long eternal night of death. To him who can not enjoy one ray of comfort and consoling hope from the consideration of the promises of God, how bitter the anguish, how revolting the reflection that his powers, his capacities, his endowments, his improvements, his hopes, his all, must descend with him into the narrow precincts of the grave to be forgotten in oblivion!

Perhaps some may say that I have not spoken sufficiently plain respecting the nature of death—have not given it that full signification which the Scriptures affix to it. I may be told that there is a sense in which its consequences are truly fearful, and upon it depends the eternal destiny of our race? It is true that death is spoken of in a sense different from that of the decease of the body. I am aware that there is a spiritual or moral death, and that the consequences of this death are such as have conferred misery upon the world. But this I regard also as the negation of moral life. It is that state of the moral powers and propensities which seemingly incapacitates the mind for directing its thoughts and energies to a proper source, and which through the ignorance that occasions it, deprives the being who is under its influence of the noblest and the most happying assurances and reflections which the God of heaven has granted to men.

But perhaps some may wish me to go farther and speak of eternal death. And they will tell me, perhaps, that such a death is spoken of in the Bible; but I have not yet read my Bible sufficiently to have found such a record. The death to which they refer is the wages of sin, moral death; the absence of moral life and of the blessings attendant thereupon. Of its eternity, however, I can not find a shadow of proof but what vanishes before the light of the Gospel, when considered in connection with reason; for were that the case, the apostle could not shout victory over death, nor could he adopt the reasoning which he has done in the chapter containing the text. For even he who is morally dead can—and if we may believe scripture, will—be reached by the power and influence of that Gospel which brings life and immortality to light, which bestows liberty upon the captive in the chains and fetters of sin, and which will yet, as it has already done, quicken those "who are dead in trespasses and sins."

There are then evidently two kinds of death spoken of in the Bible; viz, natural and moral,

The one is the negation of animal life, with all its dependant circumstances; the other is the negation of spiritual and moral life, with all its blessings, and, as a necessary consequence, is the sufferance of moral pain—a condition in which our Saviour has figuratively said, “their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched.”

I speak now very briefly of the introduction of death into the world, and the ends which are to be subserved thereby.

It has long been supposed by the Christian world in general, that in every sense in which the term death is used, it is referable for its introduction into the world, to the transgression of our first parents in the garden of Eden. But I must confess that I have never yet met with a single argument which was conclusive in proof that mankind as they were first created, were not made mortal, and consequently subject to the dissolution of their bodies as the effect of the palsy hand of time. Philosophy, chemistry, and all the sciences combine to teach us that the human nature of man, his corporeal body, was not designed to live eternally. It was formed of perishable materials, of the dust of the earth; it is by the use of such materials that it is sustained, nor is there any contrary evidence found in the sacred books. So far from this, the very curse pronounced on account of that transgression, implies that this was a fact already known to Adam. “Cursed is the ground for thy sake. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return to the ground, for out of it thou wast taken, for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return.” If we admit that Adam was created with a body immortal, there has been a change passed over the human race analogous to a new creation; for it can not be disputed that men in all ages from his days to the present time have all alike been subject to the article death. From a curious calculation which has in it, in my opinion, much correctness, it has been ascertained that the surface of the earth which is not covered with water, supposing it to have been one vast plain, must have been dug over one hundred times to have buried its inhabitants, from the creation down to the present time. Such a calculation may be appalling to many, but it shows how truly is decay and reproduction the order of nature. Nor is this true in regard to man alone. All that possesses life, whether animate or inanimate, all things, are subject to the same principle, the all pervading spirit of decay and death. Can we doubt, then, that these bodies, with which our spirits are clothed as with a dwelling or house, are designed by the Maker as temporary residences, which, after a few years of incipient existence, would moulder back to dust, and permit the spark of Divinity therein implanted to soar away to its own appropriate dwelling-place, in the presence of the Most High? The mind or soul, alone, was created immortal; it is formed of imperishable materials, is an emanation from God, and can not therefore, in the nature of things, be stricken from existence. It lives on, it retains its faculties, it increases in its capacity, and as that capacity increases, so also do the sources from whence its joys, its comforts, and its happiness proceed. And if any proof is needed upon this point, I give it in the language of Solomon, whose doctrine is also sustained by the writers of the New Testament. “When the silver cord shall be loosed, or the golden bowl shall be broken, or the pitcher shall be broken at the fountain, or the wheel be broken at the cistern, then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.” The whole theory may be resolved into this short quotation. I can not therefore, acknowledge, for I have not evidence sufficient to induce me to believe, that the transgression of Adam brought natural death into the world, for I have every reason to believe that it is the established law or rule upon which the world was made. It might have brought in, to a great extent, the host of pains and diseases and the like, with which we are afflicted, for, in the study of the constitution of our species, we find that most of these flow from disobedience to those laws, under the operation of which, the Creator has seen fit to place us here.

Moral or spiritual death we admit freely to have been introduced at the dereliction of the first man from his duty to God. By means of the transgression his mind became estranged, in part, from the Author of his being. Darkness, ignorance, dread, fear, and many other, or all other evils, may be traced to their beginning in the corruption of our race by the power of sin. And though upon all men there is stamped the impress of the Godhead, (for otherwise they could not be men,) yet, as the Psalmist has also assured us, “They are all gone out of the way, there is none that doeth good, no not one.” That is, there are none so perfect that they do good continually, unmixed with evil, or as the apostle has plainly stated it, “There is none that doeth good and sinneth not.”

It may be asked by some who would doubt the goodness or the wisdom of God, why natural death was introduced into the system of the universe. And before I answer, I wish to propose to such an inquirer a few questions, which if he can answer, I will also answer him, and tell him why death was the order of the universal plan. I would ask him, why did the Maker create man at all? Why did he confer upon him the constitution and the faculties which he possesses? Why did he place him here on the earth? and why did he manifest to him his power and might? Why did he create him subject to vanity? Why did he permit sin to deform the fair face of his moral world? Let man answer these questions; let him search and find out the Almighty to perfection, and become fully conversant with the counsels of Jehovah, and then, and not till then, may he become acquainted with the reason why God appointed man to mortality and to the circumstances of a mortal existence. It were folly for us, in our limited capacity, to assume to know the causes of the various means employed by the moral Governor for the promotion of his final and ultimate ends. When therefore we attempt to give a reason for these things, we launch out into a boundless ocean of speculation without the proper means to lead us to the truth.

Death in its effect upon mankind, as I have before observed, reaches but the body, and by destroying it or rather returning it back to its native dust, it gives liberty to the spirit, which now spurning the bonds of earth soars away to a world of immortality, where it can exist and expand its powers in an almost infinite degree, approximating to the character of the Godhead. It subserves, therefore, a proper and necessary end in the economy of God's government, which appears to us to be the only means which could be employed to secure that end. It might have been possible, it is true, that a change might have taken place which would have rendered the body immortal, but yet such a change would be analogous to death—the purging away of the principles of mortality and the bestowment of immortal principles, and which of course, is a change as incomprehensible to us as the resurrection from the dead. Thus I have endeavored to lay before you my views respecting the nature of death, its introduction into the world, and the ends to be subserved by it.

2. I am now to speak a few moments respecting the victory which, in the dispensation of the Gospel, will have been achieved over death.

As has been frequently stated, there is in the breast of man a principle, or feeling, which revolts at the idea of death. Ignorant of the fact which affords so much happiness and consolation, that the soul is in its nature and capacities immortal, when our Saviour appeared many men looked upon death as an eternal sleep; as the closing up of man's existence; and upon the land of forgetfulness and darkness as their portion. This was the moral aspect presented by one part of mankind, while the other part embraced a system which, in my view, is equally remote from truth, and far more productive of misery; that for the imperfections and the sins of this short life they were to be subject to endless tortures, various in kind, and in their nature absurd and foolish. There could not be that confidence in the principles of Heathenism, nor yet of Jewish philosophy, which was needed to sustain the mind in the hour of affliction; and though immortality was the gift of God then as it is now, yet while they were ignorant of it, it afforded them no satisfaction or hope. It was to them a mystery unknown, and it was thought a thing incredible that God could raise the dead. To afford them the happiness and comfort which the truth was calculated to impart, there was required a revelation of that truth from the Most High. There was required tangible evidence of the highest possible kind, to induce men to believe a truth so much desired, and yet so incomprehensible. In the person of Jesus Christ that evidence was given. In the numerous miracles which, by the assisting favor of God, he was enabled to perform, there was competent evidence that he was sent by the Father, and that he was entrusted with an important mission, even the bringing of life and immortality to light. He taught to his disciples the resurrection of the dead, that man was placed here but for a season, and that he would prepare in the mansions of the Father a place for his children. And to render the Victory of truth complete, after prophesying that he should rise again he submitted to the pains of death, was laid in the sepulchre, and the door thereof guarded to prevent imposture or the removal of his body, in order that if assertions were made that he had risen it might be produced and his followers be put to silence. But when the third day came he gained a victory, the power of death lost its hold upon him, and as he rose “he led captivity captive,” and freed the nations who should believe in him from the power of the grave.

“Then, then he rose. Then first humanity
Triumphant passed the crystal ports of light—
Stupendous guest!—and seized eternal youth—
Seized in our name. E'er since 'tis blasphemous
To call man mortal. Man's mortality
Was then transferred to death, and Heaven's duration
Inalienably sealed to this frail frame,
This child of dust.”

It was a victory indeed, and whoever looks upon the world of mankind and surveys their mortal state, and observes the fear and dread which without this hope hangs around the death-bed of the departing; and compares the bitter anguish, the undefinable fear of something dreadful in the future world, or yet the stupefying despair that looks forward to a gloomy inactivity and eternal death—with the calmness, the fortitude, the resignation and even the smile of satisfaction which over-spreads the countenance of the Christian on his exit from time—he and he only can appreciate the blessings which that victory confers. As we reflect upon the tenacity with which humanity clings to life, we can appreciate, in part, the language of the apostle, “Forasmuch as the children are made partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that hath the power of death, and deliver those who through fear of death were all their life time subject to bondage.”

The fear of death is truly a bondage of the most galling nature, especially to those who can not look beyond the narrow isthmus and behold the broad and boundless ocean of eternal life. But when this fear is removed it may truly be said that a victory is obtained. Hence, though the soul of man was created immortal, though it was endowed with a spark from the divinity, and is in its nature indestructible, yet such ignorance upon the subject prevailed, that man did not derive from the truth that joy and comfort which it was designed to bestow. He was in darkness. Jesus brought life and immortality to light, and when all the human race from the first born of creation down to the last earthly intelligence, shall have become acquainted with the truth and shall have cordially embraced it, then shall the victory over natural death be fully achieved, and men be enabled to shout with the apostle, "O, death where is thy sting! O, grave where is thy victory!" The universe of mind is now freed from its power or its fear. The earthly nature is fallen, mingled with its proper elements, and at this glorious era, the souls of all are clothed upon with bodies suited to their capacities, fitted for immortality and endless existence. From the reading of the chapter which contains the text, I know not that we may gather the idea that our present bodies which we lay in the tomb will rise again in their present forms, though this has been the prevailing sentiment of the church; but rather that God shall clothe it with a body suited to its nature and employments, for "as we have borne the image of the earthy we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."

But I have yet to speak of the victory over moral death. For reasons which our comprehension can not fathom, God has permitted sin and disobedience to mar the beauty of the moral world, and he has appointed as a punishment for transgression a variety of pains and penalties. Often it is the case that we are afflicted not only physically, but the mind also is subject to seasons of depression, and gloom, and mental darkness. Though punishment and discipline are designed by the moral Governor for our benefit, though calculated in its nature to reform the offender and restore him to spiritual life and happiness, and to a reconciliation to the law of God, yet so imperfect is man, that, so far from receiving it in the kind manner in which it was intended, they have looked upon it as the effect of anger and malevolence, and have vainly attempted to reconcile God to themselves and transform his supposed fierce anger to friendship and love. And at the same time fearing his vengeance and desirous to escape his wrath, they, by degrees, lost their knowledge of him and his character, and sunk into a state of the deepest degradation, moral darkness and death. From this stupidity nothing seemingly could rouse them but the voice of God. There seemed to be a kind of moral incapacity in mind to appreciate the truth, the goodness of God or his government. Though every act of his government if rightly understood was that of a kind and tender parent, though "his tender mercies were ever all the works of his hands," yet in the perverseness of their imagination they had clothed him with terrors, they had withdrawn so far as they were capable from their allegiance to him, and in their ways and conduct, in their words and actions, they denied the God who made them, and sunk into the deepest shades of ignorance respecting his character and his attributes. And at the present day, though all or nearly all of our surrounding population are taught the nature and the attributes of the Supreme, yet how few there are, in comparison with the whole, who have any adequate conceptions of his goodness or of his essential attributes!

The world is yet to be enlightened, and even in this highly favored land there is yet much of ignorance to be removed; there are yet many wrong views to be superseded by the light of truth, before a victory can be declared over moral death. A knowledge of the character of God is necessary, for the Saviour has truly said, "And this is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."

This necessary knowledge was imparted by Jesus. He came from the bosom of the Father, as a manifestation of his goodness, he illustrated and defended that grace which was bestowed alike upon all mankind, he pointed out the nature of the Deity, he taught the principles of his government, and he showed the relationship which existed between man and his Maker. And by thus showing the principles upon which God acts in reference to his creatures, showing that we are all children of the same great family, that as God gives to us all life and breath and all things, as he bestows upon all his waiting children the blessings of his Providence without partiality and without hypocrisy—so are we taught to entertain for our fellows those sentiments and kindly affections which render us, in some measure, the children of our heavenly Father. In the Gospel we are taught the principles of moral righteousness and the duties which we owe to God and to our fellow men. And no one can read the Gospel or hear it proclaimed, and understand its truth, but must from the very nature of those principles become a better and a happier man. There is a power, there is a principle in the Gospel of our Lord, that will exert itself in every heart that receives its truth, that becomes acquainted with its principles, and that beats in unison with the requirements of the system of God's grace and love. There is a moral life which in its operation completely destroys the principle of moral death, which knocks the shackles from the limbs of the mental slave, opens the prison doors to the moral captive, and bids the oppressed by doubts and fears go free. This power will not be denied by even the superficial observer of the effects of pure and undefiled religion upon the soul. 'Tis a resurrection from the dead; it is the renovation of the spiritual man; it is the consummation of the plan of redeeming grace; it is the holy union of the soul with the power that gave it being; it is the union of the spirit with its kindred source!

In every return, then, of erring man from the dark pathways of sin, of rebellion and error, to the pure and enlightened reconciliation of the mind to God, we witness a victory. A victory achieved over moral death. A victory won by the principles of the Gospel over the dark dominions of sin. A victory which incites joy and praise among the beatified legions that surround the throne above. A victory which causes the powers of moral death to tremble, to shrink back in darkness, and verge towards the destruction of oblivion—an everlasting triumph, the rejoicings for which echo and re-echo through the boundless expanse of heaven for ever and ever. And could we be assured that there is sufficient energy or fulness of power in this Gospel to "overturn and overturn," till the kingdoms of the world should become the reconciled kingdoms of our Lord, and that in the fulness of its power it would finally banish from the moral universe every opposing principle, that sin shall be finished and transgression shall have a full end—then could we look forward, and in fond anticipation, we could hail the day when all moral creatures shall be reconciled to God, and as an inevitable consequence, when the imperfections of humanity shall have been shaken off, and all shall be happiness and peace.

When these principles are understood, the fear of death, even in this present state, shall be in a great measure destroyed; the bitter reflections which the fear of eternal death and never ending misery have shed around the death bed and the tomb, shall cease to exert their poisonous influences, and the soul shall look forward with joy in the anticipations of future life. There are evidences in the New Testament which teach us conclusively that all the moral dispensations of God shall eventuate in the reconciliation of all things to him, the moral triumph of the Redeemer over evil of all kinds, and the restoration of all intelligent creatures to the purity and happiness which all aspire after. The mind, the moral system shall be purged, purified, and prepared for its work of praising God. I said such evidence might be found in the New Testament. I have not time to repeat, nor perhaps have you patience to listen to all or even a moiety of this proof, for it would be the repetition of a large share of the writings of the author of the text.

I would refer you to the language found in the 5th chapter of Romans, and also, the 11th chapter of the same epistle. Also, 2d Cor. v: 13, and onward to the end, as well as Eph. i: 3-14. Also, in Philippians, the apostle says, "For our conversation," literally, citizenship, "is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." So also the same apostle says to the Colossians, "And he is the head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first born from the dead, that in all things he might have the preeminence. For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell, and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things on earth, or things in heaven." In addition, reflect upon the argument contained in the context throughout the whole chapter, and to my mind the evidence is complete. I am satisfied of the power, the wisdom, and the will of the Deity, and of the ability of the moral Mediator to accomplish the work. His kingdom shall be an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion shall extend throughout nature's wide domain. "And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject to him that did put all things under him, that God may be all in all." This is a victory which is truly a source of joy. It is a victory which embraces all the children of humanity. A victory which will call forth the gratitude, the high praises of the universe. From all beatified intelligences the anthem of redeeming grace shall rise, and as it approximates to its height and grandeur, the shout will be heard, long and loud, "Death is swallowed up in victory"—life, spiritual, moral, and immortal, has gained a full, a complete triumph. AMEN.

ALICE W..... OR THE INFLUENCE OF PURE RELIGION.

BY MARY M. HAMILTON.

How sad would be the human heart on bidding adieu to the bright scenes of our youth, and the dear ones that with us have encircled the cheerful fireside at our childhood home, were it not for the blessed assurance, that if we meet no more on earth, there is a sunny clime beyond the dark valley of death, where we shall be reunited to our kindred and friends, to enjoy with the redeemed earth one eternal home of blessedness! How chilling the word farewell, to that heart which has never learned from the sacred volume that separation is not eternal, and that we are fast hastening to that holy mountain where "tears are wiped from off all faces," by the kind hand of our heavenly Father! But these divine truths seem to dispossess parting of its sting, and enliven the drooping spirits on separation's eve.—These tranquilize the troubled mind, and are in a great measure efficacious in driving from the lone heart such unwonted sadness.

But these were not the consolations of Alice, as she sat one bright lovely morning by the window, intently gazing upon the broad mirrored surface of the ocean, imagining to herself the various vicissitudes through which her brother would pass ere she could behold him again, if she should be so happy as to welcome him to his dear native shore, and endeavoring to reconcile her mind to his departure. A gentle rap at the door preceded the entrance of the object of her solicitude. "Arthur, my dear brother," said she, "it is the first time in my life that your presence ever gave me pain—and how can it be otherwise, when I am, alas, too well assured, it is but a prelude to your departure! How can it be otherwise, when yonder proud ship is unfurling its white sails to catch in their embrace the passing breeze, and every whispering gale that wafts through the embowering trees, but reminds me it is hastening on to bear you far hence to the European world." "My dear sister," replied he, "every pang that your tender heart may feel is reciprocated by me; and I can assure you it is no small sacrifice for me to leave you for so long a time, but"—

"For so long a time," interrupted Alice—"Alas! the time you mention, I should consider but a short one, could I then flatter myself that we should meet again. As it is, I have but little hope of ever seeing you again. It is not for me to be happy on earth—my parents have departed life's gloomy scenes, and now you, my brother, my last earthly treasure, are to leave me as I may say, alone in this unfriendly world." "Say not thus, my dear sister," said Arthur; "it is true that our parents have long since mingled with the sleeping dust, but there is an Omniscient eye that ever regards with compassion the orphan while his 'tender mercies are over all his works.' Put your trust in him, and he will strengthen your hope that we shall meet again in due time."

"Alas! I am but too well assured that we shall never meet again—a something within, whispers we part now forever!" "My dear sister, do you yet render yourself miserable by your fears that I shall never be with you a participant of those joys promised the redeemed. Do you feel still that I can have no share among the blessed above? O, do not, I beseech you, torture yourself longer with imaginary woes! We have a rich promise of an immortal crown beyond the darkness of the tomb—and it is to all. Our's is not a partial God—'He is no respecter of persons.' I can not avoid now expressing my regret that you yet cling with such avidity to the principles of your education, and that you are thus, with your own hands forging the chains that bind down your mind in superstitious darkness. Let me entreat of you to arise in your might, throw off those gloomy forebodings of unending misery, and burst those mental fetters that so long have confinied your young mind within the dismal cells of ignorance." "From what source," asked Alice, "can I derive strength to engage in an enterprise so dangerous to my soul's salvation and so repugnant to my own feelings. Pardon me, my dear brother, yet I can not listen to your advice unless you produce sufficient proof that I am not thus forfeiting my soul's eternal welfare, by acting in exact contradiction to the will of Heaven."—"Proof, do you ask—here take this sacred volume; it is the word of God, and for the sake of your brother—yes, and your own peace, peruse with careful attention its precious contents.—Throw aside every prejudice, divest yourself of your contracted views of God's mercy and benevolence, and receive the truth into an honest heart, and may the God of all grace strengthen you in the undertaking, and open your heart to receive the truth with humility and love. Promise me, dear Alice, that you will comply with your brother's last request." "I promise," faintly murmured Alice. "Adieu, then, my beloved sister, the time for my tarry has expired, and if we meet no more on earth, we shall at least rejoice each other in heaven." "Adieu, and God bless you," had hardly been pronounced by the weeping Alice, ere Arthur had departed, and was soon speeding his way o'er the billowy waves of the broad Atlantic, to seek dame Fortune's smiles amid a stranger crowd.

Alice gazed long—till the ship seemed but a speck in the horizon, and at length vanished, ere her eyes turned towards the gift of her brother, which in after years proved a rich treasure—a sweet solace in a lonely hour. We will not stay now to recount the hopes and fears, the joys and sorrows which alternately took possession of the heart of Alice as she attentively perused each page of that precious book. We will not stay now to describe the material change which was by this means wrought in her mind and disposition, but pass on a few months, when we see Alice W. sought and won by the generous and noble Henry Trenville. Hope filled her soul when she consented to a matrimonial union with him—the rainbow of promise even there seemed to shed an unwonted lustre upon her pathway; the star of her destiny, too, beamed with a hallowed light upon her dawning prospects, while visions bright, flitted before her dreaming fancy as she gently breathed "I will," to the interrogatory of Hymen's priest, and thus became another's. She little dreamed, alas! that her bright imaginings would vanish at noonday. She little thought that all her bright hopes would soon be buried beneath the mountain wave of adversity.

But so it was. Adverse fortune assailed them in an unexpected hour. Mr. Trenville had engaged extensively in one of the mercantile stores in the city of —. It failed—he was ruined. 'Tis well that our earthly prospects are transient, that earthly riches are of short duration. Were it otherwise, we should so cling to earth as to repine that we must one day sleep in our narrow homes—were it otherwise we should be unwilling to exchange earth for heaven.

But it is not thus, joy is not perfect here,
The happiest smile is oft dim'd by a tear,
O'ershadowed is the brightest day with clouds,
And disappointment sweetest hopes enshrouds.

And it is oft times by such reverses that we are constrained to seek those durable riches which time or change can never reach. We are led by this to lay up our treasures in heaven where "moth nor rust doth corrupt," and from whence we can derive inexhaustible enjoyments:

Such now was the case with Alice Trenville. She had been induced by her brother to search the Scriptures impartially, and in them had found and partook of the bread of "Eternal life." And now when adversity's tempest assailed her little bark on life's stormy sea, with calm resignation she met the fierce attack, not fearing her bark would founder while that Omniscient eye, that sleeps not, watches over the human family; and as she retreated into the vale of obscurity, the olive wreath encircled her once polished brow, which, though it bore the impress of care, was calm as the unruffled sea.

"Time rolled its ceaseless course," and as yet no change came o'er their darkened dreams. Life was with them a monotonous round of toil and care, with hardly a kindred spirit, or congenial heart, to cheer them in their weary pilgrimage. Weary, did I say? nay, nay, it was not so to the mind of Alice. Although forsaken by those who once paid homage to her smiles, although those friends who had judged of her merit by the extent of her riches, did not recognise her in her humble garb, yet a heavenly joy diffused itself in her heart; she felt that her afflictions were but the chastenings of infinite benevolence, for "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth."

But her cup was not yet full of bitterness. She had not yet sufficiently drank at the mixed fountain of human life; she was not yet sufficiently purified by affliction "to burst a scraph in the blaze of day." Sickness, that herald of human woes, laid its withering hand upon her only child. Long did he linger on a bed of pain, his constitution struggling with the fell destroyer. Pale and deathlike became the countenance of their once sunny boy—careless strayed the rich brown ringlets on his pale, high forehead—languid and heavy were those once bright eyes as they listlessly rolled, or for a moment stopped to gaze at vacancy—fainter and yet fainter rolled the tide of life—the lips moved as if to speak—a gasp—a groan—all is o'er—the spirit has taken its everlasting flight!

Who hath ever measured the depth of that holy fountain—a mother's love? Who hath ever discovered the extent of maternal affection? Reader, hast thou ever stood by, and seen the tender mother bend over the emaciated form of her dying child, and marked the agony depicted in her countenance, as with breathless anxiety she watches the last ebbs of life, and wilt thou not say it is unfathomable? Hast thou ever seen an erring son or daughter return penitent and humble from the paths of error, while the fond mother enfolds them in her embrace, and graciously breathes forgiveness, and wilt thou not say it is unlimited? Nay, thou canst but confess it. But I have digressed. Long and undisturbed was the holiness of that young mother's grief, when she saw the dearest object of her love torn from her embrace by the cold hand of death.—Again she saw how transient was earthly bliss, and amid the darkness of sorrow she felt the presence of that hope that points through the dim vista of the present to the peaceful shores of eternal rest. She felt that but a few more shadows could intervene ere she should meet her treasure in the realms of glory.

Previous to the death of their child, Mr. Trenville had purposed leaving his family in search of a residence befitting his present reduced circumstances, and he now thought best to carry it into execution. Preparations were made and he departed. With a heart rich with Christian meekness, did Alice perform her now increasing cares. Day after day stole along and it became evident that her slender frame was bending beneath the weight of accumulated toil and sorrow. Her health began to decline and she was prostrated on a bed of sickness. A heart unsupported by the divine principles of our holy religion, could not bear above such a multitude of trials as did this example of goodness. No, it is not in human nature to meet afflictions with such calm composure. Neither could Alice, ere the emanations of divine love had illumined her darkened understanding. Although her physician had some hopes of her recovery, yet from the beginning of her illness she felt that she should not recover. Yet resignedly she spoke of her dissolution, which she said was near. She had but one wish to live, that she might behold Mr. Trenville on this side death. But she could not expect it. She knew not where he was, therefore no messenger could be despatched for him to return home. Her brother she should never more meet, till they should meet in heaven. "For me," said she, "death has no sting and the grave is dispossessed of its gloom, since Jesus has lain therein." * * *

It was a rich Autumnal sunset. The "day god" was sinking in the gorgeous West, diffusing over the face of nature the soft mellow rays of departing sunlight; bright clouds "were cradled in the South," tinged with gold and crimson; the birds, too, were chaunting their vesper hymn as each sunk to rest beneath its leafy canopy, and as the sun sunk beneath the Western horizon, a holy stillness pervaded the retiring day. Alice lay upon her couch, her eye gazing at the bright star of even, now lingering in the horizon. "Look," said she, to her attendant, "do you see yon bright star in the West? How mild and steady is its light; how benign its rays? Methinks it resembles the dying Christian, so cheerful is its aspect. Like that would I sink calmly and peacefully to rest. My spirit is now hovering around the confines of another world. This is the last sunset I shall ever behold, but ere another revolution, I shall be an inhabitant of that clime whose glorious sun never sets, where the long, happy day never ends. There sorrow or suffering can never gain admittance, but pleasure will succeed to pleasure uninterruptedly." She ceased to speak. A heavenly smile overspread her pale countenance, and after having recovered from her exertion, she said, "one thing more I would add—if Arthur should ever return, tell him I die happy in the triumphs of that faith that points to one eternal home of bliss. And it is through his influence; had it not been for his parting injunction, possibly I might not thus in my dying hour, have relied with implicit confidence on the impartial grace and boundless love of God; but now 'I know that my Redeemer liveth' and is the resurrection and the life." She said no more—a slight tremor passed over her features—they raised her head from the lowly pillow—but she slept. Her's was the sleep of death. * * *

The cold earth had peacefully reposed a few short weeks over the form of Alice, when two friends entered, one cold evening in November, the church yard of —, and approached silently a new made grave. Long wept they over the low mound; and fervent were the prayers of the younger, that they might have strength from on high to support them under their severe affliction; then dashing from his eyes the starting tears, he approached his friend, and taking his hand addressed him with that calm and subdued tone, that composed and heavenly mein, which evinces that the mind has held communion with superior beings.

"Do not, my dear Trenville, thus yield to unavailing grief. It is the lot of all one day to sleep in the grave, and our vain regrets can never recall her who reposes here." "Nay Arthur, nor would I, if I could, recall her; she is happier, far happier now than when here the sport of cruel fortune; but O, that I might with her repose in the cold grave! Life is to me now but a burden, for here lies all my treasure. I vainly thought when I consigned my beloved child to the tomb, that then I had drank of bitterness to the dregs; but alas! that I should return from a toilsome journey and find my last remaining solace, thus unexpectedly torn from me, with none of her kindred near, in a dying hour—'tis more than human nature can bear!"

Although Arthur kindly endeavored to whisper consolation to the bereaved, yet his own heart was not without a pang. He had hastened "o'er the foam crested billow," to the joy lit climes of his native home, with the bright anticipation of meeting, after a long absence, his dear sister, and to repay her fully for all the care she had experienced on his account, by increasing kindness; but alas! he was too late, although her shroud was not yet still from the commingling of earth with its kindred earth. But his heart was supported by grace—he had a resource for consolation which Trenville had never experienced. "He could cast his burden upon the Lord," and feel that he was in the hands of a kind and benevolent Parent, who would deal with him but in justice and mercy. He viewed the character of God in its true light, a being of love, as all the earth will view him when they unitedly bow before him, and acknowledge "in the Lord have I righteousness and strength."

INNATE, CONNATE AND INBORN DEPRAVITY.

BY REV. W. H. GRISWOLD.

ORIGINAL SIN.

"Undoubtedly it is one of the grand pillars on which the Andover Institution rests."—Dr. Dana's Letters to Prof. Stuart.

In a previous number it was intimated that the learned D. D.'s here were at loggerheads. Their own account of the warfare is as follows:

"If in the remarks I shall offer on your theory, I shall make it appear that the philosophic principle on which it is built is erroneous—that the celebrated author whose support it claims, gives it no support at all—that the theory itself is in conflict with the Scriptures—that it is inconsistent with your own repeated admissions and statements—and finally, that it stands opposed to your publicly avowed opinions; you will doubtless admit that it should be abandoned." [Dr. Dana's Letters to Prof. Stuart.] Again, the ground of this difficulty is stated as follows by the same author: "Your denial of the doctrine of original sin is based on the apprehended fact, that all sin consists in voluntary transgression of known law and in nothing else; in one word, that properly speaking, there is no other sin besides actual sin. Thus you would seem to exclude propensities, dispositions, habits, from the possession of any moral character whatever." Thus it will be seen that it is not sufficient to believe in the total depravity of moral agents, but the very "dispositions," and "propensities" of the new-born babe must be considered as totally depraved. Nothing short of this is sound and healthy Orthodoxy.

From the above the reader would be led to suspect that something besides the "first shade of thought" had dawned upon a great mind. "That all sin consists in the voluntary transgression of a known law," would seem to be an unexceptionable position to common minds; yet this is the head and front of Prof. Stuart's offending. And indeed, he has so modified and softened down this by other admissions that he can hardly be said to occupy this ground in its fulness. His words are: "All come into the world in such a state, as makes it certain that their appetites, which lead to sin, will prevail, and that they never will have any holiness, until they are born again." And again, he says, "That they are in such circumstances that they will all sin as soon as they are capable of sinning, and will never do any thing holy until they are regenerated."

Thus he writes in his "Comments on the Epistle to the Romans." Hence the real difference between him and his brethren would seem to be the following: He believes in the total depravity of all as soon as they are capable of sinning; and his brethren in the innate and inborn depravity of all as soon as they are born. In other words, he holds that all are born with a nature that will certainly lead to total depravity; and his brethren hold that they are born with one already totally depraved. The former of these opinions Dr. Dana pronounces unscriptural, and sustains his charge. The latter, Prof. Stuart declares to be at variance with the sacred Oracles and proves that it is so. Therefore, neither position is right, they themselves being judges. And yet this is the base of the "grand pillar" on which the Institution of Andover rests! This is the "foundation" upon which the whole "superstructure" is raised! And if the foundation is thus proved to be a "baseless fabric of a vision," by their own household, what may we safely predicate as a consequence? Let Dr. Dana answer. After well and truly saying that no one can deny, expunge from, or even modify a single truth of inspiration without corrupting the whole system of religion, doctrinal and practical, he thus speaks, "What a tremendous responsibility does he then assume (who does do this)—especially if the truth in question belongs not to the superstructure of religion, but to its very foundation. Such is unquestionably the case with the doctrine we are considering. By most divines, and by most Christians, it has been thought hitherto, that the man who is essentially wrong in his views of human depravity, can be right no where in religion." [Letters to Stuart.]

Verily these learned men place themselves in rather of an unenviable position. Right no where in religion! And this according to their own showing! It is to be hoped that their case is not quite so bad as this, and in our next, we will endeavor to show that there is some little ground for such a hope. In the mean time we will close this article with what in Andover is called real genuine heresy. After attentively reading the above we think our readers will settle down into something like the following: "Man's sinful nature consists in such animal senses, appetites, propensities and passions as exposed Adam and Eve to transgress. These propensities are not in themselves evil; nor were they implanted to render it certain that children will sin, and only sin as soon as they are moral agents. They are favors, bestowed by God to render us capable of enjoyment and usefulness; but they are like other favors which expose mankind to temptation. When abused or unlawfully indulged, they are occasions of sin." This is no "middle journey," 'tis true, nevertheless it may be the right one for all that. The reader is not asked to see whether it agrees with the Westminster Catechism or not; for the writer acknowledges no such authority. His inquiry is, "What is truth?" Not what does the catechism say? The above opinion therefore should be tried by some other standard besides the "creeds and commandments of men,"

THE POOR MAN'S GOSPEL.

Not his exclusively, but his peculiarly. The distinction between the rich and the poor, to the world so prominent, in the Gospel is effaced and lost. No where does the Gospel fall with a more levelling power, than upon these two classes of community. It perceives in them one common nature, and it meets out its blessings with an impartial hand. There has not been a more marked distinction between the religion of Christ Jesus, and that of every other founder of a system which has flourished in the world, than in this view of these two classes of society. Not a system which has been put forth for the professed exaltation of humanity, except that of Jesus of Nazareth, but what has slighted and despised the poor, and, in a measure, excluded them from the blessings which it had to grant. Mahomedanism began its very course with the influence of wealth and grandeur. Its founder, a descendant of the most powerful and honorable family in Mecca—his coffers increased by an opulent marriage, his early influence extended by an alliance with others of his family and country—men of high descent, distinction and wealth—these were his dependents, and with these, for the first three years of his enterprise, did he work in secret, trusting to the power and affluence of those whom he had thus privily enlisted in his cause. His highest heaven was promised to those only who spent their lives and fortunes in his cause; and without a fortune—without gold—in vain could they expect the highest honor of his kingdom. The very glory of his heaven consisted, in part, of the riches of the world. His robes of silk and palaces of marble—his couches of ease and groves of beauty, with all the sensual and material richness with which his heaven was emblazoned—this formed the glory of that system of religion which its founder pretended to have received from above.

Contrast it with the Gospel of Jesus Christ our Lord! The poor have it preached to them, and the poor in purse and in spirit, receive the richness of its influence. Without gold, the religions of the earth would have done comparatively nothing. Without gold, the religion of Jesus Christ does all. It makes rich with an incorruptible inheritance. It regards not the outward man, but sends its hallowed influence through all the channels of the mind, depositing there its stores of wealth and beauty. And thus it is, that the poor of this world stand, frequently, pre-eminent; and receive far more of the Gospel's influence than can ever penetrate through the barriers of human pride and human greatness. Not that the rich can not rejoice in Jesus, but frequently, because they will not. Not that the rich are necessarily estranged from the religion of the Gospel, but that "better is a poor and wise child, than an old and foolish king, who will no more be admonished."

Apply the spirit of this passage to the distinction of wealth alone. We should be taught that there is an attainment which is of vastly higher value—an attainment which can be mastered even by the tattered beggar, which, in the eye of God and of considerate man, is the only true riches and the only true wisdom. It is an attainment also, I remark for the consolation of the poor, which is much more likely to be acquired in the midst of their poverty, than in the midst of human affluence and glory. We do but repeat a truth of the Bible, when we say of the rich man, in numberless instances, that "the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful."

In order to estimate the worth and glory of the Gospel, apart from all the outward distinctions of the world, it is necessary to contemplate fact rather than theory, and to go out into the world, observing the total disconnection of Christianity with external circumstances, or this world's importance. And for this purpose, suppose we look into the very humblest parts of society—into the habitations of those who can not boast of affluence, but are in truth, the real objects of poverty, ignorance, and want. If, in such circumstances, you should find a Bible as the treasure most prized and trusted, and in fact, the only thing of consequence cared for in all the premises—if you find an apparent indifference with regard to the possession of all things else of which this family can boast, and a sort of careless disregard even of what few comforts do make that home tolerable, so high is the trust, and so supreme the attachment to what to them forms the all for which life is valuable; you may, I apprehend, learn something of the value of that faith which is the only inheritance of the poor of this world. And with this they are rich—ineffably rich, in all their want, and all their humility. You could not tempt them to renounce their trust, for the dazzling riches of the earth. And you would not, impressed with the holiness of that scene, so wound their honorable feelings as to offer the contrast of pomp and of affluence as a consideration to make their circumstances even more tolerable than they already are. Why, my brethren, they are already, in the simplicity of their trust, far in advance of the generality of this world's people. And, with their humble fare, and bare necessities of life, they do, with faith in Christ, wear a brighter crown than many wise or many mighty, and stand the highest on the scale of heaven's greatness.

"The poor have the Gospel preached to them"—how contrary to all the systems of the world! How indisputably does this invest it with a high supremacy, and stamp it at once with a mark of its divinity! It sought not gold for its advancement, and it seeks not gold for the security of its triumphs. It triumphs most in the humblest walks of life, and rears its proudest trophies in the cottage and the family. Mind is the sphere of its dominion, and wherever there is mind, there does it work, and there achieve its victories. Be it ever recollected, that within the reach of our moral capabilities, there is a commodity which money can not purchase, and which possesses a more sterling excellence than all that money can command. The poor can have this excellence in equal fulness with the rich. In the rich depths of his moral and religious nature, there is a mine more precious than all the riches of Golconda, and an ore to be taken and wrought into instruments of beauty. The heavenly refiner can watch the operation of his work, and, under the rough and unpromising exterior, may the pure metal shine as bright, as when the clayey tenement is adorned with splendor.

But, to attain a just estimate of him whose riches are hidden in the inner man, in comparison with him who may be poor in the midst of his abundance, let us briefly contemplate the end of both. How soon, upon the rapid wings of time, will the season of every paltry distinction at length pass away! How soon will death "strip the one of his rags, and the other of his pageantry," and send them, in utter nakedness to the dust! How soon the trumpet voice will awake them from the dead, and, before the Dispenser of their future lot, will they stand, the property of one Lord and one Redeemer! "Blessed be ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God."

ELECTION AND REPROBATION.

BY J. H. MASON.

The human mind is a curious thing. Like clay in the hands of the potter, it can be moulded into any form whatever. By being trained from infancy, it may be made to believe mentally that black is white, and white black—that evil is good, and good evil. It may be trained to love and delight in any thing you please, however absurd or ridiculous, or however lofty, ennobling and elevating the scene, or however low, debasing and degrading.

When the mind has been wrongly educated, been taught false principles, one of its prevailing characteristics seems to be a love of mysteries, of romantic and visionary schemes. It will not be content to put on the simple garb of truth and stand forth in the simple grandeur and dignity of its nature, but must wander from the path of simplicity and revel in the visionary and mystic imaginations of a heated brain.

Such persons are sincere in their belief and notions, and however forcibly truth may be presented to them, and though their opinions may be wholly discountenanced by the light of reason and the sacred oracles, yet they will cling to them like life, as if they were their all, and as if they would be lost and utterly ruined by the separation.

Many persons wonder why it is so, that such persons will contend so earnestly and with such zeal for error, and be so unwilling to renounce it when so completely routed. Yea more, they will write a discourse, and read, and re-read it time after time, and still be unable to discover an error, while to a careful observer contradictions will stare him in the face in every line. But all this is not to be wondered at in the least. It is well known that a person afflicted with the delirium tremens will frequently start with fright and call on the bystanders to protect him from some evil demon, which his diseased brain imagines is about to destroy him. Do we wonder at this when we reflect that the brain, the optic nerves, in fact, the whole nervous system, is diseased and sickly and can not perform the natural operations of nature? As well might we wonder why a broken machine will not move—why men can not perform the labors of the day when borne down with disease and pain, and racked with the most excruciating pains of a rheumatic affection. The mind by constantly drinking at the fountain of false education has become diseased—every nerve of the mental system has become distended, and it is one continued scene of mental illusion.—Under such circumstances how is it possible for the mind to perceive truth? As well might the Ethiopian change his color, or the leopard his spots, as for such persons to receive the truth. The mind must be cured; false notions and prejudices must be rooted up and cast out before there will be room for truth.

By closely observing human nature, and tracing it through all its bearings, we can not but come to the conclusion that the mind is liable to be diseased—to wander far from the paths of truth, and drink in copious draughts of error as a sweet morsel. I have not lately witnessed a mind so lamentably diseased and led astray, as I did in Salina, in the afternoon of July 5th. The Rev. Mr. Deforest officiated. He addressed the audience with much warmth and feeling, and spoke in a kind and friendly manner. He spoke of the doctrine of election and reprobation, urged it as an essential doctrine of the Bible, as most beautifully holding forth the character of God in all its loveliness and perfection, as worthy the attention and consideration of every individual, and that it is necessary, and that it should be often and publicly preached as one of the essentials in the conversion of sinners. He stated that God had elected before the foundation of the world all whom he knew would conduct themselves in such a manner as to secure their salvation, and those only could he consistently save according to his divine counsels and will. On the other hand, all whom he could not consistently save, he knew would conduct in such a manner as would work their utter ruin. Now God knew all this before the foundations of the world were laid; then how can any individual, if out of the bounds of electing grace, ever be permitted to enter within the limits of its saving influence? Impossible!

And yet this same speaker urged and entreated us to labor and strive to enter into rest; in fact he urged and entreated us with all the pathos and affection of a father to his children, to perform a moral impossibility.

He can not see these glaring errors, nor would it be an easy task to convince him of his folly. His whole mental faculties have become poisoned with the withering influence of error, and he is not aware that he is representing his heavenly Father as tantalizing his children by laying before them moral impossibilities to perform. He is not aware that he is sowing the seeds, and laying the foundation, for the more effectual growth of infidelity, despair and suicide.

Among all the evils that have visited the world, there is none so pernicious, so deleterious, and so destructive to the peace and happiness of mankind as the doctrine of election and reprobation. It is the very basis of infidelity, insanity, despair and suicide, and consequently the broad foundation on which the most flagrant crimes are based. What man for one moment can believe that a God of love is thus guilty of tampering with the human family! Yet their pastors pretend it is taught in the Bible; they have been taught it from their infancy, and of course believe it to be the doctrine of the Bible, and many, catching a glimpse of its inconsistencies, reject it and discredit the Bible, and deny the existence of a God. Hence infidelity is the fruit. Look at France. What flagitious and heart rending crimes have been committed by that devoted nation!

Again, what person can for one moment understand and firmly believe this sentiment, and survive the shock. No one! that moment they are totally given up to despair, become raving maniacs, and end their miserable existence in the madhouse or by committing suicide. No intellect, however strong, is capable of bearing up under it. It infuses a moral poison through the soul—fills the heart with deadly sickness and burning pain, and causes the mind to revolt at the very idea of Deity.

But let us turn from this dark picture to one more lovely, more transcendently glorious, and more in accordance with the divine and immaculate character of the great I AM. John hath said, God is love. The very idea that God is love should carry conviction to every heart, that he will not destroy nor cast off forever, but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies, and finally receive the whole human family, pure and without spot or blemish, to bask in the smiles of his eternal love. "God is love." Love is divinity itself, and God is divine. Christ shall reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet, and the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. Then shall Christ be subject unto the Father, that God may be all in all. Then shall the triumphant question be asked. "O, grave, where is thy victory! O, death where is thy sting!" But the boasting monster shall be silent, and its gaping jaws shall be sealed with an eternal seal, and banished, eternally banished into the dark recesses of annihilation, and the triumphant voice of a ransomed universe shall shout the song of victory over death, hell and the grave, and shall be heard saying glory, honor and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the lamb forever and ever.

CHAUTAUQUE ASSOCIATION.

BR. GROSH—For some time past we have had cause to regret the great coldness, which has been manifested by the friends of our cause in this town, but of late our hearts have been made to rejoice by the flattering prospects of a revival, not of fanaticism, but of pure religion—of that piety which should characterise every professor of Universalism: A more becoming zeal for the cause of religion is apparently felt by the members of our society generally, and as a society we are resolved to distinguish ourselves more fully than we have yet done, as not merely a moral but as a truly religious people. Believing that the ordinance of baptism is necessary as a means of promoting practical piety, many of our society, with myself, feel it a duty, and purpose to be baptized at the time of our Association, which meets in this town, as noticed by the Standing Clerk. We have warm hearted friends in this place, who will esteem it a privilege to administer to the wants of those who shall come from a distance to partake with us, of that feast of fat things which we anticipate will be provided at the Association. We cordially invite all our friends, and especially our ministering brethren who can, to come and participate with us in the joys of the occasion. The ordinance of baptism will be administered on the first day of the Association, and the eucharist probably on the second.

A FRAGMENT.

Children value the most gaudy, and often the least useful flowers, and only because they admire the blossom, and are pleased with its delicate tints, and know not of the thorn that is concealed upon its stalk.

I saw a beautiful chernub go forth, communing unconsciously and intuitively with her Maker's presence. Smiles were upon her countenance, and happiness was in her heart. She sat beneath the branches of a rose bush and thought of its cooling shade. She raised her eyes and gazed upon the opening bud and expanded flower, and loved them for their fragrance and their beauty. Early hope opened its fascinating blossoms before her, and she loved them too, and for the first time dreamed of the future.

Again she went forth to meditate beneath her favorite flower; but the tempest had been there; its stalk was covered with thorns, and leaves were scattered upon the ground. She trampled upon the withered blossoms with the recklessness of disappointment, and wept! Was she ever to be thus the child of disappointment?

No! The Spring of infancy was passing away, but the blossoms which hope bears to youth, dried up her tears with their fragrance. The flowers were more numerous, and she thought more lasting in their homage to her cherishings. Rapidly did she pass from one to the other, but they were too beautiful for culling. She returned to make a second choice, but they were blasted and odorless! Their stalks she plucked up by the roots, and their leaves she buried in oblivion.

Was there no plant which she might cultivate in the hope of eternal blossoming? Yes, the maturity of mind, and the halcyon days of experience came, and with them the upward springing of religion's fairest and richest flower. The holiest gem of her heart was the pearl of great price, free to all, and yet her own. And that being went up to her resting place, with the flowers of love encircling her brow, and the incense of piety gushing forth with the last throbbings of her heart, a blessing to her kindred race, and the blessed of those who survived her.

THE EDITOR'S REMARKS.

BR. GROSH—I trust you will allow me a place in your paper to say one word by way of self-defence, touching your "remarks" upon an article of mine which appeared in your columns, July 17th, and which was headed "Information Wanted." The object of that communication was to show that our lay brethren were not guilty of the things, whereof they were accused, in the remarks of Br. A. R. B. which followed the proceedings of the last session of the Central Association—viz., a neglect to take up a collection for the benefit of the preachers. I stated then, that our brethren did their duty and their whole duty. My views are unchanged—are now as then. I at that time regarded the remarks of Br. A. R. B. uncharitable and ungrateful, and do now, 1st. Because the laymen discharged their duties according to the usages of this Association. 2d. Because a collection was not asked of them. But you say "Br. Ackley is mistaken as to former usages." Before I wrote my first article I was informed by several laymen that it was not customary to take up collections in this Association. Since your remarks were published, Br. E. M. Woolley, who has been a preacher in this vicinity, I think, some eight or ten years past, has informed me that he has never known a collection taken up in this Association but once, and then for one individual.

Again, you say—"I would remind Br. Ackley that the subject of a collection was named to him as the pastor of the society, and as the proper person to name it to the congregation." I plead not guilty. I have no knowledge whatever of being spoken to on this subject. I lay no claims, however, to infallibility, hence it is among the possibilities that some one named the thing to me. I wish not to multiply words upon the subject now under consideration. I hope, therefore, you will receive whatever I have said, as spoken for the best good of the cause in which we are mutually engaged and not in reference to any personal prejudice; and believe me your friend and fellow-laborer in the Gospel of Christ.

Hamilton, July 27, 1840.

REJOINDER.

I have before intimated, and I think plainly enough, that what I wrote in relation to our Associations, was done from a sense of duty. And I say it again. Never have I performed a duty which was so painful as this was, in the two instances where it occurs. It was painful because I was sensible that some might take the responsibility of appointing themselves arbitrators over my motives and feelings, who were incapable of judging either. I supposed I was as honest in writing what I deemed for the good of the denomination, and due to our ministering brethren, as Br. A. is; and did it with as kind language. Yet Br. A. considers my article uncharitable and ungrateful, while he wishes his received as written for the best good of the cause. So be it. I have no disposition to retaliate. I shall form no opinion upon his motives. I only know that on submitting the matter to the public, those who can view Br. A.'s article as charitable, will have no very great difficulty in approving the spirit and design of mine.

One word more. What I have written about defraying the travelling expenses of preachers at the Associations has not been done from selfish motives. I have attended but four Associations. Towards two of those I have discharged what Br. A. considers an uncharitable and ungrateful office; at the other two I took nothing, because my expenses were nothing, although contributions were taken up. The rule which I have adopted—under the impression that the services, time, and expenses of much abler men than myself can be obtained scot free—is, never to attend an Association unless I can defray my own travelling expenses without injuring myself. When I can do this, other considerations being propitious, I shall gladly visit Associations. And I shall visit them as our lay brethren visit them, to hear and enjoy. I shall go without expecting, without desiring any other compensation than what they receive, holding myself under no more obligation to them when I get there, than they are to me, and free to act according to my individual sense of duty. I expect to be called uncharitable in doing so, but I am determined not to be driven from my duty by gratuitous judgment.

Again. Br. A. says that the object of his former communication "was to show that our lay brethren were not guilty of the things, whereof they were accused in the remarks of Br. A. R. B." From this some may infer that I laid a false charge to our brethren. I intimated that there was a neglect to take up a collection for the benefit of the preachers. I intimated that this rule, if followed up, would compel many of our preachers to absent themselves from the Associations, by the consideration that they could not defray the expenses of the journey. This is the substance of the charge. What I intimated then, I say again. Will the reader look it over and see if there is any thing uncharitable and ungrateful here.

SONG OF THE EARTH TO THE MOON.

Sweet sister, draw thee near,
Breathe o'er my weary brow thy silver dreams,
My flower cups all are closed,—the night dew's tear
Weighs down their lids,—they crave thy lucid beams;
Sweet sister, draw thee near!

Midnight has shaded o'er
My mountain tops, and my deep rivers rush
Inky and cold, moaning with sullen roar;
And then my grandeur with an awful hush
Midnight has shaded o'er.

Come forth and kiss me, sweet!
Roll high, dear sister, in th' empyreal sky,
Laugh dimples on the sea—my broad lakes greet;
Frost them with sprinkling silver,—lovingly
Come forth and kiss me, sweet!

Thy trembling pearly rays
Quiver with music, and the furies tread
Their lightsome measures to the amorous lays Midst flowers chalcidony; in bliss they wed
Thy trembling pearly rays.

Beneath thy magic eye
Gray Ruin smiles, as though a second life
Peep'd through the ribs of death; sterility,
The moss clad pillar, stands with beauty rife
Beneath thy magic eye.

Upon thy clouds of snow,
Like a fair conqueror, thou sailest on;
Whilst the warm fragrant zephyrs gently blow,
In lovely majesty, thou comest down
Upon thy clouds of snow!

Joy!—Sister, thou art near!
My heart is light, my face is joyous now;
My flower-cups ope their lips, as though in prayer.
List, how my forests sing!—flood, lawn, and bough;
Joy, sister, thou art near!

A SCHOOLMASTER SCHOOLED.

["SMIKE," a poor, jaded, spiritless boy, is dragged into the school room, to be flogged for having attempted to run away from the cruel oppression to which he had been subjected. Mr. Squeers, armed with "a strong, supple, waxended, and new instrument of torture," inquires of the culprit if he has any thing to say for himself. The scene which ensues is not exceeded by the kindred one in Roderick Random, wherein a tyrannical schoolmaster is visited with similar punishment.]

"Nothing, I suppose," said Squeers, with a diabolical grin.

Smike glanced round, and his eye rested for an instant on Nicholas, as if he had expected him to intercede; but his look was rivetted on his desk.

"Have you any thing to say?" demanded Squeers again, giving his right arm two or three flourishes, to try its power and suppleness.—"Stand a little out of the way, Mrs. Squeers, my dear; I've hardly got room enough."

"Spare me, sir!" cried Smike.

"Oh! that's all, is it?" said Squeers. "Yes, I'll flog you within an inch of your life, and spare you that."

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed Mrs. Squeers, "that's a good un."

"I was driven to it," said Smike, faintly; and casting another imploring look about him.

"Driven to do it, were you?" said Squeers—"Oh! it wasn't your fault; it was mine, I suppose—eh?"

"A nasty, ungrateful, pig-headed, brutish, obstinate, sneaking dog," exclaimed Mrs. Squeers, taking Smike's head under her arm, and administering a cuff at every epithet; "what does he mean by that?"

"Stand aside my dear," replied Squeers—"We'll try and find out."

Mrs. Squeers, being out of breath with her exertions, complied. Squeers caught the boy firmly in his grip; one desperate cut had fallen on his body—he was wincing from the lash and uttering a scream of pain—it was raised again, and again about to fall—when Nicholas suddenly starting up, cried "Stop!" in a voice that made the rafters ring.

"Who cried stop?" said Squeers, turning savagely around.

"I," said Nicholas, stepping forward. "This must not go on."

"Must not go on!" cried Squeers, almost in a shriek.

"No!" thundered Nicholas.

Aghast and stupified by the boldness of the interference, Squeers released his hold of Smike, and falling back a pace or two, gazed upon Nicholas with looks that were positively frightful.

"I say must not," replied Nicholas, nothing daunted; "shall not. I will prevent it."

Squeers continued to gaze upon him with his eyes starting out of his head; but astonishment had actually for the moment bereft him of speech.

"You have disregarded all my quiet interference in the miserable lad's behalf," said Nicholas; "returned no answer to the letter in which I begged forgiveness for him, and offered to be responsible that he would remain quietly here.—Don't blame me for this public interference. You have brought it upon yourself; not I."

"Sit down, beggar!" screamed Squeers, almost beside himself with rage, and seizing Smike as he spoke.

"Wretch!" rejoined Nicholas, fiercely, "touch him at your peril! I will not stand by and see it done; my blood is up, and I have the strength of ten such men as you. Look to your self, for by Heaven, I will not spare you if you drive me on."

"Stand back?" cried Squeers, brandishing his weapon.

"I have a long series of insults to avenge," said Nicholas, flushed with passion; "and my indignation is aggravated by the dastardly cruelties practised on helpless infancy in this foul den. Have a care; for if you raise the devil in me, the consequences shall fall heavily upon your own head."

He had scarcely spoken, when Squeers in a violent outbreak of wrath, and with a cry like the howl of a wild beast, spat upon him, and struck him a blow across the face with his instrument of torture, which raised up a bar of lived flesh as it was inflicted. Smarting with the agony of the blow, and concentrating into that one moment all his feelings of rage, scorn and indignation, Nicholas sprang upon him, wrested the weapon from his hand, and pinning him by the throat, beat the ruffian till he roared for mercy.

The boys, with the exception of Master Squeers, who, coming to his father's assistance, harassed the enemy in the rear—moved not hand or foot: but Mrs. Squeers, with many shrieks for aid, hung on to the tail of her partner's coat, and endeavored to drag him from his infuriated adversary. * * * * *

Becoming tired of the noise and uproar, and feeling that his arm grew weak besides, he threw all his remaining strength into half a dozen finishing cuts, and flung Squeers from him, with all the force he could muster. The violence of his fall precipitated Mrs. Squeers completely over an adjacent form, and Squeers, striking his head against it in his descent, lay at his full length on the ground, stunned and motionless.—Nicholas Nickleby.

SUMMER-TIME IN GERMANY.

FROM JEAN PAUL.

"The summer alone might elevate us! Heaven! What a season! In sooth I often know not whether to stay in the city, or go forth into the fields, so alike is it every where, and beautiful. If we go outside the city gate, the very beggars gladden our hearts, for they are no longer a cold; and the post-boys can pass the whole night merrily on horse-back; and the shepherds lie asleep in the open air. We want no gloomy house. We make a chamber of every bush, and so have my good industrious bees before us, and the most gorgeous butterflies. In gardens on the hills, sit school-boys, and in the open air look out words in the dictionary. On account of the game-laws there is no shooting now; and every living thing in bush and furrow and on the green branches, can enjoy itself right heartily and safely.

In all directions come travellers along the roads. They have their carriages, for the most part thrown back. The horses have branches stuck in their saddles, and the drivers, roses in their mouths. The shadows of the clouds go trailing along, and the birds fly between them up and down. Even when it rains do we love to stand out of doors and inhale the quickening influence; and the wet does the herdsmen harm no more!

And as it is night, so sit we only in a cooler shadow, from which we plainly discern the daylight on the northern horizon, and gaze on the sweet, warm stars of heaven. Whithersoever I look, there do I find my beloved blue; on the flax in blossom; on the corn flowers; and the godlike, endless heaven, into which I would fain plunge as into a river.

And now if we turn homeward again, we find only fresh delight. The whole street is one great nursery; for in the evening after supper, the little ones, though they have but few clothes upon them, are again let out into the open air, and not driven to bed as in Winter. We sup by daylight, and hardly know where the candlesticks are. In the bed-chamber, the windows are open day and night, and likewise most of the doors without danger. The oldest women sit by the window, without a chill, and sew. Flowers lie about every where;—by the inkstand, on the Lawyer's papers, on the Judge's desk, and the tradesman's counter. The children make a great noise, and one hears the rolling of nine-pin alleys. Half the night through one walks up and down the streets, and talks aloud, and sees the stars shoot in the high heaven. The foreign musicians, who wend their way homeward toward midnight, go fiddling along the street, and the whole neighborhood runs to the window. The extra posts arrive late, and the horses neigh. One sits in the noise by the window, and drops asleep; and the post-horns awake him: and the whole starry heaven hath spread itself open. O God! what a joyous life on this little earth!

Some men will admit of only two sorts of excellence, that which they can equal, and what they term a still higher, that which they can surpass; as to those efforts that beat them, they would deny the existence of such, rather than acknowledge their own defeat. They are dazzled by the rays of genius, and provoked at their inability to arrive at it; therefore, like those idolaters that live too far from the temple, they form and fashion out a little leaden image of their own, before which they fall down and worship.

A CUTTING REPLY.—A charitable divine, for the benefit of the country where he resided, commenced a large causeway, and as he was one day overlooking the work, a certain nobleman passed by—"Well, Doctor," said he, "notwithstanding your pains and charity, I don't take this to be the highway to heaven." "Very true, my lord," replied the doctor, "for if it had been, I should have wondered to meet your lordship here."

DEATHS.

In Victor, May 17th, Mrs. NAOMI GILLIS, consort of Mr. Samuel Gillis, aged 34 years.

Mrs. Gillis lived for many years a sincere and devoted Universalist. By her upright, meek, and humble deportment, she had endeared her self to a large circle of friends who sincerely mourn her loss. Suffering for a long time under the influence of disease, and even deprived of the privilege of speaking except in a whisper, she manifested the most exemplary patience and resignation to her heavenly Father's will. For her death had no terrors, the grave no dread; and to the last moment of her life her countenance wore the placid smile of hope.

She died rejoicing in that hope which is an anchor to the soul sure and steadfast entering into that within the veil. See funeral Sermon in this week's paper. T. S. B.

In Victor, July 20th, Mrs. ABIGAIL PARDEE, aged 85 years.

Another revolutionary patriot gone! Died, in Hamilton, July 14th, Mr. JOHN YOUNGLOVE, aged 84 years. The patriotism, philanthropy, and Christian liberality of Br. Y. was proverbial. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright. For the end of that man is peace." D. A.

In Madison, July 15th, Mr. JOSEPH CURTIS, aged 67 years. Br. C. was one of the early settlers of the town in which he died. He lived to be the father of six children, and see them all married and settled in life. In this dispensation sister C. is bereft of a kind companion, the children of a fond and provident father, the Universalist Society of Madison, of a worthy member, and the town of a valuable citizen. May the consolations of the Gospel comfort all who mourn his death. D. A.

DEATH.

Death is regarded as the greatest evil to which man is heir. It is an event which is viewed with horror, sorrow, and dismay. It is contemplated with emotions the most heart rending and dreadful, as being the harbinger of evils unknown; as cutting us off from all the enjoyments of life; as premonitory of the judgment of Heaven. A mystery envelopes it.

The association of such ideas with the extinction of life, seems to me to be extremely erroneous, and I am persuaded that the dread which this grim monster conveys, is altogether imputable to the teachings which mankind have received—that in and of itself, death, philosophically contemplated, is capable of exciting no such dark, dread, and dismal forebodings. I am furthermore persuaded that to the unadulterated mind, death, in the ordinary course of years, would be hailed as a desirable event; as freeing us from the cares and perplexities of this precarious existence, and as affording us rest from our toils. Even the thought of it in perspective would not disturb our lonely musings.

But considerations of much more importance come within the sphere of its influence. Considered as the preliminary step to that life beyond the grave, which is to continue forever, the subject is filled with the most delectable emotions and heartfelt joy. But aside from these considerations the event would be mingled with pleasure, were it not for the erroneous doctrines propagated by man—by professed Christians. Being sensible of the moral and physical laws by which we are governed; of the system we form; of the organization which enables us to act, no one can say but what death is an ordination in the economy of God's laws, wise, just and proper, and absolutely necessary to the preservation and continuance of the same. God has established certain organic laws, which can not be evaded. God in his infinite wisdom thought proper to ordain such rules and regulations as would best conduce to the execution of his design, and the well being of his subjects. Of the excellence, utility, and importance of these organic laws a little reflection will convince us. We are endowed by our Creator with a frame susceptible of pleasure and pain. To be thus constituted, it was necessary that this fabric be so organized, and subject to such restrictions, as would tend to perpetuate that existence, and thereby insure the greatest amount of felicity to each and every individual. In the animal economy we are so fashioned. We have nerves to transmit sensations, and a brain to receive them. We are endowed with volition and muscles to perform that will. We have passions, and the apparatus to make those passions known to others. We see that all parts of the human frame harmonize with the design of omnipotence—that he has so arranged our faculties, that each one is dependant—an excess of one will produce a corresponding effect upon another—that a due balance and equilibrium must be preserved with the whole. Any one who endeavors to form correct views of these divine laws, will, I venture to assert, come to the same conclusion. He will be led to reflect on the beauty, order, and harmony which every where prevails in nature's works. When we are sensible of the organic laws which govern us, we must be sensible also, that a departure from them must be attended with pain. When we approach too near the fire, our feelings admonish us to recede; when cold comes on apace the same principle induces us to guard against its ravages. Inattention to any organic law will be followed with a proper degree of punishment, directly or indirectly, sooner or later. Aware of this we are constrained to act in conformity to those laws. God has ordained us to live for the space 60 or 80 years, by a proper use of our faculties. At the end of this time generally, the functions are unable to perform their allotted office, and who then would wish to live?

But here the inquiry may be made why were we not made immortal? To such as make the inquiry I would say, that God in his providence thought proper to constitute us rational, finite beings; for what purpose we can not tell—time only can reveal. A little reflection will, I trust, enable us to see the propriety and usefulness of this mortal institution. We are constituted with moral and intellectual faculties, which are innate. A due cultivation of these will produce happy results; but if any are carried to excess by us, the equilibrium is lost, and we wander guideless and in confusion. For instance, if the moral faculties only are cultivated, there will be no excitement to act—no stimulus to exertion. The faculties by right cultivation convey their own stimuli to each other. On the other hand, if we cultivate the intellectual to the exclusion of the moral, the consequences are still more unhappy. We are constituted a bodily machine, capable of anticipating pleasure, and enduring pain. Some repine very much that they were made susceptible of pain, but the short sightedness of their conceptions will be apparent when we realize, that, without the faculties by which we experience pain, we could not be sensible of pleasure. No one I think would be disposed to exchange his situation for one void of pain. I have been extremely well-pleased with Combe's ideas on the happiness of individuals. For the pleasure it may afford the reader, I will insert an extract. He adopts the form of dialogue as affording the best illustration of the subject. The address is made to Jupiter.

"O Jupiter, I lie here racked with pain and pass hours in agony without relief. Why hast thou created me so miserable a being?" Jupiter answered, "what aileth thee, and of what institution of mine dost thou complain?" The husbandman replied, "The earth which thou hast made will yield me no food unless I till and sow it; and no increase except it be watered by thy rain. While I guided my plough in obedience to thy law, thy rain came, and it fell not only on the earth, but on me; it penetrated the clothes which I had been obliged to make for myself, because thou hast left me naked; it cooled my skin, which thou hast rendered delicate and sensible; it disordered all the functions of my organized frame, and now rheumatic fever parches my blood, and agonizes every muscle. O Jupiter, thou art not a kind father to thy children." Jupiter heard the complaint, and graciously replied, "my physical and organic laws were established for thy advantage and enjoyment, and thou hast grievously infringed them; the pain thou sufferest is intended to reclaim thee to thy duty, and I have constituted thy duty the highest joy of thy existence; but say, what dost thou desire?" The husbandman answered, "What, O Jupiter, signify the purposes of thy laws to me, when thou hast denied me the faculties to discover and obey them? Frail and fallible as I am, they cause me only pain; deliver me from their effects, and I ask no other boon." "Thy prayer is granted," said Jupiter; "I restore thee to perfect health, and for thy gratification, I suspend the laws that have offended thee. Henceforth water shall not wet thee or thine, thy skin shall feel cold no more, and thy muscles shall never ache. Art thou now contented?" "Most gracious Jupiter," said the husbandman, "my soul is melted with deepest gratitude, and I now adore thee as supremely good." While he spoke he found himself afield behind his team, healthful and vigorous, jocund and gay, and again blessed Jupiter for his merciful dispensation. The season was spring, when yet the chill blast of the north, the bright blaze of a powerful sun, and rain, interchange in quick and varying succession. He drove his plough along, the rain descended; but it wet not him; the sharp winds blew, but they chilled no fibre in his frame; the flood of heat next poured upon his brow; but no sweat started from its pores; the physical and organic laws were suspended as to him. Rejoicing in his freedom from annoyance and pain, he returned gladly home to meet his smiling family, after the labors of the day. It had been his custom in the evening to put off the garments in which during the day he had toiled, to clothe himself in fresh linen from the fold; to sup on milk prepared by his wife, with savory fruits and spices; and to press his children to his bosom with all the fervor of a parent's love; and he used to feel a thrill of pleasure pervading every nerve, as they acknowledged and returned the affectionate embrace. He looked to find the linen clean and cool, delicately dressed and lying in its accustomed place; but it was not there. He called to his wife to fetch it, half chiding her for her neglect. With wonder and dismay depicted in every countenance, she narrated a strange adventure. With the morning sun she had risen to accomplish her wonted duty, but, although the water wetted every thread that clothed other individuals, it moistened not a fibre of his. She boiled it on a powerful fire, and applied every means that affection, enlightened by intellect, could devise, but the result was still the same; water glided over his clothes, and would not wet them. "The physical law" (said the husbandman within himself) "is suspended as to me; henceforth water wetteth not me and mine." He said no more, but placed himself at table, and smiled over his lovely family. He lifted his youngest child upon his knee, a girl just expanding into bloom, pressed her to his bosom, and kissed her ruddy cheek. But he started when he experienced no sensation. He saw her with his eyes, and heard her speak, but had no feeling of her presence. His knee was as stone; his bosom as marble; and his lips as steel; no sensation through his skin. He placed her on the floor, looked wistfully on her form, graceful, vivacious, and instinct with love; and, as if determined to enjoy the well remembered pleasure now withheld, he clasped her to his bosom with an embrace so ardent that she screamed with pain. Still he was all adamant, no sensation reached his soul. He sent her away, heaved a deep sigh, and the thought again entered his soul, that "the organic law is suspended to me." Recollecting well the sweet gratifications of his evening meal, he seized a bowl, and delicately began to sip, exciting every papilla of the tongue to catch the grateful flavor. But no flavor reached his mind; the liquid glided over his gustatory organs like quicksilver over the surface of a mirror, without impression, and without leaving a trace behind. He started now in horror, and his spirit sunk within him, when he thought that henceforth he should live without sensation. He rushed into the field and called aloud on Jupiter, "O Jupiter, I am the most miserable of men; I am a being without sensation. Why hast thou made me thus?" Jupiter heard his cry, and answered, "I have suspended the physical and organic laws, to which thou ascribedst thy fever and pain; henceforth no pang shall cause thy nerves to shrink, or thy muscles to quiver. Why then, art thou thus unhappy, and why discontented with thy new condition?" "O Jupiter," replied the husbandman, "but thou hast taken away from me sensation; I no longer feel the grateful breath of morn fanning my cheek as I drive my team afield; the rose diffuses its fragrance for me in vain; the ruddy grape, the luscious fig, the cooling orange, and the fresh fountain, to me are now savorless as adamant or air; my children are as stones. O Jupiter, I am utterly wretched, I am a man without sensation!" "Unhappy mortal," replied the god, "how can I afford thee satisfaction. When I gave thee nerves to feel, and muscles to execute the purposes of thy mind, and bestowed on thee water to refresh thy palate, and made thy whole frame one great inlet of enjoyment, thou wert not content. I made thy nerves liable to pain, to warn thee when thou departedst from my laws. The rain that was sent fell to fructify and refresh the earth, and not to injure thee. I saw thee while the showers descended, stay abroad, regardless of its influence on thy corporeal frame. The northern blast received from me its piercing cold, to warn thee of its effects; and yet I saw thee, wet and shivering, stand in its course, regardless of its power. In the voice of the storm I spake to thy understanding, but thou didst not comprehend. The fever that parched thy blood was sent to arrest thee in thy departures from my organic laws. If I restore to thee my institutions, thou mayst again forget my ways, and in misery impeach my justice." "O most gracious Jupiter," cried the husbandman, "now I see thy power and wisdom, and my own folly and presumption. I accept thy laws, and gratefully acknowledge, that, even in the chastisements they inflict, they are beneficent. Restore to me the enjoyments of sensation; permit me once more to reap the advantages that flow from the just uses of my nerves and muscles, and I bow with resignation to the punishment of misapplying them." Jupiter granted his request. His fever and pains returned; but by medicine were relieved. He slowly recovered health and strength, and never after embraced his children, or enjoyed a meal, but he poured forth a deeper offering of gratitude than he had ever done before. He was now instructed concerning the source of his enjoyments; he studied the laws of his nature and obeyed them; and when he suffered for occasional deviations, he hastened back to the right path, and never again underwent so severe a punishment as the first."

It is apparent from this beautiful extract, that men are really ignorant of the means of increasing their happiness; although they constantly murmur and complain. There are certain laws by which we must be guided, in order to secure the greatest amount of felicity. Food is necessary for the preservation of life. We have within a monitor and regulator, as to quality, quantity, and periods of time at which it is to be taken. We know from experience that these laws must be obeyed, or else, we must inevitably suffer the consequences of such neglect. If we do not take our sustenance at regular, stated intervals, debility and languor ensue; and if the same course be persisted in for any length of time, death is the final result. So with the other faculties; all are subservient to one grand, harmonious whole; all are dependant upon the condition of the others. When we take into consideration enlarged views of the plan of infinite wisdom and goodness, we can not fail to be impressed with the most grateful emotions to the divine Architect who formed, protects and encircles all. Notwithstanding many are called to pass the isthmus of death in the morning of their days; to surrender all their fond hopes and pleasing anticipations, yet, such premature and untimely deaths are to be imputed to the inattention or carelessness of those unhappy few; to folly or imprudence in their course of life; to disobedience to the organic and physical laws of animated nature. And to the old and decrepid, it certainly must be a consolation to anticipate a relief from their pains and vexations by the hand of death; that they have not to endure forever the misfortunes and calamities to which they are liable here on earth. Aside from all hope of a life to come, death would be regarded as the friend of the aged, weary and way-worn; if so, how much more happying with the prospect of an endless existence beyond the grave. It becomes doubly inviting. I am convinced the time will soon come when death will be disrobed of its terrors, and arrayed in habiliments of delight. When men come to reflect upon the laws by which they are directed, the beauty, order, harmony, union and simplicity of those laws and their operations, then they will be rational, intelligent beings, and have a clearer perception of the attributes of the Deity. #### SUNDAY SCHOOL EXCURSION.

The Sunday school connected with the Universalist society in Albany, made an excursion to Troy, on Wednesday, July 29th, prepared for a day of enjoyment in fresh air. About 80 children with their teachers, and some 50 friends and patrons of the school, assembled at the church in Green street, soon after 9 o'clock A. M., bringing sundry baskets of pies and cakes, with divers other more substantial eatables—all eminently calculated to ensure comfort on such an occasion. After forming procession, the whole proceeded to the pier at the foot of State street, and entered the steam boat for Troy.

It was one of those delicious summer mornings with which we are sometimes favored, after a night of refreshing rain—as bright, and pure, and glorious, as a cool west wind and sun-light could render it. And an hour's sail on the Hudson—the river which nursed the parent steam boat, in the very midst of scenery fraught with life, and comfort, and prosperity, and surrounded by cheerful and pleasure looking faces, was every way fitted to make both old and young forget the ills of life, and feel for once comparatively happy. And happy they were—some from the novelty of the thing—others from the native buoyancy of the young heart—and all from sympathy that shares in others' joy.

At eleven A. M. the party was received at the landing in Troy, by the superintendent and a few friends of the Universalist Sunday school in that city; and conducted to their church in Fifth street, where their school was in waiting to receive the procession. After a very cordial welcome and singing several appropriate hymns, the two schools formed a procession—crossed the superb railroad bridge over the Hudson—strolled nearly across the island, and halted under the shade of some lofty trees in full view of the cities of East and West Troy.

And now the children—used for months to the confinement of the school room, and the dust and ashes of close streets—broke forth in all the overflowings of young gratification. They ran, laughed, shouted and romped, till the woods rang with sounds of unwonted merriment. Every other passion seemed subdued or expelled; and doubtless the phrenologist might have detected a sensible augmentation in the bump of joy.

But one thing was wanting to fill up the measure of rational comfort; and that was soon supplied by the arrival of the well stored baskets of refreshments, accompanied by ample supplies of water, ice, and materials for lemonade. The fresh grassy bank was spread with stores in an abundance that might have astonished an indifferent spectator, if such could be found, and in a style every way suited to the time and occasion.

And speculate as we will upon the absurdity of giving so much attention, or any particular attention to "what we shall eat," there is a substantial reality in these wants which, at least in the child, puts to flight all philosophy and speculation in a moment. It can at once, annihilate every form of juvenile frolic and hilarity—gather groups from the chosen play ground, and from the most dearly prized sports, to feed like meaner things. Nor is this alone the misfortune of childhood—too many of our race, matured in body and in mind, instead of eating to live—live only to eat.

But this was not an occasion to tax the wants of nature with unmeasured oppression—fresh air and good healthy exercise only sharpening the appetite and adding a little sweetening to sweet-cake!

Well, the repast was finished, "the fragments gathered up," when it was found that many a basket was lighter, whether hearts were so or not. And now again commenced the gambols of the young—the wild uproarious shout of unsophisticated joy, till the hour of return arrived. Then gathering at once, and joining voices in the hymn of praise to the beneficent Author of our mercies, closed with "home sweet home," the procession again formed and retraced its steps to the city.

The Troy friends and school accompanied us to the boat, in which after a kind leave-taking we were soon borne to our city and homes. Nothing occurred to mar the happiness of the day—except that there were no more to share in its enjoyment. The Captain of the boat was courteous and obliging—the children behaved with great propriety—no accident occurred—all were pleased, and as heartily fatigued, but it was fatigue won in cheerfulness, innocence, and doing good.

For good is done, by such little efforts as convince our Sunday schools that not only their immediate friends take an interest in their improvement and comfort—but that there are those in other places and around us, who sympathize with them and share in their enjoyment and prosperity. Many a young heart received impressions that day, which can only be erased in death. The half solitary believer of a world's redemption, when he sees a multitude gathered as by magic which sympathizes in his views and feelings—goes home with new strength and encouragement to run the race of duty. And at the same time, many a worlding, and many whose prejudices induced them to believe that Universalists were too few and of too little weight to merit consideration, learn from a procession half a mile in length, that there is a community which demands and can command their respect.

There are few occasions better calculated than such a holiday scene, to convince those who have any doubts on the subject, of the utility and necessity of Sunday schools. It is a practical embodiment of their influences—informing the mind and purifying the heart. And let parents remember, that it is no small consideration that children are well employed on Sunday—that they are kept from vicious association—and from the grossness and idleness in which too many dissipate that respite from the ordinary pursuits and business of life. Let them reflect, what immense numbers of children patrol the streets and commons of our cities—and haunt the brooks, and woods, and farms of the country—wasting one seventh of their existence in all the varieties of vagrancy and worthlessness, and contracting and confirming those pernicious habits which are of necessity to have great influence over their whole lives; and they will perceive that the day most abundant in means of rational improvement and needed rest, is prostituted to low pursuits and criminal indulgence.

And all this when a single hour each week in the Sunday school, will not only furnish them with much information, secure cleanliness, promote health, and yield them the accomplishment of singing—but will give them access to valuable collections of books, improve their tastes, form their characters, and render them wiser, better and happier through life. Parents who love their children, and who love the doctrine of Universal grace should lay these things to heart; and should never rest satisfied, until they have established Sunday schools in every place where even two or three families of kindred sentiments can be brought together—and until they have made provision for this most suitable, useful, and least expensive of all methods of improving the minds, morals and happiness of their children.

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS WITHOUT ANSWERS.

BY REV. S. MILES.

1st. Is it true that our Creator made man in his own image? Did man lose that image by the fall? that is, did he become "a covenant breaker, without natural affections, and unmerciful," according to Rom. i: 31? Is it important that man should be changed from the mind and disposition of the carnal, implacable, and unmerciful man, to the mind and disposition of his Maker?

2d. If such a change is important, how then can it be true, that our Creator is like unto the implacable, and unmerciful man? And if he is not like unto such a man, how can he have a mind and disposition to torture millions of his offspring without end and without mercy?

3d. Are you a Christian, reader? If so have you been changed from your former fallen mind and disposition, to the mind and disposition of a merciful and compassionate God? Or have you been confirmed in the spirit and disposition of an infinite, unfeeling and revengeful tyrant, who will punish without end and without mercy?

4th. Did the Inquisition of Portugal, France and Spain, bear the image of the great Creator? Do the nations of the forest burn their prisoners of war without mercy? Now, if God has "built a dismal hell, and stored his wrath and vengeance there," and will consign millions of our race to its fiery vaults, would not his spirit and disposition confirm the propriety of the cruel and unmerciful doings of the Inquisitions and savages alluded to, rather than otherwise?

5th. Is it your earnest desire and fervent prayer, that men may be converted, and brought to be like such a being, who will torture some men without end and without mercy?

6th. Is the law of God a moral transcript of his divine nature? Can you say that you "delight in the law of the Lord," according to Ps. i: 2, Rom. vii: 22? Does the law of the Lord in which you delight, require that the wicked should be tormented eternally in the fiery billows of hell? Is your happiness now enhanced in proportion to the delight you have in that law of God which is said to require the endless misery of unbelievers? If you do not delight in the law of God, which is a moral transcript of the divine nature, nor in the execution of that law, do you not come short of loving the divine attribute of justice? If to evade the force of these plain questions, you contend that God has no pleasure in the death of the wicked; then it is not true, that he will destroy death, and sin which is its cause, as is predicted, Is. xxv: 6-8. 1 Cor. xv: 26, 64-55. Heb. ii: 14, 15.

7th. Is God an enemy to the wicked? Are you a partaker of the divine nature and disposition of such a being? that is, has he shed abroad his spirit in your heart, thereby making you, like himself, an enemy of the wicked? Or do you expect to meet with a change after death, and then be like him, an enemy to the wicked? Is it true that "God is love," according to, 1 John iv: 16? Has love built a dismal hell of never ending torment, and does he laugh at the calamities of the wicked who look up to him from thence and beg for mercy? If love has done this, would not hatred have done exactly the reverse?

8th. Can you now say "great peace have they that love thy law, and nothing shall offend them"—according to Ps. cxix: 165? Do you love the doctrine of endless wo as fully as the Christian is exhorted to love the law of the Lord? Is the doctrine of ceaseless misery and sin, a moral transcript of the divine nature? Do your meditations on the doctrine of endless punishment produce in your soul more peace and happiness than any other doctrine that can be embraced?

9th. Is it true that there is no change after death? Are you as perfectly prepared now to behold the misery of the damned in endless torture and be happy, as you would need to be should you now be presented with the awful sight as is said to exist in a future world?

10th. If the law of the Lord, and the doctrine of ceaseless misery be one and the same thing, and there is no change after death, should not the hearts of Christians be imbued with a perfect indifference to the most excruciating miseries of their nearest and dearest friends now? Now, as there are many who are unconverted and unprepared to behold with this cold indifference such miseries and torture and be happy, and as there is no change after death, is it not of the utmost importance that they should immediately meet with such a change as will free them from every feeling of commiseration for the miseries of their fellow beings?

11th. Does not the reading and hearing the doctrine of endless wo, serve to cherish the spirit and disposition of itself in the hearts of those who receive, believe and love it?

12th. If the Saints of God are now prepared to behold the indescribable miseries of the damned in endless wo, and need no change after death; are not their minds and dispositions "without natural affection," and as unkind and as unmerciful toward the inhabitants of earth and hell, as the minds and dispositions of the wicked are toward the saints? If so, which shall we pronounce the most depraved?

13th. Reader, the writer of this article has buried the cold remains of four children; and I must say that I am not prepared to stand upon the battlements of heaven and look down upon either of them in endless wo and be happy; no, nor do I feel the least desire to meet with such a change, nor will I profess to have met with such a change, until my heart is like adamant, and my ears as deaf as a viper. Now, suppose I should depart this life as I am, and should find my Lord as kind, and full of compassion as when he died for a lost and benighted world, would he banish me from heaven, and doom me to an endless hell, because I can weep with those that weep, as well as rejoice with those that rejoice? Because I bear in my soul the marks of undying love and mercy to all my kindred nature? Can we have too much of the spirit and image of Christ spoken of Heb. iv: 15, and v: 2. Eph. v: 1, 2, and iv: 31, 32. Matt. v: 7?

ESSAYS ON WAR. NO. XV.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"And the soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, Do violence to no man; neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages." Luke iii: 14.

We finished, in the last number, our reply to objections drawn from the Old Testament. We now proceed to the New Testament. The first objection presented from this source is founded on the interview that the soldiers had with John the Baptist. It is said that he did not disapprove their profession, and therefore he did not disapprove of wars.

An objection founded on such a basis seems hardly worthy of notice, but then as it has weight with some minds, we will give it a slight consideration. "Darkness had covered the earth, and a gross darkness the people." But moral light at last began to appear; glimmering slowly succeeded to glimmering; light struggled with suffocating darkness, till at last the day-spring became manifest. In John's day, the full blaze of Gospel truth had not poured upon the world. The Prince of Peace, who is to reign triumphant in the earth had not then begun his great work. We need not be surprised, therefore, if wars were not fully condemned under such circumstances. For its entire abolition we are to look to that bright and beautiful dispensation that was introduced with the songs of angels, proclaiming "Peace on earth, and good will to man."

The precepts of John were of a general character, not stopping at particular vices and evil customs. If the injunction of John, be content with your wages, justified war, it also justified idolatry and all the conquests, tyranny and oppression of Pagan Rome. We might also ask why he did not take this opportunity to condemn idolatry, polygamy, unnatural lust, licentiousness, and all the horrid vices of the Roman camp. Surely, we ought not to reason from his silence that he approved of war any more than its accompanying vices.

But take the injunction, 'Do violence to no man,' and it certainly goes as far to condemn war as any other remark of his to the soldiers, did to discountenance any other sin. If all the soldiers in the world would obey this direction in its spirit, wars would immediately cease throughout the earth. God speed the happy day!—These soldiers were stationed in a conquered country. They often assisted the publicans, or tax gatherers in collecting the tribute money, and it is probable that among other acts of oppression, they accused people falsely of not having paid their tax, and thus extorted money from them. Hence the appropriate injunction of John, that they should not commit robbery, but "be content with their wages." In conclusion, we believe that the friends of peace could use the whole verse in their favor with more plausibility than the defenders of war.

THE LOVE OF GOD.

The love of God is a shoreless, fathomless, eternal ocean of the purest benevolence, rolling its clear and placid waves over the vast, the infinite empire of mind and of matter. Its streams reach the farthest verge of creation; so that if we could take the light of the morning, and traverse from star to star, and from system to system, visit "worlds on worlds," throughout the vast fields of infinite space, we should not learn its height, nor depth, nor length, nor breadth.

"It extends through all extent and operates unspent."

The heavens and the earth—the whole rational creation, from the lowest self, through the "just made perfect," up to the cherubim and seraphim and to the highest arch-angel permitted to swell the heaven inspiring note of unconquering benevolence, all alike, are partakers of its abundance and glow in the richness and fulness of its glorified nature. This is Divine Love. This is that deep unwasting fountain that supplies the wide universe from its inexhaustible stores, adorning all it encompasses with immortal verdure and "throwing over innumerable systems a halo of transcendent loveliness." How great! How glorious! Reader, is not such a God worthy of our highest adoration, and our most unlimited confidence!—Universalist Palladium and Ladies' Amulet.

INNATE, CONNATE AND INBORN DEPRIVITY.

BY REV. W. H. GRISWOLD.
ORIGINAL SIN.

In a previous article we promised to show that there was some evidence that these learned men did not belong to that class, who are "right no where in religion." The following is our first attempt. "You assert that those very susceptibilities which in fallen man are so very pregnant of evil existed substantially in Adam while innocent. . . . You even declare, (though my pen almost refuses to record the declaration) that 'the Lord Jesus Christ himself had a susceptibility of feeling the power of excitement to sin; like that which Adam had before his fall.'" (Letters to Stuart.) This seems to us to be good theology, and as such it is introduced, and this for two reasons, first, to show that Prof. Stuart is right somewhere; secondly, that the reader may, if he can, reconcile it with the following which all the Profs. of the Andover Institution have to subscribe to once in five years: "The covenant being made with Adam not only for himself but for his posterity; all descending from him by ordinary generation sinned in him, and fell with him in his first transgression." And again, "The sinfulness of that state whereunto man fell, consists in the guilt of Adam's first sin, the want of original righteousness, and the corruption of his whole nature, which is commonly called original sin; together with all actual transgression which proceeds from it." Recollect that the favorite maxim of the heretical Prof. is, that "all sin consists in voluntary action," and that he holds that the "susceptibilities of all before actual sin, are innocent—wholly innocent;" yet that they must be regenerated before they can even perform a good act with these innocent susceptibilities! Did Adam need regenerating before he sinned? Did our Lord and Master before or even after, "feeling the power or enticement to sin?" And were these corrupted in their whole natures? Would they not do a good act? Yet we are told that beings with susceptibilities "substantially the same"—"innocent," and wholly so—must be regenerated or be eternally lost! Innocent, yet sent to hell! Does the reader ask, why? Because they were incapable of performing a good act, had never performed one, and therefore were destitute of holiness.

Now it seems to us that if the infant with innocent susceptibilities is denied heaven because it has never actually performed a good act, then we have the clearest right to infer that it can not justly be sent to hell, since it has never actually performed a bad one. Ergo. Where will these innocents go, which are neither holy nor unholy? Dr. Dana would seem to say, to hell for their want of holiness, yet he owns that it is natural for us to hope otherwise—that "nothing in Scripture stands plainly opposed to" the idea that "infants will be washed, sanctified, and everlastingly saved"—while at the same "time (continues he) as the fact is not plainly revealed we should speak on the subject with diffidence." Not plainly revealed? And yet the doctrine of the "innate inborn moral pollution of all men" is taught in the sacred Oracles, he would say, "in language plain and unequivocal!"

By a reference to the first quotation made in this article, it will be seen that the "pen" of the reverend gentleman here quoted, "almost refuses to record" a sentence which Prof. Stuart had uttered. And that the reader may see what his pen does not shrink from recording, we will introduce him to the following sentences from the same author. "From the commencement of their (i. e. human beings) being, they are personally depraved, and sinful, and in this view, obnoxious to the displeasure of God and all its dreadful consequences." Once more "In every age infants die by millions, and as death is the fruit of sin, their death is either the punishment and proof of their personal depravity, or God visits on them the penalty incurred by their first progenitor." (Letters to Stuart.)

The above reasoning would probably be quite as conclusive if the assumption that death, (meaning thereby natural death) is the fruit of sin, occupied a place not quite as conspicuous as it does. Where, in language "plain and unequivocal," are we taught that temporal death is the fruit of sin? Yet this is not only assumed, but is coolly made the basis of a syllogism that consigns millions and millions of our fellow mortals to irremediable and undying woe! And by whom? By an individual who thinks that when the Scriptures do not clearly reveal a subject, it should be spoken of with much diffidence, and whose pen almost refuses to record a sentence which recognizes the truth that all are innocent until they actually commit sin!

"How charming is divine philosophy!" Out of thine own mouth shalt thou be condemned. "When men abandon the simple guidance of Scripture and undertake to explore a path of their own—learning and ignorance, wisdom and folly stand on much the same level. Our only real wisdom and safety lie in speaking with the Bible and being silent with the Bible." (Dana to Stuart.) This is a very sound and healthy maxim, and another evidence that a man may go right sometimes, even though he starts wrong. Had the author of it listened to its wisdom a little more attentively than he seems to have done, he would not now find so much perplexity in proping up the "grand pillar," or be discoursing quite so freely about "fallen angels," but would let them with all their kindred be entombed in their own corruption, without even a "Hic jacet" to tell where. ## WHAT IS MAN?

He is a being possessing not only a physical frame, but a peculiar mental constitution. He looks around and beholds the works of creation, stretching themselves abroad upon every hand, and then returns again to himself—to his own limited understanding, and asks an explanation of the countless millions of mysteries, which he finds written upon every page of nature's golden history. Being unable to obtain an answer which gives perfect satisfaction, and as the mind of man never rests so long as there is a single mystery unsolved, he again retraces his steps and wanders in thought through the mighty maze of the universe. He seeks for a revelation—he labors to unfold and make known the secret laws of the universe of God. He penetrates the depths of the earth, and brings from thence a silver page replete with instruction. He unlocks the deep caverns, and searches out the crystal fountain. He brings forth the costly pearl, and the sparkling diamond, and from the Peruvian vaults, the choicer metals. The foundations of ancient cities are unmasked, which for a thousand years have lain in oblivion. He now sees that nine hundred centuries have rolled away in the production of the stately trees which stand upon their ruins. His mind is filled with profoundest awe in consequence of his ignorance of the unknown past.

For the sake of more extensive knowledge, and self-satisfaction, he roams in the forest wood, and through the lonely wilds of uncultivated regions, and over the lofty peaks of towering mountains; thence along the course of some meandering brook or majestic river, which bends its way through huge masses of rocks heaped pile on pile; and still on through the silent depths of some impenetrable forest, till at length he launches upon the billowy surge of the great deep—the ocean's home. Here he spreads his sails before the wind—visits the many nations of the globe—traverses a land of strangers—over battle fields, and desert plains, which have been flooded with human gore—beholds the land of miracles and goes to the mountain from whence the Lord made manifest his counsels to the children of Israel, in clouds of smoke, and pillars of fire. Again he takes the sea. He wings his way to the cold and icy regions of the north, to see if there is not some phosphorus fabric, from which proceeds that light which so oft illumines the northern sky; striking terror to the ignorant and superstitious. He finds naught but mountains of ice sunk deep beneath the briny surface of the sea, and rising high in the atmosphere above. Satisfied with his discoveries in the north he returns to the spicy groves of the south, where the earth's surface is continually decked with foliage and flower; where the forest trees wave with perpetual and living green, and the spontaneous productions of the soil yield sufficient to satisfy his daily wants.

Being still intent upon new discoveries, he takes his microscopic glass, the powers of which swell into an uncommon size all objects placed before it, and what is his astonishment! He beholds in the flower, and even the sands of the sea, a new order of living creatures. The crystal streams—the juice of the grape—the sparkling wine, he discovers to be full of life, and teeming with myriads of sporting objects. Though wonder and amazement fills his mind, he stops not here. He becomes a Herschel—builds a telescope—wings his way into the wilds of ether, and takes a near survey of all the planetary orbs. He begins with the sun—discovers his magnitude and motion—his lordly throne erected in the centre of a mighty empire, controlling a multitude of worlds with his power, and keeping them in motion with as much care, as doth the wind some suspended leaf upon the towering oak. So follow him: further on you will find him bounding from system to system, from centre to centre, from universe to universe, through the immeasurable regions of space, in search of the great centre of the whole—the throne—the power and Omnipotence of the incomprehensible Jehovah.

But here he seeks in vain. He discovers his inability to the task. He sinks back again into himself, and ask the simple, yet unanswerable question "What is man?" Is he not the creature of a day—a child of circumstances—yet destined to eternal progression? One thing he learns; which is that God is great, good and wise, even beyond thought, or imagination. Sustaining all, preserving all, protecting all, providing for, and keeping all, for his own glory, and the ultimate happiness of the whole. Therefore trust in him and be happy O man, whoever thou art! for he is thy friend in the day of adversity, and thy help in time of need. E. B. WHEELLOCK.

LET US GO HOME.

As there is peace and comfort to him who is provided with a home around his father's hearth, and who loves its regulations and restrictions, so there is joy to him who loves to dwell in his heavenly Father's spiritual house. Our kind Father in heaven has revealed himself to us, and given us a religion. He has promised that if we believe and obey it, we shall find peace. There are two ways, then, in which we may wander from the house of our Father. Both in our belief and in our conduct we may leave our plentiful home; and in both cases these wanderings will be productive of misery. That produced directly by an erroneous faith will be different from that produced by evil works. Each has its respective effects. One remedy, and one only, exists for all these evils; and that is, to return to our Father's house. Have we wandered upon the barren and cheerless wastes of skepticism? Have we left the hopes of immortality bequeathed us by our heavenly Father when we first became conscious of existence? Have we squandered them away in idle speculation, in vicious company, in rioting and excess? Are we feeding, or rather starving, on the husks which swine do eat! cherishing no hopes of a better destiny after death has set his seal on us, than to perish like them? viewing all beyond the grave as one dark void? Oh! let us go home!—home to our Father's house, where there is bread to spare, while we perish with hunger. Our minds can never subsist on such food as this. They will famish, faint and die. Our Creator has given our spirits as natural and ardent a longing for immortality as he has our corporeal frame for the sustenance which supports animal life. And we may as well expect the one to thrive on husks, as the other to find peace when this hope is destroyed. Let us hasten, then, to the well stored mansions of our Father, where we shall be welcomed with a feast which will make our souls glad.

Are we lost on the scorching deserts of Partialism? Believing that the soul is destined to immortality, can we see nothing beyond the confines of the tomb but one broad, boundless abyss of despair and death! Can we hear nothing but the wails and groans of immortal spirits—children of our Father—writhing in agony and cursing the author of their existence? Oh! these are husks indeed!—husks which the most cruel monster would not give even to swine. “Rather give me the atheist's faith, and let me sleep the long unbroken slumber which knows no waking.” Let us fly from so cruel a faith! Let us hasten to our Father's house! That Father will receive us—will make a feast for us—even if our elder brethren be angry thereat. Let us not tarry on this accursed soil, when spiritual want, famine, pestilence, and death stalks spectre-like in our midst—where we would gladly feed on the husks which some do eat, and even these are denied us. Let us go home and be at peace. But if we imagine that we are our Father's house, by being believers in the paternal character of his government—if we have the glorious assurance that in heaven is prepared for us an unending series of joys, and not for us only, but for all our brethren, even then, if this is but a speculative belief, instead of a governing principle in our bosoms, we may be poor, lone wanderers, far from home, with want staring us in the face, while we are striving in vain to satisfy our craving appetites with husks. If we have forsaken the path of virtue—if we are not found among the godly and the truly pious—if charity has no place in our bosoms or influence on our conduct—if we have not that pure religion which consists in visiting the widow and the fatherless in their affliction, and keeping ourselves unspotted from the world; we are walking in the transgressors hard path—in the path to ruin. And what I say to one I say to all wanderers, go home to your Father's house, and fill yourselves with bread. ITHURIEL.

REMEMBER ME.

There can not be found in the vocabulary of the English language two words which convey so much meaning—which breathe in the true language of the heart such pathetic tenderness—which call to memory so many recollections of the past—so fraught with associations connected with days gone by, as the simple yet powerfully persuasive words, “Remember me.” A gift, the token of reciprocated friendship; how often it is bedewed with tears, as the image and affection of the giver are called to memory. How fraught with interest is the memento of early attachment—the gift of a departed relative or companion, in whose character was reflected the moral image of Christian perfection—whose every act was characterized by the purest benevolence and active philanthropy. Though the ashes of the departed one lies slumbering beneath the green sod of the valley, and his spirit has winged its flight to the God who gave it, and is now participating in the pleasures of another sphere, he still speaks through the medium of the little token, “Remember me.”

God, in all his works, admonishes his children to remember “the high and lofty One that inhab-iteth eternity,” who regulates all things for the promotion of his own glory and the ultimate good of his offspring. He speaks to us through the medium of his works, to remember him at all times and under all circumstances. Has the cold blast of adversity unexpectedly thwarted our budding hopes, and withered our blooming expectations? Let us remember him who alone can heal the wound. Do we sit under the radiant smile of prosperity, enjoying the richest blessings which time can impart? Let us remember God as the giver. Has the fell swoop of death carried to the cold chambers of the tomb those with whom we were connected by the strongest ties of friendship? Let us remember God, whose ways are as high above those of man, as the heavens are above the earth, that it was him who gave and him alone who can take away.

When we look upon the gift of an absent one, what a flood of little incidents hasten into the mind—what a mighty rushing together of disconnected thoughts! God has surrounded us with tokens ever visible, showing forth his existence and character; yet how many can look upon them without being affected by their beauty and sublimity—without losing for a moment the powers of conception, or elevating their feelings and sensibilities, to give scope to the excursions of fancy. Yea! how very many there are who can look upon the budding gaiety of spring without experiencing sensations impressive or cheerful—who can behold the fading glories of autumn, without being softened into solemn musings—who can look upon the physical beauty and magnificence of external nature, without being animated with a just conception of the existence of their great Author, who has inscribed, in legible characters on every feature of his works the impressive words, “REMEMBER ME.” JULIO.

A SECRET FOR THE YOUNG.

When you detect any one in a falsehood, or a deceitful trick, you despise him from your heart; and when any one is bold enough to confess the truth, you admire him. Had you been present you would have thought nobly of George Washington when he confessed the following fault to his father. George had got a new hatchet, and was busily employed in trying it and his powers upon all sticks and trees around. Among the rest, he tried it upon a pear tree, which he hacked until it was completely ruined. His father soon after finding his tree so abused, came into the house to inquire who had done it. George was afraid, and much tempted to deny that he knew any thing about it. But he thought it noblest to tell the truth, and so he said, “Father, I can not tell a lie. I did it with my new hatchet.” His father clasped him in his arms, and said he would rather have all his trees destroyed than have his boy a liar. Now would you like to do always just as Washington did then? You doubtless would. Well, then, the secret of being able to do so is this: Yield not the very first time you are tempted to tell a lie; and you will more easily overcome the next temptation; and your power will increase every time you resist the temptation. #### GOD'S FIRST TEMPLE.

BY J. H. MASON.

Behold you proud city, where pomp and show vie with each other, to out do in beauty—where noise, and tumult, and commotion, fill the air with discordant and unmeaning sounds! In that proud mart, with holy fire, the Christian rears his temple high, to worship God. As if the immortal mind required the towering wall, the arching roof, the lofty dome and climbing spire, wherein to bow an humble worshipper. As if the organ's swelling notes, from wall to wall reverberate, must needs be used to wake the soul to heavenly scenes. Yon lofty spreading wood—where the wild bird's lofty songs ascend in grateful melody to heaven; where the squirrel with antic gesture springs, and the timid hare, with love delighted bound, skips across the woodland scene—there was the red man's temple. No sycophant was there, with hollow voice and heart, the praise of God in mockery to sound; nor organ's tones the swelling anthem raised. No, he listened to God's own music! The sweet birds carolled the songs of praise, and the deep-toned thunder answered, I am nature's mighty sounding bass. Each tree, and shrub, and plant, and flower, a preacher stood, by God ordained. And even the mighty cataract, with thundering voice proclaimed, “The mighty Maker reigns.”

BE CONSISTENT.

It seems to me that there should be a consistency in matters of opinion and practice. Men are not generally very fond of being glaringly inconsistent in the affairs of life. They prefer to maintain some resemblance between their pretensions and their practices. It is much more agreeable to conscience, and certainly more acceptable to community. I have some times puzzled my brain with calculations on the condition of society were it to adopt, as a universal rule of conduct, the same principle which is sometimes adopted in community. Lest the reader should wish, some time or other, to make the same interesting calculation, and fail by not knowing the rule, permit me to inform him. I can tell him, however, that the calculation is interesting only in its beginning; for after having progressed a little ways into the problem, product multiplies upon product so rapidly that the whole assumes rather a serious aspect. The rule to which I allude is the same as that by which the “blind guides,” mentioned in a certain book, elbowed their way through the world with so many followers at their heels. It is called—“straining out a gnat, and swallowing a camel”—and the “how to prove it” is, to believe you ought to be the best man in the world, and act like the worst.

Following up this rule, what a pretty imaginary community have we! Men looking one way with the spiritual eye, and another with the natural, and running still another with the feet. Preaching up that honesty is the best policy, and robbing the widow and the fatherless to swell a Sunday contribution with. Professing charity, and dealing in denunciations. Professing meekness, and overrunning with vanity. Mechanics promising the best of work and giving none but the poorest, or promising to go to a dozen jobs for as many different individuals, at the same time. Lawyers pledged to serve the interests of a client, and pocketing three times the amount in dispute. Doctors, fearing the very medicine they recommend to a patient. Preachers, like guide boards, pointing out the way but never going themselves. Merchants advertising the best and cheapest goods in town, and selling none but the worst and dearest. Patriots, praising up their governor in the abstract, and in the detail making him out to be a devil transformed into an angel of light to hide his deformity. Politicians throwing mud balls at each other, each making himself contemptible, in his anxiety lest the others should not appear more so. Editors—a—hem—talking about poverty, and living six weeks without a dun!

Now I would not say that this is the real condition of society. I merely say that some men—I will say some Christians—are so inconsistent in their notions and conduct, that if they were to be followed universally, the above would be precisely the state in which community would find itself.

Thus; the Calvinist acknowledges that the supreme

Ruler fixed all things and events by an unalterable decree, and yet teaches men that he would be glad to rob malignant justice of some of its trophies, by saving more than God intended for salvation. The Arminian is willing to die for the salvation of those whom he believes God is willing should be damned if they choose. Both admit that the Governor of the universe is good, but ascribe to him traits which would more than damn themselves, if such a thing were possible. Both admit that the fear of hell is the only safe restraint against the commission of vice, and yet, living under this fear, they contend that every day's transgression would damn them endlessly if justice was done then.

Now suppose that Christians should all adopt this rule of straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel, what would be the result? Why, similar to what we have described above. Partialists would either burn heretics because God loves them, or love them because God will burn them. They would practice persecution because God is good unto all. They would lie, steal, and swear, because there was no personal devil to do it for them. They would cut their throats in cool blood, because there was no fear of hell before their eyes to drive them to insanity. Universalists, too, would pretend that "God is love," and never love him. They would confess him worthy of all homage, but never worship him. They would disbelieve in cursing, yet damn their neighbors. They would acknowledge the universal brotherhood, yet trouble community with their dissensions and bickerings. They would own themselves under the most pressing obligations to God and men, yet trample them under foot. In fine, to them, Universalism would be the warmest and most glorious theme imaginable on paper, but the coldest in their hearts!

How shall we prevent such a universal dilemma as this? I answer, be consistent. Indulge in no notions but such as are consistent with the best of actions; and suffer no conduct but such as is in agreement with the most exalted faith; and let both go together.

REV. M. H. SMITH.

When we stated, about a month ago, that this gentleman had embraced Partialism, and commenced putting down Universalism, we supposed that was about the last time we should feel called on to devote an article to any further notice of him and his doings. But it appears that Universalism "won't stay" renounced. He has again renounced his renunciation! In other words—after renouncing Universalism for the second time—after being examined by "Orthodox" physicians and declared to be of sound mind—after being duly examined by a council of Partialist clergymen, and his "experience" and "conversion" declared "genuine," and his "faith," "Orthodox"—after all this, and much more—the Rev. M. H. Smith comes out and declares that he has, all this time, been laboring under mental derangement and confusion—that his experience and conversion are but the unconscious ravings of a disordered mind—and that he hardly knows what he has been doing and saying during his late renunciation of, and attacks on Universalism. He has made a public statement and humble confession of his weakness, in Salem, Mass., where he had been the Pastor of a Universalist society. The Partialist clergy have proved their infallibility with a vengeance, in spiritually discerning spiritual things, when they took the workings of insanity to be a genuine experience and conversion!

But, seriously—this insanity of Mr. Smith's is a queer thing—out of the general order of mental diseases—and is a hard matter for many to believe. Yet it may be that he was insane. We can only agree with Br. Whittemore, that if he was not insane, he is morally unfit to be in the ministry—and if he was, his mental aberrations, (so difficult to be distinguished from a genuine "Orthodox" experience and conversion, even by the best judges!) certainly disqualify him for that eminently difficult and responsible station. We hope—we sincerely desire that he may find some other suitable and pleasant employment, where his talents may secure success and be usefully engaged, that we may be no more troubled in recording his conversions and reconversions. One only lesson have we learned from this event, to pay us for our labor—i. e., "Orthodoxy" and insanity are so much alike, that the best judges of both diseases can not tell them apart! God grant, then, that the whole world, as well as this afflicted man, may speedily come to their senses, by embracing "the truth as it is in Jesus."

FOOD AND WINE.

Food and wine are used in the Scriptures as figures of truth—of truth, of which the world shall eat and drink. One passage alone will decide these positions. "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees; of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it." Isa. xxv: 6-8. Here is a feast of food and drink prepared for "all people," for "all nations" when "all faces," shall be animated with a smile of joy and the pleasures of salvation. That I have applied this passage correctly, is clear, from the fact, that when Paul was discoursing about the resurrection and the period when this mortal shall put on immortality, he directly quotes from it, and remarks, "then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory!" 1 Cor. xv: 54.

On earth people are degraded by the "rebuke" of sin—the "veil" of imperfect human nature is upon all men, and the "face of the covering" of error hides multitudes of souls—while tears are on all faces, when the wine of death is handed round—an idea, terrifically set forth in the words of an English poet, Barry Cornwall.

"King death was a rare old fellow—
He sat where no sun could shine,
And stretched out his hand so yellow,
With a glass of his coal-black wine.
Hurrah! for the coal-black wine!
There came to him many a maiden
Whose eyes had forgot to shine,
And widows with grief o'erladen,
For a glass of his sleepy wine;
Hurrah! for the rare old fellow,
Who laughed till his eyes dropp'd brine,
As he stretched out his hand so yellow,
And pledged them in death's dark wine."

But the time is coming when "death shall be swallowed up in victory"—when "all people" and "all nations," shall partake of the feast of truth and salvation, shall have no rebuke of sin, no veil of error, no tears of anguish, no fears of death; but shall have great joy in their redemption from all evil, and by their being "created anew in Christ Jesus," to sit at the feast and wine of truth.

To finish the argument, that all will partake of the feast and wine of truth, the following passage is confidently cited. "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater: So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." Isa. lv: 10, 11. Just so sure as rain and snow fall on the earth to make it fertile, giving seed to the sower and bread to the eater, and return not again to the atmosphere without having accomplished that object, so the word of God shall not return to him until its mission shall be fulfilled. And, as Paul affirmed that it is the will, pleasure, and purpose of the Almighty, to gather together in one all things in Christ, so that gathering will be accomplished, and the "times of the restitution of all things" brought about.

MEMOIR OF REV. S. W. FULLER.

We acknowledge ourselves much indebted to Br. J. H. Gihon, and Co., the publishers, for a copy of this interesting work. The portrait is not only an excellent likeness of our deceased brother, but is also beautifully engraved, and is worth nearly the price of the work. The memoir is well written, and highly interesting; and the selection of papers from Br. Fuller's manuscripts, will add to his well-earned credit as a writer. There are two subjects incidentally alluded to by Br. A. Moore, in the Memoir, which I wish to notice as the only exceptions, brief as they are, I could find in reading the Memoir.

The censure of the New-York State Convention, on page 41, is unjust and uncalled for—besides implying, what is not true, that the giving of fellowship to Br. Fuller was a departure from previous usage, and from present rules. Br. F. had preached more than a year, which, in this state, is longer than is generally required, before fellowship is granted. The concluding part of the paragraph is all mystery to me—I can not understand it, and therefore exempt it from censure, except so far as it seems to imply censure on the Convention for doing what was right, usual and proper.

The second remark is on page 82—"And we may incidentally remark; that if the first and second chapters of Luke are not true, Christianity may well be considered a fable! If Jesus Christ was no more than a descendant of Adam, of the earth, earthy, our preaching is vain, and our faith is also vain." I much regret that Br. M. should introduce such a sweeping remark against the views of many of his brethren—a remark uncalled for by the subject of his labor, and very illogical. For, suppose it should be most conclusively proved that the first and second chapters of Luke had been added in the year 100, by a certain forger of the Scriptures; would that prove that the book, to which were added those chapters, was a forgery—a fable? No—no more than the additions made in italic by the translators, prove that all the rest of the Bible was added by them.

So, also, in regard to the nature of Jesus. If it can be shown that Jesus was the natural descendant of Adam, David and Joseph, whom God selected to be his messenger, and exalted to be the Messiah; and that that "descendant of Adam" faithfully delivered the message God gave him, my faith in that message is no more vain than if it had been delivered by "the very and eternal God," "the Son," of whom Trinitarians speak—nor would my preaching of that message be vain. Truth is truth, by whomsoever, or whatsoever communicated; and though Br. M. may consider belief in the strict humanity of Jesus, a great error, unsupported and denied, even, by Holy Writ, yet I can see neither sound logic nor Christian charity in the remark he has made, and in travelling out of his way to make it, as he has done above. There are infidels enough in the world, without striving to swell the ranks by persuading those believers who differ from us, that they are infidels; or by making others believe that our brethren in the faith, are, in reality, but infidels. And these harsh censures for differences of opinion, will never convince one of his error, or tend to cultivate that unity of spirit which only can keep our denomination united in the bonds of peace.

These remarks are made in good will, and with the hope that nothing but the haste in which the Memoir was written, led Br. Moore to make these two remarks here objected to.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Rural Evangelist has utterly mistaken my meaning, or I can not understand his—I will therefore delay his correction and the Supplement, till I can find leisure to write to him in full. I suspect that we use the same terms with widely different meanings.

Br. D. A.'s questions about the encharist could not be answered without occupying more time and room in our paper, (supposing he would desire to reply,) than I can spare, or many of our readers would deem profitable. I have already published my views on the subject, some years ago—if he merely wants information, he can find it there. Besides, his questions are totally irrelevant, based on a misconception of my views.

For some weeks past I have devoted all the time I could, to preparing and correcting the copy for the Register—it will occupy a little more time yet. I can not confine myself to the writing desk as formerly, without injury to my health. I must therefore neglect some things, in order to accomplish that which is most necessary. This will explain to some why I have not attended to their letters, communications and requests.

A. B. G.

"WALNUT HILL EVANGELICAL SEMINARY."—Such, the Trumpet informs us, is the title of the contemplated Theological Seminary, to be erected by our brethren in Massachusetts. "What's in a name?" Not much, I confess; but if I was as friendly to such a project as I am not, I would not relish the "Walnut" part of the title. However, tastes differ, and as our friends do the paying and working, they have a perfect right to gratify theirs. I would nevertheless suggest a title for their annual catalogue of students—"List of Evangelical Walnuts, which Partialists may crack if they can; together with the terms and modes of culture pursued in producing them in the Walnut Hill Evangelical Seminary."

Would it not be well for Partialists to start an opposition Seminary, entitled "Hammer and Lapstone, (or Nutcracker's) Orthodox Seminary?"

CORRECTION.

The newspapers are circulating an article recording Mr. Whittaker's renunciation, in which they state that he was the oldest preacher of our order in the city. He was in New-York but two years—his society is but a new society—so that this statement is false.

It is amusing to see with what avidity and display this renunciation, and that of Mr. M. H. Smith, are noticed in the papers. And well they may be—for it's a rare thing to find a case of the kind. But why not notice changes the other way? Will these papers inform their readers that Mr. Smith has renounced back again?—Will they notice the dozen or more of Partialist clergyman who have renounced Partialism and embraced Universalism within the last twelve months?

COLLECTIONS.

I expect to attend the Conference in Oxford, and the Chenango Association in South Bainbridge, (see Religious Notices.) We are much in want of cash, and I hope then and there to meet some of our agents and friends from various places in that section. May we not urge on their particular attention between this and that time, the importance of settling up, as far as possible, all the accounts belonging to G. and H., and making collections on the present volume? Let all subscribers yet indebted, send the amount by some neighbor who is to attend.

A. B. G.

ASSOCIATIONS.—The Fall Associations and the General Convention will afford opportunities for sending money to us, or to some of our agents for us, by private conveyance. Will our agents please exert themselves between this time and such an opportunity, to collect all they can for us, and send it? See remarks above, headed collections. Those not having such an opportunity, had better send earlier, by mail.

A. B. G.

HOSEA BALLOU.—Our friends in this vicinity will be glad to hear that this veteran soldier of the cross will preach in this city by the second Sunday in September, (13th.)

Our readers are requested to remember the Sunday appointments given this week—particularly those made by our eastern brethren—and be prepared for them. This request is made lest the notices may not gain another insertion.

WHITTAKER'S RENUNCIATION.

Br. Price has published an extra containing 1st, a sermon preached by Rev. W. Whittaker before his renunciation of Universalism; 2d, the sermon containing his reasons (?) for renouncing Universalism; and 3d, a statement of all the facts and circumstances which led to and attended the renunciation. The extra is afforded at 3 cents single—10 copies for 25 cents, and 50 copies for one dollar. We commend it to the public, and hope our friends in particular will purchase and circulate it widely, that all may know what Universalism has gained and Partialism lost, by this renunciation—for in Paddy's phraseology, our opposers have "gained a loss."

THE LONELY TREE.

BY MRS. ADDY.

Thou lonely tree, that, on the mountain standing,
Frownest in grandeur on the vale below,
In stern magnificence our awe commanding—
No soothing fellowship is thine to know!
Each wild flower that this tranquil vale embosoms
Seems in its social ties more blest than thee;
We walk among them, and we cull their blossoms
But shun thy dizzy height—thou lonely tree!

In life, I often thus sad homage render
To some fine mind removed from groveling ken,
Standing aloft in solitary splendor,
Beyond the reach or touch of common men:
The world inclines to those who crave protection,
Loving the suppliant voice and bended knee;
But oh, if Genius ever seeks affection,
It shares a fate like thine—thou lonely tree!

Stay! from a cloud a sunbeam brightly darting,
Even while I speak, invests thy boughs with light,
No radiance to the lowly vale imparting,
But resting long on thy majestic height!
O, to thy dwelling place a charm is given,
Though unaccompanied by thy kind it be!
Thou hast a brilliant messenger from heaven
To cheer thy solitude—thou lonely tree!

When I lament the gloomy elevation
That Talent holds, this scene may I recall,
And think that beams of holy inspiration
Perchance oft visit one unwooded by all;
Cold, feeble minds may lesser boons inherit,
But Heaven's peculiar communings may be Reserved to gladden the ethereal spirit,
That upward towers like thee, O lonely tree!

A STORY OF LAKE ERIE.

An Indian woman and her child, who was about five years old, were travelling along the beach to a camp a few miles distant. The boy observed some wild grapes growing upon the bank, and expressed such a desire to obtain them, that his mother, seeing a ravine at a little distance, by which she could gain the edge of the precipice, resolved to gratify him.—Having desired him to remain where he was, she ascended the steep, and was allured farther into the wood than she at first intended.—In the mean time the wind began to blow vehemently, but the boy wandered carelessly along the beach seeking for shells, till the rapid rise of the water rendered it impossible for him to return to the spot where he had been left by his mother. He immediately began to cry aloud, and she, being on her return, heard him, but instead of descending the ravine, hastened to the edge of the precipice, from the bottom of which the noise seemed to proceed. On looking down, she beheld her son struggling with the waves, and vainly endeavoring to climb up the bank, which was fifty feet perpendicular height, and very slippery. There being no possibility of rendering him any assistance, she was on the point of throwing herself down the steep, when she saw him catch hold of a tree that had fallen into the lake, and mount one of its projecting branches. He sat astride upon this, almost beyond the reach of the surges, while she continued watching him almost in an agony of grief, hesitating whether she should endeavor to find her way to the camp and procure assistance, or remain near her boy. However, evening was about to close, and as she could not proceed through the woods in the dark, she resolved at least to wait until the moon rose. She sat on the top of the precipice a whole hour, and during that time occasionally ascertained that her son was alive, by hearing his cries amidst the roaring of the waves; but when the moon appeared he was not to be seen. She now felt convinced that he was drowned, and giving way to utter despair, threw herself on the turf. Presently she heard a feeble voice cry, (in Indian) "Mamma, I'm here, come and help me." She started up, and saw her boy scrambling up the edge of the bank. She sprang forward to catch his hand, but the ground by which he held giving way, he was precipitated into the lake, and perished among the rushing billows!

DIALOGUE.

"Your doctrine is a base doctrine," said a Methodist to a Universalist. "Sooner than believe it I would cut off my right hand."

Universalist. I am not ashamed of my faith; it gives me joy in believing.

M. Neither am I ashamed of my faith.

U. You are ashamed of it, and I will prove it.

M. You cannot.

U. Pray what is your faith?

M. My faith; I believe the righteous will be happy forever, and the wicked will be made endlessly miserable?

U. Do you not hope they will be endlessly miserable?

M. I hope they will be endlessly miserable; do you think me a brute.

U. I believe that all men will be endlessly happy; and I not only hope and wish them to be so, but rejoice in the knowledge that they will be so; but you think that none but a brute can wish or hope the endless misery of a part of mankind, and you, notwithstanding, believe they will be miserable, and are ashamed even to acknowledge, that you hope or wish your doctrine to be true, but at the same time believe it; you, therefore, are ashamed of your faith; and confess, that none but a brute can rejoice in it!!!

We recommend the perusal of the above to all believers in the endless misery of their neighbors. If it does them no good, we think it can not hurt them.—N. H. Examiner.

"GOLD AS A MEDICINE"—The medical properties of gold have lately occupied the attention of a celebrated chemist who declares it as his opinion that this metal reduced to an impalpable powder, possesses in a very high degree the property of restoring vigor, strength, and of increasing the activity of the organs of digestion and nourishment. We should like to line our pockets before we take it inwardly in very large doses.

I'M READY FOR EITHER.—James Knowles, of Point Judith, in the last war, lived in an exposed situation, near the ocean, and never went to bed without having his gun well charged by his side. One night there was a violent thunder gust which shook the house to its foundation.

"Husband, husband," screamed the wife "get up, the British have landed or the day of judgment has come, and I do not know which."

"By gosh," said Knowles, springing up, and seizing his gun, "I'm ready for either."—Burlington Sentinel.

DEATHS.

In Angelica, April 18th, OLIVE, daughter of Henry and Lovicy Lewis, aged 16 years, 7 months and 16 days. The deceased was truly an amiable and interesting young person. Funeral on Sunday 19th, in the Methodist meeting house. Sermon by Br. I. B. Sharp. In Newark, on the 4th of August, ELIZABETH, eldest daughter of Kneeland and Caroline Townsend, in the 13th year of her age. She was most strongly endeared to those who were most intimately acquainted with her. Her funeral was attended on the 6th, by Br. Ackley, and a very large number of sympathizing friends of all denominations listened to the communication of our Br., and followed her remains to the grave.

In Paines Hollow, on Monday, July 13th, FLAVIL C. son of Lemuel and Lurena Swift, in the 16th year of his age. The funeral was attended on the 15th, and a discourse delivered by the writer, founded on Jeremiah 9th, 21st. This is the fourth child which Br. and sister Swift have been called to part with in the space of about one year. May the hope of meeting them again in the morning of the resurrection, where pain and sorrow will never come, sustain them under their afflictions and through the short journey of life.

J. D. HICKS

In Salisbury Centre, July 22d, of consumption, STEPHEN PRATT, aged 66 years. Br. Pratt has for many years been a firm believer in the doctrine of the restitution, and adorned his profession by a virtuous life. He bore his last affliction with fortitude, patience, and resignation, holding fast his confidence unto the end, and thus adding one more to the long list of evidences that Universalism is good to die by. Br. Pratt has left a large circle of relatives who a cerely feel and lament their loss, especially his widowed companion. May the consolations of the Gospel be her support, and that of the relatives in general. The funeral was attended on the 24th, in the Centre Meeting house, and a discourse delivered by the writer to a large and attentive congregation from Zechariah 1st, 5th, "Your fathers where are they, and the prophets they live forever?"

J. D. HICKS.

In Richmond, March 4th, JOHN C. ADAMS, son of Alonzo and Lorena Adams, aged 10 years.

By this dispensation the hearts of very affectionate parents are severely pained. They looked forward full of expectation to the time when their son should mingle in society as a useful citizen. But God saw fit to call him home, he will surely take care of him, and in proper time he will be our guide to the same celestial mansion, where parting will be no more.

In Huntington, L. I., on the 31st ult., Mrs. REBECCA PRICE, of New-York, wife of P. Price, Esq. publisher of this paper, in the 43d year of her age.

She had been suffering from a disease resembling the Bronchitis for nearly a year, and had been confined for a great part of the time. She bore her sickness with singular patience, and exhibited a great degree of resignation to the allotments of her God. She murmured not, nor complained, but submitted to him, who doeth all things well, with a confidence which suffering and death could not shake—a confidence founded on the conviction, deep wrought in her heart that God is infinitely good and chastens and afflicts us only, for our profit.

A great change had been wrought in Mrs. Price's faith and feelings within the last few years. She had come to know and love God through Jesus Christ, and to trust unreservedly in his grace manifested in the Gospel. She believed without misgivings in the final gathering of the whole human race into the fold of the blessed Savior, and found in believing, "the peace of God which passeth all understanding." She was well aware of her situation, and had been waiting for several days previous to her decease for her hour of departure to come. A few minutes before she closed her eyes in death she clasped her hands in prayer, and said—"Blessed Saviour come quickly." These were her last words, and she soon gave back her spirit to her God.

She has left behind her to mourn their loss, a husband, who was ardently attached, a mother who has watched over her and ministered to her with the greatest tenderness during her whole sickness, a brother and sister deeply interested in her welfare, and two sons, who are keenly sensible that they are to share in a mother's love and solicitude no more. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered by the writer to the family and a large concourse of friends, who were brought on the occasion on Sunday afternoon last, at Norwalk, Ct. where the body had been borne to be interred beside the remains of four children buried there. May the grace of God sanctify this dispensation to the spiritual good of all concerned.

In New Marlborough, Mass., on the 17th of June, EMILY, wife of Col. Charles D. Palmer, aged 34 years, leaving a son aged nine years and an infant daughter only a few days old.

Mrs. Palmer was loved as extensively as she was known, and her death will be truly mourned by her acquaintance.—To her afflicted husband the loss is irreparable, and he shows that he feels it to be so. Seldom have we been called to witness deeper grief. The consolations of the Gospel were presented to the mourners and to a large congregation of friends and neighbors, by the writer of this obituary, in the Presbyterian Church, which was kindly granted for the occasion.

Also on the 21st of June, four days only after the death of his mother, WILLIAM W., son of the above Col. C. Palmer, aged 9 years. Thus has a second blow been inflicted on that heart which was bleeding with its recent bereavement. May he who in wisdom has dealt the blow, in mercy heal the wound. The services on this latter occasion were attended by Br. A. B. Manley.

ORIGINAL SERMON

Delivered at the funeral of Mrs. Salinda, wife of Mr. Nathan Brainard, of Exeter, Dec. 19th, 1839.

BY REV. J. POTTER.

[Published by request.]

"And Agag said, Surely the bitterness of death is past,"
1 Sam. xv: 32.

Agag was king of the Amalekites, and they were the enemies of Israel from their exodus from Egypt to the promised land, and still maintained the same unabated hostility, until the event of which our text is a part. But notwithstanding the Israelites were frequently annoyed by them in the wilderness, and also in the land of Canaan, yet God stood by Israel against all her enemies, and they were enabled quietly to possess the inheritance, promised to their fathers. Notwithstanding the many tokens of Divine protection exhibited to the children of Israel in the wilderness, at the Red sea, and in the land of Canaan by driving out the heathen, of which the Amalekites were witnesses, yet they in defiance of the majesty of Heaven, ceased not their hostility to the people of God.

But the time of retribution at length arrived. The Lord, by Samuel the prophet, directed Saul king of Israel, to make a final end of the Amalekites, and "utterly destroy all that they" had; to "spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass." But Saul disobeyed the strict injunctions of the Lord; for the people suggested to him to "spare the best of the sheep and oxen for a sacrifice unto the Lord," to which Saul yielded. He also "took Agag king of the Amalekites alive, and destroyed the rest of the people with the sword."

The above case of Saul and the Amalekites, furnishes a mirror before which, should thousands stand, they would behold a picture which would cause paleness and trembling—it furnishes a specimen of the policy of thousands, both in ancient and modern times, who will perform such parts of the divine requirements as shall be in accordance with their preconceived opinions, or which are in accordance with the popular usages of society, and neglect that which is most essential; and as an atonement for neglected duty, depend on a donation, a vain show. But the above case is proof positive that nothing short of unreserved obedience will satisfy the divine requirements—the whole heart's affections must be surrendered to God, which alone will secure the full tide of joy, and reconciliation to God, and prepare us for the reception of what doctrine may be clearly revealed in the record of God.

But to finish our views of the context. Samuel, ever faithful to the command of God, and regardless of popular opinion, said, "bring ye hither to me, Agag, king of the Amalekites." And Agag came unto him delicately. And Agag said, surely the bitterness of death is past. And Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal.

The love of life, incorporated as it is, into man's existence, sharpens the bitterness of death; and to the benighted pagan, and the unbelieving of every clime, death has reigned the king of terrors. Who can compute the amount of misery and anguish which death has produced in its relentless sway! The long and rayless night of Paganism, which has been permitted to hold unbroken dominion over a portion of the world, has caused the bereaved to bow over the tombs of departed friends with deep and thrilling solicitude for the fate which awaited them in the future. The parent has gazed upon the broad heavens, with deep supplication and exclaimed, Shall my child live again? Is there a life beyond the grave? My kindred where are they? But the grave still holds its unbroken silence—not a ray of light is shed upon its darkness and silence, from that source.

Notwithstanding Agag was a pagan, yet in his case a train of circumstances mitigated the bitterness of death. Witnessing the destruction of his nation, and himself in captivity with nothing before him but disappointed hopes, he preferred death rather than to live with shame, which produced the sentiment of the text, "Surely the bitterness of death is past." There are few, indeed, who go down to the grave destitute of the Christian's hope, as Agag did. The case of Napoleon Bonaparte may be an instance. After he had wasted Europe, and made the thrones of monarchs tremble, he found that power became weakness; and in his habitation in the midst of the seas, with no hope for the future, and with nought but the sting of disappointed ambition, he might, with Agag, prefer death as a lesser evil.

When we contemplate man as a compound being, with wants in common with those of the animal kingdom, we inquire why is this strong love of existence? Come these strong desires from the earth, or the earthly man? That which is of the earth, the bounties of earth are capable of satisfying. But man is a moral being made in the image of God, consequently nothing short of a revelation from, and communion with his heavenly Father, can ever satisfy that heavenly image in man, which is his moral nature. Religion, therefore, is to man's moral nature what bread is to the body. No marvel then that man has a strong desire for future life, a sighing for immortality. It goes in proof of the fact, that man is a religious being. In every clime, and under every mould and cast of education, the image of God in man, hungers for future life, and for a knowledge of the divine character and will.

In the fulness of time, the Father sent into the world the promised seed—the brightness of the Father's glory—the image of the invisible God—the first begotten from the dead—the first born of every creature—who not only revealed God's character and perfections, but his will, which was, that he had given mankind eternal life in Christ Jesus, before the world began.

As the demand of man's moral nature was for life, "Jesus said I am the bread of life"—and again, "except ye eat the flesh of the son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." "The disciples when they heard this, said, this is a hard saying, who can hear it?" The Saviour therefore seeing the difficulty in which they were involved, said unto them, "It is the spirit that quickeneth: the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life."

By the above we perceive that the teachings of Christ were adapted to man's moral or spiritual wants, and are calculated to expand, elevate, and purify the heavenly principle in him, and enable him to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of the truth," until he shall arrive to the perfect stature of a man in Christ Jesus. So perfect were the teachings of Christ, that there was not one attribute of the Father, which was not clearly revealed in him, for in "him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." This he displayed in his love to sinners—healing diseases—casting out devils—comforting the mourning—preaching the Gospel unto the poor—and raising the dead. This constituted the moral or spiritual aliment—bread—which was imparted to man, by which he became partaker of the divine nature by faith, which alone could cause the bitterness of death to be past, and make him love God with all his heart, and thereby find perfect reconciliation.

From the nature of the revelation made to man in the Gospel, it is proved positively that man has a moral nature in the image of God; otherwise the revelation would not have produced any more effect on him, than heaven would, deposited in the sands of the sea shore. This may be made further evident, by the teachings of the Saviour, who said, the "kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." By the kingdom of heaven we are to understand the new covenant, or the Gospel, by which "life and immortality is brought to light," and by which we are taught that the heaven, and the lump, or the meal to be leavened, must possess kindred properties. As it is a conceded point, that leaven will only produce its natural effect on like properties, so with the spirit God in the new covenant, revealing future life. Hence saith the apostle, "the spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit [or moral nature] that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs: heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ." And Job says, "there is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth it understanding."

Do we need further evidence to establish the position, that man's moral nature partakes of the divine. We would summon to our aid all who have been regenerated by the spirit of God, and who have been made partakers of the divine nature by faith; whose expansive benevolence has extended to those that curse; in a word, to all, who have found the divine nature within, to rise and expand until forgiveness was extended to all the erring sons of humanity. Then and not till then, man finds his moral nature beating in unison with the divine—his sins are put away, and he finds it in his heart to love God with all his affections, and his fellow man as himself.

Under the influence of the kingdom of heaven within; being "quickened who before was dead in trespasses and sins, to a newness of life," and having his moral nature purified, can never be willing that any portion of his kindred should miss of the "grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men," or of that eternal life which was given us in "Christ Jesus before the world began?" To this, the answer would be, unqualifiedly, in the negative—surely, loving his neighbor as himself, he could but say—No!

With the mind thus imbued with the love of God, and the Gospel of his Son, man can find reconciliation to God, in that hope which embraces an intelligent universe in the pale of salvation—then can he pray in the spirit, and say, "thy will be done." His moral nature will then be satisfied, and in view of the dissolution of his earthly man by death, he can say, "surely the bitterness of death is past."

Contemplating the mutations, which are interwoven with, and thrown around all earthly comforts, and the present instance of mortality, which has summoned us to mingle our common sympathies with this bereaved family, and to perform the last rites to kindred nature, we are admonished that moral worth, nor kindred affection, as in the present instance, can plead an exemption, from the ravages of the fell destroyer. With what confidence, then, can we, point the living to the Gospel of Christ, as the only refuge from the storms of adversity—the only weapon that can disarm death of its sting, or the grave of its terrors. The earth can only minister to man's animal wants. Go to the chamber of death; view the man of wealth struggling with the king of terrors, and tender him the additional stores of India's rich treasures, or if a king, give him extended dominion, and he will spurn them from him as worthless dross, and will exclaim, Give me the pledge of an immortal life beyond the grave, give me the hope of the Gospel which is "sure and steadfast," and it is enough. My moral nature takes hold on life, the sure bread of the Gospel. When he can exclaim with the apostle, "for we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens"—then, and not till then, can he be reconciled to go hence and be here no more for ever.

Hence the conclusion, that the divine government has a perfect adaptation to man's nature, both physical and moral. A transgression of the law of God is a violation of the laws of man's nature, and will be sure to produce pain, as obedience will always give peace and reconciliation. It were vain to exhort man to contentment and reconciliation, while hunger preyed upon him, without administering the proper aliment—no substitute will suffice. So with the moral image of God in man—the world can never satisfy it.

With such results from the influence of the Gospel, with what assurance can we recommend the hope of the Gospel to our fellow man, under all the circumstances of life. It is of more importance than the universe, for as we have shown, put man in possession of all that earth can give, and there still remains a void which the hope of immortality alone can satisfy.

Like the anchor to the mariner, its true value is only known in the storm. And to the bereaved and mourning friends we may say, such were the saving influences of the Gospel of a world's salvation, in the trying hour of dissolving nature, that our departed friend was both ready and willing to go hence and be here no more. Is it not to you, that this Gospel now shines and triumphs? In this hour of adversity, when you are for the last time, gathering around the remains of a loved one—a wife and a mother—to perform the last offices to her remains, is it not the Gospel of a world's salvation which shines in its strength, so that by faith you can now look forward to the end of your hope which is the salvation of the soul; to that period when you will, through the power of the resurrection, be reunited with the ransomed of the Lord, when there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor mourning; when you shall join with the countless millions in triumphant song, saying, "O, death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!" A song which shall be chanted by "every creature which is in heaven, on earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them—saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him who sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." Amen.

JESUS PREACHING TO SINNERS.—No. I.

Jesus would not attempt to build up truth intermingled with error. He embraced every opportunity to trample the latter in the dust, that it might not impede the progress of truth. While he spake in accordance with the received opinions of the Jews, they lent him a willing ear, and praised him, saying, "Master, thou hast well said." But when he reproved them for their wickedness, and exposed the hollowness of their religious professions; telling them that with all their sanctity their fathers were bloody men, and they were a generation of vipers, they concluded that he was not the good master they had supposed him to be, but a man worthy of death. Yet Jesus pursued a uniform course whether the multitude applauded or mocked. He came to bear witness to the truth, and he was faithful to his mission. Had he forgot his duty, and sought out words wherewith to feast the morbid appetites of the self-righteous, we might now be sacrificing our bulls and goats, and looking for justification to the scarlet-clad priest. Or as Gentiles we might be immolating our friends and relatives—yea, even ourselves—to Moloch.

But truth was the shrine at which Jesus bowed. Will it please? Will it be popular? are inventions in the Christian church of a date long posterior to the time of Christ. Those who listened to him must hear the truth whether it flattered or condemned. For he would not perpetuate error, neither permit it to take root and send out its branches, for the purpose of increasing the number of his hearers. Those who wished to stumble along in the darkness of midnight might listen to the time serving Rabbies of Judea, who would tickle the ear and flatter the vanity of the pretendedly sanctimonious, while they wrapped their hearers, their subjects, and themselves in the fogs of mysticism. But those who drink in the words of the Nazarene must submit to the scorings of truth. He spake, and the heart was pricked. Condemnation was written on all that was evil, and iniquity whether of the high or low, found no favor in his eye. Approach him, and the light of noon-day shone into their bosoms, exposing their most secret thoughts—their blackest deeds. But the same light which revealed their errors and faults made plain the path of truth and righteousness. It was for this it was kindled.

A beautiful illustration of our Saviour's method of teaching is found in the fifteenth chapter of Luke. Here he reproves the self-righteous and arrogant in a manner uncommonly mild, even for him, yet so pointedly that none could mistake his meaning. The Publicans and sinners drew near to hear him. This was always seized upon as an objection by those who thought themselves the favorites of Heaven; and they now "murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them." Jesus, without appearing to notice their proud and scornful censure, spake to them the parable of the lost sheep. In this he reminded the murmurers that the shepherd was not willing to lose his sheep, nor any of them; but if even one from the flock wandered in the wilderness, he would not cease to search for it till he found it—that he would never leave it till he had brought it back to the fold. Thus, in figures, they were taught heavenly things. He then took up another parable—the woman with ten pieces of silver. When she had lost one, she made diligent search till she had found it, and then rejoiced. The cause of joy is worthy of remark in both cases. The shepherd called his neighbors to rejoice with him, because he had found his sheep; not to rejoice with the sheep, because it was found. The joy was on the part, and in behalf of the owner. So with the woman. So with the angels in heaven. It is also worthy our notice, that the owner's love for the property was not diminished, but rather increased by the loss of the property. Also that the property was not changed. The sheep did not become a goat, nor the silver, dross. The Pharisees were here told, as plainly as a parable could tell it, that those sinners, as much as they despised them, were God's property, and he would not lose them.

Then follows the beautiful parable of the prodigal son. To represent sinners as the property of God, came short of the reality. They were not so much his sheep, as his children. He prized them, sinners though they were, as we prize silver—nay, more highly—as parents prize their children. "A certain man had two sons," etc. To understand these parables we must keep constantly in mind, that they were spoken to those who thought themselves righteous and despised others; being always disposed to cavil at any doctrine different from their own; especially that which taught the sinner to look to God as his Father, called the inhabitants of the earth brethren, and the promulgators of which sinners drew near to hear. A knowledge of the customs and laws of the Jews of those days, is also necessary if we would comprehend the last parable in its details. A child might demand of his father a division of the property which belonged in common to the heirs, and the father could not refuse him his share or inheritance. It appears in this case that the elder son, (i. e. the righteous) remained with the father, but he had received his share of the estate: for we read, "He divided unto them his living." Were it other ways, and had the father made the feast from the elder son's inheritance, there would have been some show of reason for his anger. And the supposed case would not then have been a parallel, with the one which Jesus wished to illustrate, it would have failed in several particulars, one only of which I have time to mention; viz., The ground of complaint. No person, however holy in his own estimation, objects to the sinner being brought home and blessed on the supposition that the happiness thus conferred is to diminish his own joys. But the plea always is, "I have served thee and obeyed all thy commands, while this son of thine has wasted his substance with harlots." Or in a more modern phraseology, "I have been shut up in thy mansions and vineyards, and compelled to feed at thy plentiful board, (i. e. I have lived a holy life) by reason of my own desire, while he has been carousing and rejoicing in foreign lands with swine—i. e. has been a great sinner. We also notice that the elder son would not call the younger, "brother," but said contemptuously, "This son of thine." This is a remarkable trait in the self-righteous, wherever and whenever found. It is not every child of their Father that is worthy to receive the appellation, "brother," from them.

From the Universalist Expositor.

UNIVERSALISM AMONG THE RATIONALISTS OF GERMANY.

Rev. H. Ballou, 2d:

DEAR SIR—It is now nearly two years since I addressed a letter to Dr. K. A. Credner, professor of theology in the University of Giesen, Germany. I had known Dr. Credner as the author of an Introduction to the New Testament, and had been made farther acquainted with him through a German scholar, who was educated at Giesen, and with whom I have been for some years familiar in this city. My letter consisted chiefly in a very brief account of Universalists in the United States, and in inquiries respecting the existence of the Universalist faith in Germany, particularly among the Rationalists, with whom Dr. Credner sympathizes.

As my letter was carried out by a German friend who was to visit Giesen, and to spend several months in his father-land, I did not anticipate an answer till his return. This happened late in the autumn of 1839, when I was highly gratified by the receipt of a packet from Professor Credner, containing, among several other things, a very friendly and interesting letter, of which I here send you a translation for the Expositor, should it be deemed of general interest to your readers.

Yours, etc.

T. J. SAWYER.

Sec. of the Univ. Hist. Society.

New York, April 23, 1840.

Geisen, April 9th, 1839.

DEAR SIR—I avail myself of Mr. D—'s return to his new home, for the purpose of frankly and candidly answering your friendly letter of the 29th of June of the past year.

To come directly to the main subject,—you define Universalists, with whom you acknowledge yourself associated, as those who believe that all the human race shall ultimately be reconciled to God, and made holy and happy through the mediation of Jesus Christ. In this definition I find but one thing not altogether clear, viz., the meaning of the words through the mediation of Jesus Christ. If this be synonymous with through the gospel of, or through the doctrine of Jesus Christ, then you may reckon upon the assent of all judicious (vernünftigen) theologians in Germany, called by their opposers Rationalists and also Naturalists; and of such judicious theologians there are still many, thank God, in the Protestant Church of Germany, and even the ablest, and for theological science and culture those among the most worthy, acknowledge themselves their coadjutors, and freely proclaim their opinions from the pulpit and the chairs of the universities.

Not till during the reactions of the last twenty years has this theological direction (Richtung) become suspected and calumniated, while within purely scientific limits it has always maintained the superiority. As is commonly the case, opposers have left no means untied, be they what they might, for gaining the advantage, and the political course of affairs, the tone adopted in many courts, and the modern philosophy which perniciously wraps itself in the mantle of orthodoxy, while it undermines the deepest foundations of Christianity, have all contributed to their aid. One must therefore be very cautious of modern orthodoxy. It is but seldom that it appears in its pure and genuine shape; for it generally trims its sails to the wind, or veils itself in hollow forms. I am not surprised, therefore, that you have felt some scruples upon the shifting views of such a champion of orthodoxy.

There is some difficulty in giving a definition of the term Rationalist or Rationalism, owing to an abuse which has obtained in relation to this word. Those have been called Rationalists who, rejecting all extraordinary revelation, desired only a religion of pure reason, (Vernunft-Religion,) as well as those who wished to explain everything in the Holy Scriptures in a natural way, and to discover in them everywhere only the doctrines of reason. Both of these modes of thinking, often designated by their opposers by the name of Naturalism, and in more recent times, vulgar, Rationalism, are to be considered as in general obsolete.

Those, on the contrary, are by the so-called orthodox or zealots for the system of the creed, at present denominated Rationalists, who maintain that the Holy Scriptures are to be interpreted, not according to dogmatic rules, but according to the universally valid laws of reason, i. e. rationaliter, (rationally,) and that many a dogma of the church rests on a false hypothesis, and who still acknowledge Christianity to be a system of divine revelation.

Since your definition of Universalists is not altogether perspicuous, I am unable to designate particularly the works in our literature which may have been written in a manner corresponding to their modes of thinking. The two following will, however, in any case be interesting to you: Eberhard's New Apology of Socrates, or an Inquiry into the Doctrines of the Happiness of the Heathen; 2 vols. ed. 3; Berlin, 1788: and Ammon's Progress of Christianity to a Universal Religion; 3 vols. ed. 2; Leipzig, 1836.*

Among the theologians now living who contribute in various ways to Rationalism, the following are distinguished: Baumgarten-Crusius, at Jena; Bretschneider, at Gotha; Gesenius and his school, at Halle; Gieseler, at Göttingen; Justi, at Marburg; David Schultz, at Breslau; Roehr, at Weimar; Winer, at Leipzig; Wegscheider, at Halle; and De Wette, at Basle; the latter, however, only in his exegetical and critical writings. In the Universities of Königsberg, Breslau, Leipzig, Jena, and Gießen, Rationalism is generally predominant. In Halle and Heidelberg, where this was also the case, every thing has been attempted to deprive it of its influence. In Berlin, a certain modern orthodoxy and Hegelianism are engaged in mutually jeering each other.

I enclose a catalogue of the theological works which appeared in Germany in 1836, and have indicated by a mark in the margin those that are rationalist: I send you, besides, the first six sheets of a work, † in the publication of which I am engaged. Had it not been for my numerous avocations, it would have been already completed. Should these sheets sufficiently disclose the direction of my own mind, and excite in you a desire for the continuation, it shall follow.

Be that as it may, however, it will in any case afford me pleasure to assist, by word and by deed, those on the other side of the ocean, who, like ourselves, are struggling to comprehend fully the spirit, which is exerting its influence in Christianity, and I shall be ready and happy to render any service in my power.

May the attainment of our high aim, a genuine Christian operation and influence, which is possible only by mutual purity of effort and true charity, unite us on this and that side of the Atlantic; and may our efforts be blessed! With this expression of my sincere wishes, and with assurances of my respect,

I am yours, etc.
K. A. CREDNER.

REMARKS.—I may be permitted, in this connection, to say that the doctrine of endless misery, which is so popular in this country, seems not to be in equal favor in Germany. From the letter above, it appears that the whole Rationalist party agree with us in rejecting that dogma, and in entertaining the belief of the final holiness and happiness of all men. According to the testimony of Prof. Tholuck, as well as of our own countrymen, Dwight and Sears, a very respectable if not a very large portion of the so called evangelical party in Germany adopt the same views. Indeed, we have reason to think that the school which maintains the absolute eternity of punishment is by no means large, nor remarkable for its learning or piety.

I am particularly gratified with the account which Dr. Credner gives of the existing character of Rationalism in Germany. The infidelity and semi-infidelity which have been heretofore designated by this name, it appears, are already become, or are rapidly becoming, obsolete. Those who are now called Rationalists occupy, I can not but think, the true Christian ground. Without calling in question or putting to hazard the religion of Jesus Christ as a divine revelation, they "maintain that the Holy Scriptures are to be interpreted, not according to dogmatic rules, but according to the universally valid laws of reason; that is, rationally." On what other principle can the Scriptures be safely interpreted? Revelation was made to MAN as a rational being, and is therefore to be considered as a communication from God to man's intellectual and moral powers. What God has revealed, or whether he has made any revelation at all, it is impossible for us to know, without the exercise of our reasoning faculties. And perhaps there is no volume in the world which, in its study, demands their exercise so constantly.

But, while the German Rationalists contend that the Scriptures must be interpreted rationally, they do by no means predicate the truth of Christianity on its conformity to reason. Christianity is to be received because Jesus is the Christ, the

† This work is entitled, "Das Neue Testament, nach seinem Zweck, Ursprung und Inhalt. Für denkende Bibel-freunde." [The New Testament, according to its Design, Origin, and Contents. For thinking friends of the Bible.]

The subjects treated of in the ninety-six pages which I have received are "Christianity and Christian Faith; the Doctrine of Jesus; the Gospel; the Twelve Apostles; the Apostle Paul; the Jewish Sects; the Writings of the Apostles; the New Testament; the Canon." These articles are well written; but, as I may offer a translation of some of them to the readers of the Expositor, I shall withhold any expressions of opinion upon their theological merits.

T. J. S.

Son of the living God; and the faith in Him as such, while it constitutes the badge of the Christian, implies in itself the fact, that what he taught is the highest and most perfect revelation. Dr. Credner, in the sheets of his forthcoming work, which he sent me, expressly asserts that he who acknowledges that the doctrines and commandments of Christianity are valid and true only because they are conformable to reason, has no claim to the name of Christian; he is destitute of faith in the divine mission of Jesus Christ. The Christian, on the contrary, honors Jesus as the divine Teacher, i. e. the Teacher sent from God; and the declaration of our Lord himself—"My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me"—strikes its roots deep into his believing heart. In short, Dr. Credner shows, with great clearness and force, that he who adopts Christianity simply because it is conformable to reason, must, to be consistent, embody whatever truth is thus conformable to reason with Christianity. Endless doubt and contradiction and error would of course be the result; and the power of faith, and the joy of faith, the certainty, the confidence and peace, which now belong to the Christian, would be gone forever.

So far as I am enabled to judge, there is little in the opinions of Prof. Credner which should be regarded as objectionable. The German mind is quite unlike the English, and much freer. It is more speculative in its character, and therefore is prone to take wider, and higher, and more devious flights. But the effervescence, which has been going on for the last half century in Germany, is obviously working off, and sounder and more matter-of-fact views are clearly gaining ground. Still, Germany is not to take up again all the doctrines which she formerly contended for. New views and better views will assume the place of exploded dogmas; and, after a season of excitement and speculative extravagance, of mingled skepticism and infidelity, we doubt not she will come out, like gold purified in the fire, the brighter and the better for the process. The grounds of faith will be better understood, the principles of criticism and interpretation more clearly defined, the word of God more studied, appreciated, and loved, and truth itself, in its highest scriptural manifestation, more fully comprehended and boldly and effectively proclaimed.

I trust the correspondence now opened with Germany will prove mutually interesting; while, on our part at least, it can hardly fail of being highly profitable.

GOD THE AUTHOR OF EVIL.

BY REV. A. PAIGE.

Many very excellent and worthy people neglect to investigate sentiments maintained by Universalists, by reason of having often heard it asserted, that they represent the great Supreme as being the author of evil. This sounds extremely harsh in the ears of many. It appears to them like blasphemy in the very highest degree!

Now, it will be our object in this brief article, to give a full exposition of this subject; or, to give, at much length, our views of it, with the arguments upon which they are based. We shall here only repeat what has often been stated; that we do by no means accuse or charge God with being the author of evil as such; for we believe nothing of this kind, in reality, exists. But it is our's to believe that the Overruler of all things, will in no wise, suffer any event to happen, that can properly be called an evil—nothing but what will result in the general good of his intelligent offspring. With this confidence in him, we can look upon much that is denominated evil, and that is even intended as such, with the assurance that, as in the case of Joseph's ill treatment, they will eventuate in the greatest good. Such we believe will be the final end of sin. Nor does this belief encourage us "to continue in sin, that grace may abound."

And here allow us to present a few reflections relative to sentiments advanced by others. Should we succeed in furnishing proof of the fact, that those good people who dare not investigate our sentiments, for the reason given above; should we prove, I say, that they themselves, by their faith, accuse God of being in very deed, the author and perpetrator of evil, then we sincerely hope they will look upon our views of the subject, with less fear, or dismay. This we shall now attempt. One argument only is necessary.

It will be readily admitted on all sides, that God punishes for sin; because punishment is the effect of sin—it is the penalty. All will unite, too, in pronouncing the spirit of revenge, not only one of the meanest, but also one of the wickedest spirits ever possessed by any being—as one only fit to be indulged and gratified by those said to dwell in the infernal regions! Now as a denomination it is well known, we believe all punishment to have for its design the ultimate good of the punished—that it is for our profit—hence, that it must have an end, and restore every subject to virtue and obedience. All other Christians believe it endless; therefore if designed as a good it must fail of accomplishing the object for which it was intended. For none can suppose that endless misery will ever benefit a person doomed to suffer it! Then we must of necessity arrive at one of the two following conclusions. Either punishment has for its end and aim the good of the sufferer, and for this purpose must restore him to virtue and happiness; or else, must be designed to gratify in Deity, the so much condemned spirit of cruelty and revenge. In the first conclusion it would prove a blessing; in the last an evil. The first would represent God as merciful and kind; the last as vindictive and cruel—as the author and instigator of evil. There appears in my mind no alternative. As God is the author of the law, he must also be of the penalty. And if endless misery, or misery which can in no wise result in good to the sufferer, be inflicted by God, it must be an evil. To which case, God must be called the author of evil! I have not introduced this subject to you, here, kind reader, for the purpose of injuring the feelings of our opposers. They are innocent. If they sin in this respect, it is through ignorance. In which case we are in duty bound to pray for them, and labor to convince them of the truth. May the Lord bless them, and lead them all in the way of peace and holiness.

CLERICAL MISFORTUNES.

Every thing is liable to perversion, and all men are subject to fall into mistakes; but the misfortunes of clergymen are of a peculiar description. And they have so long been regarded as a class by themselves—as having so little in common with other men—that whatever their calamities, whether real or imaginary, they seldom share deeply in the world's sympathies. Above all other things, they never receive advice. Not that they are particularly unwilling to receive it, or incapable of being benefited by it—but because none feel willing to advise them, and some incompetent to do so with propriety.

We beseech the reader not to grow nervous, for unless he be a clergyman, he has little concern in the matter—nor is it any part of our present purpose to induce him to feel any. No—for once, we ministers have a little affair of our own to talk over—and because we neither have, nor can have the common rights of privacy in our affairs, we do the thing openly and before the world. Nor are we like to be tedious in the detail—since we can spare but little time from our duty to others, to admonish each other or even to take care of ourselves. But to the matter in question.

1. Clergymen are peculiarly liable to be sick. It should be remembered, that we are speaking of Universalist clergymen; other denominations we hope, may be able to take care of their own sick, as well as their own poor. We know not how, nor why it is, but so it is—we are a set of sickly men. Many are sick at home, and some, if one might judge from appearances, are sick of home, since they are most easily found with the few who remain where they ought to be; with their families, if they have any. From the general aspects of the disease—its permanent and prominent idiopathy, however diversified its types, there can be little dispute of its causes. These will usually be found in close and hot rooms, good appetites and little exercise. Its developments are said to be indicative of intense thought—for this reason probably the patient appears to think of little else. But however much or little the patient may think, after some years both of experience and observation we are convinced, that the strongest exhibitions of its presence, convey the fewest proofs of its mental origin.

Why, just reflect a moment—what has a diseased liver to do with what a man had thought for some few preceding months? And especially with theology! As if a morbid state of that almost insensible membrane was the peculiar inheritance of clergymen! Do none but Universalist ministers think? Or is it our peculiar province to have our thoughts confined in their operations to a particular part of our own frame! One would suppose that our heads should come in for a share of these consequences—unless indeed, they are too strong to be affected by any effort of their owners.

Another development is in a most obstreperous cough. Not the deep, dry, agonizing and half suppressed cough, that bodes our earthly doom. But a roaring, rampant, and tremendous outbreak, that sets all common noise at defiance, and leaves the lungs as tough and trust-worthy as if insured by a bellows-maker. This, to be sure, is sometimes seriously alarming to the individual—and commonly as vexatious and annoying to his friends. But both should take courage when it is recollected, that such roarers can talk eternally, and loud enough to be heard in a sea-fight, and in preaching for two hours upon a stretch, exert a voice of thirty horse-power!

Under the influence of the moping, and lassitude, and irritations of these forms of ministerial ailments—another misfortune awaits us. In no case is cause and consequence more intimately connected, than a course of dietetics with the maladies of a minister. Tea and coffee are too stimulating for him, though the weakest member of his family and friends may use both with impunity. Toast is denied as too unctuous—and even molasses to his crust, may prove too acid for his stomach. Alas for him now! for to the debility of starvation, he must add the effects of medicine; and he literally breakfasts upon boluses—dines upon alkadies, and sleeps upon anodynes.

What merely human constitution can be proof against the combined powers of vitiated air in a close room, lobelia, and a little bread and water? The man who will not be sick under such treatment, must be incapable of sympathizing with his race—and is scarcely fit to be a minister. But the most mysterious part of the whole matter, is—that those who are supposed to think so much, do not at once think of exercising, eating—temperately to be sure, but in other respects like other men—and studying no more hours than are required in well regulated schools. Depend upon it, such a course will cure in three months, one half of our mopers, and relieve the remainder of incurables—at the same time, that it would both relieve and oblige their friends, who would enjoy their conversation much better when free from the details of indisposition.

Think how Proteus would have been puzzled to put on all the shapes of ministerial indisposition. And then, poor fellow, could he have done even that, what a miserable figure he must make with his pale face, perfumed whiskers and finger-rings—wheezing, and coughing, and moping about from place to place, eating bran bread, and declining exercise—lest he should be fatigued! But odd and whimsical as all this might appear, it is but an epitome of what we every day meet among the living, breathing, and moving monuments of ministerial infirmity.

2. Another misfortune peculiar to the fraternity, is that of being puffed and praised. True, this may not sully—but it can tarnish a good head, and miserably overwhelm the kindest heart with unwonted care. And we have occasionally seen very promising youths rendered quite delirious—and not a few men of riper years most deliciously giddy over a single sentence in a news paper, which would have escaped the notice of those who read without spectacles.

We would by no means insinuate, that our publishers and editors have any motives of interest or policy, in bespattering their brethren with these off-hand compliments. Much less would we accuse them of an intention to bring the curse of more than bearable self-conceit upon the unfortunate subjects of commendation. All that we can do—and that is more than is likely to be done—is to hold them like projectors of other injuries, accessories in offence, and alike responsible for the consequences.

But whatever they may mean—who does not discover, that an aspiring young man will exert himself to secure the patronage and advance the circulation of a paper, in which his own name in CAPITALS is trumpeted as the hero of some exploit above his years or attainments? And who has not learned, that even age has its foibles. The talents of such may have been fairly worn out in the strife and toil of many years; but a well-aimed compliment can warm the cold blood—and a single hearty puff, blow the crutch from the hand of decrepitude, and make its owner fancy himself young again. This is the foundation, on which rests the superstructure of half the popularity in our little world. The breath of another blew it into name and form—and he is a fortunate man, who does not himself, blow it down. For it converts some otherwise kind-hearted, unassuming and useful young ministers, into arrogant, pompous and dictatorial pets, by far too wise to learn any thing till too late, and too confident to heed danger before they fall.

There is my friend Knowall—who to very respectable native talents, was favored with the early means of adding some valuable attainments; and who was, before he was puffed out of his senses, a modest and useful minister of the Gospel. But it was his misfortune to be praised,

And forsooth, his sermons are elaborate productions, in which matter and manner are shaped for display, full of "sound and fury," and suited to almost any time, place and occasion—except Sunday, the pulpit, and divine worship. There is scarcely a place in the land where he would deign to waste his talents more than a fortnight; and probably few where, with his airs of consequence upon him, he would be endured over a month. This is not to be charged upon the affections of his heart, for they are kind—nor to his moral sentiments, for they are yet uncorrupted. But both we fear, will suffer under the perpetual irritations and disappointments to which, in his present position, he is exposed. For few things are more certainly calculated to try the principles and influence the conduct, than the pervading idea—always uppermost and foremost in such minds—that their talents are not appreciated.

In view of these evils—but a small part of those that fall to our lot—if we do not help ourselves, it will remain for the doctors and publishers to help us out of our misfortunes. — MATTHEW.

"THE WAY OF THE TRANSGRESSOR IS HARD."

The truth of this declaration is amply sustained. Passing by the evidence derived from the consideration of the physical and organic laws, we find it susceptible of proof. The suffering that arises from the infraction of human laws abundantly confirm it. The gibbet of the murderer is eloquent in its defence. The fetter of the felon proclaims the atrocity of his crime, and the condignity of his punishment. The dungeon's darkness bears signal testimony to the rigor of the sentence that awaits the guilty, and the deep consciousness of merited disgrace lights up in the soul the withering fire of shame.

But the transgressor knows other and sterner sufferings than these. The murderer may consummate his purpose and evade the inefficient arm of human justice. He may mingle unrecognized in the city's multitude, but still the corroding apprehension that he is suspicion's victim rankles in the heart that could forget the enormity of its crime. The bosom of the unpeopled desert may become his habitation—the shades of the eremite's lone cave may screen him from public gaze—yet conscience, stern and unrelenting opens her records in his soul—from her tribunal there is no escape. Her accusations are convictive—and her vengeance is the deep, rending throes of mental agony.

The highway robber may perpetrate his crime unseen by human eye. Circumstances may close every avenue to his detection. Yet in every breeze he hears the clanking chain, and in every rustling leaf the pursuing foot step. He is the prey of continual apprehension and death. Every moment of his enjoyment is embittered by the recollection of his crime, and never till memory and conscience become the convenient tools of the basest depravity can he cease to suffer. The cause of his suffering is incorporate with his very being—the vitality of the one terminates but with the destruction of the other.

But if we direct our attention to those crimes which human laws regard less criminal, our convictions of the truth of the above declaration, will be strengthened. The slanderer—the assassin of character—who, clad in the robes of hypocrisy, and wearing the smile of deceit upon his lips, goes forth to prey upon the noblest treasure to which humanity lays claim—may effect his purpose. The wrecks of character may be his trophies. The flower of innocence may wither beneath his maliginity, and in the transport of a fiendish triumph he may rejoice over the consummation of his victim's ruin. But could we read a succeeding chapter in his career, we should find that his crime, although conceived in the excess of depravity, and matured in the very heart of malice, meets a punishment proportioned to its aggravation. True, in the society of his companions, he may assume an air of composure and happiness, and stifle the uprisings of conscious guilt. His remorseless hypocrisy may give the seal of sincerity to his declarations, and conceal the feelings of his heart. He may conceal every appearance of remorse, and while he insists upon the truth of his libellous allegations, may, in mockery of reputation affect to commiserate the misfortunes of his victim—but "silence and reflection come." Then vengeance resumes her throne. The hour of retribution is at hand. The images of murdered character rise before his vision. The picture of innocence, struggling, and sinking beneath the burden of calumny, is portayed before his imagination in features too haggard for conception. Misery takes possession of his soul. The concealment of his guilt adds fuel to the tormenting fire—and as the sturdy oak supports the worm that wastes away its heart, so does the slanderer nourish within his soul, the worm that preys upon the vitals of his peace.

The miser who wrings the last reluctant shilling from the hand of widowed poverty, and robs the orphaned family of bread, although he can retreat behind the scrutiny which law affords, finds in his idolized coffers the poison of his enjoyment, and in his anxiety the misery he dreads. So it is with transgression of every description. The votary of vice or crime wherever he may be, feels that "the way of the transgressor is hard"—that no compromise with conscience can purchase impunity—that every crime, every transgression must be visited with punishment, dreadful and severe. #### AFFECTATION AND SIMPLICITY.

In order to exhibit the contrast between the former and the latter, we have only to step forth on the broad theatre of action, and there note the doings and sayings of men, carefully and critically, and we shall then be prepared to delineate on paper scenes from real life, illustrating most clearly the disgusting and soulless spirit of affectation, when portrayed by the side of heaven-born simplicity. In the church of Christ, affectation is all that we need to constitute the loathsome, detested hypocrite; a creature on which our Saviour's sharpest rebukes, while here on earth, fell, without measure. Yea, his most solemn and awful denunciations against the transgression, here in the flesh, were announced as coming on the heads of the hypocritical, self-righteous pharisees, who pretended to have all the religion in the world. This is evident from our Saviour's language to them, Matt. xxiii: 19, and onward, Wo unto you, scribes, pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widow's houses, and for a pretence make long prayers. They loved to pray, standing in the most conspicuous places, in order to have the world see how very pious (judging by the number and length of their soulless prayers) they were. It was much easier then, as well as in the present time, to appear outwardly righteous, holy, and pure, than it was to be in very deed a Christian; provided there was more to see through their affectation. It was our Saviour's task to unmask their hypocrisy and deceit, before the eyes of the world—not evitable eye, by any means!

But let us look among the every day concerns of life. Do we there find any affectation? or, I might with more propriety ask, do we find any simplicity? The present has most certainly more to do with affectation, than did any other period ever known in history. It is a very rare circumstance now to meet with pure simplicity in her shining lovely robes, without some dark spots to mar her beauty. Fashion, the idol before whom thousands prostrate themselves, in the very dust, has done more for the uprooting of simplicity of manners, words and actions, among us, than every other cause combined. When we are under fashion's tyrannical control, we are not permitted to speak the sincere thoughts of the heart, or act according to its sober righteous dictates—all must be affectation. Instead of being guided by the warm and charitable feelings of the youthful heart we must act the part of a dissembler to please the world, and to be called popular or fashionable. O, the folly of affectation! This speaking one thing when we mean another—this superficial, studied, formal mode of life—who can bear? Not one! Let us begin then to reform! Let us no longer be the dupes of fashion, or the slaves of groveling affectation. Let truth, sincerity, and a real desire to be good, and to do good, pervade every heart henceforth. H. J. S.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS ....NO. XV.

In the 56th Psalm, 8th verse, David says, "Thou tellest my wanderings; put thou my tears into thy bottle; are they not in thy book?" By putting tears into a bottle, we find two allusions to explain—1. The bottle—2. Putting tears into it. Most readers of the Bible are deceived by the term bottle—for they associate it with bottles now in common use; viz., those made of glass. But a moment's reference to some passages of Scripture, will show the fallacy of such a notion. When the Gibeonites went out to meet the Jews in order to obtain their favor, for the Jews were then conquering Palestine, it is said that they had with them "wine-bottles, old, rent and bound"—or patched. Joshua ix: 4. David says, "I am like a bottle in the smoke." Ps. cxix: 83. "Our Saviour said, "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles, else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish; but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved." Matt. ix: 17. Now, if we suppose that the bottles here mentioned, are glass, what sense is there to say of glass bottles, that they are old, rent, and patched—and why could not wine be just as well kept in old glass bottles, as in new ones?

The whole difficulty is at once removed, by knowing the fact, that the bottles mentioned in Scripture are not made of glass; but of skins. The Arabs to this day, when crossing the deserts of their country, carry their water in skins, some of which—those made of ox-skins—hold sixty gallons. Niebuer, when about starting from Cairo for Suez, says, among other things, "We had each of us a vessel of thick leather to drink out of; and because we should find no water for some days, we took also quite a number of goat skins filled with water with us." See Calmet, Art.; Bottle. The bottles then which the Gibeonites had, were old skins, which having been rent, were patched, in order that they might hold the wine. When David said that he was "like a bottle in the smoke," he meant that his desolate feelings were comparable to an old skin-bottle hung up in a tent, and blackened and shrivelled by its smoke. And when our Saviour spoke of new wine being lost, if put into old bottles, he meant that its fomentation would burst old and unstretching skins—but if put into new skins, they would yield sufficiently, so that the fomentation of the wine would not hurt them.

These bottles were large or small, according to the size of the animal whose skin was taken to make them. And when David remarked, "put thou my tears into thy bottle," I presume that small skin bottles are referred to.

But what are we to understand by putting tears into a bottle? It was a custom among the Persians, as it long was among the Greeks and Romans, for a priest to go around among the company who were assembled, and who were mourning for any dead person, and to carefully collect the falling tears upon a piece of cotton, which was squeezed into a bottle, and its contents offered on the tomb of the deceased. This custom explains the allusion in the text; when David said, "put thou my tears into thy bottle," it was simply a prayer for God to remember his afflictions, and to give him comfort under them. What his afflictions were, will at once be seen in the fact, that the 56th Psalm was most probably written during the time that king Saul was persecuting him.

One noble trait in the character of David, was, that he put the most implicit confidence in his Maker. On all occasions and under all circumstances, he believed that the Lord would do right, and hence was a Being in whom to place unwavering reliance. Hence his language, "the Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?" Ps. xxvii: 1.—"What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee; in God I will praise his word; in God I have put my trust; I will not fear what flesh can do unto me." Ps. lvi: 3, 4.

There was one occasion, in which his confidence was strikingly exhibited. David had committed great sin before the Lord—as a punishment for his wickedness, he was told to choose one of three things; 1. Seven years' famine in the land—2. To flee three months before his enemies—or, 3. To have three days' pestilence in the land. His answer to God the seer, who made the proposition to him, was, "I am in a great strait; let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, (for his mercies are great,) and let me not fall into the hand of man." 2 Sam. xxiv: 14. We here discover that David had far rather fall into the hands of God, than into the hands of man, for the simple reason that the Judge of all the earth would do right, while man would be cruel and oppressive.

I have often thought of this declaration of David's, while meditating upon the frequent representations of Deity which are made by men. I have sat and heard a preacher tell of the wrath of God—how angry he is with sinners—what terrible and endless vengeance he will inflict upon them, unless they repent. I have then heard the preacher tell of his own love for souls, and how certainly he would save them if he could. And while thus hearing, the thought stole into my mind, that if the preacher had power, I had rather fall into his hands, than into the hands of God, admitting his representations true. And yet when I also remembered, that such notions exactly reversed the decision of David, and that the idea of God's being cruel, is a false and pernicious error, and that he is all-gracious love, which is infinitely greater than the love of man, I could not help rejoicing that we are permitted to follow the good old practice of trusting in the Lord, who "will not cast off forever."

"THE GLORY OF GOD IN THE FACE OF CHRIST."

It is a beautiful philosophy that sits at the feet of nature, and treasures up her pure and unfettered teachings. She has a voice for the depths of the soul, and it becomes elevated and calm and strong under her influences. It is good, when the brain is perplexed and the eye worn with studying the theories of men—the problems of human wisdom—it is good to go out into the open world, and study the instructions that are graven upon every rock, that whisper in every quivering leaf and murmur in every running brook. And there are other feelings to be gratified in this, than mere curiosity and scientific research—there are other powers to be cherished beside the imagination that kindles at the beauty and brightness of the existences that we behold strewn every where around us. The heart may be made better—our moral energies may be quickened and strengthened—when we go forth and commune with the living, the original and the pure. The truth is, we see in nature the glory of God. We behold his attributes mirrored and imaged forth. We witness in these wonderful creations, manifestations of infinite love, and power and wisdom; so that the untutored savage—the little child—may sit in this great temple of the universe and learn of Deity.

But there has been given to man a higher Revelation of God than that which glows in the lineaments of nature, striking and glorious as it may be. The moral loveliness and beauty of His attributes have been seen in another and a brighter form. In other words—the glory of God has been seen in the face of Jesus Christ. At the feet of the Messiah man has been brought to a more intimate knowledge of his Maker than has been vouchsafed to him in any other way. It appears to us as a great truth, that where Christ teaches and acts, it is as if God taught and acted—it is a manifestation of the invisible One through the visible.—Christ was the image of God. He bore to him a moral likeness; just as a son who should go out and correctly represent his father in his disposition, his teachings and his acts, would bear a likeness to his parent, and might properly be said to be an image of him.

Let us in this view look at a few of the traits in the character of the Redeemer. Look at his Benevolence. He laid his hand upon the pale brow of disease, and life and health coursed freely through the veins of the sick one. He touched the withered limb and it was made fresh and strong. He saw the poor blind man, sitting by the way-side, and he pitied his darkness and poured a flood of light upon his sightless eyes. He came to the lame and bade him walk and run. He witnessed the agony of the poor widow of Nain, and he drew back the covering of the bier and her only son was restored in life to her arms. Now these were all instances of deep, sincere, ardent benevolence. The poor and afflicted looked to him for relief and found it. But does the force of these recorded miracles end here? do they end when we have contemplated only the facts that wonders were wrought and benefits conferred? No—they likewise show us that God is good. That He pities the children of men. That he delights to heal their pains and sickness. It was the glory of God that shone in the face of that Christ "who went about doing good." It was the image of God that bent over the troubled couch of the sick man and said "be healed"—that appeared to the bewildered vision of the blind man as he opened his eyes to the light of day—that moved in the pathway of the lame and restored him to strength—that appeared to the disconsolate widow, and gave her her son. And when these afflicted ones lifted up their heads at the sound of the kind and healing voice that addressed them, and gazed upon the lineaments of meekness and pity and tender love that beamed in his countenance—then, then, did they behold an image of the merciful Father—then did they see the "glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

VIRTUE AND HAPPINESS—SIN AND MISERY.

We have frequently taken occasion to contend, that virtue produces present happiness, and vice present misery; thus manifesting a practical comment on the declaration, "behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner," Prov. xi: 31. But the plain demonstrations that such is actually the case, have been resisted by those of a different faith. Hence, we not uncommonly hear the remark made, that sin oftentimes renders its practice happy on the earth, while the path of righteousness is very frequently a thorny one. We take great pleasure in quoting the following thoughts in the language of Dr.

Nott of Union College, as it confirms our views of virtue and vice, and refutes those of our opponents in faith.

"A life of virtue and happiness, then, exactly coincide. To practice the one, is to secure the other. The God of virtue formed every faculty of pleasure, and has made them all subservient to duty. There are those, I am sensible, who represent religion shrouded in gloom or covered with scowls; but the attitude, the drapery, the features are unlike the divine Original and betray the pencil of an enemy. There never was, nor there never will be one source of happiness, which religion does not authorise. Some, indeed, speak of all the pleasures of sense, as pleasures of sin. But such language is at once an outrage to common sense and an indignity to God. Sin never gave the faculties of sense, and let not sin claim the bliss that springs from them. There is not a being in the universe that owes to sin a single enjoyment. The immortal God is the author of them all. He made you what you are, and if in the abuse of the faculties he has bestowed, a single delight remains, it is owing to his clemency."

"Which of the faculties is it, I would ask, that sin improves? Is it the eye? Is it the ear? Is it the palate? Does sin add any new faculties? No; she only palsies the energies, perverts the use, and poisons the pleasures of those which before existed—these are her baneful and damning works, under whose influence, delights once desired, disgust the thoughts and pall upon the senses. My God! if you are beguiled by an idea of the pleasures of sin, look once upon the emaciated body, the pallid countenance, the bloated features, and the noseless face of the loathsome and worn out sensualist! Look again! And can you believe the place of his resort is the habitation of pleasures? No; 'tis the temple of pollution, of disease, of death—there sin, accursed sorceress, mingles her cup and infuses her poison. Mark the place—avoid it: turn from it and flee away." Addresses, pp. 37, 38.

These are views of virtue and vice which we have constantly proclaimed, and which we are glad to know are advocated by Dr. Nott. The following is to the same purpose.

"As we have said, a life of virtue, and a life of happiness coincide. And he who seeks the latter in opposition to the former, counteracts the laws of nature, contradicts the experience of ages, and to succeed, must transcend not himself only, but his Maker also, and become more potent than Omnipotence himself. The body can subsist in health without aliment as easily as the soul without virtue. Nor is poison more fatal to the one than the venom of sin to the other. This is matter of experience; of fact; and whoever asserts the contrary, belies his heart and contradicts the testimony of a world." Pp. 39, 40.

This is decisive testimony—testimony which illustrates the inspired declaration concerning sin, "in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." And though the remarks of Dr. Nott sufficiently show the effects of vice and virtue, yet I can not forbear closing this article with an extract from another eminent man.

"As excess in action and passion always tends to the shortening of life, and nothing preys on the constitution more than disorderly passions; he must live not only happiest, but longest who avoids them. It is an edifying story that is told in the book of Mussar, chapter I, quoted by Rosenmuller: 'A certain person travelling through the city, continued to call out who wants the elixir of life? The daughter of Rabbi Joda heard him, and told her father. He said, call the man in. When he came in, the Rabbi said, what is that elixir of life thou sellest? He answered, is it not written, what man is he that loveth life, and desireth to see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips from speaking guile. This is the elixir of life, and is found in the mouth of man.' A. Clarke on 1 Pet. iii: 10.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

The importance of Sunday Schools, and the utility of Libraries for the same are attracting considerable attention among Universalists; while the difficulty of selecting books which are free from debasing error, and which are calculated to interest and instruct the mind, has been severely felt. We are not without the hope that we may yet be able to furnish our respective schools with books which are free from the mark of the beast, and the scathing touch of modern mysticism. To aid in the selection, Br. S. R. Smith has furnished the New-York Christian Messenger with a catalogue of the books used by the School in Albany "which were carefully examined before they were submitted to the children." We transfer it to our columns, in the same hope which he indulged, that the friends of similar establishments may be induced to add from their collections such as they can recommend, not included in this list.

To the Members of the Universalist Historical Society. Brethren—I take this method to call your attention to the interests of our Society, and to solicit your aid in its behalf. The approaching session of the U. S. Convention, and also of the Historical Society, at Auburn, N. Y., will afford a favorable opportunity to bring together donations of books, pamphlets, papers, etc. for the Society's Library. I am particularly desirous of seeing the Library rendered as complete as possible, and hope both Corresponding Secretaries and members generally, will exert themselves for the attainment of this end. I had intended to have prepared a new catalogue previous to the next session, but, not having yet received many of the books ordered from Europe, it has been thought advisable to defer this work till those returns are in hand, and it was also hoped that large accessions would be made by the liberality of our brethren in the United States.

I would also take this opportunity to request the Corresponding Secretaries to forward to the approaching session of the Society, reports, exhibiting the condition of the cause in their respective states, and giving such other information as shall relate to the objects of the society.

Very respectfully yours, THOMAS J. SAWYER,
New-York, August 10, 1840. Sec. U. H. Soc.

COPY OF A LETTER

From a Universalist to his Partialist Friend.

FRIEND PARTIALIST.—As I was of late reclining on my couch after a long day of fatigue, "Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," gently lighted on my eyelids, and I dreamed as follows: I thought that you and I were both at once called to take our exit from this stage of action, and that we together took our flight for the gate of heaven. Both arriving at the gate of the outer court, you, with a confident air of Orthodox assurance, rushed up to the gate, and seized the knocker. But scarce had it been thrice applied to the massy golden bar, when the man with whom had been intrusted the keys of the kingdom, demanded from within, "Who comes thee, and what is the object of your arrival?" We both at once pronounced our names, and also our desires to enter through the gate into the city. Peter then turned his golden key, drew open the gate, and in an instant we were both ushered into heaven's outer court. Both stood, both gazed enraptured by the glow of transparency, which curled over the summit of the inner wall, and the occasional vibrations of harmony exquisite. On a sudden, the sinner's friend, the head of every man, the prince of heaven and earth—who as yet, had not reconciled all things unto his Father, that God might be all in all—presented himself to our view, smiling propitiously upon us, and holding out a golden sceptre. He first addressed himself to you, as if to purify those doubts, fears and seeming anxieties, so plainly depicted in your face.

Prince. I am the head of every man, and if thou art a man, thou art a portion of my body. Since he that is dead is free from sin, name thy request and it shall be granted thee.

Partialist. My only request is that I may possess a mansion in thy Father's house, where I may rejoice eternally with all for whom thou hast tasted death.

Prince. Hast thou any claims to file in, either for the whole or a part of the price of a mansion in my Father's house, in view of any, or every good thing which thou hast ever done while living on the earth?

Partialist. Thou great and glorious potentate, in whom all the families of the earth are blessed! I now perceive that for all the good works that I have ever done with a cheerful heart, I have been amply rewarded as I passed along in performing the acts themselves: and as to all the religious slaving that I have ever done, or giving to the poor with a grudging heart, if it was loss to me there it is lost to me here. And could I produce a legal assignment of all the good works that have ever been done, by all the saints from the time of the righteous Abel down to John the revelator, I should now be ashamed to offer the whole for a seat in heaven, for the term of seven years.

Prince. Well, and do you claim a mansion in my Father's house on the ground that he loved you any better while dead in trespasses and in sins, than he did any other individual of the human race, while in a like condition?

Partialist. Frequently when striving for heaven, has the recollection, that all my good works were no more, and even less than my duty, driven me to that alternative; but now I no longer view my God as a capitious or capricious prince, trifling with the faults and weaknesses of the creatures of his power. But since the judgment came upon all men to condemnation, and nothing short of God's Almighty arm could bring salvation to any, if the free gift came upon all men to justification of life except one, I should expect to be that very one myself, and for the following reasons. 1st. If I had done all that was my duty to do, God would have owed me nothing. 2d. If God could exercise partiality towards any, I both wish and expect to be the last one to receive favor from that source. For if the covering is too narrow for all mankind, it would be arrogance in me to think to wrap myself in it.

Prince. Thou hast come to thyself.

He then accosted me as follows. "And didst thou in the other world forsake both Calvin and Arminius, suffering reproach for my sake? I answered, yea Lord—but by trusting in the living God as the Saviour of all men, I was delivered from the fear of death, which was an ample compensation for all my persecution. He then gave us both a hearty welcome to enter the celestial courts. But on approaching the gate I awoke. And although it was a dream, still it is like a reality to me, inasmuch as I am waiting for its fulfilment in substance. For I am sure that my Partialist friend will finally be immortalized in the resurrection; and I am as sure that it can never be effected by any thing short of God's universal grace. For to take the ground that the best man on earth has ever done as much as to move a straw towards getting to heaven, when he is scarcely worthy to live on the earth, would be weak and foolish, inasmuch as grace would then be no more grace. And to maintain that only a part of the human race will be immortalized in Christ, and that to turn on the eternal partiality of an all powerful Being whom we must affect to call good, is an insult on common sense and a burlesque on a God of equal attributes, and needs only to be understood to be detested.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.
BEAUTY.

I gazed o'er Nature's radiant brow—
The green wood's shade—the ocean's glare,
And view'd the rainbow, Nature's vow—
But looked in vain for beauty there.

The mountain in the distance rose,
And at its foot the riv'let plays,
The silver lake in mild repose,
Reflected back the moon's bright rays.

I saw the gentle zephyrs kiss
The lonely floweret, blooming fair;
They seemed to speak of mutual bliss—
But still I saw no beauty there.

I viewed a lovely maiden bright,
Trip lightly down the sylvan dale,
Her eye was Venus' silver light,
Her brow was Winter's snowy veil.

A lover soon her pathway traced,
And wander'd to her fav'rite bower.
Love's golden chain their hearts embraced,
And held them by its magic power.

I looked again—the charm was broke,
The chain dissolved in empty air!
The lovers' tears impressive spoke,
And said, "There is no beauty there."

My eyes then wandered earth around;
I sighed, and muttered in despair,
"This precious gem can not be found,
In earth, sea, sky, nor heaven nor air."
But ere my lonely musings ceased,
There came to view an angel fair,
Which soon my troubles all released,
And made me say "There's beauty there."

This angel form was Friendship true,
Its home was in the virtuous heart;
No words can bring it to your view,
No tongue can tell its secret art.

'Twas not the sunbeam's vestal light,
Nor Ocean's breast in sunny hours—
That disappears at coming night;
This boils with rage in storms and showers.

Not so with Friendship; faithful true,
Misfortune's blasts are blown in vain;
Change after change may still ensue,
But Friendship ever will remain.

Earth's changing scenes no beauty know,
But Friendship is a child of Heaven—
Man's guardian angel here below,
'Tis Beauties self, by Wisdom given.

WHEN WILL PEACE DAWN UPON US!

When we rise from the pillow, while others are dreaming
And look through the mist, to the dawning of day,
When we gaze on the beautiful light gently gleaming,
E'er the sun hath appeared, which illumines the way,
When we feel that all nature with which we are surround-ded,

Is the volume which reason reveals to the eye,
Is the work of a being whose love is unbounded,
Whose essence pervades us, whose spirit is high—
To know that the proof of his blessing is given,
To learn that not half of his wisdom is told,
To feel that the spirit which whispers of heaven,
Is in us, the same that his promise foretold—
To look through the vista of time, to the end,
In faith, that all sinning and sorrow must cease,
Then visit the shrine of Jehovah and bend:

This, this is the blessing, the dawning of peace.

THE ATMOSPHERE.

The atmosphere is an element which we can not see, but which we feel investing us wherever we go: whose density we can measure to a certain height; whose purity is essential to existence; whose elastic pressure on the lungs, and on and around the frame, preserves man in that noble attitude which lifts his head towards the skies, and bids him seek there for an eternal home.—The atmosphere is neither an evaporation from earth nor sea, but a separate element, bound to the globe, and accompanying it in its motions round the sun. Can we for an instant imagine, that we are indebted for the atmosphere only to some fortuitous accident? If there were no atmosphere, and if we could possibly exist without one, we should be unable to hear the sound of the most powerful artillery; even though it were discharged at the distance of a single pace. We should be deprived of the music of the sea, the minstrels of the woods, of all the artificial combinations of sweet sounds, and of the fascinating tones of the human voice itself.—We might make our wants and feelings perceptible to each other by signs and gesticulations, but the tongue would be condemned to irremediable silence. The deliberations of assemblies of men, from which laws and the order of society have emanated, could never have taken place. The tribes of mankind would wander over the earth in savage groups, incapable of civilization, and the only arts which they could ever know would be those alone which might enable them to destroy each other.—Review.

We select the following from the Southern Literary Messenger, showing the utility of scientific knowledge in the advantage which it gives its possessor over the ignorant. A knowledge of the sciences can never do harm, and it may afford the means of the most exalted usefulness.

On Mount Philatus, near Luzerne, is a valuable growth of fir trees, which, on account of the inaccessible nature of the mountain, had remained for ages uninjured, until within a few years a German engineer contrived to construct a trough in the form of an inclined plane, by which these trees are made to descend by their own weight, through a space of eight miles, from the side of the mountain to the margin of the lake. Although the average declivity is no more than one foot in seventeen, and the route often circuitous, and some times horizontal, yet so great is the acceleration, that a tree descends the whole space of six minutes. To the spectator, standing by the side of the trough, at first is heard on the approach of the tree, a roaring noise, becoming louder and louder, the tree comes in sight at the distance of a half mile, and in an instant shoots past with the noise of thunder, and almost with the rapidity of an arrow. But for the knowledge of the inclined plane, which the German engineer had previously acquired, such a work as this would have appeared impossible.

The chronometer, a species of watch constructed to go with great accuracy, has been applied to the purpose of determining longitude at sea.

"After months spent in a passage from South America to Asia," says Arnott, "our captain's chronometer announced that a certain point of land was then bearing east from the ship at the distance of fifty miles; and in an hour afterwards, when the mist cleared away, the looker out on the mast gave the joyful call, 'land ahead!' verifying the report of the chronometer almost to a mile, after a voyage of thousands. It is natural at such a moment, with the dangers and uncertainties of ancient navigation before the mind, to exult in contemplating what man has now achieved. Had the rate of the wonderful little instrument changed even a little, its announcement would have been worse than useless—but in the night, and in the day, in storm and in calm, in heat, and in cold—while the persons around it were experiencing every vicissitude of mental and bodily condition, its steady beat went on keeping exact account of the rolling earth, and of the stars; and in the midst of the trackless waves, it was always ready to tell its magic tale of the very spot of the globe over which it had arrived.—In one point of view, this result appears to arise from the perfection of the chronometer's mechanism; but had not the men of science determined the exact figure of the earth, and its rate of motion around both its own axis and the sun, the chronometer could have given no information respecting the longitude, it would have told its tale indeed; but without science, its interpreter, that tale would have remained wrapped in the mystery of an unknown tongue.

A green horn from the country stopped into a Menagerie to view the beasts, birds and creeping things congregated, among which an Ourang Outang particularly struck his attention. Several gentlemen were conversing about the animals, one of whom expressed the opinion that it was a lower order of the human species. Jonathan did not like this idea, and expressed his contempt for it thus: "Pooh, pooh! he's no more human species than I be!"

A legal gentleman was asked lately to give the derivation of the word CUFFEE—a word colloquially employed to designate the sons of Ethiopia. "Our community," said the gentleman, "is divided into two great classes; the whites who are the 'cuffees,' and the blacks who are the 'cuffees.'"

DEATHS.

In Leyden, on the morning of the 11th inst, after a lingering illness of several months, Mrs. ALTA MIRA, wife of Mr. Johnson Talcott, aged 59 years. Among the multitudes over whom the grave is daily closing its portals, we occasionally behold an individual whose life has been an exhibition of such rare moral beauty, that a deep shade of sadness comes over us as we witness its termination. We feel that a pure, bright light is extinguished, darkening the social atmosphere around the place where it shone. Such an individual was the subject of this notice. Amiable and devoted as a wife; as a mother, kind, tender and affectionate; obliging and charitable as a neighbor, she was universally esteemed and beloved.

She had been for many years a full believer in the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation, and she was an ornament to her profession. If her faith communicated a pure and quiet lustre to her life, her life reflected back beauty and loveliness upon her faith. She has left an afflicted husband, and a large family of bereaved children, to sorrow over her departure. May they be sustained under their bereavement by that sacred truth which was her comfort in life, and her consolation in death! Beloved wife! fond mother!—ADIEU. We soon shall meet thee in a brighter world!

"Trend lightly o'er her ashes,
Ye virtuous daughters of Zion;—
She was your sister."

Funeral services were performed on the 13th, in the Universalist church, and a sermon was preached to a large congregation by I. CHAMBERLAIN.

In Norwich, McKean county, Pa., July 27th, RHODA, consort of William Smith, in the 60th year of her age. For a number of years she has been a firm believer in the final holiness and happiness of the human family, and remained to the last unshaken in the belief, of this heart cheering doctrine. By her Christian deportment she secured the friendship and respect of the circle in which she moved. COM.

In Lansingburgh, N. Y. July 29th, Mrs. LUCY JANE, wife of Mr. Alvin W. Stockwell, in the 29th year of her age.—Her disease was the consumption, under the ravages of which she suffered long, and towards the close, very severely. Unwavering in the faith of God's universal and efficient grace, she was signally patient and resigned, often speaking of her approaching dissolution not only with composure but with the most joyful anticipations. Within a short space of her departure, (probably not more than half an hour,) feeling that she was going, her joy increased almost to rapture. She called her husband and little daughter, and other friends who were present to her, embraced and kissed them severally; and with a smile playing on her countenance, said, "I am going to my Savior." She also remarked to them with emphasis, "O, Universalism is good to live by, and it is a blessed doctrine to die by;" and without a struggle or a groan she fell asleep in Jesus. A more joyful and triumphant death has rarely been witnessed. Her funeral was attended the following day, at the Universalist Church, and a discourse delivered by the writer, from 1 John iii. 2.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED. TO WIVES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Chap. VII.—Expenditures.

"Now basket up the family of plagues,
That wastes our vitals; peculation, sale
Of honor, perjury, corruption, frauds
By forgery, by subterfuge of law,
By tricks and lies as numerous and as keen,
As the necessities their authors feel;
Then cast them closely bundled, every brat
At the right door, Profusion is the sire."

It can hardly be said that in the above lines, Cowper has described the effects of profusion in language too strong or significant. A profuse squandering of money, is undoubtedly the parent of an immense majority of the crimes which fill our prisons with tenants. When money is lavishly spent in every foolish extravagance, the demand is very likely soon to become greater than the supply; and hence to obtain that supply, there is danger of adopting fraudulent and dishonest measures which may lead to degradation and ruin. This has been the career of tens of thousands. To guard against such a course, is but the dictate of wisdom and plain common sense: and there is no guard more effectual than economy and prudence in all expenditures. When these principles are observed, there is no profusion, no extravagance, no squandering.

There can be no doubt that the pecuniary prosperity of every family, depends very much upon the course pursued by the wife. By her wastefulness and extravagance, she may bring her husband to poverty and keep him there—or by her prudence and economy, she can greatly aid him, in acquiring competency and wealth. In no transactions can economy be more profitably exercised, than in the expenditures of a family, and in nothing is it more necessary. There are numberless little expenses requisite in every family, and if proper precaution is not exercised, many trifling outgoes will be constantly recurring, which are not necessary. Now these small items, when taken in the aggregate, form an important portion of the expenses of the household. They amount to a sum in many families, which, could it be fully ascertained, would surprise husbands and wives who flatter themselves they are quite economical.

Dr. Franklin's favorite maxim was, "take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves." This care is peculiarly necessary in a family. Take care of the small expenses as well as the great. When an outlay of any magnitude is made, some attention is usually paid to prudence and economy in regard to the necessity which calls for it, and the disposition which is made of it. But in spending trifling sums, these considerations are often overlooked; because, as the amount is small, it is deemed of very little moment whether it is necessary or not. But although each separate trifle is of small consequence, when viewed alone, yet, as already remarked, the sum total of constantly occurring trifles, will amount in the course of the year, to no inconsiderable item in family expenditures.

It is peculiarly the province of the wife to attend to these things—to regulate the expenses of the household, and see that nothing is squandered or wasted. This she can do much better than the husband, because she is, or should be, much better qualified for it. From her location as head of the household—from her knowledge of domestic affairs

—she is more capable of judging whether expenses are necessary or unnecessary, than any other person. Hence she should not fail to put this knowledge into practice, and to be extremely cautious to conduct her household arrangements in a manner that shall prevent all prodigality, all wastefulness, all squandering. It is immaterial what the circumstances of the family are, in this respect.—Wealth furnishes no apology for wastefulness. Whatever is wasted, is lost, and no housewife can be held guiltless who so profusely squanders the gifts of Providence, that they fail to impart all their benefits.

The endeavor to be economical and prudent, should extend to all expenses of every description. A very striking inconsistency in this respect, is sometimes exhibited. Dr. Johnson speaks of a lady who, while squandering her husband's fortune by the excessive splendor in which she would indulge, refused to have a two shilling mango cut at her table, because it was not economical! And this is the manner in which many people proceed. In regard to houses, furniture, dress, and all that pertains to outward appearance, they will squander their means in the most wasteful profusion. But to atone for this prodigality, and satisfy any qualms of conscience which may arise, they will descend to miserly, penuriousness and absolute meanness, in regard to small and trifling expenses. And such people will flatter themselves that they are all the time exceedingly economical—mistaking meanness and parsimony, for prudence and economy. I have seen some people of this description. They would beat down the wages of servants and poor laboring persons, to the lowest possible degree, even to the splitting of cents and farthings—exerting all their ingenuity and cunning to obtain the greatest amount of labor, for the smallest remuneration that poverty can induce its victims to accept of! And this they call economy!—While, at the same time, they would squander more in one day for a needless dress, or a useless article of furniture, than they would save in months by their miserable parsimony. Such a course as this can not be called economical—it embodies the very spirit of littleness. True economy is not opposed to liberality, or generosity, or charity. Whoever close their ears to the calls of benevolence, under the plea of economy, dishonor that word, and convert it to the base purpose of concealing a selfish heart, and a miserly spirit.

I pray all young wives to avoid the mistaken notions of economy to which I have adverted—I pray them not to believe that in pinching with one hand, and squandering with the other, they are prudent and economical. They should look upon this practice in its true light, as uniting in one person, two extremes—parsimony and prodigality—either of them dishonorable when existing separately—but when united in the same person, presenting a monstrous compound of dishonor, utterly disgraceful to human nature! Economy should extend to all things—not only to small expenses, but large ones—not only to the comforts of life, but more especially and directly to the superfluities. In regard to personal, bodily wants, whatever is not necessary for a comfortable subsistence, and for decency in appearance, is superfluous, and should not be indulged in. And those who avoid those superfluities, have all the more means to answer the calls of charity, and to cultivate and beautify the mind, that inward person, whose adorning is of much more consequence than that of the outward.

The disposition to be economical should not ebb and flow like the tides of the ocean—prudent and saving to-day, and profuse and wasteful to-morrow.

Instead of this, economy should be established as a fixed and general principle, to be applied at all times and to all things. The wife should study economy. She should strive to understand its principles, its requirements, and its claims on herself and her family.

In her dress, the wife should be careful not to overstep the bounds of economy. She should be neatly, but not gaudily, dressed. This is a point which requires some attention. It may be somewhat excusable in a young lady, whose mind is vain and weak, to imagine that dress is the most important consideration in life, and to exhibit a great display of finery in her apparel. But a disposition of this character, is not at all excusable in a married woman. Let her condition be what it may, she has, or should have, something of more importance, of more value, of more usefulness, to occupy her attention, than dress. When she became a married woman, she left the circle of the thoughtless and giddy, and entered the class of the matrons of the land—a class whose manifest duty it is, to set a proper example of prudence, moderation and economy, to all their sex. Such an example every wife should strive to exhibit. Few things are more reprehensible and ridiculous, than for a married lady to look with manifest dislike upon her domestic duties, while she runs a reckless strife in the follies of fashion, with every flaunting belle in her vicinity! How much is it to the credit of a woman's intellect, how much does it speak the strength of her mind, the purity of her tastes, and of her disposition to be useful, to watch with eagerness for the most minute change which the ingenuity of the dress-maker invents, instead of watching the progress of her household concerns? on the tip-toe to be first to display a new shaped contortion in her bonnet, or a new-fangled cut in her garments, or to exhibit a dress of some strange, unheard of material, to which a silly, meaningless name has been appended to entrap the fashion-crazy, instead of being eager to be first in usefulness to her husband and her family? And yet this is the highway of fashion! It should rather be called, as it really is, the highway of folly and ruin! And every wife possessing one grain of common sense and one spark of sensibility, should avoid it as "the broad way which leads to death." Fashion is the enemy, and often the destroyer, of domestic peace and harmony. It is an enormous evil in our country—it "—— has littered all the land,

And bred, within the memory of no few,
A priesthood, such as Baal's was of old,
A people, such as never was till now.
It is a hungry vice:—it eats up all
That gives society its beauty, strength,
Convenience, and security and use:
* * * * * unties the knot
Of union, and converts the sacred band,
That holds mankind together, to a scourge."

Many a woman appeals to the law of Fashion for a justification of her folly and extravagance, as though its dictates were binding upon all, and should be considered as irreversible as the decrees of the Medes and Persians. But all truly intelligent and independent people, will spurn its yoke, and allow none of its dictates to coerce them into any habits in opposition to good taste, propriety, prudence, economy or generosity. I must repeat a remark which I may have before made—and would that I could so urge it upon the attention of my readers that they would realize its truth—that people never establish a worthy character, and never benefit themselves in the least possible degree in any respect, by foppish and gaudy apparel.

While it gains not the respect or confidence of the wise and worthy, it invariably excites the envy and bitterness of the weak minded and vain.

In addition to these considerations, the expense of following the extravagances of fashion, is by no means an inconsiderable item to be taken into the account by the wife. If the property of her husband is small, she squanders for useless ornament, means which might be profitably employed in some other manner, or which might at some future day, save him from a harassing and dangerous pressure in his business, or perhaps from bankruptcy itself. If her husband is wealthy, she throws away in needless finery sums of money, which, if bestowed upon proper objects of charity, would give relief and comfort to many a poor widow and her hungry and naked orphans. View this subject of extravagance in dress, in whatever light we may, it is a sin in the sight of God and man, and no individual can be held innocent who indulges in it. Hence it is all important that wives especially should strive to avoid this evil. They should study prudence and moderation.—And while arraying themselves in plain and neat apparel, should never indulge in any thing which has even the appearance of extravagance or wastefulness—following fashion no farther than fashion comports with economy, modesty and health.

In shopping and making her purchases generally, a wife should never lose sight of economy. There is one rule which should always be strictly adhered to—that is, never to purchase any thing which you do not really want. People are often led into needless expenses for want of proper firmness and reflection. On entering a store where a variety of goods is exhibited, they see many things they would be pleased to possess were they able, but which they do not actually need. The shopkeeper displays them in the most captivating manner, and dilates upon their value, and the cheap rate at which he will dispose of them, until at length they give way to the temptation and expend their money for that which is not actually necessary. The prudent wife must guard against these allurements. Whenever any thing is presented, which incites a desire to possess it, ask yourself the question—is it needed for myself or my family?—can I procure it at a reasonable price? If these inquiries can not be answered conscientiously in the affirmative, refrain steadfastly from the purchase, however desirable it may appear, or however pressingly it may be urged upon you.

There is an unfortunate practice which many people (male as well as female) fall into, which I must notice—that is, the custom of buying any thing, whether wanted or not, simply because it is cheap. In regard to this practice, I can not do better than to introduce the following description of a "bargain buyer." I find it without name or date, but should judge from the style, that it is from the "Spectator," and is probably the production of Addison or Steele.

"I am the unfortunate husband of a buyer of bargains. My wife has somewhere heard that a good housewife never has any thing to purchase when it is wanted. This maxim is often in her mouth, and always in her head. She is not one of those philosophical talkers, that speculate without practice, and learn sentences of wisdom only to repeat them: she is always making additions to her stores; she never looks into a broker's shop but she spies something that may be wanted some time; and it is impossible to make her pass the door of a house where she hears goods selling by auction.—Whatever she thinks cheap, she holds it the duty of an economist to buy; and in consequence of this maxim, we are encumbered on every side with useless lumber. The servants can scarcely creep to their beds through chests and boxes that surround them. The carpenter is employed once a week in building closets, fixing cupboards and fastening shelves. I had often observed that advertisements set her on fire; and therefore, pretending to emulate her laudable frugality, I forbade the newspaper to be taken any longer; but my precaution is vain. I know not by what fatality, or by what confederacy every catalogue of "genuine furniture" comes to her hand, every advertisement in a newspaper newly opened is in her pocket-book, and she knows before any of her neighbors when the stock of any man leaving off trade is to be sold cheap for ready money. Such intelligence is to my dear one, the Siren's song. No engagement, no duty, no interest, can withhold her from a sale, from which she always returns congratulating herself upon her dexterity at a bargain. As she can not bear to have anything incomplete, one purchase necessitates another; she has twenty feather-beds more than she can use, and a late sale has supplied her with a proportionate number of blankets, a large roll of linen for sheets, and five quilts for every bed, which she bought because the seller told her that if she would clear his hands he would let her have a bargain. Thus by hourly encroachments, my habitation is made narrower and narrower; the dining room is so crowded by tables, that dinner can scarcely be served; the parlor is decorated with so many piles of china, that I dare not step within the door; at every turn of the stairs I have a clock, and half the windows of the upper floor are darkened, that shelves may be set before them. She knows the loss of buying in small quantities, and we have, therefore, whole hogs, and quarters of oxen. Part of our meat is tainted before it is eaten, and part is thrown away because it is spoiled; but she persists in her system, and will never buy any thing by single penny-worths."

Although this description of a "bargain buyer" may be somewhat overdrawn, yet are there not many wives possessed with a mania quite similar to that of the good woman above described? An article may be very cheap, but unless it is actually needed, and can be put to some useful service; to purchase it would be but throwing money away.—It is true there is such a thing as a prudent forecast to be exercised; and it is very proper to purchase things that are not now, but soon will be wanted, if it can be done to greater advantage. But unless great precaution is exercised, there is danger that people will fancy they may want that which they will never stand in need of. There is a wide difference between purchasing what it is possible we may want at some future indefinite time, like the lady mentioned above, and buying what we clearly see we shall want within a certain period.

In all her expenditure, the wife should have expressly in view, her husband's income. If possible, she should never allow the outgoes to exceed the income; for this would soon bring poverty and want. In all cases where it is practicable, bring the expenses more or less within the income. This will in due time secure competency, if not wealth. The maxim of Dr. Franklin can and should be applied to the whole expenses of the family—"Spend less every day, than you earn." In the great majority of cases it depends much more upon the wife than the husband, to determine whether the expenditures of the household shall be economical or prodigal. If she is negligent and indifferent, a thousand things will run to waste—if she is prudent and saving, the fruit of these virtues will not only be manifest in her own discreet management, but also in the proceedings of her husband and her whole family; for in this, as in most other respects, the example of the wife exerts a powerful influence upon the entire household. In conclusion, allow me to urge every housewife to adopt "Economy" as her motto—economy in all that pertains to herself and her family—that true economy which is as equally removed from wasteful extravagance on the one hand, as it is from pinching parsimony on the other.

A GOOD NAME.

BY MISS E. ROUNSEVILLE.

Of how little value do a majority of mankind, apparently, esteem their own character. How frequently do they barter it for a mere bauble, and at the same time, bow with respectful, though forced deference, to him who scorns to stoop to the degrading traffic. Why this inconsistency? Is our own good name less beneficial to us, than our neighbor's is to him? The costly and brilliant gem that so beautifully glows upon the bosom of our friend; would it be unworthy preservation—of no consequence if in our own possession? We behold, and are constrained to acknowledge the homage it gains for him; why not seek to bind a similar one to our throbbing hearts? If we would each of us endeavor to profess and practice those virtues we most admire in others, what a glorious renovation would our world enjoy. Let us become, all that we desire our brother to be, and we shall find ourselves, truly, "but a little lower than the angels."

Am I wealthy? Do the far famed mines of Potosi and Golconda combine to fill, with their richest treasures my secret vaults to overflowing? Let the winds of heaven scatter them; let them sink to the hidden recesses of the fathomless deep—do friends as innumerable as the leaves of yonder forest, with hearts as true and invaluable as the northern star, attend my dreamy couch and gently guide me on my pathway? Let them be weary, faint, shrink from my sight; let them prove hollow-hearted—false—if I possess an unsullied reputation—a good character—nay, anything that bears the least resemblance to it, touch it not, I pray you; take even the last lingering drop of life's ebbing current, but let that remain; rob me not of it, I beseech you. Rob me not, at least, until thou shalt behold the clammy dews of death gathering upon this earth-cold brow, and the hungry grave yawning to receive my senseless remains!

A GENERAL PROFESSION OF FAITH.

As a denomination, Universalists have no other creed but the Bible. And as they believe that is sufficiently clear to decide all essential points, they feel perfectly safe in resting the matter of faith with its authority. It is, however, deemed profitable and necessary that our respective churches should adopt some expression of belief, by which our general sentiments may be known. The following is the Profession of faith adopted by the Universalist Society in this city. It was published in the Magazine and Advocate in 1831, was afterwards issued in pamphlet form by Br. Grosh, and is now republished, by request. A. R. B.

ARTICLE I.—Concerning God.

We believe in one, only, living, and true God; that he is a pure spirit, self-existent, immutable, eternal, infinite in wisdom, power, and goodness, and possesses every natural and moral perfection which can render his character amiable, lovely, reverend, and adorable. That he is the Creator, Upholder, Benefactor, and moral Governor of the universe; that he stands in the relation of Father to all mankind; that, as he hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth, we are his offspring; all have one Father, one God hath created us; that though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,) yet to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; that God is love, good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works; that he loveth all the things that are, and abhorreth nothing that his hands have made, for he never would have created any thing to have hated it; that he is a just God and a Saviour, who will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth; that he worketh all things after the council of his own will; that all his attributes harmonize; that in him, mercy and truth have met together, righteousness and peace have embraced each other.—1 Cor. viii: 4-6. Deut. vi: 4. Mark xii: 29. John iv: 24. Mal. ii: 10. and iii: 6. Gen. xvii: 1. Ps. cxlviii: 5, xlv: 9, and lxxxv: 10. Wisdom xi: 23. Isa. xlv: 21. Acts xvii: 24-28. 1 Tim. ii: 4, 5. Eph. i: 11. 1 John iv: 8, 16.

ARTICLE II.—Concerning Christ.

We believe in one Lord, Jesus Christ. That Jesus of Nazareth is the promised Messiah, the one Mediator between God and men; the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world, the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person; that to him the Divine Spirit was given without measure, and hence, God hath made him both Lord and Christ; given all things into his hand—even power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father hath given him; that all that the Father giveth him, shall so come to him as not to be cast out; that he was sent to reveal the true character of God to the world, and save mankind from sin, misery, darkness, and death; that, to this end, he gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time; is a propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world; that having been crucified on the cross, he arose from the dead on the third day, ascended up on high, leading captivity captive, and giving gifts, unto men; and having brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel, he shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied; shall reconcile all things unto God, by the blood of his cross; that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive; that he shall reign in his mediatorial kingdom till all things shall be subdued unto him; till death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed; till every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess him Lord, to the glory of God the Father, and that he will then deliver up the kingdom to God, the Father, that God may be all in all.—1 Cor. viii: 6, and xv: 3, 4, 22, 24–28. 1 Tim. ii: 5, 6. 1 John ii: 2, and iv: 14. John: 45. iii: 34, 35, vi: 37, and xvii: 2, 3. Matt. i: 21. Heb. i: 3. Rom. xiv: 9. Eph. iv: 8. 2 Tim. i: 10. Isa. liii: 11. Col. i: 20. Phil. ii: 10, 11.

ARTICLE III.—Concerning the Scriptures.

We believe in the Divine authenticity of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments—that they contain a true and faithful record of the revelation of God to men, and are a perfect and infallible rule of faith and practice; that the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the holy spirit; and that all Scripture given by inspiration of God, is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness, that the servants of God may be thoroughly furnished unto all good works, and become wise unto salvation.—2 Peter i: 21. 2 Tim. iii: 15–17.

ARTICLE IV.—Concerning the motive to obedience.

We believe that, as God hath commended his love to us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us, it is our duty to love him because he first loved us; that if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another; that the goodness of God leadeth to repentance; that the grace of God which bringeth salvation to all men, hath appeared, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; and that those who believe in God, ought to be careful to maintain good works; for these things are good and profitable unto men; that Christ should be our pattern, and his love should constrain us to walk in his footsteps.—Rom. ii: 4, and v: 8. 2 Cor. v: 14, 15. Tit. ii: 11, 12, and iii: 8. 1 John iv: 11, 19.

ARTICLE V.—Concerning the reward of obedience.

We believe that great peace have they who love God's law, and nothing shall offend them; they are like trees planted by the rivers of water, that bring forth their fruit in season; their leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever they do shall prosper; that Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace; that she is a tree of life to them that lay hold of her, and happy is every one that retaineth her; that the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace; that Christ's yoke is easy and his burden light and all who come to him will find rest to their souls; that we who have believed do enter into rest; that, though God is the Saviour of all men, he is especially so of the believer, and that whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, and is not a forgetful hearer but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed.—Ps. i: 3, and cxix: 165. Prov. iii: 17, 18. Matt. xi: 28–30. Heb. iv: 3. 1 Tim. iv: 10. James i: 25, and iii: 18.

ARTICLE VI.—Concerning the punishment of disobedience.

We believe that God, as the righteous and moral Governor of the universe, will render to every man according to his deeds; tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first and also of the Gentile; that he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons; that the way of transgressors is hard; that the wicked are like the troubled sea when it can not rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt; for there is no peace, saith our God, to the wicked.—Rom. ii: 6, 9. Col. iii: 25. Prov. xiii: 15. Matt. xvi: 27. Isa. lvii: 20, 21.

ARTICLE VII.—Concerning the remedial design and limitation of punishment.

We believe the Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies; that he will not contend forever nor be always wroth, lest the spirit should fail before him, and the souls he has made; that although he may apparently forsake his children for a small moment, yet with great mercies will he gather them; in a little wrath he may hide his face from them for a moment, but with everlasting kindness will he have mercy on them, and heal them, and lead them also, and restore comforts unto them; that whom he loveth he chasteneth (and he loveth and chasteneth all) for their profit, that they may be partakers of his holiness, and be enabled afterwards to say, "before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept thy word."—Lam. iii: 31, 32. Isa. liv: 7, 8, and lvii: 16–18. Heb. xii: 7–11. Ps. lxxxix: 30–35, and cxix: 67.

ARTICLE VIII.—Concerning Baptism.

As there is a difference of opinion among the sincere followers of Christ, in regard to this ordinance, and this difference ought not to separate true disciples one from another, we believe it is the duty of every one to follow the dictates of his or her conscience, leaving each to judge, both of the subject and mode of Baptism, as shall seem most consistent with Scripture and reason. Matt. xxviii: 19. John iv: 2. Acts ii: 41. Rom. vi: 3, 4, 5, and xiv: 1–6. 1 Cor. i: 14–17. 1 Pet. iii: 21.

ARTICLE IX.—Concerning repentance, faith, and love.

We believe, according to the divine doctrine and preaching of Christ and his apostles, that repentance toward God for sin, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and love to God and our fellow-creatures, are means of grace appointed by God, and essential to our salvation, and glory.—Matt. iv: 16, and xxii: 37–40. Mark i: 15. Acts iii: 19, v: 31, and xx: 21. Heb. xi: 6. 1 John iii: 23, 24.

ARTICLE X.—Concerning the extent of salvation.

We believe that God, who is rich in mercy, who turneth the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned, who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, whose people shall be willing in the day of his power, will, in the dispensation of the fulness of times, gather together in one all things, in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him; and that every (intelligent) creature in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, shall at last unite in the song of Moses and the Lamb, saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever.—Eph. i: 6–11, and ii: 4. Prov. xxi: 1. Ps. cx: 3. Rev. v: 13.

ANECDOTE.

Some years since, in Ellicottville one of the leading members of the Calvinistic faith, one day went out in search of his cattle, which ran in the forest; but unfortunately he lost his way, and wandered about till nearly night. Weary and faint with his wanderings, he at last espied a clearing, and joyfully made his way to it, and thankful was he when he found himself again in the society of his fellow creatures. The country being new, he had gone about ten miles from home. A good man received him kindly into his house, administering bountifully to his wants. After refreshing himself, the conversation turned upon religious subjects. Our wanderer was much pleased to find his host a clergyman. To what order did he belong, was the purport of his first question. "Not any," was the reply. "Well, what do you call yourself, sir?" "Why, I call myself a liberal Baptist, sir." "Well, well," said the wanderer, "I am happy, for we have not had a sermon preached in our vicinity in a long time. And now you must come out and preach to us next Sabbath, will you, sir?" "Perhaps you will not like my preaching." "Do not give yourself any uneasiness about that, sir, for we are glad to get any!"

Our hero returned, and gave out the appointment. He came up to one of his neighbors the next morning after his return, filled with animation. "Good morning, good morning, Br. H., I have found a preacher; and he is coming to preach next Sunday, he does not belong to any church, but he calls himself a liberal Baptist." "What! what!" says the old gentleman, "a liberal Baptist?" "Yes, yes, a liberal Baptist; and he is the nearest like us of any man I have seen in some time."

At the appointed hour the preacher came, and the house was filled with Baptists, Methodists, and Universalists, all anxious to hear the new preacher. He commenced with his discourse by feeling for the pillars on which the temple of modern orthodoxy stood, and he got his hands upon them, and bowed himself, and the temple fell, and great was the fall thereof. Then he began to remove the rubbish, and to dig deep for the rock Christ Jesus; and then he began to build the temple of Universalism upon that rock. He would hew out a stone and place it upon the foundation; then another, and another, and cement them with the mortar of truth, until he had a building that all the combined energies of earth and hell, can not demolish. No sooner had he closed, than our hero jumped up and accused him of being a false teacher, and a wolf in sheep's clothing, in that he professed to be a liberal Baptist. "But," said he, "he is not a liberal Baptist, and never was; and now my friends, do not believe a word he has said, for it is all a lie." The stranger replied mildly but satisfactorily, and then turned to the accuser and said, "Brother Parker, will you pray?" "No! I don't feel the spirit of prayer now!" P. HOWE, JR.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

SECTION VI.

Multitudes attend John's Baptism.

MATT. III: 5. Then MARK I: 4. John did went out to him Jerusalem, baptize in the wilderness, and all Judea, and all the and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins.

6 And were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins.

NOTE. Baptizo is ap-dea, and they of Jerusalem, plied to the washing of the and were all baptized of hands in Mark vii: 4, Luke him in the river of Jordan, xi: 38, confessing their sins.

MATT. III: 6. Confessing their sins. We are not to infer from this, that each individual baptized, made a particular confession, as is done sometimes in confession meetings at the present day; but that there was a general acknowledgment of guilt. This is all that the words necessarily or naturally imply.

Mark i: 4. Baptism of repentance. See the note on Luke iii: 3.

Remission of sins. That is, the putting away of sins, which every person does who reforms. The repentance which John preached, did not allow a man to retain his sins; but made it necessary that he put them away. The Greek term aphesis here rendered remission, and often rendered forgiveness, is made up of apo, from, and iemì, to send, meaning, when associated, to send from or put away.

GENERAL REMARKS.—Much controversy has existed in the Christian church respecting the ordinance of baptism; and though all must acknowledge that the ordinance is merely intended to represent the purification of the mind, yet many Christians in their zeal for the figure, have overlooked and disregarded the thing represented. Such persons, though they may have been baptized with water, have never experienced the baptism of repentance, or the washing of regeneration. Respecting the ordinance of baptism, it may be remarked that it did not originate with Christianity, but was a part of the Jewish religion. And we have yet to learn that it now possesses any more virtue than it did under the Jewish dispensation. That it may have a good moral influence if attended to with proper motives, there can be no doubt; but after all, it is the substance, and not the shadow, than is in itself, of any value.

As to the manner of baptism, it would perhaps be presuming to offer an opinion, since I have employed but a little time in studying the Scriptures in reference to that point, and since others who have employed much research and biblical erudition in investigating the subject, are far from being agreed respecting it. And as I do not believe that my eternal destiny depends upon a right decision respecting baptism, I shall not be particularly disturbed in my mind if I do not devote much attention to the subject, or trouble my readers with many remarks respecting it, while more important matters demand our attention.

John warns the Jews of their impending destruction.

MATT. III: 7. But when LUKE III: 7. Then said he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to him to be baptized with him, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath of God to come?

8 Bring forth, therefore, fruits meet for repentance, and begin not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.

9 And think not to say in yourselves, we have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.

Matt. iii: 7. Pharisees. This sect took its rise, between 150 and 200 years before Christ. They were called Pharisees from a Hebrew term that signifies to separate (pharash.) because they "professed an uncommon separation from the apparel and customs of the world." They are supposed originally to have been a very virtuous sect; but in the time of the Saviour they were exceedingly corrupt.

Sadducees. The Sadducees took their rise between 200 and 260 years before the Christian era. Their founder was one Sadoc, after whom the sect was named. Though they were better than the Pharisees, still they were quite corrupt.

Generation of vipers. A brood of poisonous reptiles—an appropriate representation of their vile and degraded characters.

Wrath to come. Dr. George Campbell renders this phrase impending vengeance, and supposes it to refer to the calamities about to fall on the Jewish nation. That it has such reference is plain from the occasion that called it forth.

It was not till John saw the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, that he refers to the subject with which that phrase is connected; giving us to understand that it was something in which they were particularly interested. Dr. Adam Clarke, Lightfoot, Pierce, Hammond, Gill, and Kenrick, all suppose the phrase to have this application. See Notes on the Parables by Thomas Whittemore.

9. We have Abraham to our father. The Jews prided themselves on their affinity with Abraham; and on that account promised themselves impunity in the commission of crime. It was to remove this impression that John warned them against trusting in their relation to Abraham. Hence he goes on to assure them that the just judgments of God would inevitably fall upon them, unless they made their escape by immediate repentance.

God is able of these stones, etc. Rather than to violate the principles of justice, God would perform a miracle that should furnish him objects on whom to bestow the blessings promised to Abraham and his seed. By this language John would assure the Jews, in the most forcible manner, that their dependence upon Abraham was vain; and that they could not receive the blessings promised to his seed, unless they reformed their characters.

The language ascribed to John by Luke, being nearly the same with that of Matthew in the whole paragraph we have been explaining, does not require a separate consideration.

"WORSHIP GOD."

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

I shall discourse upon the privilege and duty of Christian worship. I hope the reader will contemplate with all seriousness, the hints I may throw out upon this subject, and be induced to discharge, with all fidelity, a duty so obviously important in the promotion of human happiness. I can conceive no service more agreeable, no duty more plain, no work in which the advantages are so immediate and certain, as the worship of Almighty God. It gives to our minds just conceptions of the divine character and perfections. It shows us our relations to God and one another, makes us feel them, and inclines us to live worthy of them. It qualifies the soul for the most pure and perfect enjoyments of earth, and elevates it to the perennial joys of heaven. It reconciles and soothes the mind, under every condition of life, by elevating all our thoughts and affections above the darkness and change of time, and fixing them in devout meditation upon the perfection and benevolence of God's government. It gives to ardent desire the bright assurance of another, a better, and a happier life beyond the dizzy scenes of the present, where ignorance and error shall not detract from the soul's highest attainments, nor vice disturb its purest bliss; where no care, no anxiety, no ungratified wish, shall ever intrude to separate between the living, burning sentiment, and the pure and holy object of every good desire.

It may be said with strict regard to truth, that man is naturally a religious being. He feels that there is something greater, wiser, better, and more stable than himself, and that that something deserves and demands his respect, obedience and worship. This fact is evidenced on every page of human history. It is seen not less in the character of the pagan than the Jew, Mahomedan, and Christian; not less in the barbarian than in the civilized and enlightened among the nations. The Brahmin pyre, the Grecian hecatomb, the Mehkan kaaba, the Hebrew altar, the Christian temple, nay the emblems of devotion among all nations, all give full proof of a reverence for a superior Intelligence. The impress of a Divinity is stamped on every mind. Error may deface its brightness. Prejudice and bigotry, produced by a false education, may misdirect it. Ignorance and vice may seem to obliterate it altogether. But it can not be destroyed. The light of Gospel truth, which is destined to "enlighten every man coming into the world," shall shine into the understanding, when intervening obstacles are removed, and then religion like the splendid invention of Daguerre, will concentrate the rays of divine glory and fix anew the heavenly image upon the soul. Man shall then "worship God" in spirit and in truth—in the beauty of holiness.

Christianity is the instrument through which the light and glory of the divine perfections are communicated most directly to the mind; other systems of religion and philosophy, like the telescope, microscope, and camera obscura, may have given practical views, presented outlines by which to form a tolerable transcript though imperfect in theory, and incorrect in detail, yet extensively adopted for want of a better. But to Christianity belongs the high honor of presenting to man the "brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of his person." It was in Christ that shone all the perfections of the Godhead bodily—the divine perfections in human form. In the person, and teaching, and conduct of Jesus were reflected, perfect in all their parts and wise in their adaptedness, the moral principles of the divine government; for he, though tempted in all things as we are, did no sin, neither was guile in his mouth. When raised from the tomb and ascended to the Father, he showed the complete conquest over evil; for the powers of darkness then fell, and truth, and grace, and love, were then declared triumphant. A light, and glory, and beauty, and perfection then shone resplendent around the throne of the Eternal, and he was shown to be the Lord Jehovah, the God of all might and majesty, the Alpha and Omega, the all in all.

The light of joy should play on every countenance, the sentiment of gratitude kindle in every soul that is permitted to "worship God," under the teachings and influence of Christianity. It is in this alone that the character of the Supreme object of all true worship is distinctly presented to the mind, for in a manner calculated to produce respect and reverence, or beget confidence and hope, without which no worship can be genuine, acceptable to God, or profitable to man. Other systems may present as a God of power, the God of wisdom, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and manifold gods of every form and character which imagination can conceive, but none, save Christianity, ever presented the eternal, ever-living, never-changing Jehovah as the Father and Friend, and Saviour of all his rational creatures.

Nature, indeed, may afford us simple and correct lessons in first principles, in the rudiments of devotion; and I would not for a moment, in any shape, detract from the sweet delight the humble worshipper feels, who kneels and adores at nature's altar only. I too have drank in the holy inspirations of this beauty and loveliness. I have loved to go forth in nature's ample temple, and gaze with open eyes upon the charms and glories all around. My heart has kindled with a holy fire as I traced the footsteps of Divinity in every shrub and flower, in every tree and forest, in every will and river, in every spring and ocean; warbled by every rural songster; borne on the wings of every breeze, sparkling in every dew-drop, smiling in every star, and filling every point in the vast creation.

But nature alone, however well its lessons may be understood, can not teach us all the joys of worship; for it does not present us the character of a God, perfect and benevolent in all his government. In other words, it does not satisfy the mind on every inquiry which will arise in regard to the purity and perfection of God's government, respecting the ultimate condition of ourselves and race. I own that nature, in a good degree, portrays his wisdom, power, and goodness. But it does not reveal to us fully his will and pleasure concerning us, and no man can feel implicit confidence in a master whose intentions are unknown. By inference we may for a time, silence, if we do not satisfy, the inquiry ever alive in the souls of mortals respecting the designs of the Creator. But amid the changes of earth, the wreck and ruin we often behold, what page in nature's book can teach us their solution? When man nears the confines of the grave, and feels that all which was lovely and dear is departing for ever, and that he is soon to lay himself down in the silence, in the darkness and dampness of death, what chapter and verse will then remove all his doubts, dissipate all his fears, and give the bright assurance that if he dies he shall live again, and live for ever! Can he adduce such hope from the worm which in appearance dies, lies dormant, turns chrysalis, and, at length, spreads its light wings in a new, and changed, and improved condition? Those wings are frail; that body, though light, almost aerial, is mortal still—is of earth and must soon die again. A hope, resting on such foundation, must end in disappointment. In that hour the soul needs some other reliance, some surer prop than this world's wisdom. We can not, then, worship God as manifest in nature only, and be satisfied. We can not then lift up holy hands without doubting. One hand, at least, will cling to earth with the intensity of life, while we feel that all with us will soon be over, nature's work be done, and all be terminated, be terminated forever in our complete extinction—in dark, blank oblivion.

With what expressions of delight does the believer listen to the messages of grace and truth divine? How exquisite the joy that thrills through all his soul, on beholding the revelations of truth and salvation, present and eternal, as presented in noon-day splendor, in the clear light of demonstration, by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, by which all men are permitted to hope in endless life, and love, and joy through him. In the language of poetry,

"God in the person of his Son,
Has all his mightiest works outdone."

The character of God is presented in the Gospel in a new and favorable light, such as the world never saw before. Many additional inducements are presented sufficiently strong, irresistibly powerful, to incline every reflecting mind to "worship God," to cultivate the pure spirit of devotion, and consecrate the noblest faculties to his service. Allow me to state with brevity and without argument or illustration some of the many reasons why we should "worship God."

1. God is our Father. He is the Father of all. Hence all should worship him. None but Christians can worship him as such. 2. God has made worship necessary to the perfection of our happiness. He does not require us to worship him as slaves revere a tyrant. He presents to us the perfect character of a Father, and bids us respect and revere him in order to be happy. 3. He designs all men to engage in his worship and be happy. See Ps. lxxxvi: 9. Rev. xv: 4. Isa. xlv: 23, 24. Phil. ii: 10. Rev. v: 13. The fact that we are intended to worship God and be happy, is a powerful argument why we should begin even now, while it is called to day. 4. God will execute his designs, and all men shall worship him. See Eph. i: 10, 11. Dan. iv: 35. 5. The last reason I shall mention is the advantage which results to the worshipper in attending to this duty. Under this head it may be said we "worship God," first, because it will bring us nigh to him; second, because it will reconcile us to the allotments of his providence; third, because it will reconcile us to one another; fourth, because it will save us from all low and debasing thoughts and affections; fifth, because it will fit us for every condition of life, for death itself, and the untried realities of eternity.

I have not spoken of the means how to "worship God." I will not do it now. Suffice it to say God requires the heart, the whole heart, the entire consecration of soul and body to his service; which, by the way, is the true service of ourselves and humanity. It is to me of little concern how the spirit of worship manifests itself outwardly; whether in the unuttered devotions of the Quaker, the profound contemplations of the philosopher, the clamorous zeal of the new convert, the warm and steady flow of grateful feeling of the enlightened and liberal Christian, or in any other way. Where the spirit of the Lord is there is liberty. Only let us "worship God," truly, sincerely, heartily—"in spirit and in truth;" and never shun to let our joys be known, when such confession may encourage some brother or sister to go and do likewise. To me it is worship to listen to the warblers of the wood, to gaze upon the flowering fields; to join in prayer and songs of praise in the Christian temple, at the family altar, or in the closet silence of the soul.

Brethren and sisters, believers, think of your duty; inquire it out, and faithfully perform it. Forget not—no, never forget to "worship God," your Father, Friend and Saviour. Worship him in the beauty of holiness. Never hold back. He will meet you half way. He is nigh unto all that call upon him. In life, in health, in youth, in age, in death, throughout eternity, may we all worship Him who is the light of our joy, and the strength of all his saints.

JESUS PREACHING TO SINNERS....No. II.

In the first two parables to which we have alluded, it is plainly taught that all that wander, shall be sought, found, and brought back. Here the owner is represented as doing all himself. Upon his ability alone depends the success of his desires. We are thus taught that the certainty of salvation for the sinner, depends on nothing but the ability of the Most High to accomplish the work to which he devotes his every energy. But in these, no mention is made of the punishment incurred. True, in the case of the sheep we should fancy him wandering alone, unguarded, and unprotected for, over barren fields, and rocks, and desert plains; beset on all sides with dangers and none to protect him; hungry, with none to feed, and thirsty with none to lead him to the cool waters. But our Saviour did not choose to leave it for the imagination of the hearers to devise the transgressor's punishment. In the parable of the prodigal he clearly and explicitly pointed it out. The boy regarded not the admonitions of his parent, and that they might not reach him in his career of profligacy, "he went into a far country." He sought, as congenial spirits and fit associates, the vain and wicked. His substance was wasted as the inevitable consequence of his folly; there arose a famine in the land, as there very naturally would in a land of such inhabitants, and he was in want. So low was he reduced, that he joined himself to a stranger in the capacity of a swine herd, and divided with his charge the husks, (the fruit of the caroub tree) on which they fed. Unhappy youth! Fostered in a fond father's house, where plenty spread her board and held her daily festival, how keenly, how sensibly, must he have felt the humiliation of his degraded condition. How great the contrast! There the beloved and respected son of an honored and noble father—here a ragged, hungry, despised swine herd, who fain would share with the swine in their allowance of food. And no one pities, no one relieves him. Fallen was he indeed! Aggravated was his wretchedness! Swine were, by the Jews, considered as accursed of God. Their existence in Judea, was tolerated only because it opened and sustained a profitable traffic with the Gentiles; and there were but few things a Jew would not do for money. Yet the herdsman was ranked with the beast he tended. It was the basest, vilest, and most degraded of all employments. And even in Gentile countries, we are told swine herds were not allowed to mingle in civil society, or to enter the house of worship; nor would the dregs of society contract matrimonial alliances with them. Thus did Jesus picture the certain and fearful punishment which awaits the disobedient, and follows close upon transgression.

But the Teacher's design was not accomplished when he had illustrated the nature and consequence of sin. He proceeded in the same lucid manner to exemplify the tendency and result of punishment. He represented the young man as "coming to himself." His miseries reminded him that he was a wanderer from home. "In my father's house," said he, "is bread enough and to spare, while I perish with hunger. I will arise and go to my father, and say to him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. Make me as one of thy hired servants." This was not an idle resolution—a waking dream; but the determination of the heart. "He arose and came to his father." And mark the manner of his coming. He made no claim—no excuse. He did not say, "Although I did wrong in leaving you, yet I have done nobly in returning to you." He saw no merit in being compelled by starvation to return from his wicked ways. Nothing of the kind entered his mind. He resolved to throw himself upon his father's bounty. His highest wish would be gratified if he was but a servant in the home of his youth, and allowed to fill himself with bread.

And yet the subject was not complete. The sinner's reception must be illustrated. This is done. When the repentant child was yet a great way off, the quick eye of affection pointed him out to the sorrowing father. In the crippled tread of a ragged, filthy, barefooted beggar, he saw and knew his own, his darling boy. The sorrow and pain this son had caused him fled away. A father's affection conquered all. His bosom burning with compassion, his heart melting with love, he ran and fell on his neck and kissed him. Could there be affection stronger than this? He regarded not his son's request to be a servant, but sent for the best robe to be put on him, and a ring for his finger, and shoes for his feet. "Bring," said he, "the fatted calf. Let us make merry, for my son was lost and is found; was dead and is alive!"

Certainly if all poor, miserable wanderers from the path of rectitude knew of this kind father, and of his willingness to welcome them home, they would no longer feed on swine's food. Our Saviour here first pointed out the error of the Jews. They supposed that sinners had forfeited the love of God. But it was not so. God loved them still, and would not forget them, neither lose them. Then he showed them, as in a picture, the real and inevitable consequence of forsaking God, and the remedy in all cases, and the only effectual remedy to be applied. The punishment was of such a nature as inevitably to bring the sinner to a realizing sense of his situation; and it was to last until the object was accomplished. But whenever he came to himself and arose and went home, he was sure of finding a fond father ready to strip off his rags and put on the robe, to press him to his bosom, kill the fatted calf, rejoice and be merry. This done, and the subject was fully illustrated.

It is worthy of more particular remark, that in neither one of these three parables do we see the whole subject illustrated. So impossible is it to find language to speak, or things by which to represent the dealings of God with man, that even Jesus could not make himself understood when he wished to remove old and erroneous ideas, and substitute new and correct ones, without speaking three parables, each differing from the other. Thus, the parable of the sheep illustrates the care and watchfulness of God; and the final return of all things to the fold of the shepherd. But the sheep is not a true representation of the soul, inasmuch as the former is perishing in its nature, and the latter immortal. The piece of silver in the next parable atones, for this deficiency, and represents the soul, which, though lost and covered with filth, will remain the same pure essence, uncorrupted and incorruptible; and when the owner finds and cleanses it, it will be the same priceless gem it ever was. But the illustration is still incomplete. God does not palsy the arm which is raised to do evil, nor chain the feet that would go astray. He is an unseen actor in all this. He pursues his sheep with chastenings. He searches for his silver with a rod. This is represented and the illustration made complete in the last parable, in the sufferings and consequent reformation of the prodigal. When we view these parables separately, we do not catch the spirit, nor comprehend the full meaning of Jesus. But when we unite them as he united them, they delight and instruct us.

Another particular connected with these parables, and found alike in all of them, being the only point on which they perfectly agree, and the one to which it appears all the rest are subordinate, is that every thing is brought back to its owner and home at last—nothing is lost. There was no third son who went away and did not come to himself, and say, "I will go to my father's house." And from this it is evident that just as certain as some wander, and suffer in consequence, just so certain all that do thus wander will be brought back. ITHURIEL.

SPIRITUAL ASPIRINGS.

There are certain subjects in which every intelligent being on earth feels an interest. No matter what may be the condition of man—whether ignorant or learned, high or low, rich or poor, he is attached to every thing, which he believes to be a promoter of his present happiness. His pursuit after happiness will be varied according to his knowledge of the nature of and aids to real enjoyment. If wise, he will, under the promptings of his native feelings walk in the path of wisdom, and be somewhat gratified in the attainment of the cherished prize which he has in view. He will be gratified so far as the wise can expect gratification in this mortal state. But if he is ignorant he will be likely to follow whatever dazzles most, and yield to those impulses which are strongest in his mind. And the dazzling lustre of fancied pleasure is frequently false; the blind impulses of the mind are generally perverted or misapplied. Hence they end in disappointment. But whether successful or not, the ardor of his natural desires is not abated. He still feels an interest in everything which relates to his present spiritual welfare.

Now if he will examine himself, he will find that this feeling, those desires, are striving to teach him wisdom. He desires happiness, and this propensity of his nature should teach him that there is something within, which asks not for the fancied ease of indolence and indifference, nor for the gratification of the earthly appetites alone. These may beguile the hour, but they soon pass away and often leave a sting behind. The best of transitory bliss, unassisted by that wisdom which cometh down from above, would pall the heart of the possessor and leave him unsatisfied. Something within him desires to know what will be its future condition. What will satisfy these desires? Must not something be added to the best of perishable enjoyments? Can man be contented to lay aside all knowledge of the future, and live in the belief that all happiness, and all consciousness, end in the grave? No! However ignorant he may be, he finds that prosperity in the ordinary acceptation of the word, is not altogether sufficient to give him happiness.

Man possesses a mind—a faculty which reaches, in spite of himself, higher than the amusements and occupations of this world. True, it has interests to draw it down to earth, and it may and will find peace in the discharge of duty; it can not find peace without it; but it also needs higher food. To the joys of faithfulness and integrity must be added the confidence that this earth is not our abiding place, that this body is not our most glorious tabernacle. In the midst of its occupations on earth, it will pine for brighter and purer scenes, and strive to paint upon the horizon of its temporal existence the image of higher hopes and holier occupations. It may hold in its possession, wealth, power, fame, worldly ease, and all their kindred accomplishments—it may bow its powers in the deepest fervor—it may engage in the most agonizing religious worship that was ever poured out upon the altar of bigotry or superstition—but all these are of the earth earthy; it has not whereof it may glory through Jesus Christ in those things that pertain to God, and to a knowledge of his will and designs.

Here then is a subject which concerns man as a religious being. Let us view him in this capacity, and see what will satisfy his spiritual longings. Let any individual go among the Heathen and worship their senseless gods; or let him erect a modern Baal in his own household, and clothe him with all the imaginary attributes which have been ascribed to his namesake of old. Let him fancy his god a fickle being, as the gods of men were and are always supposed to be; hating to-day and loving to-morrow; favoring one nation with his special presence at the expense of another; in one place one hour and in another the next; leaguering himself with other spiritual beings, for the purpose of introducing confusion and misery among men, that he may laugh over them, and gratify his insatiable wrath; himself, or some agent in his employ, building some dismal tartarus, or deep infernus, whose walls are laid in darkness, whose only ray of light is the flashings of vengeance, and whose only praise is the howlings of remediless damnation! Would a man with such fancies be happy? It is needless to ask the question of any who know themselves, and what happiness is. Where are the innate longings of the soul to worship something superlatively excellent, beautiful and good? Where are its desires for lofty, spiritual devotion? Where are its hopes of happiness—its impulse to virtue—its connecting link which binds the immaterial to the eternal? All unsatisfied—disappointed—groaning under the weight of a living death!

Let the reader cast his eye where he will, and he will find a similar result attending all those who reject the truth of God, or who pervert it that they may cherish the imaginings of man. It is not natural for man to live without some gleams of that light which gilds the page of life with faith and hope, and moral purity. He can not live a spiritual life, without this light to show him that the life which now is, is but the pledge of another and a holier. But let him have this light, and he is happy. He sees—what his soul and his desires taught him must exist before it was revealed to him, and what he knew he needed to guide him to the fountain of all excellence—truth. Truth, which holds no cruel anathema for his former ignorance, and doubt, and iniquity; but which reproves in mercy, and leads him along the path of wisdom, that he may see how much he has lost in his past life, and thus be induced to faithfulness and perseverance in future. Truth, which mocks not his high aspirations, but gently raises him higher and yet higher in devotion, the nearer he approaches to a knowledge of God, and Jesus Christ, the Sent of God.

"MIND YOUR BUSINESS."

There was much sterling good sense and sound morality taught on these olden-time cents which we occasionally meet with, and whose principal motto we have placed at the head of this article. The circle of links united in one chain, enclosing (I believe,) the hour glass with its fast ebbing sands, and the warning "time passes," was well calculated to remind men of their union, as well as of the union of the states of this infant confederacy—to impress on their minds the preciousness of that fast dissipating inheritance which is to many all they have in the world, and to all the most valuable property which is bestowed upon them—and to teach them to "mind their business." If every individual link in the great chain of society will mind his own business faithfully, it must follow, as a matter of course, that the entire business of the whole community will be most effectually attended to. And even admitting that circumstances may occur to prevent some from successfully attending to their affairs, those who have done so, will be far better able to help these unfortunates. Thus the entire circling chain will draw along the several links, and the success must finally be complete. Here is the lesson of the chain. The whole is made up of its parts. Each part attended to secures entire success. That success can not be complete, unless every link is attended to—for the good of the whole consists in the good of every one of its parts.

Frequently, when business crowds and the want of more time to accomplish the work on hand is most severely felt, some one—a good natured friend—will call to get you to read and praise his book, or to tell you of his peculiar and private troubles and afflictions, or to have a sociable chat with you about the hundred nothings that make up the circle of ideas which revolve so rapidly through his brain by long usage to their mill-horse round, that he really thinks he must be a very clever man to think so rapidly! I never am thus pressed for want of time, and bored by such an interruption, that I do not wish I had one of those old pennies to present to my tormentor. Were I able, I certainly would buy up a lot of them and keep them in an open box on my desk, so as to be able to circulate their silent teachings in community. Why, when some of our business men commenced coining substitutes for cents, as they did a few years ago, why did not some one get a die constructed to give us a lot of that good old pattern?

"I only ask you to read it—it contains only 180 or 200 pages, and will not take up much time"—says your kind friend. But, my dear Sir, I have not any time to spare—I have copy to prepare, editorial to write, a proof sheet to read, two sermons to revise, myself to shave, dress and get ready to go 25 miles (to the place where I am to preach to-morrow,) and all this must be done to-day, so that I can not possibly oblige you. "Well—well—I am sure I feel for you—I have often thought you had too much for one man to do—but I want your opinion of my book, and as you have so little time, you can omit the preface and introduction, and skip over the third and the sixth chapters, and just read the rest." Indeed, Sir, I can not read a page of it—my time is not sufficient to enable me to do what requires my attention without your book. But the tormentor is not to be shaken off in this manner—he reiterates his request again and again, lessening every time the number of pages he would have you read, until out of all patience you tell him plumply you will not read a page of it—that he has already kept you from pressing business for a whole hour—when he goes off quite offended, saying that you might have read all he asked you to read in that time; and perhaps reports you abroad as a surly, disobliging, uncivil fellow! Oh, if I only had had one of those old pennies, what a suitable gift would it have been for the persecutor—and what a precious hour might it have saved me, besides the loss of temper and of reputation. So much for the lesson taught by the hour glass and its motto. Time is an estate. He that has little to do, needs but little time to do it in. But it is downright robbery—taking away a man's farm, rood by rood and acre by acre—to call upon a poor preacher, or editor, or other person of business, when they want more time to labor in than six days to the week, and to take up their precious moments, whether they will or not. First ask the man, whether he has time to spare for such and such business or amusement—and if he has, how much time; and govern yourself accordingly. Depend upon it, you will not be a loser by your courtesy and honesty. For such a man, I would, even make a sacrifice to oblige, but one of your other sort, will render any one the more surly and disinclined to oblige, the longer he hangs on against all rule, reason and right.

But lest I tax the reader's time too much at a single sitting, I will here conclude my essay on the importance of time. The other lesson inculcated by the good old penny will keep very well for another time—sometime when the reader may be able to spare me five or ten minutes of his precious time and serious attention.—Only let him not forget that all mankind are one chain, of which every human being is a link. Let him remember, too, that time is money—yea more than money—and let him improve his own, and not employ another's, without consent first obtained. A. B. G.

"THE GLORY OF GOD IN THE FACE OF CHRIST.

[Concluded.]

Look at the deep sympathy and love of Jesus. See him as he takes in his arms the little, gentle babes, and looks upon them with a smile. See him as he lays his hand upon their heads and blesses them, and exclaims, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God." See him as he stands by the grave of Lazarus. The sorrowing sisters are there, and the tearful countenances of friends are gathered at that sealed tomb, and what does he? He weeps. Jesus, the messenger of God to guilty, erring man, weeps; and with such bitterness that those standing around exclaim, "Behold! how he loved him." See him at that last Paschal supper. The hour of parting for that little band has arrived. The betrayer will soon bring upon them soldiers with torches and with weapons, and the rude hand of cruelty and insult shall be laid upon their beloved Master, and their hours of blessed and holy communion, their chords of near association, their hallowed ties and more than earthly joys, shall soon be broken up. See him there—oh! let the world gaze upon the Founder of our Faith and read the tenderness of his character. The disciple whom he loves leans upon his bosom, and he utters for that group the earnest precept, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another." There, reader, was the image of God. In all these scenes to which we have alluded, it was as if God was communing directly and tenderly with men. Those little babes—those weepers at the grave—that sorrowful band of disciples—as they gazed upon the kindness and sympathy that looked upon them from the countenance of that Great Teacher, saw, "the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

Once more: look at the long-suffering and mercy of the Redeemer. There is brought one taken in the commission of a grievous crime. The eager multitude throng around to see what their new Teacher will do. They have no idea of forgiveness in their hearts. They look upon the criminal as a guilty and abandoned one, fit only to be cast out and stoned. Their apparent ignorance of their own frailty, their zeal to hunt crime in another, causes them to forget their own liability to sin.

What does Jesus? He lifts up himself from the ground on which he had been writing, and says to that anxious multitude, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her;" and as, conscience-stricken, they go out one by one, he says to the abashed and guilty woman, "Neither do I condemn thee: go and sin no more." See him at meat in the Pharisee's house. A woman, that was a sinner, washes his feet with her tears, and wipes them with the hair of her head, and kisses them, and anoints them with ointment. The Pharisee reasons, that if this man were a prophet, he would have known "who and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him; for she is a sinner." But Jesus, after propounding a question to Simon, turns to the woman, and enumerating what she has done since he entered the house, says, "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much"—and he tells her, "Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace." See him at the hour of his crucifixion. He has borne the bitter mockery, the wicked insult. His brow has been lacerated by the rankling thorns, his hands and feet are pierced by the cruel nails. But in the midst of all that deep agony, he utters no exclamation of revenge. He breathes the prayer, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." Here again, was the image of God. In these instances of mercy it was seen. The guilty but pardoned woman, as she looked upon the countenance of him who told her to sin no more—the weeping sinner, as she heard the kind words of forgiveness—the hardened soldier and the sorrowful disciples, looking at the blood-stained features of the Redeemer as he hung in the hour of death upon the cross; these, all these, saw "the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." They saw a manifestation of the long-suffering and mercy of the Deity, exhibited in one individual, concentrated, made palpable, brought to their attention, in the brightness of the life and acts of the Saviour.

We will not specify further. The reader will understand what I meant by saying that Christ bore a moral likeness to God. And all must feel that it is a sublime feature of the Gospel, that in the person of its Founder God is brought so near to man. It will be perceived how much more than in any other way, it may be said, that we can discover in Jesus what are the attributes of God. We commenced by referring to nature as containing many manifestations of these attributes. We repeat this truth. But for a bright, unclouded, moral exhibition of our heavenly Father, we urge you to look at Jesus Christ. If you would know what God is, seek not the boasted scrolls of philosophy, seek not the teachings of human creeds, but go out beneath the starlight on Galilee—go sit in the shades of Olivet—go stand in the porches of the temple—and look upon the Saviour, and hear him speak, and treasure up his words and his acts.

And remember, moreover, that in order to understand another being, to enter into his truths, to drink in his teachings with lively and affectionate interest, we must sympathise with him—and in order to sympathise with him we must possess a portion of his spirit. In order then to comprehend and to love the moral excellence of Christ, we must cultivate and cherish that moral excellence in the depths of our own souls. The apostle in a passage of singular beauty speaks thus. "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." Here is a sublime image. The same Being whose spirit moved over the shadowy depths and the unformed masses, and moulded this sphere of beauty, and caused light to gush from its fountains through the thick darkness—the same Being gives to the shadowed mind and the wandering thought a perception of the excellence and the loveliness of the Redeemer, so that, no longer blinded by the influences of sin, they see in his face the glory of God—they behold mirrored in him the perfections of Deity.

Let him, then, who would comprehend the full excellence of the character of Jesus—who would sympathize deeply with the attributes which he exhibited to the world, yea who would have them shine in his own character—who would be "changed into the same image from glory to glory." I say, let one who would thus see and feel, renounce the dominion of sin—let him put by the wiles of temptation—let him look into his own soul, let it be purified by repentance and contrition—and let him ever act true to his convictions of the right and the holy. #### TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are in want of short articles. If carefully written "the more the merrier." We have received a few articles of good poetry within a few months past, and more of bad. Those who write poetry should be sure that it is not deficient in measure, and style. Mere rhyme is not poetry. And as we are not poets ourselves we are sometimes obliged to throw aside good sentiments because the language is badly arranged. Our correspondent who sent us some "Thoughts" in poetry will please try again. The sentiment of his last is good, but does not conform to the laws of poetry. May we not hear from him again in prose. A. R. B.

The Lady's Book, for September, has been received. It is not one of the least of the merits of this excellent monthly, that it is regularly published, and received by its subscribers early in the month, and generally before the date it bears. To those who particularly value it* beautifully colored plates of the fashions, this must be no trifle in view of the capricious and sudden changes of that unstable goddess!

To those who value the letter press of a periodical, it is sufficient to say, that the Lady's Book always presents a list of contributors whose names stand high on the roll of literary fame. Godey, Publisher, Philadelphia.—Price only $3.00 per annum—two copies for five dollars. The money must accompany the order, and the letter be free of postage, or it will not be attended to. A. B. G.

REMITTANCES.—We hope our friends will remember us—we have great need of aid all the time. Send in as soon, as fast, and as much as you can. A. B. G.

N. B. We say the same to those indebted to Grosz & Hutchinson.

The signature to the piece of poetry in our last number headed "Beauty," was subjected to a typographical error which made it read "Angels," instead of Angelo as it should have been.

THE HONEY-BEES.

One loveliest morn, as the matin breeze
Kissed the lilac and vine,
There met, by a chance, two beautiful bees
On a blue Columbine

And altho' each flower with sweetness was laden
Till it drooped on its stalk—
Yet resolved for once was each honey-maiden
On a gossiping talk.

And one smoothed the plush of her saffron vest,
And composed her thin wing;
Then, turning about, the other address,
Like an eloquent thing.

"Thine exquisite face is sweet as the scent
Of the coy mignonette—
Had thy dark, brilliant eye to me been lent
I would play the coquette."

Then she turned to scan that mirrored feature
In the dew of a rose,
And deemed her own self a much fairer creature
For a flirting with beaux.

The other replied,—"I know we are fair
As are roses and rubies:
But where is one's glory and beauty—where,
When our beaux are such boobies?"

The butterfly gay has her gaudy mate,
And is never alone:
While we, alas! must toil early and late,
And then sleep with a drone."

"'Tis true," said the first, "but even in that
There is one consolation;
For sure, when drones are so ugly and flat,
We're 'the lords of Creation!'"

CALM AT SEA.

Deepest silence rules the ocean,
Moveless, stirlless, rests the deep;
See our vessel, without motion,
On the polished mirror sleep!
Not a breath from any quarter!
Stillness death-like as the grave!
On the vast and boundless water,
Not a ripple, nor a wave!

THE VOYAGE WELL ENDED.

The mist is dispersing,
The blue heaven clears;
Now loosed from its fetters,
Eolus appears.

The breeze, onward sweeping,
Gives wings to our ship,
And swift as an arrow
We dart through the deep.

We shall greet those who love us,
Long ere it is night—
Huzza! make all ready!
The land is in sight!

CAROLINE M. SAWYER.

DR. FRANKLIN.—In a notice of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, their ages, places of birth, etc., it was remarked by the Editor of the Democratic Press that "the youngest man who signed the Declaration, was Edward Rutledge of South Carolina, then aged twenty six years, and the oldest man who signed it, was Benjamin Franklin, then aged seventy years.—What a splendid career of usefulness he ran after three score years and ten!"

The concluding observation of the editor was brought forcibly to mind by reading a few days since, the following familiar conclusion of a letter from Dr Franklin, to his friend G. Whatley, Esq., written May 18th, 1787.

"You are now 78 and I am 82—you tread fast upon my heels, but though you have more strength and spirit, you can not come up with me till I stop, which must be soon; for I have grown so old as to have buried most of the friends of my youth; and I now often hear persons, whom I knew when children, called old Mr. Such-a-one, to distinguish them from their sons, now men grown and in business; so that by living twelve years beyond David's period, I seem to have intruded myself into the company of posterity, when I ought to be abed and asleep. Yet had I gone at 70 it would have cut off twelve of the most active years of my life, employed too in matters of the greatest importance; but whether I have been doing good or mischief, is for time to discover. I only know that I intended well; and I hope all will end well."

The very doubt expressed by Dr. Franklin, whether he had been "doing good or mischief" to his country by his public acts, should endear to us still more the memories of our venerated patriots and statesmen. If the case had been a clear one in the outset;—if the sages and heroes of our revolution had been as certain of the eventual success of their labors as they were of the justness of their cause, there would have been the less merit in resisting the arbitrary and oppressive acts of the British Government. But when we consider that the chance to "sink or swim, live or die," was about equal—that if unsuccessful, they were to be punished as rebels against their rightful government—and if successful had at least to await the gradual operation of their plans, in order to attest their utility, and the tardy justice of posterity to meet out their reward—we can not but the more and more admire the self denying fortitude and noble-hearted sacrifices of our gallant forefathers in the arduous struggle for Independence.—Concord Statesman.

HONESTY.—A certain poor widow, one winter's day, had just consumed her little stock of wood in cooking a scanty meal for herself and children, without knowing where she could obtain any more. She put her children, to bed, soon after, and sat shivering over a handful of dying embers, in full view of a large woodpile belonging to her rich, hard hearted neighbor. The thought darted into her mind, "had I but one handful of that wood to keep me from freezing, how glad I should be; he has enough and would never miss it." After many struggles, she concluded to go after her neighbor had gone to bed and get one handful, that she might be able to cook herself some breakfast. She went and picked up the wood, but the thought of stealing so overwhelmed her, that forgetting where she was, she spoke aloud "Have I come to this? Must I steal? O I can not. But if I don't I must freeze. But O, I can't steal." Again the horrors of winter drove her back; again she picked up the wood, and again threw it down, saying, "I can't steal, and if I perish I will perish." She went home and went to bed. The rich man stood in the door and heard all that the woman had said, and it softened his heart. Early next morning he sent her eight loads of wood ready cut, and other articles, telling her that she was welcome; adding, "you fairly beat the devil out of me last night."

Laughable Anecdotes of the Arabs.—It is amusing to contrast this fact relating to the people of Yembro' with the picture which has been given us by Irwin and Bruce of its ferocious and treacherous inhabitants. The pigs we had on board excited more attention and curiosity than the ship, though no European vessel had visited their port for many years before. I had strolled for a few miles beyond the walls of Yembro', with some other officers, and arrived at a small Bedouin encampment. Here we sat down to partake of the milk which was brought by the females; the several portions of our uniform underwent a minute scrutiny; and while the jacket of one was pronounced decidedly indelicate, the surtout of another accorded better with Arabian ideas of propriety. Our hats they styled "jidders," or cooking pots; but the eye shade of the dress caps afforded the widest scope for conjecture. "What can it be for?" was echoed from all sides. "Wonderful!" at length exclaimed an old seer, with uplifted hands, who had not before spoken "wonderful. These Infidels are doomed to eternal perdition, and with becoming modesty, they shroud their eyes from the looks of the Almighty, nor will they lift them upwards; lest they should profanely encounter his gaze."—Westred's Travels in Arabia.

Original Anecdote.—A few years since, a jolly tar, who had just returned home after a long cruise, employed a cartman, known about the town as Dutch Yacub, to carry his baggage from on board the ship to his boarding house. After every thing was stowed on the cart to his satisfaction, Jack sented himself on the top of his chest, and for want of better amusement, spliced the ends of the cart-ropes together.—When they arrived at the stopping place Yacub attempted to cast off his rope preparatory to unloading. After searching in vain for the end of it, he threw his hat on the pavement in a rage, and exclaimed, "Dunder and blixen! some tain Yankee's cut off bote de ends of mine ropes and put dem vere der tuyfel himself vout finds em."

N. Y. Whig.

Trees.—Every one who has read the Heart of Mid Lothian will remember the following sentence; "Jock when ye hae naething else to do, ye may be aye sticking in a tree; it will be growing, Jock, when ye're sleeping." Sir Walter Scott says somewhere, these simple words induced a certain Earl to plant a large tract of country which in such a place as England would, in a few years, be of immense value.—We will only repeat the advice given to Jock—let every one who has nothing else to do, be "sticking in a tree," that posterity may reap the benefit of it. The cost is comparatively nothing, and the pleasure of doing good of itself should be a sufficient inducement for every one to be "sticking in a tree," who has "naething else to do."

TWO AGAINST TWO.—A gentleman of the name of Man, residing near a private madhouse met one of its poor inhabitants, who had broken from his keeper. The maniac suddenly stopped, and resting upon a large stick, exclaimed "who are you, sir?" The gentleman was rather alarmed, but thinking to divert his attention by a pun, replied, "I am a double man, Man be name and man by nature." "Are you so?" rejoined the other:—"why I am a man beside myself, so we two will fight you two." He then knocked down poor Man, and ran away.

No man can live or die so much for himself as he that lives and dies for others; and the only greatness of those little men who have conquered every thing but themselves, consists in the steadiness with which they have overcome the most splendid temptations to be good, in consequence of their low schemes and grovelling wishes to be powerful, like Napoleon, who

"Though times, occasions, chances, fees and friends,
Urged him to purest fame, by noblest ends,
In this alone was great,—to have withstood
Such varied vast temptations to be good."

Conflagration of Moscow.

DEATHS.

In Eatonville, July 27th, Mrs. NANCY JOHNSON, wife of Jerome Johnson, aged 21 years. She bore her sickness, which continued from May 13th till the time of her decease, with great fortitude! She has left many friends to regret their loss. May God bless them with the consolation that she has gone to a better and happier home. Sermon by T. D. Cook.

In Canistota, Madison county N. Y., on the 26th of May last, ELIZABETH, wife of Wm. H. Kinney, Esq. Also in the same place, August 11th, CLARISSA, wife of Lucien B. Robe, aged 26 years, both the above were daughters of Lancelot and Lydia Jarvis.

Within two years these afflicted parents have followed to the grave three, and all of their daughters. Yes, two years have not yet rolled around since the three sisters were in health and in the enjoyment of their own and their parents and brothers society, with all the prospects of protracted and happy lives. But the destroyer came; and what is truly happy to their surviving friends it found them undismayed at its approach. Not a murmur escaped their lips during a long and painful pulmonary disease but happy resignations to the will of God softening their dying pillow's and they now lie sleeping side by side in their still deep resting place awaiting the coming of their kindred spirits they left behind. The first above left a little son aged 14 months, and the latter two little daughters, the one aged about 4 years, and the other about 15 months. These little pledges unconscious of the great losses they have experienced, and left to pass through this world without the guardian aid of a mother's cares. But the surviving friends are not without the consolation—resulting from a full faith in the assurance that so certainly as Christ liveth they and departed friends, with the vast family of man, shall live also. ## A VOICE TO THE MARRIED. TO WIVES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Chap. VIII.—Influence of Female Character.

"Holy, thrice holy, is the part
Through life to thee that's given;
Well might the poet say thou art
The link 'twixt earth and heaven.

Such art thou, Woman, when thy mind
Equals thy glowing form—
When not thy deadliest foe can find
One trace of passion's storm."

The influence of woman upon society, is of incalculable extent. It is seen and felt, and should be acknowledged by all. In refined communities, where the religion of the Gospel has shed its divine light, and diffused its elevating hopes, and where education has developed the mind and polished the manners, woman has attained her highest rank, and exercises an influence the most deep and extensive. But even among the uncivilized and barbarous nations of the earth, we shall not find the female entirely divested of influence. It is no trivial spur to the ambition, and the courageous daring of the western Indian, to be able on returning with the war-party, to chant the song of victory, and recount his deeds of valor in the hearing of the females of his tribe, and display before them the spoils of conquest. The Creator has so framed our constitution, that it is an inherent desire in man, to cause his deeds and his deportment to be of a character calculated to please "the better half" of our race. A large proportion of his actions, are performed in express reference to this end. Remove this honorable disposition—take away from man's heart all desire to gain the approbation and good will of the wife, the betrothed, the mother, the sister or daughter, and one half, at least, of the laudable ambition and enterprise of the world would be lost.

The influence which wives universally possess and exercise over their husbands, is well known. Whatever may be the disposition or habits of a woman—whatever may be her personal appearance, her talents or acquirements—she will invariably exercise a very sensible influence upon the character of her husband. No man has long been in the marriage state, who has not had his disposition, his habits and his tastes, very materially modified, either for the better or worse, by the conduct of his wife. The intimacy between the husband and the wife, is so close and uninterrupted, that they insensibly imbibe each other's traits of character, to some extent, and give a coloring to each other's disposition.

And who does not know and realize the immense influence which is exercised by the mother over her offspring? The first word the child attempts to utter, is caught from the oft-repeated utterance of the mother—and from the same watchful parent the first subjects for thought and reflection, are presented to its tender mind. "To her is mainly committed the task of pouring into the opening mind of infancy, its first impressions of duty, and of stamping on its susceptible heart, the first image of its God. Who will not confess the influence of a mother in forming the heart of a child? What man is there, who can not trace the origin of many of the best maxims of his life, to the lips of her who gave him birth? How wide, how lasting, how sacred, is that part of woman's influence? Who that thinks of it, who that ascribes any moral effect to education, who that believes that any good may be produced, or any evil prevented by it, can need any arguments to prove the importance of the character and capacity of her, who gives its earliest bias to the infant mind?"

As is the mother, so to a great extent will be the children who are under her direction. If she is slovenly in her own appearance, or negligent of the appearance of her offspring—if she is ill-natured and fractious—if she is a tattler and a busy-body—if she is heedless of truth, and moral principles in general—her children will exhibit similar traits of character, and thus be led, very probably, into crime and ignominy. But when the mother's habits and principles are all the reverse of this, the children as naturally imbibe them and imitate them, and walk under their light and influence, as the infant draws nourishment from the maternal bosom. And in confirmation of these remarks, the reader has but to notice any or all the families in his immediate vicinity, to find abundant proof of their correctness.

The influence exercised by woman in the polite and social circles, can not be fully estimated.—Here its sway is almost supreme, and is realized by every individual who mingles therein. Ladies have the power of determining what shall be the character of the gentlemen with whom they consent to associate. This determining power is so clearly within their province, that none can with the least propriety question it. No man making the least pretensions to good manners, will thrust himself into the company of ladies where his presence is disagreeable; and if there is one who persists in so doing, the public voice will speedily place the brand of incivility upon him. There is no power in civilized communities to compel ladies to mingle in society which is distasteful to them; and hence their company can be as select as they desire, and of such character as most pleases their own taste. They can demand such requisitions and qualifications, as passports to their favor, as they deem proper.

The objection that if ladies are very particular respecting the character and habits of the gentlemen with whom they associate, the latter would keep quite aloof from them and the enjoyments of social society be broken up, is entirely groundless. So strongly has the Creator implanted in man's heart a desire to mingle in the company of the "gentler sex," and to obtain their smiles and their affection, that he will comply with any requisition in his power. In the days of chivalry, the knight-errant, at the bidding of his "lady love," would perform feats of the most daring intrepidity to gain her approbation. And could he but obtain the most trifling token of her affection, he would attach it to his banner, and under its inspiration would rush to the battle, and face death on many a blood-stained field, that she in her distant home, might hear his name shouted in the throng, and his deeds chanted in the wandering Troubadour's song.

Although these romantic manifestations of the desire to become acceptable to woman, are not now exhibited, yet the disposition which gave them birth, still exists, strong and vigorous in man's bosom. And he is as ready and willing now to gain her approval in whatever manner she may dictate, as at any other period of the world. If respectable and virtuous ladies are indifferent in regard to the character of the gentlemen who desire to mingle in their society—if they will associate as freely with the man of dishonesty, of intemperance and dissipation, with the unprincipled debauchee, and the hardened seducer of their own sex, as with the man of stern integrity, morality and virtue—the whole influence of such a course, will be to give vice and profligacy a respectable appearance, and enable them to strike their roots deeper into the vitals of society, and spread their deadly poison abroad far and wide! Profligacy can well carry its head erect with unblushing assurance, when smiled upon by the virtuous, or when they can, under any circumstances, be led to afford it the least countenance. Let it not be said that ladies can associate with individuals of the other sex, without approving their known vices. I dissent entirely from this position. When women voluntarily and habitually mingle in company with a man who is well known to be addicted to unprincipled and debauched habits, they in a very important sense, and to a high degree, approve and countenance his vices. And they should so be held responsible by community. The very fact of their freely and willingly associating with him, is strong evidence that they view his aberrations with lenity, if not with favor, and hence a portion of his guilt must be reflected upon them. If woman is desirous of discountenancing vice and approving virtue—if she is anxious that purity, honesty, sobriety, and all kindred excellences, should gain a decided ascendancy over opposite principles, and enlarge their power and influence in the world—she has vastly more power to aid in forwarding such a work than belongs to the male sex. If in each community, every respectable woman would firmly resolve never to associate with, or countenance, a man of known vicious habits, and carry this resolution into faithful execution, a blow would be struck at the citadel of iniquity, that would cause it to totter to its foundations.

Thatcher, in his remarks to woman, writes as follows:—"It rests with woman, in a pre-eminent degree, to give tone and elevation to the moral character of the age, by deciding the degrees of virtue that shall be necessary to afford a passport to her society. The extent of this influence has, perhaps, never been fully tried; and if the character of our sex is not better, it is to be confessed that it is, in no trifling degree, to be ascribed to the fault of yours. If all the favor of woman was given only to the good; if it were known that the charms and attractions of beauty, and wisdom, and wit, were reserved only for the pure; if, in one word, something of a similar rigor were exerted to exclude the profligate and abandoned of our sex from your society, as is shown to those who have fallen from virtue in your own—how much would be done to re-enforce the motives to moral purity among us, and impress on the minds of all, a reverence for the sanctity and obligations of virtue."

It can not be too often, nor too strongly impressed upon the minds of the female portion of community, that the moral condition of mankind is placed in their keeping. It is to our mothers, wives, daughters and sisters, that we must look for the purification of our moral atmosphere from those noxious exhalations which are so destructive to virtue and happiness. Their influence is felt in every department of society, in every rank and station in life. The remark of Cato respecting the influence of Roman women, is as true in our land as in the ancient Republic. "The Romans," said he, "govern the world; but it is the women that govern the Romans." In relation to moral sentiments and habits, women now hold, as they ever have held, the controlling influence in every community. And if they are true to themselves and their sex—if they are true to that genuine purity and modesty with which they have been highly endowed by their Maker—they will exert this influence in a manner calculated to benefit themselves and the world at large. They should consider themselves the conservative party in morals, and realize that to their keeping, in a great degree,

God has entrusted the general purity, taste and manners of society. In every place, a stranger can form a very correct general estimate of the character of the woman, by the customs and habits prevailing among the inhabitants generally. And the same principle will apply to a nation. In a country where the females, as a general rule, are ignorant and debased, it is impossible for virtue and purity to prevail—and in a land where the women are intelligent and virtuous, it is precisely as impossible for the people to be corrupt and dissolute! "Give me a host of educated, pious mothers and sisters," says a late writer,* "and I will do more to revolutionize a country in moral and religious taste, in manners and in social virtues and intellectual cultivation, than I can possibly do in double or treble the time, with a similar host of educated men. I can not but think that the miserable condition of the great body of the people in all ancient communities, is to be ascribed in a very great degree, to the degradation of women." "If this world," says Mr. Flint, in his Western Review, "is ever to become a better and a happier world, woman, properly educated and truly benevolent, sensible of her influence, and wise enough to exert it aright, must be the original mover in the great work."

Such being the immense influence of woman, and such the important consequences depending upon the exercise of that influence, how necessary that every female should have clear and lucid views on this subject. To enable woman to exert her influence in a salutary manner, there are certain qualifications requisite, at which I will briefly glance.

There is no better aid than the religion of Jesus, to enable females to exercise a healthful and salutary influence upon those with whom they mingle. That religion is peculiarly adapted to woman's nature and disposition. When its warm and cheering light is permitted to beam in unclouded brightness upon her soul, it brings into life and activity, all the better qualities with which she has been endowed. It purifies her heart, refines her susceptibilities, and in all thing, prepares her for exerting a moral power of the most healthful character.—Wherever woman has come under the sway of Gospel truth, it has raised her immeasurably in her capabilities, as well as in her station. And in whatever community they are the most directly under the sway of the principles of the Gospel, there they are the most respected and exalted, and there the morals of the people, are in a state the most pure and unalloyed. The reader's own knowledge of the condition of mankind in various parts of the world, will satisfy himself of the truth of this remark. A woman destitute of religious principle has but little security for her virtue and uprightness—the guards by which they are preserved are few and weak, in comparison to what they should be, and she is in great danger of exercising an influence of a most deleterious nature.—Let every wife, then, every mother and daughter, who is desirous of "acting well her part" in the great drama of life, seek and embrace the simple, yet sublime, and perfect principles of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Let those principles form the foundation of all her motives and all her exertions, and then she can not fail of exerting a power and an influence, exceedingly valuable in all its operations.

A proper cultivation of the mind, is highly necessary to enable woman to exert properly and efficiently the influence others command. A well cultivated intellect is the only medium through which she can rationally hope to exercise any influence that will benefit society. This important consideration is too often lost sight of, under the mistaken supposition that the only influence which woman possesses, consists in the attractions of a beautiful exterior appearance. This is a great and serious error, and has tended to deprive thousands of females of that power of doing good, which they actually possess. It diverts the attention from the ornaments of the mind to the ornaments of the person, and these afford but very inefficient means indeed, to exercise any influence that would be of worth to the world. A man who can be attracted and influenced solely by a lady's dress, or the beauty of her countenance, possesses an intellect so weak and puerile, that it could be of very little benefit to mankind, even though it could be won by these vain and frivolous appearances, into paths of usefulness. Woman should understand that the only true and permanent attraction which she possesses; that will enable her to exert a salutary influence upon the other sex, is to be found in her mind, her heart, her disposition. All other attractions are empty, worthless and fleeting. It is the mind that constitutes the being—it is the mind that gives beauty or deformity—it is the mind, when cultivated and enlightened, that enables its possessor to wield influence and power, or when uncultivated and barren, makes its owner a mere cipher among fellow-creatures. The poet Spenser conveys a similar sentence in the following stanza:

"It is the mind that maketh good or ill,
That makes a wretch, or happy, rich or poor;
For some that bath abundance at their will,
Have not enough, but want in greatest store—
Another that bath little, is both rich and wise.

The correctness of these suggestions must be clearly obvious to every reflecting woman. Hence there is an obvious necessity calling upon all females who would pass through life in usefulness, to take advantage of every opportunity to cultivate their intellect, and store their minds with useful knowledge. It is to be apprehended that too many ladies, on entering the marriage state, suppose their days of study have passed, and that henceforward their minds are to be occupied and absorbed by other duties and occupations. But this is an improper view of the subject. That marriage closes their school days, is very probable; but it should not hence be supposed that all opportunities for study and improvement cease, when that important ceremony is performed. The saying that "we are never too old to learn," is just and true. And with it should always be connected another maxim, equally important, that we should ever consider ourselves learners, and seekers after knowledge, whatever may be our age or condition. From the cradle to the grave we can ever be acquiring useful information. Many married ladies, I am aware, are ready to put in the plea of the want of time and opportunity, to cultivate their minds on account of the multiplicity of their cares. I willingly acknowledge this plea has some plausibility—(and much more in some cases than in others)—but it should not be allowed to cover more ground than legitimately belongs to it—it can not be received as an excuse for neglecting all attempts at improvement. While wives have many things to occupy their attention, I am satisfied that few or none, are so circumstanced that they can not devote a portion of their time daily, to mental improvement. All who are anxious to cultivate their understandings will so arrange their affairs without neglect or injury to any of them, as to secure frequent opportunities for reading and study, "Other things being equal" says the author of a late work,* "a woman of the highest mental endowments will always be the best housekeeper; for domestic economy is a science that brings into action the qualities of the mind, as well as the graces of the heart.

It is not within my province to point out the course of study to be pursued by a wife who is desirous of cultivating her mind. In this she must follow the dictates of her own judgment, and give heed to the advice of her husband, who, if worthy of being her companion, will assist her in a work so truly commendable. I can not refrain, however, from urging upon her the importance of establishing a well regulated habit of reading, at such hours as her circumstances will best allow. And let the works which engage her attention, not be love-sick novels, or senseless romances, or empty and vapid poetry, but publications devoted to the subjects of health, science, morals, religion, and such topics as are in the highest degree calculated to impart useful and practical instruction.

"WILL A MAN ROB GOD?"—JOB.

The above inquiry may appear no less strange to some than important to others. When viewed in regard to property, power, or possessions, it would seem the height of folly to inquire whether a finite, capricious, imperfect creature like man, could rob God—deprive him of the energy of Omnipotence, and thus convert the Almighty Sovereign of the universe into a fallible, finite creature. None could be found among mankind so presumptuous as to undertake such a work—none that would dare to set up their authority and rule in direct opposition to those laws already instituted by the Creator of all things, for the purpose of dethroning God, lest in so doing they should suffer scorn from their fellows, and indignation and justice from God the rightful Governor over all. It may be, however, that when viewed under a different aspect—when considered apart from actually producing any change in the Almighty, mankind may with propriety be addressed with the interrogatory—"Will a man rob God?" It is not, we think, irrational to suppose, nor uncharitable to declare, that men often rob God—that they greatly fail to reflect upon Him that honor which is due his matchless perfections—that they refrain from yielding that implicit obedience to his revealed will which his law demands—that they form too low an estimate of their own worth, and snuff those noble faculties which a merciful Creator has bestowed upon them to be under the influence of unfounded fears; thereby using means to mar their earthly happiness.—Among the numerous ways in which men may, and often do rob God, are the following:

1. By supposing Him to be partial in his love, and in the bestowment of his blessings. All nature around, above and below, seems to teach mankind a truth which is corroborated by revelation, declaring the Almighty to be "good unto all;" yet there are those, who, rather than praise God for his goodness, and in consequence thereof be led to repentance, choose to rob God, and in opposition to the revealed truth that God is no respecter of persons—that "he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust"—that "he will render to every man according to his works"—they are found teaching and supporting those sentiments which represent God to be a Being "altogether such an one as themselves," and he is regarded as loving those only who love him and obey his reasonable commands, caring for none other than such, save it be a regard which prompts him to select them as objects upon which to satiate his holy indignation and vindictive vengeance. Thus it is that men rob God, by attributing to him a character opposed to his very nature—by depriving him of that spiritual worship due from us to him, and by being impelled to obey his requirements solely from notions of fear—an obedience meriting no reward, being effected wholly by incentives produced by fear.

2. Men rob God by considering him as changeable in his purposes and designs. There are professed Christians in our land who consider God as a mutable being, notwithstanding the word of inspiration declares that "He is of one mind and none can turn him"—that "He is without variableness neither shadow of turning." According to their views, to-day he loves—to-morrow he hates; to-day he smiles—to-morrow frowns of wrath are seen spread over his countenance; to-day he blesses—to-morrow he curses; and all this it is said is affected by the conduct of frail man. At one time He looks upon us and beholds us pursuing the ways of wisdom—he sees us endeavoring to obey his requirements as set forth in the Gospel of his Son, and for all this he loves us. In the course of time we yield to temptation, do that which is contrary to his will concerning us, and lo! he now despises us—is filled with wrath—his anger awaits our consignment into irrecoverable ruin. Thus also men rob God, by cherishing false views concerning his character, and thereby dishonoring his name among mankind.

3. Men rob God by regarding him as being possessed of a revengeful disposition—a desire to retaliate injury for injury. Are there not those who ascribe to God infinite wisdom and Almighty power, and yet contend that he has so arranged matters pertaining to his divine government, that on account of man's disobedience, thousands must suffer and wither beneath the inflictions of his rod during the wasteless ages of eternity, without mitigation or end? Is this the only manner in which the vicious may be reclaimed? Is this punishment, of which the human mind can form no adequate conception, deserved? Does unwavering justice, exercised in harmony with love, demand it? Is not the design of punishment reformation? Punishment, therefore, inflicted without the design of reforming the offender, is revenge; and inasmuch as there are those who contend that God will inflict unending tortures upon myriads of his creatures, they greatly misrepresent his character, and rob him of that honor due from them to his holy name.

It may be shown that men rob God in various other ways, but we can, at present, pursue our subject no farther. Reader, beware, lest thou rob the Almighty by cherishing false views concerning his adorable character. J. J. P.

AN ANSWER TO THE QUESTION OF A PARTIALIST.

Partialist. Did you not once believe in the doctrine of sovereign grace and election, as firmly as you now believe in the doctrine of Universalism?

Universalist. I once believed a part of mankind would be saved by the power and grace of God—I now believe that all will be saved by the same power and grace. I never did believe that a part of mankind were decreed for endless misery. I believe they were left to their choice—or will—and that will was to choose the road to death, and I thought that death was in a future state, but I now find I was mistaken in that idea, because the apostle says, to be carnally minded is death. I now find that the destruction and misery which I then believed to be in a future state, are described as being in this present state of existence, and I find that many passages of Scripture, which I formerly thought alluded to a future state, are spoken in the present tense; and both hell and damnation are clearly described as being in this present state of existence. But as Christ has come to make an end of sin, and “to destroy him which had the power of death, that is the devil”—and as “sin is of the flesh”—so I believe when we shall be divested of the flesh, or earthly tenement, we then shall be free from all the sorrows of this life. When the veil of mortality is taken away, I sincerely believe we shall find ourselves in the celestial world of bliss and glory, where there is an end of sin, and where death is “swallowed up in victory.”

What parent in the universe could be happy, even in heaven, if he knew that his children were destined for endless misery? We who are parents of children, do know, that we are willing to have our children chastised for their good; and we are willing to have them go through the tedious operations of medicine for the purpose of gaining their health, and should necessity require even a limb to be taken from their body, for the purpose of saving their life, I think we should be willing to have it done, but we could not endure the thought, that they must be endlessly tormented—especially when it could be of no use, only to satisfy what is called a holy principle!—I know it is often said, that we shall have no natural affection in heaven, but according to the words of an apostle, those who were without natural affection, in this life, were not of the Gospel spirit. What principle can be more holy, and heavenly, than the pure love and affection which exists in family connections? According to the words of Christ, all that is holy and heavenly will be saved and gathered into the garner, or heavenly kingdom; and if natural affection is of the Gospel spirit, then of course, we shall possess natural affection in heaven, and it will be pure as the gold that has been seven times tried in a furnace of fire.

We have abundance of proof, both from the Scriptures, and from the works of nature, that God is good, and that his tender mercies are over all the works of his hands. In the formation of the beasts of the field, there is a proof of kindness which I think is worthy of notice. The most ferocious beasts of the forest are made with shoes (or hoofs) on their feet, apparently for the very purpose of protecting their feet from the rough and stoney ground on which they are destined to travel. The beasts of the forest are clothed with fur; and what is a little singular, their fur is much thicker and warmer in Winter than in Summer. All creatures from the king on his throne to the serpent that crawls on the ground, are made with two eyes, and two ears, a mouth and a tongue, which clearly evince the truth that they are all made by one Being, and that he is always of one mind, because the same order has been kept up for more than six thousand years. All kinds of birds are made with wings, apparently for the pleasure of flying through the air. Fish are made with fins, for the pleasure of swimming and sailing in the water. The caterpillar emerges from the earth to an existence in the open air, apparently in a much happier situation than when she was crawling on the ground. The honey bee is endowed with wisdom and economy for procuring both food and habitation. The Ruler of the earth has evinced a principle of kindness in forming the many kinds of fruit—and luxuries which pervade the earth. Another proof of kindness is the voice of music which is made to burst from the mouths of mankind, and from the birds of the air, and even from the cricket in the corner of the chimney, in token of the happiness which they enjoy. And if our heavenly Father is thus kind and benevolent to all the works of his hands—if he is thus kind to the birds of the air, so as to give them wings for the pleasure of flying, and the voice of music for the pleasure of singing—and if he causes even a grain of mustard seed to die and come forth again, will he ever neglect the creature man, and suffer him to dwindle away to nothing? and will he, or can he, consistently with his goodness ever suffer one dear soul of Adam's race, to be endlessly tormented, so long as he has power to make him both holy and happy? The whole face of the earth goes to show, that the nature of God is love—and although he may at times appear to hide his face, like the sun behind a cloud, and like Joseph may appear to be stern for a little season, yet his compassion will never fail—the clouds of sorrow will prove a blessing to us, even as the clouds of rain do prove a blessing to the earth. In the course of events, we can often see, that

Behind a frowning providence,
He hides a smiling face.

In this life we are subject to pain and distress—and we know it is often the case that great distress and calamity will be superseded by peace and tranquility. According to scriptural accounts, darkness was first on the face of the earth, and was superseded by light; and ever since that time, darkness has been superseded by light once in twenty-four hours—except the time of the Egyptian darkness. And according to the writings of the apostles, the darkness of the mind was superseded by the light of the Gospel. Ever since man was made subject to vanity the whole creation have been, more or less, in pain and distress. It is true we have times of rest, and peace, and thus are saved from affliction. And according to the course of nature, and according to the Scriptures, will not this great day of pain and distress, be superseded by the great and glorious day of IMMORTALITY? Will not the whole creation be born into the celestial world of peace and joy, where all sin and sorrow will be done away, and where every creature in heaven, on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, will sing the praises of God and the Lamb forever and ever? LUCY HORTON.

A SHORT ADDRESS TO YOUNG MEN.

BY REV. E. B. WHELOCK.

I ask, where lies the hope of our country, and of the world? Does it not lie in the hands of those noble youths, who are springing up every where around us, and pressing forward to the stage of action? Does it not lie in the well disciplined arm of those who are to be the future guardians of the rights of the people? Young men! you who are soon to act upon the important stage of useful life—it is to your care and fidelity that the heaven born principles of American freedom—the present delightful condition, and happy prospects of our highly favored country, are to be transmitted.

The glory of the world, and the pride of nations are soon to fall into your hands. The health of ten thousand cities—the intellectual riches of an hundred generations—the towering monuments of art—the effulgent beams of the mighty sun of science—the concentrated wisdom of all past ages—are the inestimable treasures of which you are to be made the happy recipients. In order therefore, that your names may become great in the future history of man, as time rolls onward, and generations succeed you, let not the wisdom of past ages soar beyond the reach of vision; nor disappear in the desert of forgetfulness. Let not the silver streams of science which now pour their floods into the fountain of knowledge become impeded in their course, or driven from their channels by the violence of men. When political enthusiasm swells its tide beyond the bounds of truth and decency, float no farther towards the unknown shore lest you dash the ship of state in pieces, and shipwreck the nation.

Think, O think! of the blessings you now enjoy, and of those vast possessions which are soon to be yours. All the inventions of men—all the improvements of art; and more valuable still—the blessings of freedom—the liberty of conscience—the right of free investigation, and the ennobling principles of a republican government, sweetened by the spirit of a religion no less republican—no less honorable in the sight of God and man—even that which teaches a universal triumph of holiness over sin, effecting the ultimate happiness of all mankind, which shall continue forever—are the inestimable treasures which ere long will be transferred into your hands and left for your care and protection.

Under these considerations permit me to ask, would it be honorable in you to be basking in the sunshine of prosperity, and float heedlessly down the current of time, at the expense of those who have gone before you. Nay, it is your duty to mount upon the watch tower of the nation, and wave the flag of equal rights in token of peace and prosperity to future generations. If you desire honor, be virtuous, charitable and humane. If you desire fame, seek wisdom, be ambitious and persevering. If you desire to behold a literature such as the world has never seen, spare no pains in cultivating the present flourishing and expansive vine of science—add by your industry, nourishment to the soil in which it grows—prune it of all things detrimental to its purity and growth—gently direct each shooting vine to that quarter of the globe where its utility is most needed, where its irresistible charms will ever be appreciated and felt. Unchain the human mind—give it freedom from the fetters of superstition and selfishness—bid it soar onward and upward, and all will be well—for this I conceive to be the design of him who is in all and above all forever. Amen.

INNATE, CONNATE AND INBORN DEPRAVITY.

BY REV. W. H. GRISWOLD.

"Undoubtedly it is one of the grand pillars on which the Andover Institution rests." [Dr. Dana to Prof. Stuart.]

It may not be generally known to the mass of readers, that there was formerly a venerable old Dutchman, called Vitringa, who said or wrote some very sensible things, as the following extracts will show. Hence we beg leave to let the good old man of years gone by, here introduce himself to the readers of the Magazine and Advocate. Listen then, for it is an aged father speaking. The words included in the quotations are Vitringa's own words as quoted by Stuart.

"The idea of sin involves the conception both of LAW, and of a SUBJECT. . . . It involves also the idea of an act, commanded or forbidden by the law, either neglected or committed."

"LAW is essential to the idea of sin." What is law? "It is the command or prohibition of a ruler or superior, which regulates the voluntary acts of an inferior who is subject to him." Law therefore, (as well as sin,) involves the idea of a RATIONAL SUBJECT. What is a rational subject? Ans. "A free agent furnished with the faculties necessary for action, who is adequate to determine for himself, deliberately and voluntarily from internal principle in respect to the doing or not doing of any particular thing."

Can animals destitute of reason sin? They "can not properly be said to sin or to be delinquent." Can this rational subject be superior to the law-giver in any sense? No: he must be "entirely dependent upon him." The "right of command" and the "reason of obedience" are founded upon this very dependence. Can a rational being be subject as an inferior to another as superior unless it is of finite perfection? Most assuredly he can not, and hence "it is plain that law properly regarded, and moreover that sin also pre-supposes a rational subject of finite perfection." Could there have been any law without this negation? No: for "consummate perfection excludes a law from being prescribed by another." Can this law exceed the "ability and strength of the subject?" It can not and still be called "equitable, just and good." Must this law be made known to the subject? It must by the clearest indications. So that ignorance of the law can not possibly be made a pretext for excusing any crime committed against it. "Knowledge of the law therefore is essential to sin. All these conditions being supposed then sin may take place."

Thus testifies "an honest, pious, learned, orthodox Dutchman, of the next generation after the synod of Dort itself; a masterly critic; moreover, a noble linguist, a universal scholar and a profound theologian." [Stuart.] And thus we would that all honest, pious, and learned men had testified since his day. We should then have heard very little about man's capability to violate an infinite law, of a part of which he can have no knowledge; of his sinning before he became a rational subject, or of man's violating or being amenable to a law which exceeds the "ability and strength of the subject."

On the above we query as follows: If LAW is essential to sin how can those sin who have no law? If knowledge is essential to sin, how can those be sinners who have no knowledge? If sin pre-supposes a rational subject, how can we properly say that any one is a sinner, until we can properly say he is a rational subject? Can infants then in any sense be called sinners? And if a man can not transgress beyond what he knows, and his knowledge is finite, how can he commit an infinite transgression? Or, if the law is infinite, does it not exceed the ability and strength of the finite subject, and therefore is it "equitable, just and good?"

* Is this negation, sin? and if so, was not man the finite subject created a sinner, instead of an imperfect being?

The ashes of the venerable old man however, can not rest undisturbed. But he is summoned to the bar and made to testify, though dead, for both plaintiff and defendant, in a case pending between New School men and Old School men of the nineteenth century. And what does he say? Why, he says that both plaintiff and defendant are in the wrong, and condemns the very individuals who have brought him forward for a witness! How, in the name of all that is good and true, can the foregoing language of Vitringa be made to harmonize with the doctrine that all are born sinners, or that they can in any sense be called sinners until they have a knowledge of the law? Law is essential to sin; knowledge is essential to sin; and the very idea of sin involves the conception of a rational subject. How therefore can men in any sense be said to be born sinners? And if no law can be just and good, which exceeds the ability and strength of the subject, how can the law violated by man, be infinite? Is his knowledge infinite? And is he capable of sinning beyond what he knows, if knowledge is essential to sin?

From these remarks it should be understood that both parties, (for both Stuart and Dana claim him,) are endeavoring to get the venerable old Dutchman to assist them in propping up the old Tower of Darkness which is tottering to a fall, because of the crumbling aspect of the "grand pillar." Prof. Stuart would pull the old Saybrook Platform up to Vitringa, and Dr. Dana would level Vitringa down to the old Platform. One says that the views of Vitringa harmonize with the Westminster Catechism; and the other says that the Catechism harmonizes with the views of Vitringa. And this seems to be the sum and substance of this great spiritual warfare. Each has got his old racoon along with him; and one would patch the old Westminster garment with the new cloth of Vitringa, while the other would sew on to the new garment of Vitringa the old Westminster rags.

How any one can make the above views of Vitringa harmonize with innate and inborn depravity, or innate and inborn depravity harmonize with them, I am unable to comprehend. Yet my powers of mind are feeble and unable to grasp great and comprehensive views of enlarged minds. And this is no doubt the reason why I can not determine how this great undertaking is accomplished. I am satisfied that it is a great undertaking, and hence I know that it requires, and must require, some tremendous ideas to bring it about. I think however, on the whole, that Vitringa, thus much of him at least, looks about as well without patching as with. Don't you?

ESSAY ON WAR. NO. XVI.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"Then said he unto them, But now, he that hath a purse let him take it, and likewise his scrip; and he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one." JESUS.

The above direction is supposed to form an unanswerable objection to our views. But we see nothing so very formidable. On the contrary, we think, when all the circumstances are taken into consideration, it will be seen that the great design of Jesus was to condemn the whole war system by showing its results. It is said, with great triumph that in this case, the Saviour not only sanctioned the procuring of swords, but also permitted Peter to use one. We do not deny all that the objector claims. But we think all should aim to show that Jesus was consistent with himself. He certainly taught love to enemies, and when expiring on the cross, freely forgave all his foes. This does not appear like sanctioning the war system. Besides, our Saviour must have been considered by the apostles, a singular commander to suppose two swords to be enough for eleven men! It was not making a very serious military preparation!

Campbell, than whom no one is better authority, says on verse 38, (here are two swords—it is enough) that "the remark here made by the disciples shows manifestly two things; the first is that his meaning was not perfectly comprehended by them; the second, that he did not think it necessary at that time, to open the matter further to them. Their remark evinces that they understood him literally. * * * By his answer, 'It is enough,' though he declined attempting to undeceive them by entering further into the subject, he signified, with sufficient plainness to those who should reflect on what he said, that arms were not the resource they ought to think of. For what were two swords against all the ruling powers of the nation? The import of the proverbial expression here used by our Lord is therefore this, 'We need no more;' which does not imply that they really needed, or would use, those they had." *

Adam Clarke has a singular remark on this scripture. He seems utterly confounded, whether through fear or ignorance I can not tell. He says, "I must confess that the matter about the swords appears to me very obscure. I am afraid I do not understand it, and I know of none who does." Where so great a commentator has hesitated to express an opinion, the writer should certainly be very careful in stating his views. I believe that here our Lord meant to give a living, practical illustration of the folly of using the sword in self-defence. Soon afterwards, a great multitude came out against him, and Peter, full of military zeal, wounded the servant of the high priest. The Saviour probably foresaw this result, and permitted it that he might in the very midst of bloodshed, show his abhorrence of all resort to violence. Hear his language to Peter, "suffer ye thus far. Put up thy sword into the sheath; the cup that my Father hath given to me, shall I not drink it? All they that take the sword, shall perish by the sword."

We wish our limits would permit us to remark on this last declaration or prophecy of the Redeemer; but this we can not do. Indeed, we feel pressed all the while for room. Events have verified the prediction. The Jews put our Lord to death under the sanction of the Romans—both took the sword against Christ and perished by it. The Jews by the sword of the Romans, and the Romans by that of the Goths and Vandals. Saul took the sword and perished by the sword; so did his armour bearer.

In conclusion; one thing is certain. If Jesus authorized the use of the sword, then his immediate followers did not go according to his instruction; for it can be proved that the primitive Christians did not resort to violence and bloodshed for the three first centuries. When Constantine became a convert, and church and state were united, then a resort was made to the sword, and the glory of Christianity was then obscured. From that day to the present, professing Christians have used the sword, and forgotten the injunction of their Master, "My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews." I close this number with a touching incident, which I hope will have its full weight on the mind of the reader. A Turk at Jerusalem, † once said to Wolff, the missionary, "Why do you come to us?" He replied, "to bring you peace." "Peace," (replied the Turk, leading him to a window, and pointing to Mount Calvary,) "there, upon that very spot, where your Lord poured out his blood, the Mahomedan is obliged to interfere, to prevent Christians from shedding the blood of each other."

MEMORY.

Memory, faithful monitor of the past, presents to us in one retrospective glance, the scenes of former years. Again we are with the friends of our youth; again we tread the flowery fields and peaceful vales where we roved in all the wild joy, and unconscious innocence of childhood. Happy days, when we knew no care, when we looked forward with bright anticipations to future scenes of happiness, nor dreamed aught of the misery and evil that hung like an incubus over our path. Oh! who would forego the pleasure that memory imparts, on account of the pain that is mixed with it. It brings to mind the friends of by-gone years. Again those loved ones are with us, with whom, arm in arm, we were wont to stroll over nature's fair fields, and hold sweet converse; to whom, with the beautiful confidence of youth, which shrinks from suspicion, as from a deadly viper, we entrusted all our thoughts, our joys, and our sorrows, and in return received theirs. Oh! those were days of innocent happiness, when to our inexperienced eyes the world seemed fair and bright. We had not learned to distrust the hearts of others. We dreamed not that friendship could have an end. Little thought we that those whose hearts we believed all our own, would become changed, and to us, colder than Alpine snows. We knew not the bitter misery of seeing those on whose constancy we would have staked our lives, become estranged from us—those whom we were wont to meet in all the warmth of friendship, pass us by with cold indifference.

O, that those days might be with us again, when suspicion and distrust were strangers to us, when our minds fresh and buoyant, with the bright hopes of youth, clothed every object around us in the brightest hues. We drank deep of the sweet waters of hope, and anticipation threw her golden mantle over us. The future seemed an age to us, and we lunged to outstrip time that we might partake of the happiness which anticipation so freely offered—happiness, which alas! was never to be realized. The car of time, in his onward and never ceasing course, has rolled around those few short years, that seemed an age to our youthful minds, and that future, to which we so ardently looked, is with us—has become present—but where are the hopes and anticipations, that filled our youthful hearts with joy? Alas! they are gone, they have deserted us, fled like cowardly sentinels from their post! And where are the friends of our youth? How few are left to us of that bright circle of happy spirits, whose hearts were bound and linked together by the endearing ties of friendship! There were many who started with us in the journey of life, with hearts beating high with hope. For a time they passed on, shining like stars, shedding a bright light around them; in their onward course they bid fair to become ornaments to society, and a blessing to themselves; but at the moment when happiness seemed in their grasp, disease arrested their course. The cold and pallid hand of sickness was laid upon them, death claimed them for his own, and they went down to the silent tomb, and the clouds of the valley cover them. They were called away, while hope was still shedding his beams brightly around them; while their minds were still fresh and buoyant, and their affections unwithered. Happy fate! Yet while tears of sorrow flow from our hearts for the loss which we have sustained, we ought not to regret their fate, for their pure spirits have left a cold and cheerless world, for a more congenial clime, where the deathless principle of intelligence can expand and flourish through the countless ages of eternity.

Others there were who started with pure hearts and minds free from guile. For a time they listened to the voice of reason, and trod in the paths of virtue; but soon the tempter came; they listened to his honeyed words, forsook the bright fountains of virtue, and drank deep of the dark and polluted waters of vice. Their characters sunk low in the grave of infamy, and the hopes of their friends that were centered in them, were blasted! But with the feelings of pain that we experience as memory brings them before us, are mixed those of pleasure; for she carries us back to the days of their childhood—those days of innocence, when their minds and hearts were pure and unstained with the dark and corroding selfishness of this world.

"THERE IS NO RELIGION IN MORALITY."—
Divines of the 18th and 19th centuries.

Among those who account themselves as being the only evangelical Christians of the present age, may be heard the statement, placed as the caption to this article. It is reiterated from the desk from Sunday to Sunday and published daily by the humble exhorter, "who marks the pathway to worlds on high." No religion in morality, and consequently, he who does a moral act, without a particular kind of religion, will only treasure up to himself wrath against the day of wrath. This doctrine had long been preached by a zealous clergyman, of the "Saybrook Platform," whom by way of designating, we shall call Mr. B. One day, having waxed warm and eloquent on the subject, he depicted in glowing colors the misery of the moral man in hell, and concluded his sermon by repeating—"every good and charitable deed that a moral man performed, will only serve to aggravate his torment."

Mr. D. was present, a man, by the by, who had rendered parson B. many a favor, and took particular notice of the doctrine then advanced. Mr. D. was presently called on by the parson, and received a very urgent request to loan him one hundred dollars, for a short time. Mr. D. went to his desk, took therefrom the money, and addressed the reverend gentleman thus, "You ask the loan of one hundred dollars for a few days. I recollect you stated last Sunday that every deed of a charitable nature that a moral man did, who had not made a profession of your kind of religion, would be the means of sinking his soul deeper into hell. Here is the money—I wish to accommodate you, but if you believe it will make me eternally miserable, do not, for God's sake, take it!" The parson was confounded, and left his neighbor with shame!

Opposed to this doctrine are the Scriptures of divine truth. "Pure and undefiled religion, (says Paul,) before God and the Father is this, to visit the widow and fatherless in their afflictions, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." This is what we understand by religion, and he who can not see any morality in providing for the widow and the orphan, would not be able to discover any affinity between righteousness and godliness. He who does good to the suffering children of humanity, and visits them—not, indeed, to wring from them the last hard earned sixpence for the missionary cause, or to support a hireling priesthood—but to relieve them of their wants by substantial tokens of comfort, is "indeed and in truth," a religious man. Every moral act is a religious act; every good deed is a religious deed. And he who would endeavor to blind the people by teaching that "there is no religion in morality," makes himself wise above what is written!

How strange, that the conservators of the moral health of community, do not look at these things in their true light! According to their teaching, there was no religion in the act of the Samaritan, relieving the poor worn out traveller, because, forsooth, it was a moral deed. But if we wish to see a religious act, we have only to look over the way, and see the priest passing along despising morality, and declaring there is no religion in it. The same old leaven that troubled the Pharisees of olden time, has found its way down to the nineteenth century—there is as much intolerance, superstition and bigotry now as there was then. The same spirit that crucified our Saviour and put to death the apostles, still lives; and could those who possess this spirit, gain the ascendancy, every species of religion that did not savor of endless misery, would be driven from the earth.

Yes, priestcraft would hurl her red hot thunder bolts at all who should dare to think and act for themselves. They would raise the stake, kindle the faggot, to put down all liberal views of God's government!

"O love destroying, cursed bigotry!
Cursed in Heaven, but cursed more in hell,
Where millions curse thee, and must ever curse!
Religion's most abhorred! Perdition's most forlorn;
God's most abandoned! Hell's most damned!"

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.....NO. XVI.

In Jeremiah, 17th chapter, there are some striking illustrations of the wicked man and the virtuous man. "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord; for he shall be like the heath, (or the blasted tree,) in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh; but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness, in a salt land and not inhabited," vs. 5, 6. The expression, "in a salt land and not inhabited," has reference to numerous spots, in Eastern countries, where incrustations of salt were spread over the surface of the ground, which prevented the growth of every thing. When Major Denham was travelling over the great desert of Africa in company with a caravan, he says of a certain portion of the desert; "The road derived a very peculiar aspect from the quantity of salt with which the soil was impregnated; the clods were often so cracked as to resemble a ploughed field; and from the sides of cavities were hanging beautiful crystals of that mineral like the finest frost work. Sometimes the ground for several miles was glazed over, resembling a sheet of ice; but though the surface was very hard, the interior was brittle, and the salt fell away in flakes." Discoveries in Africa, Fam. Library, No. 16. p. 132. Strong brine will kill grass and plants—and salt, plentifully strewed over a peice of land will destroy its fertility for the time being. Hence, when Abimelech fought against the city of Shechem, "he took the city, and slew the people that was therein, and beat down the city, and sowed it with salt." Judges ix: 45,—"sowed it with salt," to prevent any thing growing upon it. Now he "whose heart departeth from the Lord," is like "the heath," or blasted tree, in the salt part of the desert. By the expression "shall not see where good cometh," the prophet intended that the tree, being blasted, could not avail itself of rain when it fell.

Could there be a better exhibition of the wicked man? I once in my travels, saw on a rocky, barren spot, a tall, gloomy pine tree, throwing out its mighty branches to the sky, which was blasted from its topmost bough to its lowermost root. On one of its outermost branches, there sat a hawk with a small snake in one of his talons screaming in the fierceness of his nature. My mind at once reverted to the declaration of the prophet, "he shall be like the heath" (or blasted tree,) "in the desert and shall not see when good cometh." And I thought there could not be a fitter emblem of the wicked man.

Take an individual, deep in oppression and vice, who is the object of general suspicion, whose example is evil, and who grinds the poor, and is he not like a blasted tree? His influence for virtue is stripped from him; his integrity is destroyed, his usefulness gone, and his conscience and feelings become so embittered, that when good does come within his reach, he can not enjoy it; for, being in the way of transgressors, every thing is hard, toilsome, and barren of happiness. When I see an individual broken down in health, wealth, integrity, and virtue, with the finger of pity pointed at him, while he is shrinking into the silence and oblivion of the grave, I remember the blasted pine, with a screaming hawk upon it and a snake in his talons.

On the other hand, what a beautiful illustration the prophet introduces to exhibit the righteous man. "Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is: for he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh, but her leaf shall be green; and shall not be careful in the year of drought neither shall cease from yielding fruit," vs. 7 and 8. This illustration is like that which the Psalmist used:—"Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful; but his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night—and he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." Ps. 1: 1, 2, 3. This figure is robbed of its beauty, if we fail to refer to Eastern geography for its explanation. In both passages, the tree is represented as growing by the riverside. Why is this? In our land, a tree will flourish as well away from a stream as nigh unto it. But not so in Eastern countries. In Egypt, for instance, a tree by the river Nile is always green—drought does not effect it, because it draws its supplies from the river at its roots. But journey out from either side of the Nile into the desert, and it is far different—a tree may flourish a little while, but when the drought reaches it, it withers and dies.

The righteous man or woman, is like the ever green tree. When the drought of temptation and affliction goes over the land, it destroys not the fruit of their virtue—their affectionate manners rendered them beloved—their kindness wins friends—their purity exerts the power of a good example over others—their virtue gains them the blessing of God, the enjoyment of a pure conscience, and the respect of community—the poor bless them, the wicked revere them, and God recompenses them in the earth. Well, did Solomon say, "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold." Prov. xxii: 1. And well did Balck pray, "let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." Num. xxiii: 10.

UNIVERSALIST RENUNCIATIONS—THE CHRISTIAN PALLADIUM.

It is singular that the opposers of Universalism, particularly those connected with the press, make so much noise over the few of its advocates who may see fit to change their sentiments, or profess to renounce this doctrine. Let but a Universalist renounce, and the whole religious world assumes the attitude of beligerents against veracity and candor. Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Christians, etc., act as though they were ready to tear the unfortunate man into shreds, so that they may get a small piece with which to bait their respective traps; and if this fails, they will be contented to have only the name to their bait, if they can but sweeten it a little with the perfume of his garments. The cry goes forth that a renunciation has happened, to the little truth adding much misrepresentation, but though the errors may be pointed out, they are unheeded; each sturdy hero takes his trumpet and blows forth the message, misrepresentations and all. After all, it would be rather an amusing matter, if they would not demean themselves as they do by disingenuousness.

We have watched the opposing legions with some interest, as well as with some pity for them, to see them labor so hard to give a one sided impression of the matter, and to avoid a naked statement of facts. Here the grave two sided disciple of non-committalism, starts up as he hears the premature boast of triumph echoed through the ranks of orthodoxy; and he places his thumb upon his nose after the most approved manner, and looks wise. There the bigot, like spunk, needs only to come in contact with the ignited spark, and a stream of fire runs through his frame like electricity. Then comes the organ of sectarianism which has scarcely dared to turn its attention from the internal throes, and dissolving elements of Partialism, over which it has watched with a father's care; but this is too great a temptation to be resisted, and it must steal one moment, and use one breath, to prolong the shout, if it dies for it. Next may be seen, beneath an accumulated load of advertisements, etc., the commercial journal, coming forth from its secret retreat, and peering up through long columns of dry details about every thing which comes within its commercial sphere; it, too must have a few words, but alas! it trembles at the discordant sounds which its own voice has made, and takes its place again amid shipping lists and foreign intelligence.

Last of all comes the "Christian Palladium;" whose monthly peripatations have prevented it from having an earlier dip in the great dish which the hungry have been feeding from since the renunciation of Rev. Wm. Whitaker; and under the editorial motto of "Keep the unity of the spirit," follows that spirit of disunion which prompts it to publish misrepresentations in spite of all its charity. That paper for August, introduces the article connected with the above mentioned renunciation, with the following very modest editorial remarks:

"Universalism.—The following important document from the New York Commercial Advertiser, presents modern Universalism as it is. Read it, and shun the delusive and soul destroying error."

Now this "important document" alludes to the renunciation of Rev. Mr. Smith, which has since become a "broken cistern." It also represents Rev. Mr. Whitaker as pastor of the oldest Universalist church in New York, which is untrue. This might be tolerated, if it was not copied into the Palladium after it has been repeatedly corrected by Universalist publications. It also represents Universalism as a "delusive faith," which comes with a very poor grace from editors who know but little about it, and who deal mostly in unproved assertions in relation to it.

Now let me ask the editor of the Christian Palladium a few questions. Is the doctrine which teaches men to do good as they have opportunity, and to love God because He first loved them, and which teaches that God is good unto all, and that he "will not cast off forever," a delusive and "soul destroying error?" If not, why did you call Universalism such? Did you know that the article in the Commercial Advertiser did not give a full statement of facts concerning this renunciation? If so, why did you endorse it to your readers? Did you know that Rev. Mr. Smith had re-renounced? If so, why did you publish his renunciation without explanation? And have you seen the remarks which have been published in the New York Christian Messenger, in the Trumpet, and in this paper, (any or all of them,) respecting the errors of the "important document," which you have copied from the Commercial Advertiser? If so, why did you say that that document "presents modern Universalism as it is?" Or have you ventured on the whole, ignorant of facts, and glad to make capital even of adulterated coin?

ENDLESS MISERY WILL NOT SATISFY THE SOUL.

When the pious and eloquent Saurin said that he found in the thought of endless misery for himself or any of his friends, a "mortal poison which" diffused "itself into every period of" his "life, rendering society tiresome, nourishment insipid, pleasure disgusting, and life itself a cruel bitter"—when he was obliged to declare, "I cease to wonder that the fear of hell has made some melancholy, and others mad"—was his soul satisfied? And when my mother suddenly lost a favorite son by croup many years since, and two professed Christians told her, that, as she did not belong to the church, her son was undoubtedly burning in a lake of fire—and when but the other day, an individual gave a mourning mother to understand, that her son was lost, because he died firm in the faith of the Restitution—could this doctrine satisfy their minds, and enable them to pray, "thy will be done!" I appeal to the reader—could you rest satisfied one moment under the conviction that yourself, or one whom you loved, would endure endless woe? Hast thou ever buried a friend; a father, mother, wife, brother, sister, son or daughter? Hast thou taken a farewell of that deceased one; and as the grave was closed, hast thou thought that that dearly beloved relative is shrieking in unending pain, has gone to wailings which shall ever increase in intense horror—has gone to ceaseless woe, where no drop of water shall cool burning anguish, or ray of love shall cheer an unmitigated night of horror—where prayers and beseechings shall avail not? Hast thou thought this? and are you satisfied with it?

Think of it, one moment. Think of indescribable agony, increasing one age with another, and growing in power and volume with each succeeding and weary century. Think of it, as still infixed and undying in the soul, when the sun and stars shall become sickly with age—when more ages of sorrow shall have been endured, than there are atoms of matter or drops of water—and yet it shall continue onward, and still onward, for ever and ever, endless in its nature, without hope of mercy, without chance of redemption, without one circumstance to mitigate the hopeless agony of avenging wrath! Is this the doom of men, from the hand of Him whose name is Love? "The Lord will not cast off forever; for though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies; for he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children men."

There is a fact, and a question, which I will propose in regard to endless misery. If the hand of the most miserable wretch on earth, was forced into a flame of fire, and a benevolent man was compelled to stand and behold it, he would be filled with commiserating sorrow. And if the burning of that hand continued half an hour, and the benevolent man was prevented from relieving the sufferer, the sight would make him miserable—there can be no doubt about it. The question arising from this fact, is this. If the affectionate and kindly feelings of human nature are infinitely more pure, excellent, and benevolent in another world than in this, as much so as heaven is more pure and excellent than earth, can we, if permitted to reach heaven, behold the agonies of myriads of our fellow-beings; agonies as much more intense than the burning of a human hand for an hour, as endless woe is greater than finite sorrow; can we behold such agonies without becoming miserable ourselves? And would not the recollection that those agonies were ceaseless, and that however much we desired to go and alleviate them, we should be prevented from so doing, make our sorrow greater, and thus change heaven into a place of lamentation and weeping? It is in vain to affirm that we shall be so reconciled to the will of God, as to be happy in the presence of such suffering—for happiness, under such circumstances, would argue the obliteration of all feeling from the hearts of saints. It will, hence, be seen, that if endless misery is true, no person can be happy—those who endure it, can not be happy; and the sympathy of the saints will make them miserable. A fact of itself sufficient to brand the doctrine of endless misery with cruelty and the most obvious error. May it soon die and have no resurrection.

It was a season of rejoicing—a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. It was a joyous prelibation of that great Association in the kingdom of immortality, where the universal fraternity of man, made pure as the angels of God in heaven, will sing the song of redeeming love through the endless day of eternity.

ANOTHER LABORER GONE.

Another laborer in the ministry of universal reconciliation has been called to his "long home," while many sincere mourners are left to "go about the streets." Our much esteemed Br. ALONZO WILLIAMS, departed this life in Ellisburgh, August 25th, in the 26th year of his age. He had long lingered under the influence of insidious and increasing disease; and conscious of its powers, he closed his labors in the ministry last March, and returned from Chester, Vt., where he had been preaching, to Ellisburgh, that he might enjoy the privileges of his paternal home. There, surrounded by the friends of his youth, he terminated his short, but useful life. Receiving religious impressions very early in life, at about 17, he united with the Presbyterian church. Advancing to more enlarged views of divine grace, and studiously engaged to understand the Gospel of truth, he commenced preaching Universalism before he arrived to the age of 20 years. He successfully preached in this State, mostly in the counties of Chautauque, Madison, and Jefferson, and finished his public labors in Chester, Vt., the place of his nativity. His soul was devoted to the cause of the Gospel, and his well-ordered life manifested the sincerity of his profession. He died strong in the faith of universal grace, and reconciled to the God of his salvation. His bereaved companion with her only child, his parents, brothers, sisters, friends and Christian acquaintances will long deeply lament their loss, which we humbly trust is his gain.

"Earth has no sorrows that heaven can not cure."

On the 27th his funeral was attended at Ellis village. It was an occasion of deep and solemn interest. A numerous congregation testified their respect by their presence. Five ministers of our denomination were present. Aided in the public services by Brs. Jones, Waggoner and Sias, a discourse adapted to the occasion was delivered by

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

MR. GROSH.—It may not be uninteresting to the distant subscribers to your paper to know, that the Clinton Liberal Institute, notwithstanding the depression which exists in every department of business throughout our country, is still flourishing under the direction of Dr. Clowes, its able and talented Principal. The next term will commence the 21st of September. To those who are interested in the progress of liberal principles—who are desirous of seeing our institutions of learning freed from the shackles of sectarianism—who would have their children learn science unfettered by creeds, nothing need be said of the claims of the Clinton Liberal Institute, to their support; farther than that it is emphatically such an institution. And I would beg leave to remind those who profess a love for these principles, that a mere assent to them, will not produce the desired object. If, while the praise of such an institution is upon their lips, their money and influence goes to the support of institutions of a directly opposite character, it can not but be obvious that no good whatever will be done. Such a course is incompatible with common sense—it is beneath the dignity of a Christian or of an honest man—it is the offspring of that time serving, truckling spirit that would sell principle for popularity, and private opinion, for public praise. I regret that I am compelled to believe these remarks are called for—I fear that they are applicable to too many and I make them in the hope that the erring may be reclaimed. If the object for which the Clinton Liberal Institute was formed be good, it should be supported—if bad, it should not receive our assent—but, having received it, our practice should be conformable thereto; for, no honest man will express a deliberate opinion with regard to principles that he will not carry out in practice.

I commenced this article, with the intention of making a few remarks in reference to the annual exhibition which took place on Wednesday afternoon, September 2d, but the lateness of the hour, and the length of the preceding remarks, will oblige me to defer them until next week.

Utica, September 7, 1840.

The next Term of the Clinton Liberal Institute will commence on Monday the 21st, of September.

MY NATIVE LAND, ADIEU.

BY MISS E. ROUNSEVILLE.

Adieu, adieu thou silvery stream,
Where proudly I was wont to roam,
Till wildered in a golden dream—
Adieu my more than childhood's home.

Adieu, ye craggy heights sublime,
Whose tow'ring summits cleave the sky;
No more your rugged sides I climb,
No more your prospect fills my eye.

Ye much loved flowers, whose rich perfume,
And Heaven-wrought robes, had power to charm
My footsteps—ye, my path illumine.
And all my inmost soul to warm;

Adieu! your sweets, some other hand
May gather now—some other eye,
May feast upon your fairy land,
And share the treasures which I fly.

Ye little birds, those notes of praise
Ye wildly chant from tree to tree,
Are mine no more—hush, hush your notes!
A requiem seems each song to me!

Ye friends!—and can I speak of you—
Ye whom this heart has loved so well!
Ah! can this tongue pronounce adieu?
Vain effort! tears alone may tell.

Deem not, though far my footsteps rove,
I'll cease to breathe a fervent prayer,
That ye may share a Father's love,
And prove a Heavenly Father's care.

And are these all? no other chains
To bind me to my early home?
Forgive! one little spot remains,
Still, dearer still,—'tis all my own!

Ye sacred mounds; and must I part,
No more to greet your hallowed dust.
My God! support this bursting heart—
Be doubly near, if go I must!

Here have I hoped to lay me down
And mingle with my kindred clay;
Here hide me from stern fortune's frown,
Here steal from all life's cares away.

Alas it may not be—I go!
A truant to these relics dear,
Will there, to soothe each future wo,
Your gentle spirits hover near?
I will believe; and there as here,
Will list for each familiar tone,
Thou Good Supreme! dispel each fear,
And guide me safe to Heaven my home.

St. Charles, Ills.

Speculation in the West.—A day or two since, a friend of ours, a merchant in this city, was hailed in the street by a tall, rough-looking fellow, very plainly attired in linsey-woolsey, cowhide boots and slouched hat, who accosted him with—

"Hallo there, mister—I say! aint your name —?"
"That is my name, sir," replied the merchant.
"Well, how d'ye do? 'Spose you don't know me, though."

"I do not recollect having seen you before."
"Well," 'spose not; but what I was goin' to say, was, haint you got an eighty acre lot in Wisconsin, — county, eh?"

"I believe I do own a lot there."
"Well, now, perhaps you would like to sell that 'ere lot?"

"Well, sir, I am in a hurry; do you wish to buy it?"
"Well, now, I don't; what do you ask for that 'ere lot?"

"Two thousand dollars, sir."
"Two thou—two thousand dollars? No; you'r joking!"

"If you wish to purchase, sir, you know my price."
"Well, now, wouldn't you like to take nineteen hundred, if you could get it, eh?"

"Why, sir, who will give it?" asked the merchant, eagerly, (for he had bought it, only a few months since at the government price.)

"Well will you take it? that's what I want to know."

"Yes, sir; I will take nineteen hundred."

"Make out your papers, then!" said the stranger.

"I've got the money; here's witness to the bargain;" and so saying, he drew from his pocket a large bag, labelled "shot," from which he counted the rhino and took his deed, evidently well-pleased with his bargain.

"You seem pleased with the trade, sir," said the merchant.

"Well, I guess I might as well," said the stranger.

"Why," returned the merchant, "have you seen the lot?"

"Well, I guess I have."

"Is the land remarkably good?" continued the merchant, supposing he had been trading with a green 'un.

"It'll do!" said the buyer.

"What is it worth?" says the seller.

"Well, I don't know what it's worth, but I've dug about ten thousand dollars worth of lead ore out on't al ready! I can't tell how much more I'll git!" and with a broad laugh, he stuffed the deed into his pocket, and left our chopfallen friend to consider how much lead ore the balance of his eighty-acre lot in Wisconsin might contain.—Detroit Spectator.

Valuable Information.—Be careful not to transplant shade trees before the leaves have fallen—as soon after as you please.

The trees should be taken from open ground. If taken from the dense forest they will not bear the exposure.

Select trees of sound growth; they have better tops and better roots than the first.

Transplant the tree entire. The leaves are the lungs of the tree, and affect its growth as much as the roots. The frequent practice of lopping off the top is very bad.

Be sure and get all the roots. Remember the small fibres are what absorb nourishment for the tree. Strip off these, and the main body of the root becomes only a contrivance to hold the tree up. Do not expose the roots to sun and air longer than absolutely necessary. Let them carry with them as much of the old soil as they can hold on to.

In setting out trees be careful to make the hole so large that the roots shall not be coiled, neither let them be crowded, for then they will decay.

Throw upon the roots at first fine strong mould, never any manure, then throw on water, and shake the tree till the mud has filled up all the interstices between the roots. After the ground is somewhat dry fill up the hole and tread down the earth. Never leave a tree so that water can stand over its roots.—Bath Const.

Scrap.—Hear what little Genius says of women. "My notice was attracted to a lady—no, not a lady, but to the waist of a lady before me—wasps and brush handles—but she was screwed up a few. I can't begin to find a comparison for it. She was compressed into a span—drawn up almost out of sight—a perfect show. And this is what is called a good figure—I don't know whose sort of a figure, without a figure 8. Well, some women are fools if they are women. I'd rather marry a form like a sugar hoghead than connect myself with such a looking hour-glass."

Truth is the object of Reason, and this is one; Beauty is the object of taste, and this is multiform.

Prevention of Jealousy in a Wife.—One thing every husband can do in prevention; and that is give no ground for it. And here, it is not sufficient that he strictly adhere to his marriage vow, he ought to further abstain from every act, however free, from guilt, calculated to awaken the slightest degree of suspicion in a mind, the peace of which he is bound by every tie of justice and humanity not to disturb, or, if he can avoid it, to suffer it to be disturbed by others. A woman that is very fond of her husband, and this is the case with nine-tenths of English and American women, does not like to share with another any, even the smallest portion, not only of his affection, but of his assiduities and applause; and as the bestowing of them on another, and receiving payment in kind, can serve no purpose other than gratifying one's vanity, they ought to be abstained from, and especially if the gratification be to be purchased with even the chance of exciting uneasiness in her, whom it is your sacred duty to make as happy as you can.—Cobbett.

The power of love consists mainly in the privilege that potentate possesses of coining, circulating, and making current those falsehoods between man and woman, that would not pass for one moment, either between woman and woman, or man and man.

Footie being on a visit at Lord Townshend's, at Raynham, happened one morning to look into the pig-stye, and saw a silver spoon among the pig's victuals; one of the house maids coming by, and perceiving Mr. Footie, cried out, "Plague on the pigs, what a noise they make!" "Well they may," said Footie, "for they have but one silver spoon between them."

DEATHS.

In New-Berlin Centre, July 2d, THADDEUS A. BROWN, son of Thos. Brown, Esq., aged twenty-seven years. After a short but very violent and distressing illness, (bilious fever,) his remains were committed to the earth on the third; and a very appropriate discourse was delivered on the occasion to a numerous mourning assembly by Rev. Mr. Wheeler, from Job xix: 21.

In the death of this young man, the state has lost a deserving vigilant and active defender of its dear bought rights and liberties, society one of its brightest ornaments, the Christian community a brother whose moral examples it would be truly honorable to follow, and the youth of the land a faithful and zealous instructor in knowledge, science and morality. Brothers and sisters have lost from their circle one endeared to them by innumerable tender ties, kind offices, instructive precepts, and good examples. His aged parents have lost a dutiful and affectionate son, whose life is as a crown of honor to their heads, and on whom they thought they might lean in the decline of life. May they bless God who gave them such a son, and be able to say the Lord gave and the Lord has taken away. COM.

In North Norwich, May 21st, Mrs. CHARLOTTE BRIANT, aged 44 years. In the death of this amiable woman, suffering humanity has lost a tried and faithful friend. Was this the opinion of the Universalists alone, it would amount to a question—but such is not the fact. For I believe I hazard nothing, when I say, the expression is endorsed by all her Baptist brethren, with whom she was connected for a number of years, before she became a believer in the restitution of all things. Funeral on the 23d, and a discourse from Rev. E. M. Woolley.

In Richfield, Otsego county, August 13th, widow RHODA HAWKS, aged 90 years. In this event of Providence, we have lost one that had long stood among us; and I may truly say, she was one of the excellent of the earth. She had long been in the belief of the final holiness, and happiness of all mankind. This had been her faith, from her earlier years. Her first opinion formed was, that God was the Father of all; and hence all were his children: and reason and Scripture taught her, that as a father, he would ever, provide for the best good of all; hence her faith in Universalism. In this faith she lived; in this she died. She was a constant reader of the Bible; and she continued the practice till loss of sight deprived her of the blessed privilege. As age advanced, her faculties were gradually impaired; but her hope still the same, was truly "an anchor to the soul." "The Gospel of God her Saviour, was good to live by in the day of her strength; and much more was it good in the day of her weakness: She had long been sensible that her stay here must be short; and as she went down the declivity of life, step by step, as she drew nearer and nearer her end, she viewed it as approaching nearer and nearer her everlasting home—the home of all. May God bless the surviving relatives and give them a like blessed faith, and a like happy death. On the day after her decease, the writer of this delivered a discourse in the Baptist meeting house at Monticello, to a respectable and attentive audience, mostly of faith opposed to ours. The Baptists in that place, have my thanks for their liberality on that occasion, especially, their preacher, the Rev. Mr. Hutchins, who took part with me in the services. It was truly gratifying to find one of an opposing faith, divesting himself of prejudice, and showing a spirit truly Christian. May many of his brethren in the ministry go, and do likewise. H. BELDISE.

THE PARTING AND RE-UNION OF FRIENDS

There is a natural and pathetic feeling that pervades the human mind, which being deeply implanted within the breast of every individual, seems to rise involuntarily, and plead with a forbidding eloquence, against "the parting of friends;" especially intimate and long cherished friends, who are linked together by a thousand endearing ties of kindred love and consanguinity. And we venture the assertion that there is no one, who is possessed with the common feelings of humanity, and whose soul has not become callous to the refined and ennobling sensibilities of man's moral nature, that can extend the parting hand, and utter the familiar "good bye," to a kindred brother, or a long cherished and intimate friend, without feeling an inward pang of regret, and indulging the secret and silent wish that it might be otherwise; and more especially,

"When duty calls and seems to say,
Start on thy course, away, away."

But it appears to have been one of the unerring and well ordered plans in the wise arrangement of divine Providence, that time and circumstance should cause a separation among kindred and friends, and teach mankind that, however strong may be the bond of union and attachment, and however much they may desire to live by an inseparable connexion in the sweet and uninterrupted enjoyment of each other's society; still they should remember that earth is not their "abiding home;" for if they are not parted by time and distance, they will ere long be separated by death.

We have only, therefore, to look around upon the changes which daily occur in the social circle, and around the altar of the domestic fire-side, and we see with what reluctance it is, that friends of every name and sect part, perhaps to meet no more in time; and it is not until these changes are about to take place that we begin to feel and duly appreciate the intrinsic worth that is in the society of kind friends, and more especially in the hour of sickness and death. Yes it is then that we notice the vacant seat, and realize the want of confiding counsel in the absence of a kind father and affectionate mother, who have "borne the heat and burthen of the day," and who from habits of industry, prudence and economy have been successful in gaining for themselves a competency of this world's goods which with proper care and attention, would be sufficient to make them comfortable and happy through life. But, unfortunately for the peace and happiness of mankind, discontentment is the lot of all in a greater or less degree; for instead of making a prudent and proper use of those things with which we are favored, and with which we are daily blessed by the munificent hand of an impartial God, we are prone to cultivate an erroneous feeling in the human mind, by feeding the imagination with that which is visionary and uncertain and which lies beyond the reach of mortality. Hence the necessary arrangements are made for the parting of friends; and parents and friends, brothers and sisters, alternately bid a long and lasting adieu to each other, and to their own, their dear "native land," and seek for the comforts of life in a more congenial clime. And upon occasions like these, there is always some one or more, for whom have been cherished the fondest hopes, and on whom will be bestowed the lingering look of affection.

But who this will be, must be determined according to circumstances. Perhaps it will be the venerable father and aged mother, or the affectionate and beloved brother and sister; and perchance it may be the new made grave of an esteemed friend—or a near and dear companion. Be this as it may, our inquiry is to know, whether, in view of the fact that God created man after his own image and in his likeness, it is in accordance with reason and analogy, to say that an attachment of pure and unbroken friendship, around which cluster all the finer and better feelings of the human soul, will separate with the parting of friends—whether it will glide away upon the ever rolling tide of forgetfulness, and no more exist to speak a comforting word in the dark hour of adversity, and point the weary worn traveller to that better world, where sorrow and sighing are never known, and where parting is no more. Nay, it is not, it can not be so.

True friendship is not an external, but an internal principle. It is not formed from motives of mercenary selfishness, nor is it the creature of circumstance, subject to change by every adverse wind that blows; no, but emanating as it does from the inexhaustible fountain of infinite wisdom, goodness and love, its moral powers are based upon the altar of the soul's best affection, and will live

"While life, and thought, and being last,
Or immortality endures."

No change of time or circumstance will cause it to forsake us. Its seed has taken deep root, and though we may go to earth's remotest bounds, there will nevertheless exist a feeling of deep and thrilling interest, that the blessings of health, peace and prosperity may crown our future years; and it is redeeming to that depravity and moral turpitude which has erroneously been said to pervade the human heart, to have the assurance that we still live in the kindness and affection of those who are far, far away.

Such, kind reader, are our views in relation to the feelings which we believe it is the nature of mankind to experience, when called upon to take the parting hand of friends and relatives, either for time or eternity. And whether or not we have spoken the mind and feelings of all who may chance to read these lines, is not in our province to decide.

Let us now, as briefly as the nature of the subject will admit, turn our attention to the "re-union of friends," which we deem to be the more important and interesting part of our subject. We say it is the more important and interesting, because we believe that there is not an enlightened and intelligent being in the universe of God, but what knows that mortality is subject to decay; and that sooner or later the curtain of death will close upon the transitory scene of all our earthly hopes and joys; and accompanied with this knowledge, is the fact that there is, implanted in the soul of every being, an insatiable desire for the re-union of friends to life and immortality.

To-day, we are visited with sickness, pain and death; to-morrow we pay the last tribute of respect to some dear friend or relative, by following him to the "dark and silent tomb," and while we see the coffin lowered to its resting place, which contains the remains of him who but yesterday was engaged in the active and busy scenes of life, we naturally begin to reason within ourselves whether this is the end of man, or whether that happy period will arrive when we shall again be united in the bonds of affection and love.

This is a most natural inquiry, and upon its solution depends much of our present happiness and peace of mind. If we arrogate to ourselves the right of being wise above what is written, and assume the position, that there is no God—that man is the mere creature of chance, and that the grave will prove to be the eternal resting place of both soul and body, it can not be expected otherwise, than that a feeling of gloom, doubt and despondency, should take possession of the whole man, leaving us, like the ship at sea, without chart or compass, to buffet the storms and tempests incident to human life, and making us doubly liable to be wrecked upon the shoals and quicksands which beset the pathway to virtue and peace. But if, on the other hand, we adopt the language of the Bible as the man of our counsel, and receive for our mutual and friendly instruction the doctrine taught by Christ, the prophets, and the apostles, we shall be prepared under every vicissitude of life, to bear with fortitude and Christian resignation the afflictive dispensations of divine Providence.

The Bible is to the eye of faith, what the telescope is to the eye of the philosopher. By the aid of the telescope the philosopher is enabled to discover objects at a greater distance than by the natural eye alone. So by the aid of inspiration our faith is enlarged, and we can look beyond the narrow precincts of time to that bright world of life and immortality; and in the trying hour of dissolving nature, surround the couch of the sick and the dying, and bid adieu to the friends we love best, with the blest assurance that we shall meet them again in heaven. St. Paul, says, "Faith is the substance of things hoped for; the evidence of things not seen." Faith therefore can not be said to consist of a tangible substance, or of anything which may be discovered by the natural eye, but it is the result of a correct exercise of our mental, moral and reasoning powers, and being based upon the immutable, and unalterable promises of Jehovah, it carries conviction to our mind, that God in the creation of man, evidently designed him for a higher, a holier, and a more exalted destiny than earth.

In addition to the above the same apostle observes, "We are saved by hope; but hope that is seen is not hope; for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for it. But if we hope for that we see not, then do we patiently wait for it." Oh, how comforting, how all consoling are the words of the apostle. It is here that our faith is made strong in the blessed assurance that our hope of again meeting our beloved and departed friends in another and better clime, is not in vain.

Again, the language of our Saviour is, "In my Father's house are many mansions, if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also." Here we not only find the doctrine of the re-union of friends, but the sentiment of identity and recognition is strongly inferred if not emphatically taught, which is congenial with the feelings of every enlightened, intelligent, and observing mind. But notwithstanding the doctrine for which we contend is in union with the feelings, the wishes, and fervent prayers of every benevolent mind, yet it may be said by the advocates of popular theology, that there is a time coming beyond the shores of mortality, when every link in friendship's golden chain will be sundered—when all that was fair and lovely in time, will be severed in twain—in a word, when everything which was held near and dear in life, will be dissolved by the eternal fiat of God's omnipotent power. Yes, if this doctrine of ceaseless woe be true, methinks there will be an exhibition of feeling at this sad and last parting scene, that could not have been endured with indifference while in this state of sin and imperfection. That father and mother, brother and sister, the partners of our lives and dear companions of our youth, each as it may please the Father of all mercies, and God of all goodness, are either to be made the happy recipients of his favor, or be cast from his presence down to the dark abyss of black and endless despair, there to endure pain—unending pain—which no tongue can describe, or pencil paint; and which is to continue through the wasteless ages of eternity, or as long as God himself shall exist.

Now we do not know but what there is some evidence—some light and truth which may yet beam from the repository of false theories, that will seal the truth of this doctrine. But what saith the apostle. "The first man is of the earth earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly; and as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Behold I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

Now although the change alluded to by the apostle is evidently a change from mortality to immortality, and from corruption to incorruption, the conclusion is nevertheless unavoidable, that a change of our mental, moral, and intellectual nature will follow as a necessary consequence.—This conclusion seems to be compatible with the wisdom and goodness of God, for it is the inner man, the spiritual body, that is to be clothed with immortality, glory and honor, before it can be fitted for the joys of heaven.

Dear reader, has it fallen to your lot in life, to mourn the early departure of kind friends? Has death in an unlooked for hour, taken from you kind and indulgent parents, or deprived you of the society of a beloved brother or sister? Or does "old Ocean" roll its unfathomable deep between you and some dear friend, in whose society you found a congenial spirit? Where—oh! where will you go to find a mitigation to your sorrows? Will you search the cold and cheerless doctrines of skepticism, over which roll the dark waters of gloom and eternal night; or will you adopt the opposite extreme, and resort to the scorching elements of Partialism, which draws the separating line between you and your friends, by an eternity of misery lit from the pyre of hell? Nay, I need not say you will not! Your happiness either for time or eternity, is especially and emphatically identified with the healing waters of God's impartial grace; and nothing less than a universal re-union of kindred spirits to life and immortality, can give God his true character, dry the widow's tear, hush the orphan's moan, and satisfy the claims of God's promises through the atoning mission of Jesus Christ, and his Gospel. With this view of the subject, and this only, you will be enabled to "See truth, love, and mercy in triumph descending,

And nature all glowing in Eden's first bloom!

On the cold cheek of death, smiles and roses and blending

And beauty immortal awakes from the tomb."

THE IMPORTANCE OF SEARCHING THE SCRIPTURES.

"Search the Scriptures."

These words it will be recollected were addressed by our Saviour to the unbelieving Jews. Such a precept, coming from so illustrious a personage, can not be otherwise than of vital importance to the welfare and happiness of mankind. Believing as we do that the Scriptures are the word of God; that they contain a revelation of his will and character, it becomes us as rational creatures, to make ourselves acquainted with the doctrines and precepts which they inculcate. Without a knowledge of their teachings, they are of no use to us whatever, and we are but little, if any, better off than those who do not possess them. Many people seem to think that if they have a Bible in the house, it is all that is necessary. But it is not sufficient that we have a Bible on the shelf, or in the book-case: we should use it—we should study it—we should make ourselves acquainted with its teachings, if we would be benefited by it. There are several reasons why we should search the Scriptures, a few of which will now be noticed.

1. We should search the Scriptures to ascertain whether they are true or false; or in other words, whether they are what they claim to be, a revelation from God, or the work of imposters. There are many among us, who, if they were asked why they believe the Bible, or how they know that it is the word of God, could give no answer at all. It is perhaps a subject perfectly new to them; something that they have never thought of before, or if they have, they concluded that the Bible must be true, because they were always told so, and their minister said it was true, and every body with whom they were acquainted believed it to be true; and there they drop the subject, and never once think of searching for themselves, to know whether it is true or not. Such persons are always liable to become the dupes of cunning and deceitful men, and are easily blown about by every wind of doctrine, that may chance to pass in the gale of contention. If then we would know for ourselves whether the Scriptures are true or false; whether they are the work of inspired or uninspired men, we should search for ourselves, and not trust entirely to others.

2. We should search the Scriptures to ascertain what they teach. Having satisfied ourselves that the Bible is the word of God, that it contains a revelation of His will and character, we should next search it to know what doctrine it teaches, and what duties are required of us as Christians. There are in the world various and contradictory doctrines and opinions, which their advocates claim to be taught in the Bible, and which are frequently urged upon us, that they may receive our patronage and support. It becomes us, then, to search the Scriptures carefully and candidly, in order that we may know which of those doctrines are true and which are false; that we may know what God requires of us, and what he does not require of us; that we may know the reward of well doing, and the punishment of evil; and finally that we may know our condition beyond the tomb.

3. We should search the Scriptures so that we may be able to defend them, and the doctrines they inculcate, from the cavils and attacks of opposers. There are many among us who make a great bluster about their sentiments, but who know so little about the Bible that they can hardly quote a single passage of Scripture to sustain their views. Such persons even if they are on the right side of the question, are easily put to silence by one of an opposite sentiment, who is acquainted with the Scriptures. If, then, we would avoid the mortification and disgrace of being put to silence by an opposer, and of having him triumph over us; if would not see the truth trampled under feet and disgraced, we should search the Scriptures, so that we may be able, not only to prove our side of the question, but to show wherein the arguments advanced by our opponent fail to establish his side of the question. In this way we shall be enabled to render an essential service to the cause of truth.

There is a fault into which some are prone to fall, and which we should be careful to shun; and that is, the habit of forming opinions such as may best suit our notions, or interest, and then going to the Scriptures to see if we can not find something to support those opinions. When this is done the Scriptures are often perverted and tortured in a very absurd and shocking manner. We should not go to the Scriptures merely to prove our opinions, but to form our opinions. And when our opinions are formed from the Bible, there will be but little danger of perverting Scripture so as to make it support our views. I now leave the subject for the consideration of the candid reader, and will conclude in the language of an apostle; "prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

THE DOCTRINE GOOD TO DIE BY.

Much has been said and written in order to convince the world what doctrine is the best to die by. That Universalism frees the soul in the hour of death, from many awful forebodings which no other doctrine can, I do most sincerely believe. But what is the doctrine which will give joy unspeakable and full of glory in death? It is a knowledge and enjoyment of the Gospel of Christ. No man consciously and obstinately wicked is happy in health, sickness, or death. Therefore, to die happy, we must be virtuous. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright for the end of that man is peace."

MORAL AND PHYSICAL BEAUTY.

Who, that is gifted with that noble possession, which raises man in the scale of being—who that has a mind susceptible of being improved, but loves to look abroad upon the fair, and ever beautiful, and varied face of nature, and feel his thoughts lifted high above the absorbing scenes of terrestrial life, to the contemplation of the God of nature? But who is there in the possession of those delicate sensibilities, and refined, noble and Godlike affections which constitute man a moral being, and which so much distinguishes him from all animate creation, beside that, does not love more, to see and feel the effects of that beauty mirrored forth in the character of an individual devoted to a life of practical usefulness, whose chief delight seems to be in diffusing the warmth of happiness, the light of knowledge, and the beauty of virtue throughout the little sphere in which he moves? The beauties of the natural universe ought to, and do claim a portion of our admiration, and thoughts. Their teachings, ever compatible with those of the purest virtue and morality, ought to be treasured up in the mind as eminently worthy of our attention and esteem.—But how much more ought the beauties of morality to be admired, and profited by, as conveying lessons of more elevated morality, and refined virtue, than those instructions emblazoned forth in the "Book of Nature"?

The sublimity of nature has an eloquence to subdue the passions, chasten the affections, elevate the feelings, and give scope to the intellect; but the sublimity of moral beauty has a deep-toned, irresistible eloquence for the depths of the soul, which not only causes the mind to aspire to a lofty eminence in the favor of others, but reaches the inmost recesses of the human heart, and bursts forth, and sheds a bright halo around the whole character of man.

It is true that physical beauty is brighter than moral, but it is inconstant, unstable and transitory; it is more like the lightning's flash bursting forth and tinging every thing with a blazing glory for a moment, but is then extinguished forever, while nature assumes her former darkness. But moral beauty is like the moon, shining with undiminished lustre, and shedding down upon the earth a soft and mellow light. What though a cloud dims its effulgence occasionally? When it passes over, light bursts forth with renewed splendor, and nature smiles around with the light of a calm and holy joy. Physical beauty captivates the eye, and charms the senses, but moral beauty has a lesson of instruction for the soul; while the former strikes from the eye and the ear bright scintillations of pleasure, which are as evanescent and transitory as the causes which produce them, the latter kindles a flame which burns on with a radiance which time or eternity can not extinguish, and every exertion which is made to smother its light, adds nothing but fresh fuel to the flames, and they glow with a brighter hue. The light of moral beauty is not extinguished when it has ceased to emit its rays in the life of its possessor, but is transferred and rekindled in eternity, and shines as a star hung far—far off in the blue vault of heaven, to guide those who are walking in the mazes of ignorance and mental darkness upon the earth. # THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. J. GUILD.

NUMBER XXXVI.

JOHN viii: 44. "Ye are of your Father the devil," etc.

The term Father was used with great latitude by the Jews, and often in a metaphorical sense for head or leader. Thus Abraham is called the father of the faithful, on account of the greatness of his faith. So also wicked men are called, in the Old Testament, sons of Belial. And here the wicked Jews, are in the same figurative sense of the word, said to have learned their bad practices from the source of all evil, termed the devil—not a real, personal being, any more than sin, or death, which are also sometimes personified in the Scriptures.

John viii: 56. "Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it and was glad." That is, Abraham saw it by faith, and this text will serve to explain verse 58, "Before Abraham was, I am." "I am he," that is the Messiah. The word "he" is left out by the translators. See verses 24, and 28, where the word "he" is retained. All that is meant by these words is, I am he that was promised before Abraham was born.

Luke xi: 52. "Ye have taken away the key of knowledge." The authority to teach the law among the Jews was given by the delivery of a key as a symbol of their office.

Luke xiv: 15. "Blessed is he who shall eat bread in the kingdom of God." That is, he who shall live in the kingdom about to be established by Christ and enjoy the felicities of his reign.

Luke xvi: 8. "And the Lord commended the unjust steward." Not for his injustice, but for his prudence.

Matthew xix: 28. "Ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

As this is a passage which has been much perverted and misunderstood, I shall give the different renderings of it by eminent translators and commentators.

Dr. Owen renders the passage thus, "Ye who have followed me shall, in the regeneration, when the Son of man cometh," etc. Wakefield, Kneeland, and the Imp. Version, follow with a slight alteration the common Version. Dr. Campbell probably gives the true sense of the passage. He renders it thus, "At the renovation, when the Son of man shall be seated on his glorious throne, ye my followers, sitting also on twelve thrones, shall judge the twelve tribes of Israel." And although the Dr. says the completion will be at the general resurrection, yet he offers no proof of this, but frankly acknowledges that, in a subordinate sense, it may be said to have been accomplished when God came to visit, in judgment, that guilty land, when the old dispensation was utterly abolished, and succeeded by the Christian dispensation into which the Gentiles, from every quarter, as well as Jews, were called and admitted. Now by referring to the parable passage in Luke xxii: 28-30, it will be evident that this was its primary and only sense.

Dr. Adam Clarke in a note on the text says, "It is evident that sitting on thrones and judging the twelve tribes, means simply, obtaining eternal salvation and the distinguishing privileges of the kingdom of glory." In a note on Luke xxii: 29, he gives us the reading of three old and approved manuscripts besides some others, and more than intimates his approval of the reading which renders this passage (Luke xxii: 29,) thus, "I appoint unto you a covenant, as my Father hath appointed unto me a kingdom," etc. "That is, ye shall be ministers of the new covenant as I am king in spiritual kingdom to which it relates."

SCRIPTURE—POETRY.

It is not unfrequently the case, that my mind, when meditating concerning the Scriptures, reverts to the many passages which are illustrated by poetry—and illustrated in a manner too, not only to set forth their distinct meaning, but also to warm their souls with piety. As a specimen of such poetic illustrations, the following instances are presented:

1. The greatest commandment of the moral law, is this; "thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, mind, soul and strength." How we should love God, is described in the poetic allegory from the pen Leigh Hunt—an allegory as beautiful as it is instructive.

"Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace;
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel, writing in a book of gold;
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
'What writest thou?' The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, 'the names of those who love the Lord.'
'And is mine one?' said Abou. 'Nay, not so,'
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, 'I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow-men.'
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had bless'd,
And, lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

2. There are many passages of Scripture which show that the practice of virtue brings with it present peace; for God recompenses the righteous in the earth; while great peace have they who love the law of God, and nothing shall offend them. This fact is most tenderly expressed thus:

"This world's 'not all a fleeting show,
For man's illusion given;
He that hath sooth'd a widow's woe,
Or wip'd an orphan's tear, doth know
There's something here of heaven.

And he that walks life's thorny way,
With feelings calm and even;
Whose path is lit from day to day,
By virtue's bright and steady ray,
Hath something felt of heaven.

He that the Christian's course has run,
And all his foes forgiven;
Who measures out life's little span,
In love to God, and love to man,
On earth has tasted heaven."

3. There is great joy in the coming of the Messiah; joy so great, that the heavenly host joined in the song of glory over the birth of him who brought good news of glad tidings to all people. The scene of the Saviour's Advent is nobly dwelt on by Br. E. H. Chapin, in the following article, which has, I believe, before appeared in the Advocate.

"Hark! Hark! with harps of gold,
What anthem do they sing?
The radiant clouds have backward rolled,
And angels strike the string.
'Glory to God!'—Bright wings
Spread glist'ning and afar,
And on the hallowed rapture rings
From circling star to star.

'Glory to God!' repeat
The glad earth and the sea;
And every wind and billow fleet,
Bears on the jubilee.
Where Hebrew bard hath sung,
Or Hebrew seer hath trod,
Each holy spot has found a tongue:
'Let glory be to God!'

Soft swells the music now
Along the singing choir,
And every seraph bends his brow,
And breathes above his lyre.
What words of heavenly birth,
Thrill deep our harps again,
And fall like dew-drops to the earth!
'Peace and good will to men!'

Soft!—yet the soul is bound
With rapture, like a chain:
Earth, vocal, whispers them around,
And heaven repeats the strain.
Sound, Harps, and hail the Morn
With ev'ry golden string;
For unto us this day is born
A Saviour and a King!"

I might go on making such poetic illustrations of parts of Scripture, to great length. But the limits of a paper forbid; and hence those already given, must suffice for, we trust not a useless, but, pleasing specimen.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

We were present at the recent exhibition of this institution, on the afternoon of the second instant. The pieces delivered by the young men on that occasion were listened to by a large and, we presume, a gratified auditory. One or two of the Orations are worthy of special mention—we allude to those on "Persecrance," and on "Poland." We had not the pleasure of being present at the exhibition by the Young Ladies on the evening previous, which we learn, was attended by a thronged congregation of hearers. We give below the schedule of the evening performance, that of the next day we have not got.

Let us speak specially in behalf of the Liberal Institute. We say specially, because we believe it has particular claims to the patronage of the liberal portion of community. All our seminaries of learning should be liberal institutes. The young mind should be taught to inquire, to think, to decide for itself, untrammelled by creeds and systems. This course will produce free, reflecting, independent men, and so long as truth is left free to combat with error—so long as it is sought with a diligent candid spirit—the result must be favorable. We were informed by Dr. Clowes that the young men of the Institute are trained to express their opinion freely and fully. This is as it should be. This distinguishes it from many of the seminaries in our land, and therefore, for this principle, we commend it to the independent, the thinking and the liberal. Let it have their patronage. E. H. ## "THE UNASSUMING GREAT, AND THE ARROGANT LITTLE."

BY MISS E. ROUNSEVILLE.

What vain, erring beings are we. Ambitious to gain the applause of our fellow-men—to secure to ourselves the approbation of those whom we consider of the first rank in society, how frequently do we mistake the sure and only course that leads to the desired haven—the goal of true honor. Affecting a haughty, supercilious air, a lofty step, swelling, pompous, and contemptuous words to those whom we would have the world believe our inferiors, may, perchance, be considered by some individuals as misguided as ourselves, as indications of greatness; but by those who are truly noble, high minded, and in possession of true, genuine dignity of soul, we shall be viewed as arrogant pretenders. When we bow with such respectful deference to Vice, in a costly, glittering robe, and pass by Virtue in a plain and homely garb, with scorn and contempt, what must inevitably be the conclusion of him who is about forming an opinion of our character, and judging by our conduct, the purity and goodness of our hearts? Can it be anything in our favor? Can it, at best, be construed into anything better than a weak head, and misguided understanding?

Let us, for a moment, extend our vision back to those illustrious personages who have shone and still shine as so many bright constellations in the zenith of glory—whose memories the all-sweeping floods of time may not wash away. Were they, I ask, afraid of tarnishing their fame—of contaminating their dignity, by approximating the hovels of the poor, or by recognizing the face, or even pressing the hand of the faint, and way-worn mendicant? We look in vain for an instance. Did He, the great pattern of all perfection, scorn to converse with publicans and sinners? No! far from it!

Let us blush at our folly—retrace our footsteps, and pursue the glorious path which he hath so wisely trodden before us. "This is the way, walk ye in it!"

INNATE, CONNATE AND INBORN DEPRAVITY.

BY REV. W. H. GRISWOLD.

"Undoubtedly it is one of the grand pillars on which the Andover Institution rests." [Dr. Dana to Prof. Stuart.]

"If (original) sin is merely putative, would not a common law of justice demand, that the punishment should be merely putative? How can we unite as par cum pari, putative crime with veritable damnation?" [Stuart.]

"One thing is very clear, . . . men will never be punished as actual sinners, so long as they commit no actual sin. Be this period sooner or later, heaven will never exact an account of talents not committed to our charge." [Stuart.]

"Against original sin, as defined by Turretin, Edwards, and others, the Lord of life and glory with the whole train of prophets, apostles and evangelists, might preach, and no effect in the way of repentance, amendment and forsaking of sin, could be at all expected." [Stuart.]

Here then we have it in plain English. 1. That if sin exists only in supposition even a common law of justice would demand that the punishment also, should be only in supposition. 2. That we can not unite, as equal with equal, supposed crime and veritable damnation. 3. And it is very clear that men will never be punished as actual sinners so long as they commit no actual sin, and that heaven will never exact an account of talents not committed to our charge.

Hear three parallels. 1. If man's knowledge is finite—if every thought, action, word and deed of man is finite; and if man has, and can have, only a finite knowledge of the law, whatever the law of itself may be, would not even a common law of justice demand that the punishment, for those acts, thoughts, words and deeds should be finite also? 2. We can not unite as equal with equal, finite crime with infinite damnation, nor finite causes with infinite consequences. And, 3.—It is very clear that men will never be punished for immortal and incorruptible sin, so long as they are not immortal and incorruptible sinners.* Be that time longer or shorter, heaven will never exact an account of us for that which we have never done, have no power to do, and never can do; viz., to sin infinitely with finite powers and finite capabilities, which are the talents committed to our charge.

Therefore we rejoice, that original sin, and all sin, as defined by Turretin, Edwards, Stuart, Dana, and others, and against which the Lord of life and glory with the whole train of prophets, apostles and evangelists might preach forever and ever, and never expect any change by way of repentance, reformation and the forsaking of sin, is not a Bible doctrine, has no foundation in reason, was a mere dream of the awful and terrible, is gradually decomposing its "adamantine rocks," throwing open its "threefold gates"—which sometimes "grate harsh thunder,"—and becoming softened down from the literal sulphurous flames of a never ending hell, into the more rational and more scriptural element of remorse of conscience and guiltiness of mind. And we rejoice more over, that we are permitted to look forward to the time—or at least to hope that it is not far distant—when mere expressions of alarm on this subject, (or any subject,) and charges of heresy and of forsaking the great standard of Protestantism, (namely, the Saybrook Platform, or the modern iron bedstead of more than one modern Procrustes,) will not pass for sound argument, good sense, or scriptural exegesis.

One thing is clear; the old notion of literal purgatorial fires in the world to come, has of late undergone quite a change among the literati of the misnamed orthodox school. Why is this? This last problem does not yet remain a thing to be demonstrated in exegesis, but is demonstrated almost daily, and has been for sometime demonstrated weekly, in all the more enlightened desks of our land. And again we inquire into the reason of this change. Have the lines of the Westminster Catechism recently been found to be "—traced in sand?"

ESSAY ON WAR. NO. XVII.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"What can we call it but madness, to carry mischief about with us wherever we go; to fall violently upon people of whom we know nothing; to destroy every thing that comes in our way, and like so many wild beasts, to murder men we have no sort of dislike to?" SENECA.

We proceed now to a consideration of the doctrine of self-defence. Here the advocates for war think they have an argument which the friends of peace can never overthrow. Self-defence it is said, is the first law of nature. Grant it, but it is not the first law of Christianity. That requires love to enemies; blessings for curses, etc. But we will enter immediately upon the work. The popular ground occupied is, that if I am attacked, or my family, and life is in danger, then I may destroy him, who attacks me, to save myself or family. Grant this doctrine to be correct, for argument's sake. And if I may kill one to accomplish my object, may I not on the same principle kill ten, twenty, or any number? Certainly. The doctrine of self-defence has no limits. I might, were it in my power, in order to preserve my own life or my family, annihilate every other being on the face of the globe. Such is the principle laid down by nations, and the same would hold good, applied to individuals. If one nation has a right to go to war to save itself, then why not an individual? If war is right, then duelling is right. In fine, if war is right, then every vice may be justified, for it is the parent of vice.

But the question returns. What shall we do when attacked? There are various ways. 1. If there be time, we may expostulate with our enemy; we may point out to him wherein he is wrong. Possibly we may convince him that we are his friend. We may go a step farther: "If thine enemy hunger feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head." Then we are to remember that we are never "to be overcome of evil, but we are to overcome evil with good."

2. We may possibly escape from our enemy. Jesus took this course: "And they in the Synagogue . . . rose up and thrust him out of the city, and led him unto the brow of the hill, whereon the city was built, that they might cast him down headlong. But he passing through the midst of them, went his way." Luke iv : 28-30. See also John viii : 59.

3. We may pray for our enemies. We are directed "to pray one for another," and as an encouragement, we are assured that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." James v : 16. Surely, the Christian should never forget the prayer of his Master when on the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." To show the efficacy of prayer, we will present only a single instance; a thousand might be adduced. "During the rebellion in Ireland in 1793, the rebels had long meditated an attack on a Moravian settlement. At length a large body marched to the town. But the Moravians, true to their principles in this trying emergency, did not meet them in arms, but assembling in their place of worship besought Jehovah to be their shield and protector in the hour of danger. The hostile bands, who had expected an armed resistance, were struck with astonishment at a sight so unexpected and impressive; they heard the prayers and praises of the Moravians; they listened to supplications in their own behalf; and after lingering in the streets a whole day and night, they with one consent turned and marched away without having injured one individual."*

4. Lastly, we may die for our enemy. We have tried, we will suppose every method of escape, of expostulation, or reconciliation. He remains unmoved. He is bent on our destruction. Now then, we are to carry out the Christian principle. That teaches that under such circumstances we must die; but "greater love hath no man than this that he lay down his life for his friends." "But God commendeth his love towards us in that while we were yet enemies, Christ died for us." Christianity requires us to sacrifice life, but it is our own life, not that of our enemy. If we are then so placed that our enemy will destroy us, then we must, like Stephen, "kneel down and cry, Lord lay not this sin to their charge." Or if this beautiful example is not enough, go to Calvary, and learn how to die. Go imitate your Saviour when he died in agony upon the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But we can go no farther.

MOTIVES TO OBEDIENCE.

The doctrine is held, and zealously urged by a vast many Christians at the present day, that no other motive save that of escaping from endless misery, is sufficient to prevent men from wandering in the paths of vice and folly, and to lead them in the way of obedience and righteousness. Remove, we are told, this powerful preventive, and we remove every restraint, every moral obligation, and leave the subject to be dictated wholly by the evil propensities of his nature, and the natural inclination of the carnal mind. Hence the sinner is continually admonished, that if he does not repent and turn from the evil of his ways, hell with all its fatal consequences will be his portion forever. That unless he puts forth those laudable exertions necessary to secure his soul's salvation, by denying himself of everything of a worldly nature, and lives a quiet and godly life in this world, he will be made to feel in the future, the pains of those eternal burnings, indescribable in their nature, and which no human power can either make or imitate.

Such are the means employed by many at the present day, for the purpose of Christianizing the world. And without them nothing can be accomplished of a moral nature. Virtue can not be promoted, hope can not be cherished, faith can not be exercised, and piety and devotion can not exist. Endless misery, therefore, according to these teachings, is the great propelling power, by which all those benign graces in the moral world are exercised. The light that has ever radiated and cheered the pathway of the Christian, from those bright luminaries which bedeck the firmament of the moral universe, is only reflected by the burnings of an endless hell. This view of the subject, I know, is horrible in the extreme, but it is nevertheless but a fair representation of the teachings of a large portion of professed Christians in this age of the world.

Let us see now, how far the motives which these teachers present correspond with those urged for the same purpose by the sacred writers. "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ which before was preached unto you, whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." "I exhort therefore, that first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions and giving of thanks be made for all men; for kings and for all that are in authority that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour who will have all men to be saved and come unto a knowledge of the truth." "My little children, these things write I unto you that ye sin not, and if any man sin we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: and he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." Here then, the "restitution of all things," the immutable truth that "God our Saviour will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth," that "Christ is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world," are held out as motives why men should "repent and be converted"—why they should "lead a quiet and peaceful life in all godliness and honesty," why they "should not sin"—why they should "live soberly, justly, and godly in this present world."

Such were the motives presented by the early disciples of our Lord and Master, to induce sinners into the way of righteousness. And how widely do they contrast with those made use of for the same purpose, by many divines of the present day! How strangely and widely have mankind wandered from those wholesome precepts of the Gospel "which are able to make them wise unto salvation!" Had the time been spent in urging mankind to the performance of their duty from such motives as were used by the primitive Christians, instead of endeavoring to coerce them by means of the unreasonable and unscriptural doctrine of endless misery—had they been taught that "God is good unto all and his tender mercies are over all his works," instead of "despising the riches of his goodness, forbearance and long suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth to repentance"—had they been made, through proper instruction, to believe that "the Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies," instead of being "led away by false teachers, ignorant of God's righteousness, going about to establish their own righteousness, not submitting themselves to the righteousness of God"—had all this time, I repeat, been spent for the promotion of these desirable objects, by the proper means, the consequence would have been ere this day, that there would have been "none to molest or destroy in all God's holy mountain, but the earth would have been full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

HELL IN AMERICA.

I had supposed that according to the teachings of our good friends the Partialists, hell was situated somewhere in God's dominions, in a place beyond the bounds of time, not made known as yet to the children of men. But herein I was mistaken, for the wonderful discovery has been made, and made too, upwards of one hundred years ago. Yes, America, our own beloved America, is to be the scene of operations, to torture the damned!

Hear what saith a celebrated divine, Dr. Increase Mather. "I know there is a blessed day to the visible church, not far off. But it is the judgment of very learned men, that in the glorious times promised to the church on earth, AMERICA will be HELL. And, although there is a number of the elect of God to be born here, I am verily afraid, that in process of time, New England will be the wofullest place in all America!"

What say you to this, reader? Is not here something new, a discovery worth mentioning? But why America should be selected as the grand theatre, to exhibit those heavy plagues, coming upon the wicked, is more than I can divine. We have no light on this point. Mather was "orthodox up the hub," and we are not a little surprised that his brethren have not said more on this subject. We think it advisable for all denominations, "Roman Catholics," (the mother church) "Church of England," "Mabometans," "Presbyterians," "Methodists," "Baptists," and all other sects, that believe in eternal misery, to get together and hold a CONVENTION, for the purpose of deciding where this hell shall be; in another world, Europe, Asia, Africa, or America, and when decided, have a "grand jubilee," that the people at large, may understand its location, and govern themselves accordingly. Is not this a good idea?

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.....NO. XVII.

"But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways; by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you, whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not. For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment; and spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly; and turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly; and delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked: for that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds; the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." 2 Peter ii: 1-9.

The precious passage is one about which there is much dispute, since it is supposed by different sects to teach different opinions, which opinions are as diametrically opposed to each other, as cold and heat. One sect, believing that the power of divine truth will finally triumph over every evil and deliver the slaves of passion from the thralldom of sin, think that the passage contains nothing which militates with an opinion so closely allied to the nature of Deity, to the disposition of Christ, to the spirit of the gospel, and to the best feelings of the human heart—but that it relates to facts, which have no kindred with the sublime mysteries of another, and we trust, better world.

On the contrary, another sect believes that in this passage, it finds proof of the existence of fallen spiritual angels, who, becoming ambitious, made war in heaven against the forces of the Almighty, until they were expelled from the regions of light into the darkness of hell. This sect also see in this passage, proof, that a great, final day of judgment will come, in which mankind will be judged—the righteous to depart into full and complete bliss—while the wicked are to be driven away into fire which never ceases; into pains which never end; into a place where no drop of water can be found, where no beam of mercy can penetrate or ray of love beam, however heart-rending may be the shriek which prays for pity—and where, oh sorrowful thought! the infinite torments of finite victims are to be contrasted with the everlasting and gushing melody of the saints.

Casting out of the account the reasonableness or unreasonableness, the truth or the falsity of this latter notion, it is so terrible in its results, so awfully disproportionate to the moral responsibility of the creature, that every reflecting mind must wish that it may not prove true, and hope that, in regard to it, the tenor of the passage in consideration, has been mistaken. Certainly, the untold horrors of this sentiment, should at least, urge every heart to a candid investigation of the subject; for if any system of more benevolent features and exalting powers be true, and be proved as issuing from the fountain of the love of God, then must the mind be animated with a pleasure and a benevolence, which no representations of vengeance can possibly produce.

For one, the writer does not believe the common view of fallen angels and of a general judgment to be correct—he looks upon it as being contrary to the express testimony of Scripture—while, it is his conviction that the passage quoted, affords no just grounds for its predication, however much the peculiar style and remarkable boldness of the apostle's language may seem to favor it. In order to give you reasons for this conviction, we shall, 1st, Proceed to state some objections which rise in the mind against the common views—and 2d, Endeavor to obtain a true knowledge of the passage.

1. There are objections which the reflective mind suggests against the popular view of the passage, which objections are entitled to serious consideration. True, they are objections which reason suggests—and it may be thought a dangerous procedure to use reason in regard to such matters. But this idea is too late—it belongs to the past, not to the present age—for man has already learned that without his reason he is an idiot; and that, if he receives any position whatever, without examining it by his reason, he receives it by mere assent, without understanding what he professes to believe. There is no knowledge, either in politics, philosophy or religion, to be obtained without a liberal exercise of reason. Besides, God called upon the Jews to reason with him, Isa. i: 18—Jesus bid the Jews to judge what was right, Luke xii: 57—the Bereans were approved for searching for themselves, Acts xvii: 11—and Paul besought his brethren to prove all things, 1 Thes. v: 21. In view of these facts, that individual takes a fearful responsibility upon himself, who denounces the use of reason in regard to matters of religion; and virtually says, that it will not answer for the mass of the people to reason, for the priests understand those things best, and will reason and think for them. For myself, on this subject and all others, I shall endeavor to use the blessing of reason which God has given me—and I invite you to use your reason in following me, to see whether consistency is used, in explaining the language of Peter.

The reflective mind will perceive, that the very notion of angels rebelling in and being driven from heaven draws largely upon our credulity; since if it be admitted, we must make concessions which are wholly at war with reason and Scripture.—For,

1. We must concede, that angels of heaven have passions, anger and pride, which lead them to war and contention. 2. We must concede that the presence of God was insufficient to keep peace in heaven, even among the cherubs of his throne. 3. We must concede that there is corruption in paradise, for if there was war among the angels, there must have been corruption. 4. It involves the immortal world in uncertainty, because, if there once was war in heaven, we have no certification that there will be no more war—hence, we know not but that heaven will be one scene of contending spirits, fighting for mastery. 5. It is contrary to the wisdom and power of God, for he would not form the attendants upon his holy presence, of imperfect materials, bursting with a disposition to rebel and break his commandments, to resist his will and his pleasure; and even so far contend with him, as to question his right to the throne of the universe, rendering it necessary for him to cast them out of heaven to save his power. 6. When the Sadducees questioned our Saviour concerning the resurrection, he informed them that the children of the resurrection should be equal to the angels of God. Did he mean by this asseveration, that we should become equal to imperfect angels who fought with each other, and engaged in such violent contentions, that some of their number were necessarily ejected from heaven? Certainly, our Saviour did intend this, if there was war in heaven, for we are in no place assured, that there will be no more war there. These are a few concessions, which must be yielded before even a pretence can be made to belief in the existence of fallen spiritual angels. And yet, they appear to me so unreasonable, so contrary to the Scriptures, and so totally subversive of all our views of a future state, that it seems impossible for a mind to admit them and then swallow the huge camel, that the throne of God was once attacked by an angel of light. If the question be asked, admitting this sentiment to be thus absurd, from whence did it arise, since absurdity can not arise from the Scriptures? I answer, that I can find but one source—and that is, it is a fable, taken from the poetic imagination of John Milton and incorporated with the gold of divine truth.

Dropping this subject for a moment, we remark that similarly absurd concessions must be made in believing the doctrine of a general judgment at one particular point of time, when this earth shall have been dissolved by fire—when the countless throngs of humanity shall be assembled in the spiritual presence of God—when the wicked shall be flung like loathsome reptiles, into the haze and gloom of unutterable anguish—when the righteous shall be gathered into the fold of heaven, reconciled to the will of God, even though that will consigns a father, a mother, a wife, or a child, to endless burnings.

But the question at once presents itself—what is the object of this supposed judgment? God as certainly understands the character of his children, the moment they pass from the stage of existence, as he would though they were to be arrayed before him for judicial examination—and he can as well pass judgment then, as at any other period. Certainly, if the common notion be true, God does pass judgment upon every creature at death; for we are told that the wicked and righteous, when they leave this life, go respectively to heaven or hell. If this be so, why take them out again? Is it because some of the wicked get into heaven, or some of the righteous fall into destruction? No person will suppose this. Is it because God does not know the amount of criminality chargeable to each person? The idea is preposterous. Why then is it supposable that God will punish sinners first, and then, at some future period, take them over that great gulf, which creeds tell us is impassable, to pass sentence afterwards? We should think strangely of a governor on earth, who should first hang the murderer and then pass sentence of death upon him.

But perhaps it will be said, that the object of this great judgment, is, to enhance the glory of God, and declare the magnitude of his power before all created intelligences. But, I am persuaded that reflection will set aside this view of the subject. Remember the descriptions which are given of this great day—that all the world will be gathered before God, and judged, not according to their deeds, for no acts of the creature can deserve infinite woe, nor can they deserve infinite peace—remember the songs of the saints, and hear the howlings of the damned, their shrieks and their groans, as the Almighty arm of heaven sweeps them into endless tortures, separating the nearest friends and relatives by the walls of eternity—remember this—and then ask if the glory of God can be enhanced by such a scene—if it is characteristic of his nature? We can conceive of a Roman conqueror gracing his triumph with the groans, tears and pains of his captives—we can conceive of heathen heroes, who are pleased to crush their victims, as an after-piece to their victorious power—but we can not conceive how God can be glorified with such scenes. The true glory of God consists in order, harmony, benevolence. Behold it in the glorious constellation of works, vast and illimitable, which adorn the temple of the universe. Behold it in the gift of his Son, for the purpose of raising the mind to the exalting scenes of virtue and knowledge—to fill it with the principles of divine truth, which will purify every creature and lead them to God, conferring upon them the dignified robes of immortal felicity. This is the true glory of God, and it agreed with the declaration of the prophet, that the Lord doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men; for he will have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies and the greatness of his love.

Besides—when we read of judgment in the Scriptures, it is entirely gratuitous to affirm that it means endless misery: for by so doing, the act of passing sentence is confounded with the penalty itself. Judgment is simply decision—it is not the penalty itself—it is simply pronouncing such consequences as are due to certain conduct. Therefore, admitting that God will judge all men on some great day, the simple fact that they undergo judgment, is no proof that the doom is endless—but after the judgment has been passed, the question arises, what is the penalty which that judgment has awarded the creature? Elucidation of this question must be found in some other terms besides that of judgment.

MEMOIR OF BR. FULLER.

A few weeks ago I noticed this work with entire approval, except two small portions of the Memoir. Br. Moore, the author, notices my exceptions in the Nazarene, and seems to think my notice might have been "all molasses," inasmuch as others had not taken any exceptions to the work. Well—probably the criticized feel more sensitively than the critics; for I can return Br. Moore's regrets to him in regard to part of his notice of my remarks.

He says I entirely misunderstood his remarks about the New York State Convention's "disregard of an important regulation concerning the entrance of preachers into our ministry." His language conveyed to every one I have heard speak of the work, precisely the same meaning that it did to me. However, Br. Moore explains his meaning differently. He now says—"It seemed to me manifestly improper that a man should be encouraged to preach about two years, and actually accept an invitation to settle as a pastor, without receiving fellowship from any body in our denomination." So that Br. Moore censures the Convention, not for giving their fellowship, but for withholding it from Br. Fuller until that time. I am glad of this explanation, for I venture to assert that no reader of his book understood this to be the meaning of the language there used. But let us see on what grounds this censure of the Convention rests.

I deny that it is "a regulation" among us for Conventions or Associations to give their fellowship unasked by either the candidate or his friends. And I can not learn that Br. Fuller or his friends asked the fellowship of the Convention, (or of the Central Association,) at its previous session. What, then, becomes of the censure? It certainly does not rest on the Convention. Br. Moore may censure the deceased, or his friends, for this departure from "an important regulation" which never was a regulation; but I have no doubt that reasons existed for their not applying, which would be amply sufficient to excuse their "disregard," even to Br. Moore.

Let us see. In May, 1829, Br. Fuller preached his first sermon in the then Genesee Association, which disclaimed the fellowship of the Convention. He preached only occasionally, also, after this time. In July, 1830, (after the session of the Convention, and of the Central Association, for that year, had been held,) he removed to Clinton. Here he preached occasionally, until September, when he was prostrated by illness, from which he did not recover until the winter. In March, 1831, he commenced laboring steadily, and in May following, (after he had been less than a year in the bounds of any Association acknowledging the jurisdiction of the Convention,) he received the fellowship, which had not been applied for earlier, and which could not have been given with propriety until this session—and the withholding of which, until that session, (instead of the giving thereof at this time,) is made a matter of censure against the Convention, by Br. Moore, a resident in another State!

I still think, even after Br. Moore's explanation of his meaning, that the censure of a State Convention, by an individual who knew nothing of the reasons for their delay in action, betrayed a little more zeal than knowledge—a little more haste than modesty. And even now, it appears, from the above facts gathered from the Memoir itself, that Br. Moore is mistaken in regard to the regulations of the Convention being disregarded or departed from in the present case. "The long delay in granting fellowship to Br. Fuller," proves to have been about the usual time—for it was granted at the first session after his removal into its bounds of jurisdiction, and as soon as it was asked for.

The other brief exception taken to his remarks, he first evades, by understanding me as censuring him for stating Br. Fuller's views. Such is not my language. Every one must see that my remarks referred only to the biographer's language, beginning with—"And we may incidentally remark," etc. I do not believe Br. Fuller would ever countenance such a sweeping remark against those who differed from him as to the genuineness of any part of the New Testament—or as to the nature of Christ—for he certainly knew that many of his brethren, the writer among the number, did believe that, in regard to the nature of Jesus, it was the human nature, only, in contradistinction from the nature of angels, or the nature of God. What he was in office, and (in consequence of that office) in being made the recipient of God's "spirit without measure," is not a matter of difference between us—nor did I consider the censure of Br. Moore as making any saving clause because of agreement on this latter point. His language is express against all who believe that Jesus was "no more than a descendent of Adam, of the earth, earthy," according to birth, or natural descent; for the whole subject touched upon, has no relation to the office, but the nature of Jesus. I am therefore glad to find him saying in conclusion, "I did not mean to say that any part of the sacred Scriptures should be rejected, if the first and second chapters of Luke are not true; but merely to express my conviction that these chapters claim the belief of all Christians, that the conception of our Lord was indeed miraculous, and that he was begotten of the Holy Ghost. And if I was even wrong, I disclaim all intentions of dealing in 'harsh censures.'

So be it, then. I misunderstood his meaning, as did many others, by construing literally his language in regard to our State Convention; and trust he will see that his censure of that Convention, even now, was hasty, made without a proper consideration of the facts in the case, and should be as publicly withdrawn as it has been repeated. In regard to the second point, I freely accept his closing remarks in explanation of what seemed to me the meaning of his words in the Memoir; and ask him to believe, that however plain I might be in the remarks which qualified the approval I gave to his book, I did not mean to be censorious or uncharitable. I would not have taken exception to the latter portion, did I not believe that impartiality demanded of me to state all that I considered faulty in the work; and that justice to myself and others, demanded a denial of the implied charge of infidelity, on account of our views of the nature of Christ. The latter has been withdrawn—the former I hope will be—and I shall continue to feel respect and affection for Br. Moore, as I ever have done. A. B. G.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"The Universalist Companion with an Almanac and Register containing the statistics of the denomination, for 1841." Pp. 72.

This work is now on its way to those in various sections of the Union, who have ordered it; and a small lot yet on hand is reserved for the orders of those who had ordered the Almanac and Register alone, (an edition not printed this year,) and of such others as may want a few for secluded neighborhoods.

It contains an Almanac, calculated by Prof. Perkins of this city, for Portland, Me., Boston, Mass., and New-York city—this is for the Eastern States—and for Utica, N. Y., Cincinnati, Ohio, and New-York city—for the Middle and Western States. Under the Almanac on each page is a brief statement of what "Universalists Believe"—and our views of the importance of "Love to God and Man." On page 14, extending to page 36, are "Two tables, intended to assist those who have little or no knowledge of any language except English, in searching the Scriptures in relation to endless misery"—by Rev. T. Clowes, LL. D., Principal of the Clinton Liberal Institute. These tables have been most laboriously and carefully prepared by an actual search of the Old and New Testaments in the original languages, compared with the common English version. They are probably the most thorough and correct tables on the subject to be found in point—if not the only ones.—"Table I," contains "all the texts of the Old Testament in which the word Olam occurs; arranged under the several significations assigned to that word in the English translation." "Table II," contains "all the texts in which aion, or aionios occurs in the New Testament." Remarks follow both Tables, showing the usage of the words more plainly in several passages, and proving that they do not mean strictly endless duration, but merely the period of the existence of any being or thing to which they are applied. These Tables will be found worth more than the price of the whole work, and it is to be hoped that the Dr. will continue his researches, (as he is ever doing,) and ultimately give his labors to the world in the form of a book.

The other articles in the Companion and Register, are, Rules for ascertaining the extent of meaning of "All and Every," when used in the Scriptures, pp. 36 to 44—"Universalism not Licentious," pp. 44 to 48—"Questions for Partialists," pp. 48 to 50—"Art thou a friend?" pp. 50, 51—"Fear not," 51 to 53—and Statistics of the denomination in the United States and Territories, and the British Provinces, pp. 54 to 71—with a review of the Progress of the Cause since "Five years ago," pp. 71, 72. This review shows a gain in the United States, within five years, only, of 200 societies; 269 meeting houses, and 204 preachers; or, about 60 per cent in preachers, 30 per cent in societies, and more than 100 per cent in meeting-houses. To God be the praise.

Since the work has come from the press, I have discovered one or two omissions and errors: not material, it is true, but vexatious to me. The difficulty of getting desired information, and of using correctly what came in at so late an hour, must be my excuse. I hope the work will be found so useful as to be widely circulated, and induce increased orders to be sent in early next year.

Absence from home and some pressing duties have prevented an earlier notice of some of the following interesting publications with copies of which we have been highly favored by their respective authors.

1. "Duties of Universalists.—An Occasional Sermon delivered before the Maine Convention of Universalists at its session in Albion, June 24, 1840. By Rev. Darius Forbes." Text—1 Sam. vii: 12. He gives a brief history of our cause, and of the obstacles it has had to encounter; after which he proceeds to consider our duties under existing circumstances. These duties are—a more general organization—an increase of ministers, and more care in admitting candidates—a stricter discipline—the cultivation of peace among ourselves—an increase of practical piety, and renewed attention to the forms of religion. The sermon is well written.

2. "The government of God, considered with reference to natural laws; and the nature of rewards and punishments explained. By Rev. Wm. Fishbough, of Taunton, Mass." 16 pp. 8vo. He clearly and ably explains the physical, organic and moral laws, shows the peculiar province of each, and the rewards and penalties attached to each, as well as their certainty and adequacy. He then explains the extent to which men are liable and accountable to those laws, and draws a conclusion against the extension of any rewards or punishments into the immortal state, for any obedience to or violation of them in this state of being—and in favor of the emendatory nature of moral punishments in particular. It is a clear, well written and excellent discourse, well calculated to do much good.

3. "A Statement of Reasons, Proceedings of the Old Colony (Mass.) Association, and an Occasional Sermon by Rev. R. Tomlinson, Plymouth, Mass., 1840. 24 pp. large 12 mo. This is a complaint against Br. Whittemore, of the Trumpet, for mutilating and misrepresenting some of the proceedings of the Old Colony Association, which had been sent to him for publication, and for omitting wholly other portions of their proceedings—because some of their proceedings requested the societies to instruct their delegates in the next council in reference to a resolution condemning slavery as a moral evil. The occasional Sermon is an able and dignified production, in the usual bold, strong, clear style of the author. Text, "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me"—John vii: 16. Use—to enforce the duty of preaching truth plainly, leaving men who dislike it, to settle the matter with the Author of that truth. Some of our temporizing, milk and water preachers might be profited by reading it.

4. "A Discourse in review and examination of a Sermon preached by Elder J. Blain in the Baptist church in Homer, N. Y. By Rev. A. C. Barry." 16 pp. 8vo. A plain, but mild, and dignified review of an uncharitable attack; and a clear refutation of a common place argument against the truth. The only severity in the Sermon is on the last page, in reply to Elder Blain charge that Universalists were worse than murderers—and this severity is merely a brief "turning of the tables" on the accuser, and is mild in comparison with the unchristian accusations he pointedly rebukes. The Sermon should be well circulated in the region where the events occurred.

5. "Reply to Professor Stuart on Universalism. By Rev. S. P. Landers, Andover, Mass." pp. 32, 8vo. This is a republication of Br. Landers' articles in the Christian Freeman. Professor Stuart took up the Apocryphal Book of Enoch, and in an article for the Biblical Repository for July, made it an excuse for a general attack on Universalism. Br. Landers has followed him faithfully, and pointed out the insufficiency of his arguments, and the errors of his positions and the falsity of his assumptions, in a clear and cogent manner. From the extracts given by Br. L., we infer that Professor S. is losing temper at the use made of his previous words by Universalists; for thus far, all his efforts to refute the doctrine have tended to advance it. The same may be said of his present effort to disprove a Bible doctrine by a book of fables! We hope the Professor will soon write again, and endeavor to bring out some newer arguments than those worn-out pleashe has been in the habit of urging.

There are probably a few other pamphlets lately received, but the foregoing are all we can now find that we deem it necessary to notice publicly. A. B. G.

HOPE IN DEATH.

BY REV. S. MILES.

Look round and see the sad decay,
Of mortals doom'd to pass away;
Glance o'er the ruins Time has made,
And view the dust where friends are laid.

The Gospel speaks when death is nigh,
Our Saviour comes from God on high,
To bear our souls to realms above,
Where all is peace and boundless love.

Then farewell Mothers, farewell friends,
Your pains and cares are at an end;
We soon shall follow you away,
To boundless bliss in endless day.

[From the Ladies Repository.]

QUESTIONS.

"Do loved ones die in yon bright spheres,
As in this world of ours?"

STARS! stars! what are ye? Would some voice
Might echo out the truth,
And tell me if ye are abodes
Of purity and youth.

If in your bounds the soul doth have
A mightier range than here?
If there bright eyes beam e'er with love,
Unshadowed by a fear?

If there warm hearts beat still for us
As in this world of death?

If there the songs of joy are sung
With an immortal's breath?

If there they wait to welcome us
When snapped the earthly chain?

If there to meet, may be our hope,
To never part again?

If there pale sickness is not known,
Nor grief, nor sorrow's tear?

If there dark sin can never come,—
O, who would linger here!

O, who would wish to make this earth
His ever dwelling place,
Where loves are formed but to be rent,
No ever present face!

DOMESTIC MANAGEMENT.

The following is from the pen of Mrs. Conant, the Editor of the Mother's Monthly Journal.

CHILD. Mother, I want a piece of cake.
MOTHER. I haven't got any—it's all gone.
C.—I saw there's some up in the cupboard when you opened the door.

M.—Well, you don't need any now, cake hurts children.

C.—No it don't, (whining) I do want a piece; Mother mayn't I have a piece?

M.—Be still; I can't get up now I am busy.
C.—(Crying aloud,) I want a piece of cake, I want a piece of cake.

M.—Be still, I say, I shan't give you a bit if you don't leave off crying.

C.—(Still crying) I want a piece of cake—I want a piece of cake.

M. [Rising hastily and reaching a piece.] There take that, and hold your tongue! Eat it up quick, I hear Ben coming. Now, don't tell him you've had any.

C. [Ben enters.] I've had a piece of cake you can't have any.

BEN. Yes I will—mother, give me a piece.
M. There, take that; it seems as if I never could have a bit of anything in the house. You'll see sir, [to the child,] if you get any thing the next time!

C. [Another room.] I've had a piece of cake.
YOUNG SISTER. Oh! I want some too!

C. Well you bawl, and mother will give you some.

Let us see, now, how many errors were committed by the mother during this short conversation. In the first place, she tells a downright lie and the child detects her in it. "I have no cake." "You have, I saw it in the cupboard." Secondly, she gave a false reason—"cake hurts children,"—for not gratifying the child's wishes; at least her next reply would lead him to suppose so. Thirdly, she encourages the child to cry for what he desires, by offering him as a reward for leaving off, the gratification which he could not obtain by continued good humor. Fourthly, she rewards the child in crying for disobeying her. Fifthly, she fosters a spirit of selfish greediness, the lowest and most degrading of all passions; "eat it up quick, and don't tell Ben." Sixthly, she utters a threat which she has no inclination to act upon—"See if you get any next time!" We must mention, also, the spirit by which her conduct through the whole is marked and which makes the child feel that she has at least yielded to his wishes, not because she loves him, but in order to save herself the vexation of being teased any longer. The practical commentary which he makes in his advice to his sister, shows that he fully understands the springs of her domestic machinery. Yet this is probably a mother who loves her offspring, who is toiling early and late for their comfort and respectability, but who will perhaps have to complain that her old age is embittered by the neglect and unkindness of her children. A mother may sacrifice her health, and life itself, for her family, and yet not make them happy; they will not value her. A child can not comprehend the value of that affection which keeps his mother busy from morning till night, when her industry is continually crossing the track of his enjoyment, when it is made an apology for petulance, in justice and neglect, by those little things which make up the happiness of childhood. Nothing but a constant hourly flow of kindness, prompt in gratifying, gentle in refusing,—a kindness which knows no ebb, unruined by passion, unpolluted by selfishness—can gain the entire confidence and affection of a child. I ought also to add, that a mother who has made herself an object of contempt to her children can not justly claim their deference and respect, and such she will be, if in her management of them she stoops to the meanness of deceit and falsehood. The pure, ennobling sentiments of filial piety, can spring up only in an atmosphere of truth and love. In its nature it is a kin to that which is exercised towards the beneficent Father of all, and requires for its expansion the same influences of rectitude and goodness.

RAPIDITY OF IDEAS IN DREAMS.—Two friends agreed to go on a walking expedition, one of whom proposed to call on the other the following morning. He did so and waked his friend, but in vain, as he went to sleep again. He then dreamed that his father put several questions to him as to the state of his health, was alarmed at his replies, and sent for a surgeon; that two medical gentlemen attended him, put the usual questions, and ordered him a cold shower bath. He awoke with the shock, and found that his friend, tired with waiting, had dashed a basin full of cold water in his face. It was evident that what the dreamer deemed the concluding circumstance, was in truth the suggester of the whole series of ideal events. The mind had called up all this train of thought to account for the sensation produced by the water. Several dreams illustrative of this point were related. There is something analogous to this in our waking hours. A single word will call up instantaneously a long series of by gone events, and in a revelry of fancies are often as ridiculous and as rapid in their passage through the mind as in a dream. Generally speaking, however, our waking thoughts succeed each other less rapidly than the ideas which make up our dreams. These might be accounted for in the first place by the absence of sensations, and secondly by the absence of that 'regulative faculty' which, when awake, we exercise over our thoughts. In sleep, the flow of thoughts is as rapid and irregular as the motion of a machine without a regulator.

DRUNKENNESS.—A drunken man is a greater monster than any that is to be found among all creatures that God has made; as, indeed there is no character which appears more despicable and deformed in the eyes of all reasonable persons than that of a drunkard. Wine often turns the good natured into an idiot, and the choleric into an assassin. It gives bitterness to resentment; it makes vanity insupportable, and displays every spot of the soul in its utmost deformity.—Spectator.

Every fool knows how often he has been a rogue, but every rogue does not know how often he has been a fool.

Patriotism, Liberty, Reform, and many other good things have got a bad name, by keeping bad company; for those who have ill intentions, cannot afford to work with tools that have ill sounds. When a knave sallies forth to deceive us, he dresses up his thoughts in his best words, as naturally as his body in his best clothes; but they must expect a fleish account, that give him credit either for the one, or for the other.

The more we know of History, the less shall we esteem the subjects of it; and to despise our species, is the price we must too often pay for our knowledge of it.

DEATHS.

In Pittsford, on the 30th ult., after a protracted illness of consumption, Mrs. SALLY, wife of Silas Nye, aged 55 years. Among the many sighing and suffering children of one common Father, few have passed through deeper and darker shades of adversity, than did our departed friend whose death is lamented by her husband and children as well as by all who knew her. This is now the third time this bereaved family have been called to mourn in the short space of two years. On the 15th of June last past, they were called to witness the decease of CINTHIA, wife of Fayette L. Robinson, whose triumphant faith in the unlimited goodness and grace of God to all men prepared the way, and strengthened the hands of her mother to follow on in the way of life and peace, through which she left the world resigned and composed. She has left an afflicted husband, and several children, to mourn her departure. May Heaven's choicest blessings fall upon them as the dew, and descend as the rain, may they grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, and finally may they meet their virtuous and happy friend where parting is no more.

S. MILES.

In Randolph, Cattaraugus county, N. Y., on the second day of August, CELIA YORK, wife of Jeremiah York, Esq., aged 56 years. Sister York had long been a firm and unshaken believer in the Gospel of God's unbounded grace; it sustained her through a long and painful illness, (consumption,) and animated her in view of her dissolution. The writer of this delivered a discourse at her request, one week previous to her death, at her house. She was joyful on the occasion, manifested a strong desire to depart and be with Christ, which would be far better, giving then her dying testimony to her unshaken faith in God's universal goodness in the salvation of all men from sin and death. In life she was an affectionate companion, a tender mother, and a kind neighbor. Her many virtues will long be remembered by her acquaintances. May the blessings of God rest upon the bereaved family. The funeral was attended by the writer and a discourse delivered to a numerous congregation.

SALMON ADAMS.

Will the Watchman please copy the above.
At Union Square, March 19th, Br. ABRAHAM VIRGIL, in the 53d year of his age. His relatives and friends will meet at the school house in that place on the fourth Sunday inst. at 2 o'clock, P. M. when a discourse suitable to the occasion will be delivered by the writer.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

SECTION VI.

Parable of the Axe.

Matt. iii: 10. And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire. Luke ix: 9. And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees; therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire.

General Remarks.—We find many instances in the Old Testament, in which the destruction of one nation by another, is represented in language similar to the above.

Of the destruction of Egypt it is said, "They shall march with armies and come against her with axes and hewers of wood. They shall cut down her forests saith the Lord." Jer. xli: 22, 23. Isaiah applies similar language in the same way. (x: 33, 34.) "Behold, the Lord, the Lord of hosts, shall lop the bough, with terror, and the high ones, with stature shall be hewn down; and the haughty shall be humbled. And he shall cut down the thickets of the forests with iron, and Lebanon shall fall by a mighty one." See also Jer. li: 19-24. In Jer. xxvi: 6, 7, after comparing Judah to a wilderness, the Lord says, "And I will prepare destroyers against thee, every one with his weapons, and they shall cut down thy choice cedars and cast them into the fire."

In view of these quotations, it must be obvious that John's language admits of a rational explanation, without applying it to the future world. Dr. Adam Clarke says that the Jewish nation is the tree and the Romans the axe, who, by the just judgment of God, were speedily to cut it down. See more to the same effect in his comments on the place. The same explanation is given by Lightfoot, Hammond, Pearce, Gill, Le Clerk, L'Enfant, and others. See Whittemore's Notes.

Parable of the Fan.

Matt. iii: 11. I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire.

12. Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor and gather his wheat into his garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

Mark i: 7. And preached, saying, There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose.

8 I indeed baptize you with water; but he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost.

Note.—Mark omits to name the baptism with fire, for the reason, it would seem, that that phrase was particularly Jewish, in its use and application, and might not be understood at Rome where he wrote his Gospel.

Luke iii: 15. And as the people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ or not,

16 John answered, saying unto them all, I indeed baptize you with water; but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire.

17 Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor and will gather his wheat into his garner: but the chaff he will burn with fire unquenchable.

Matt. iii: 11. Whose shoes.—The shoes worn at that time, were so constructed as to protect only the under side of the foot; and were kept on by being bound around the top of the foot by straps or strings, which they called the latchet. The climate of the country did not require such shoes as we are accustomed to wear. "Kypé remarks that, not only among the Jews, but likewise among the Greeks and Romans, putting on, pulling off, and carrying the sandals of their masters, was the office of the meanest slaves."—Parkhurst. John therefore by acknowledging his unworthiness to unloose the shoes or sandals of the Saviour, confesses that Jesus was as much superior to himself as the master was to his meanest slave.

With the Holy Ghost and with fire. Those who believe the Gospel, shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost: but those who do not will be baptized with fire. It is commonly supposed that but one class of persons are referred to by this language, viz., believers in the Gospel; and that they were to be baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire. And though the intimate connection of these two things, the Holy Ghost and fire, in the sentence, might favor this opinion, yet, we can not convince ourselves that John in the immediate connection, before and after this language, would use fire as the symbol of punishment, as he certainly does, and in this language use the same term in a different sense.

12. Whose fan is in his hand, etc.—The whole of this verse refers to the manner of cleaning grain that was in use when John spoke this language. This operation was performed as follows. After the work of threshing was done, the grain and chaff together were thrown into the air by such an instrument as our translators have called a fan, but which they should have translated shovel. By the force of the wind the chaff would be driven away, and the grain would fall again to the floor. This being done, the grain was of course conveyed to the granary or garner, while the chaff was consumed by fire.

That the figure made use of in this verse was intended to set forth the destruction of the Jewish nation, and the deliverance of believers in the Gospel from that destruction, is evident from its connection with the parable of the axe, which we have shown to be thus applied. It is also obvious from similar representations in the Old Testament. See Isa. xli: 15. Amos i: 3. Micah iv: 12, 13. Jer. xv: 7. Isa. v: 24. Mal. iv: 1.

Unquenchable fire.—This means a fire that can not be extinguished, but not a fire that will always continue to burn. A fire may be unquenchable, and yet go out of its own accord, when the combustibles on which it lives are all consumed. Other words in our language of the same class with unquenchable, are never understood in an unlimited sense, and why such should be the case with this, we are unable to say, unless a desire to support a favorite sentiment may afford the reason. I will name a few of this class of words. We say the rock rolls down the mountain with an irresistible force. The distance from the earth to the fixed stars is immeasurable. The ocean is unfathomable. In these and many other examples, we do not suppose that an unlimited meaning is intended. The rock will cease its motion when it reaches the plain. The distance to the fixed stars is finite, though it can not be measured. The ocean has a bottom, though we can not fathom its depth. It is worthy of remark, also, that Josephus and other writers, who lived at or near the time of John the Baptist, make use of the same original phrase here rendered unquenchable fire (asbestos pur) without any reference to eternity.

Luke iii: 15. The people were in expectation. It is stated by Tacitus and Suetonius, Roman historians, that a general expectation pervaded Judea, and the surrounding countries, that some distinguished personage was about to make his appearance who should obtain universal dominion. Under the influence of this expectation therefore, the Jews "mused in their hearts," whether John were not the Christ, the expected sovereign. It may have been the same impression that led the Magians to interpret the luminous appearance which led them to the Saviour, as significant of his advent. So that their understanding of the design of the star, was not miraculous, though the star itself doubtless was.

THEOLOGY AND ASTRONOMY.

BY REV. S. MILES.

The words which we have chosen for our title, if followed out into all their various ramifications, would lead us into a boundless field of unmeasured space, where infinite Wisdom and almighty Power, have been employed in forming worlds far more magnificent than the earth on which we live. The object of this article is to contrast some few ideas which are found in modern divinity and astronomy. And here I will introduce the masterly description of the end of this and surrounding worlds. "The blast of the seventh trumpet thundering with terrific clangor through the sky, and echoing from world to world, shall fill the universe, and time shall be no more! The six trumpets have already sounded: when the seventh shall blow, a total change shall take place throughout the creation; the vast globe which we now inhabit shall dissolve, and mingle with yon beauteous azure firmament, with sun, and moon, and all the immense luminaries flowing there, in one undistinguished ruin; all shall vanish away like a fleeting vapor, a visionary phantom of the night, and not a single trace of them be found!"

Thus are we presented with the funeral pile of worlds in one general flame. And not only worlds, but their unnumbered inhabitants are to share in one common fate, in one general ruin. For what? Why are the inhabitants of yonder bright luminaries to be involved in this "undistinguished ruin?" Here let modern theology answer, and she will tell you, that it is because our first parents partook of the forbidden fruit. What a pity that so many billions of innocent beings should be included in this unhappy event. What do they know about mother Eve's eating the apple? Why should they be involved any more than the angels in heaven?

Theology teaches that the vast globe which we now inhabit, with sun, and moon, and all the immense luminaries, shall fall to the earth, "in one undistinguished ruin."

Astronomy teaches that there is an immense number of those luminaries which are more than thirty billions of miles from this world, and that it would require millions of years for them to fall to the earth. Now if these things are so; we may safely say that, "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: BUT THE EARTH ABIDETH FOREVER." Eccl. i: 4. And not only so, we may rest assured that "the righteous shall flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth." "His name shall endure forever, his name shall continue as long as the sun: and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed." Ps. lxxii: 7, 17. "And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever." Dan. xii: 3. Here we would drop our pen, and let this subject rest for the present, were it not that we are disposed to invite the philosopher, the astronomer, and the theologian to take another view of the vast, and unbounded empire of the Almighty, where worlds unnumbered fly far beyond worlds, in the distant space; and tell us how long, how many ages will have rolled away, before the devil will have the pleasure of seeing his malice, and infernal desires carried out in one undistinguished ruin" of those immense luminaries that now hang in unbounded space, and unending eternity.

THE DISCUSSION WITH MR. CAMPBELL.

Immediately after the printing in book form of the discussion between myself and Rev. Alexander Campbell in May last, I sent him a copy of the work in sheets by mail. He has taken no notice whatever of it, not even letting his readers know that the work was published at all, till the September number of his Harbinger was published, which contains the following meagre, but censorious notice.

"DEBATE ON UNIVERSALISM.

The debate on Universalism arrived here a few days since in sheets. Since my return from my visit to Eastern Virginia I have not had time to examine its fidelity. There is an Appendix added of Mr. Skinner's own manufacture. The design of it appears to be to mislead the reader in respect to a note taken from the Appendix to the third edition of my Family Testament. The Appendix is all on one side, as a matter of course, and was needed, at least in the judgment of Mr. S., to perfect what was wanting in his defence. He has also affixed notes to one of my letters, containing comments and assertions which no honorable man would have presumed to do. It is, then, unfaithfully published. Still, his Notes and Appendix to the contrary notwithstanding, I desire that it may have an extensive circulation.

A. C."

Such is the significant and magnanimous notice which my illustrious opponent takes of the discussion in which he pretended he had completely "eviscerated" and overthrown Universalism! Such is the anxiety he manifests to have the work circulated and read by his friends and the public at large! Notwithstanding he pretended before it was printed that he was very desirous it should be published, and talked of ordering 1,000 or 1,500 copies, yet he has not bought or ordered a single copy, nor has his bookseller or any other of his adherents so far as we know. What can be the reason? Ah! there is an Appendix of four pages added to the work which he says "is all on one side," notwithstanding three-fourths of it was written by himself. This appears to be his great objection to the work. He says the Note, [there are two,] written by himself and taken from his Family Testament, is designed "to mislead the reader," etc. But how the Notes can mislead the reader he does not say. They are not garbled nor abridged, but published in full and without comment, and verbatim!

The truth is, Mr. C. well knows that those Notes completely refute all his most valued criticisms in our debate and establish my positions by his own authority. And this is the ground of his strong objection to their insertion. He refused to the very last to comply with my request, or challenge, to lay them before his readers, and has done all he possibly could to prevent the public from seeing them. That the reader may see the seditious course he has taken in respect to this whole matter we not only refer them to the discussion itself pending its continuance, but especially to the following private correspondence between us since its close. We insert first the P. S. to Mr. C's last letter of the controversy and my reply to it, which introduces the private letters since written.

Utica, September 21, 1840.

NO. 1. MR. CAMPBELL'S POST SCRIP.—Not having received any proposal for the copy right, and as your party published the discussion between Dr. Ely and Mr. Thomas in a separate volume, I therefore tender to you the right so far as my interest goes. If you or your friends decline, I presume the right will be conceded to me!

NO. 2. TO REV. A. CAMPBELL.—Dear Sir—In answer to your P. S. concerning the copy right and the publication in book form of our discussion, I will simply say that in the articles of agreement between you and me, adopted July, 1837, respecting the Questions, Evidence, Rules, length and disposition of the discussion, you made the following proposal, viz. "After the discussion shall have been published in our respective periodicals and in the periodical press, a copy-right for its future publication in the form of a volume, shall be tendered to the American and Foreign Bible society, that the profits accruing from the sale of the work may be consecrated to the distribution of the Word of life at home and abroad. And should they refuse, it shall be tendered to the American Bible Society; and they refusing, to any benevolent society to which the parties may agree."

To this proposal I unhesitatingly acceded.—Now before accepting of the offer made in your P. S., I wish to inquire, 1st. Have you, or has any one, made the proposal or offer of the copy right to the proper officers of the American and Foreign Bible Society? 2d. If so, has that society refused the copy right? 3d. Have you or has any one, made that offer to the American Bible Society? 4th. If so, has that society also refused to accept it? 5th. Has the offer been made to, and refused by, any other benevolent society? Suppose, all others refusing, you should make an offer to the American Tract Society, or the American Sunday School Union. I wish these questions answered before I accept or refuse your offer, because I wish to know, and wish the public to know, whether the officers of those societies, a jury of your own selection, most of whom are with you, believers in endless misery, have given a verdict against you, by refusing to publish the discussion in which you claim so decided a victory. An answer to the foregoing questions is solicited at as early a period as practicable. Yours truly, Utica, July 23, 1839.

MR. SKINNER—Sir, In reply to your note in the last "Evangelical Magazine," permit me to say that having understood that none of those societies mentioned in our conditions have a right to undertake any publication or vest any funds in any other books other than Bibles, or such works as have no sectarian object in view, I made no other address to them than was contained in our printed proposals, and having received no proposition, I conclude that it is as reported contrary to their constitution or articles of association to have have any thing to do with such matters, a consideration which although very obvious, did not occur to me when I made the original overture.

After an agreement to tender these societies the right, it became as much your duty as mine to ascertain their views on the subject. Have you had any communication with them? Please inform me, and of your wishes concerning the publication of the controversy in a separate volume, seeing it is as I learn incompatible with either Bible or Tract Societies to have anything to do with any controversial matters.

Faithfully and benevolently yours, etc.

Bethany, Va., August 10, 1839. A. CAMPBELL.

Utica, August 23, 1839.

Mr. Campbell—Dear Sir, In reply to yours of the 10th inst. just received, I remark that, as the proposition to offer the copy-right of our letters to the Bible societies came originally from you, and I had nothing to do but simply to accede to that proposal; and moreover, as I suppose you stand connected with one of those societies and I am entirely unconnected with any of them, I supposed, as a matter of course, that, if either of us was to make a formal proposal to them, you were the proper person to do it; and moreover that if from the published agreement alone either of them should apply for the copy-right, their application would be made to you. And indeed I think you were of the same opinion, because before our last letters were published, your P. S. was written in which you say, "Not having received any proposal for the copy-right," you tender it to me; and you repeat the same in substance in your last; as though if any such proposal were made it would of course be to yourself.

Again, whatever professions may be made, it is not true that the Bible and Tract societies publish nothing but what "has no sectarian object in view." For not only do the two Bible societies respectively design to encourage the sectarian notions of Anabaptists and Pedobaptists, but by the headings or captions to the several chapters in the Bible, virtually give a sectarian comment opposed to Universalism. And the Tract society has issued quite a number of the bitterest sectarian works against Universalism and circulated them as Tracts! Why then should either of these societies hesitate to publish our letters, especially if they are an effectual overthrow of Universalism?

As I am not acquainted with either of those societies or their officers, and have no correspondence whatever with them, I leave the matter entirely with you to correspond with them and ascertain if either of them is willing to accept the copy-right and publish the letters as they have appeared in our respective periodicals.

If you decline corresponding with them, or if corresponding on the subject, they decline the acceptance of your offer, then I submit the following proposition to you, viz.

That we shall unite in the joint publication of a respectable edition of the work, each of us bearing at one-half the expense and taking one-half the edition. (Either myself or the publishers of the Magazine and Advocate, Messrs. Grosh and Hutchinson, will unite with you in the publication.) And the work can be published either here, or at your place, according as the comparative cheapness of paper and printing shall determine.

Should you accede to the last proposal, I would like to have you state the size of the edition you would be willing to publish, together with the probable cost at your place of paper and printing for the whole, the work to include all the preliminary letters and the two controversial Notes from your New Testament Appendix.

Yours truly, D. SKINNER.

Bethany, Va., 13th September, 1839.

MR. SKINNER—Sir, On my return from a two week's excursion into Ohio, I found your letter of the 23d ult. on my table. I hasten to answer it at this late date. You seem not to have noticed that I stated to you that the Bible Society, as I am informed, has no authority to publish and vend any books but Bibles; and that not having from them any proposition, I deemed it impertinent to obtrude upon them what I knew according to advices, received since our controversy began they could not accept. And as to asking a tract society to publish our books it is in fact asking them to become a book society rather than a tract society.

Either of the societies will accept the profits of such a work as a present; but I again say that I believe it to be unconstitutional according to their charters, especially the Bible society, to do any thing of the sort, and as for the tract society it is no favorite of mine.

I do not like any copartnership concern such as you propose; but if you will agree to give all the profits of an edition of say two or three thousand copies to the Bible society I will take the one half of it and agree to publish all the introductory letters already printed in our periodicals as a matter of course. As to adding any new matter, such as notes out of my appendix to

New Testament, I do not know why you ask it—but I will even consent to these notes being inserted in a proper place, on condition that I affix to them a note of equal extent; which, you, regarding them of importance to you, can not certainly refuse—my note on the notes shall not occupy a line more than they occupy.

I would prefer for my convenience either your having the copy-right of publication, or I having it exclusively. I have tendered it to you. If you do not accept it, either tender it to me—or state the price at which you will furnish me in sheets 1,000 or 1,500 copies for a beginning—and I will either give or take at the same price, provided only you promise the whole net proceeds to the Bible or Temperance society—the former being my favorite. Please be expeditious as my Winter arrangement are about being made.

Benevolently, etc., I remain yours,

A. CAMPBELL.

The conclusion of the correspondence will be published next week.

REV. D. PICKERING.

At the last session of the Genesee Association, this brother, without being present, and without a hearing, was found guilty of certain charges preferred against him, and recommended to abstain from ministerial labor for one year, or until his reformation was assured. Previous to this recommendation, he had entered into engagements in this region, with the full approbation of the brethren interested, and his ministering brethren in this section, all of whom were acquainted with the general facts of the case. Under these circumstances it seemed necessary to many of us to recommend him to fulfil his engagements, and thus encourage him in his endeavors to do good, as well as to prevent any appearance of disrespect on his part toward the Association, in which he lately resided. We were convinced of his reformation, and duty called us to encourage and sustain him in it. Since then, also, brethren residing where the charges originated, and members of the council which found him guilty on ex parte testimony, have united with us in our recommendations. And as the former proceedings have gone forth to the public, it is but justice to all parties that these proceedings should also be laid before that same tribunal, for its candid and Christian judgment.

A. B. G.

TO THE UNIVERSALIST PUBLIC.

We the undersigned, being, as we think, well acquainted with all the material circumstances connected with the complaint entered against Rev. David Pickering, and acted upon at the last session of the Genesee Association, deem it both our privilege and duty to make the following statement to the Universalist public.

We were well aware that the complaint existed at the time of Br. Pickering's visit to this Central section of the State; and some of us conversed freely and feelingly with him on the subject. He plead, and seemed to feel, entire unconsciousness of having given just cause of complaint, but admitted that he might have done so unconsciously. When we convinced him that he had done so, he solemnly pledged himself that, in future, he would wholly and totally avoid all occasion of that or similar offence. He preached several Sundays in this region to good acceptance, and his walk being such as becometh the Gospel of Christ, he was invited, and accepted the invitation, to remove hither and preach stately in this region for the coming year.

It seems he was neither cited to appear before the Genesee Association, nor notified that any proceedings were to be had against him in that body; but only learned what was done there, by the published proceedings of that body after his engagement here, and return to Buffalo for his family, in which proceedings he is entreated by the Committee of Discipline to suspend his ministerial labors for at least one year. Now, while we feel all possible respect for the Genesee Association, and wish to pay due deference to its proceedings and judgment, we nevertheless believe that, if Br. P. is ever to resume, and can be useful in the ministerial profession, it will be as well for the cause and much better for him to continue now, or resume that profession immediately, especially considering his present engagements with the societies in Herkimer county.—We would therefore recommend to him, while we both respect the body and honor the motives of the Association above named, to proceed to fulfil his engagements with the societies whither he has removed, and to the societies to fulfil faithfully their engagements with him and render him all the encouragement in their power; hoping and believing that salvation both individual and social, will result therefrom, and that our brethren of the Genesee Association will have occasion to rejoice with us, that a soul has been saved from death, and much good done in the name of the holy child Jesus.

DAN POST.

August 16, 1840.

EXPLANATION.—Br. GROSH—I give to you the following certificate from Fredonia; not that I am satisfied with its contents, but because you and I live far from the scene where it had its origin. I object to its taking for granted the supposed fact, of my habits having been bad. There possibly may have been one instance in which I was affected by ardent spirits, and but one, and that was owing to my ill health, at the time. I was not conscious even of that. But the evidence was against me, and I submit without debate.

Since last June, I have used no ardent spirits, and shall hereafter abstain, wholly, from its use, because of my complaint, (erysipelas,) which will not admit of the use of any thing stimulating.

I am truly desirous of promoting the cause of unbounded grace, and shall, I trust, knowingly, do nothing to check its prosperity, or prevent its rapid progress.

May the name and religion of the great Head of the church, prosper and spread throughout our land, and the peace of his kingdom fill the whole earth.

DAVID PICKERING.

Fredonia, August 19, 1840.

To all whom it may concern—

This is to certify that we are fully convinced that Br. Pickering's reformation is genuine, and that he has returned to the path of rectitude with full purpose of heart. We are furthermore of the opinion, that he will keep inviolate the solemn pledge he has made, that, under the blessing of God, he will never again indulge in the use of ardent spirits. Br. Pickering has written us a letter expressive of his sincere regret that events so painful to us all, should ever have been occasioned by himself, and prays fervently that they may not in the least shake our faith in the great salvation. We feel to forgive him all that is past, that has been wrong; and feeling an ardent wish for his happiness and prosperity, remembering his great usefulness as a minister of Christ, we pray that he may again receive the confidence of the public, and go forth as a herald of salvation to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ, and be sustained by the illimitable love of God and the power of his Gospel. To this end we joyfully commend him to the great Parent of all, and to the confidence, hospitality and friendship of all with whom God in his providence shall call him to labor.

NOTE.—Rev. T. C. Eaton, who signs the above, was pastor of the society in Fredonia at the time the charges originated and were preferred in that place—and D. McDonald, another signer, a justice of the Peace in Dunkirk, near by, has forwarded another certificate commending Br. Pickering to public confidence, which we omit, being of the same tenor as the above.

There is also another certificate, by Rev. S. W. Remington, a member of the council of the Genesee Association, certifying that he believes the appearance of Br. Pickering was caused by erysipelas—that the vote finding him probably guilty met with much opposition, and recommending him to the confidence and employment of the friends in Herkimer county. A letter from Rev. J. S. Flagler was also received, dissenting from, and regretting the proceedings of the council—all of which we omit, as they are of the same tenor with the foregoing, and their mention here is deemed sufficient. No doubt many other letters and certificates could have been procured from preachers and laymen had it been deemed necessary.

A BEAUTIFUL IDEA.

Conversing with a much respected friend one day, on the subject of how many individuals, and even preachers, of other denominations, were secretly leaning to the Restitution, he alluded to a conversation which he had many years since with a Presbyterian clergyman of his acquaintance. Among other things, the clergyman proposed the following queries. "Might not the State Prison in Auburn, its cells and whips remain, though there were no prisoners to endure them; and would not the very sight of the prison, its cells and whips, make our rejoicing greater, that society was so pure as to render them useless? And may not hell, its fires, its smoke going up forever and ever, always remain as memorials of what sin had done, even after all sinners were reclaimed? May not a view of them excite greater joy in the heart, and greater praise to that Divine Grace, which liberated and reformed all sinners? Mind now—I do not believe this—I only propose these queries for consideration."

What a beautiful idea is shadowed forth in these queries! They show that the mind of their author was doubting endless misery. A fact proved by subsequent events; for he rejected the doctrine of endless misery—though so far from adopting the cheering views embraced in his own questions, he now advocates the notion that the wicked will be annihilated. How has the fine gold become dim!

INNATE, CONNATE AND INBORN DEPRIVITY.

BY REV. W. H. GRISWOLD.

"Undoubtedly it is one of the grand pillars on which the Andover Institution rests." [Dr. Dana to Prof. Stuart.]

The reader, by this time, must have become convinced that one of the grand pillars of the Temple of Darkness is undergoing the process of dilapidation. And to render this intelligence still more cheering we find that the dilapidators are they of its own household. We do not predict a speedy downfall. The works of decay we all know are slow at best, but then they are sure. And it is more by the slow work of decay than by any thing else, that we are to expect chartered error to crumble away. It is true that there are those who will do much towards hastening its process, and perhaps they will so far succeed that they will now and then remove a stone from the foundation wall. But then, there will also be those standing ready with stone and mortar in hand to fill up the breach thus made. Every effort of which human nature is capable, and every means which money can command, will be employed to paralyze the arms of the dilapidators and put a stop to the work of decay. This Institution may be characterized as the beloved Alma Mater of error. And her children are numerous; they were born there; they received their first impressions there; they were educated there; her blood circulates in their veins; and her doctrine of innate, connate, hereditary, constitutional and total depravity, has been instilled into them from their youth up, and it is now, as it were, a part of their very bones; and think you that they will speedily give it up? No! a change—a great change—a change of the whole inner man—a radical uprooting of all the evils of a wrong education, and an entire clearing away of all old habits, together with a tearing up of prejudices of long standing and deep root, is what must be expected before those things which have been drunk in youth, and which have been growing and strengthening ever since, will be given up. And no such change as this can reasonably be expected, till the spirit has escaped from the thralldom of the flesh—from the prison-house of clay, to the liberty of a glorious and incorruptible body—a house not made with hands, where mind will no longer groan under the iron heel of matter. Then there will be a change—a radical change—a change of the whole man. We can have little or no hopes that men who were born and bred in the "old fashioned sentiment," will ever be led to radically change their views; some of them may perhaps modify them, and endeavor to soften them down, but still they will have the old garment, though rent and torn, along with them. The present generation must pass away; another generation must arise from the ashes, indeed, of that which is to pass away; but not with their views, their prejudices or their habits of thinking. No, thank Heaven! prejudices, habits and mal-thinking are not wholly hereditary—are not born, but are made. And the rising generation are to grow up amidst controversies; are to be taught in a school of reason; are to see the land mark of Augsburg and Dort disregarded; are to hear the infallibility of the old Westminster divines called in question; are to see with their own eyes, the old platform washed away by the swelling tide of evangelical truth, and the decayed turrets, the crumbling walls, and the falling columns of another spiritual Babylon will be before them. And they must—they can do no less than imbibe the spirit of the dilapidators. Already, has a Stuart called in question the man of sin; and a Beecher and a Barnes have become very erratic in their journeys around a Calvinistic san. Charges of heresy in high places, are not unfrequent. Satan is losing his former attributes; he is no longer omnipresent, because this is an attribute belonging only to God—so says the heretical professor, and this certainly is no mean authority, if it is not light in a dark place. Prof.

Stuart shows conclusively that the old school men are wrong—fundamentally wrong; and Dana shows beyond controversy that the new school men are not right—and fundamentally so. And yet these are children of one family; this is a "house divided against itself;" these are men in high places—the brightest lights in the theological heavens! And if men who are leaders in the army now, discourse in tones of thunder to the vicars, cardinals, and bishops, may we not ere long expect to see a spiritual Bonaparte scaling the Alps of theology, and hear him discoursing in no uncertain tones, in the very Vatican of orthodoxy! I am no prophet, nor the son of a prophet, neither do I expect heaven as a reward; but if there is any reliance to be placed in the signs of the times—if it be a gospel truth that a house divided against itself can not stand; and if there be any truth in that prophecy, which says that the stone which smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth, many generations shall not pass away till another proud family of spiritual tyrants is buried beneath its own ruins.

This number will close what I propose at present to write concerning the man of sin, which is one of the grand pillars of the Calvinistic order of architecture. When I commenced, I intended to have given some of the beauties, proportions, and unique appearances of the base and capital of this great column; but subsequent considerations have led me to a different conclusion. The best idea I can give you of its present appearance is as follows: conceive to yourselves a form, the worst that you possibly can; and then patch up, tear off, deface, and do all you can to make it more hideous than the most hideous, and you will have something nearer the likeness of this grand pillar than any thing I can possibly give you.

"O wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see ourselves as others see us,
It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
And foolish notion;
What airs in dress an' gait wad lea'e us,
And e'en Devotion!"

Here endeth the sixth lesson.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXXVII.

MATTHEW xx: 28. "And to give his life a ransom for many." That is to deliver or rescue many from sin and misery by means of his gospel, which was confirmed by his death and resurrection. Thus God is said to redeem or ransom the Israelites from Egypt, by an exertion of his power, not by giving a price for them.

John xii: 28. "Then came there a voice from heaven." This is the third time that Jesus was honored in this remarkable manner by an audible voice from heaven. 1st, At his baptism. 2d, At the mount of transfiguration. 3d, On this occasion.

Matthew xxv: 46. "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment." Properly the punishment of an entire period, age, or dispensation. See Priestly, and Imp. Version.

Matthew xxiii: 39. "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." The address of which this is a part, was the last our Saviour ever delivered to the people at large. Mark, then, the closing part of it, as it demands serious attention.

Matthew xxiii: 9. "Call no man father upon earth." It is remarkable that notwithstanding this prohibition, this very title of father has been most of all affected by the professors and teachers of religion; as for instance we say the Christian fathers, etc.

Matthew xxvi: 26. "This is my body." The paschal lamb was called by the Jews the body of the passover, and therefore Jesus here seems to give to the bread the title of my body, or body of me—a memorial of me, as the paschal lamb was of the passover—as if he had said, This is a representation and memorial of my body, which like this bread, is shortly to be broken for you. Verse 28. This wine also, is a representation and memorial of my blood, which is shed in confirmation of that Gospel, in which the doctrine of repentance and forgiveness of sin will be preached to all nations.

John xiv: 28. "My Father is greater than I." This text was always understood to express a real superiority in the Father over the Son, even after the notion of the divinity of Christ had gained ground in the Christian church. There was a long interval between the notion of Christ being God, in some low and qualified sense of the word, and that of his being God equal in power and glory to the Father. Such a great corruption of Christianity as this did not take place all at once, but by very slow degrees.

John xv: 26. "But when the Comforter is come whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me."

This is an important passage and demands particular attention. Here this spirit which is promised to the disciples, and which was to enable them to work miracles, is said to proceed from the Father, being in reality nothing more than the power or spirit of God the Father, the same power by which Christ himself had worked his miracles. Afterwards when this spirit was thought to be a proper intelligent person, distinct from the Father, or the Son, and yet God himself and the Son, for all were one, it was imagined it derived its origin from the Father by way of emanation from him, and not in the manner of proper creation. But because this spirit is likewise said to be sent by Christ, or to proceed from him, it was imagined that the spirit must, in some way or other, proceed, or issue from both the Father and the Son.

Strange as it may appear, upon this idle question, the two great parts of the Christian church, the eastern and the western, divided, and communicated one another; the Greek church maintaining that the holy spirit proceeds from the Father only, and the Western, or Latin church, that he proceeds from both the Father and the Son. Upon either of these hypotheses, we can not wonder that they were puzzled to account for this spirit's proceeding from the Father, or the Father and Son, and yet be equal in eternity, power, and glory with each of them.

The ancient Christian writers, who were advocates of the pre-existence and divinity of Christ, always said that these doctrines were not taught to the apostles, because, said they, they were not prepared to receive them; for having expected a mere man for their Messiah, such sublime tenets as these would have shocked all their prejudices. They supposed, therefore, that the disciples considered Christ in no higher character than an eminent prophet, till the descent of the holy spirit upon the day of pentecost; and also that, though from that time the apostles were acquainted with the true character of Christ, they did not think proper to divulge the secret to many, lest they should be offended in consequence of the same prejudices. What a miserable subterfuge was this. Of itself it was sufficient to condemn the doctrine.

It is thought that the early Christians resorted to this doctrine in order to meet the objections of the Jews and other unbelievers, who objected to Christ as being the Messiah, because of his low extraction and humble appearance.

Luke xxiii: 43. "To day shalt thou be with me in paradise." By paradise, the Jews meant the place of rest for good men, where they were to sleep until the resurrection. It was one region in the imaginary hades, but supposed to be separated from the place of the wicked.

Matthew xxvii: 63. "After three days I will rise again." That this means the third day, is evident from the fact that Christ rose on the third day, and from consulting II Chronicles, x: 5, and comparing with verse 13.

John xx: 31. "That ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." By the phrase "Jesus is the Christ," John means to oppose the doctrine of the Gnostics, who held that Christ was a super-angelic being, and a man only in appearance, or that this being descended into Jesus. He therefore says in plain language that Jesus, (the man,) is the Christ.

John xxi: 22. "Tarry till I come." Meaning till I come at the destruction of Jerusalem, an event which John, and it is thought no other apostle, survived.

ESSAY ON WAR. NO. XVIII.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"In reference to our Revolutionary war, since which so much prosperity has followed in these United States, it may be observed that the war was not the cause of our felicitous circumstances; but that the foundation of our national happiness was laid in the principles of the men that emigrated from Europe, and settled this country." MALCOLM.

At the close of the American Revolution, Dr. Franklin made the following remark in a letter written to a friend: "I rejoice with you in the peace God hath blessed us with, and in the prosperity it gives us a prospect of..... We are now friends with England, and with all mankind. May we never see another war! for in my opinion, there never was a good war, or a bad peace." This last remark does great honor to the War. War in all its forms is evil. Hence, it is evident that men celebrate evil, whenever they celebrate war, or deeds of human slaughter.

We are hardly far enough removed as yet from the events of the American revolution to decide upon the merits of that long and sanguinary conflict. We are prepared to admit in the very outset that the leading men were the true friends of their country; that they deserve on many accounts to be held in affectionate remembrance. They were right in principle, but wrong in the measures they pursued. In making this remark we look at it on the principles of the Gospel, the only true standard for nations as well as individuals. Our fathers supposed that war was the only way finally to bring all their grievances to a close. Nations had long, very long, been in the habit of settling their disputes by going into the field, and the one who could bring out the greatest amount of physical power and skill, gained the victory as a general thing, whether right or wrong. Moral power was unthought of. "There is," says Channing, "moral power enough in Christianity to conquer any circumstances, to correct any evils—to modify all governments, laws and institutions—to obtain knowledge and virtue—and to enable us to rise to a point of elevation which the world has never yet seen or conceived of."

But we can not dwell long. What else could have been done? Here we want room to point out the various modes which might have been adopted. We think continued, earnest, respectful and patient remonstrance would in time, have accomplished much. We know this was tried, but then it ought never to have been lost sight of for a single moment. We might have labored until the present time, and all that might have been suffered, would not have been equal to the expense, and loss of life, and the ten thousand evils connected with the revolution. The time spent was about eight years. The cost to Great Britain, 600,000,000. To America, 400,000,000. Loss of life on the American side, 200,000. And all this to destroy members of the same great family of man, and considering the connection then existing, there must have been a destruction of members of the same families. And what have we gained? I verily believe that even now we have not so much liberty in our own country as exists in that very country from whom we were so anxious to be severed. Were this admissible here, I would prove the remark.

Our fathers might have continued to refuse the taxed articles. This course would have resulted in great good. And even if they had used them, the cost would not have equalled that of the revolution. I am aware that this remark may seem as though I was attaching more importance to wealth than principle. But then I believe that in time every thing would have become right. The colonies had many warm friends in Parliament. With them the friends of liberty would in due time have labored throughout the world, and it appears to the writer that we might have been carried through without all the blood and expense and vices connected with this long and sanguinary conflict. But we must stop while we are full of the great subject. The revolution has brought on a flood of immorality and infidelity, and I tremble for the fate of my country, for with all her faults I love her still.

"My native country! thee—

Land of the noble free—

Thy name I love:

I love thy rocks and rills,

Thy woods and templed hills;

My heart with rapture thrills,

Like that above."

Yes, I do indeed tremble for the fate of America when I think of my Saviour's prophetic declaration, with which I close. "All they that take the sword shall perish by the sword!"

LOVE AND FEAR.

We are commanded to love God. But it is impossible to love a being unless there is something about it that appears lovely. We see this exemplified in the gold image which Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, set up in the plains of Dura. It will be remembered that the king had to have a burning, fiery furnace, by which to frighten the people and cause them to fall down at the sound of music, and worship the image. Why was this? The plain reason was, because there was nothing in the image itself to influence the people to love and worship it.

Thus it is with the God which some theologians describe at the present day. They represent him as being so cruel and revengeful, that people can not love him if they would; and we dare say they would not love him if they could, for the plain reason that they regard such a being as totally unworthy of the love of a rational creature. Hence these doctors of divinity are obliged, like the king of Babylon, to keep a burning, fiery furnace before their people's eyes continually, in order to compel them to worship their God. Thus they have a form of godliness but deny the power thereof.

Could the truth become prevalent, that God is a being of unchanging love, as represented by Christ and his apostles, there would be no more need of this fiery furnace in a future state to cause mankind to love and adore him.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.....NO. XVII.

2 Peter ii: 1-9. (Continued.)

But, not to dwell too long on the negative side of the question, I shall proceed:

I. To prove my conviction, that the passage under consideration does not teach the common views of it, by endeavoring to point out its correct meaning and application.

In performing this duty an important question presents itself—who were the unjust persons reserved for punishment unto the day of judgment? To answer this, we are led to the very first verse of the passage—"But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them." In this language, the apostle mentions two facts. 1. There were false prophets among the people. He here alludes to the existence of false prophets who pretended to be inspired of God, during the period when God spoke to the Jews, and by their false teachings deceived the people. 2. As there were false teachers in olden time, so there would be false teachers in the present time, whose object was to deceive the people of Christ. In these two facts the apostle makes a comparison. In the previous chapter he had been speaking of the holy prophets of old, and this led him to illustrate present circumstances in the church—as there were false prophets among holy men of old, so, there shall be false teachers in the church of Christ.

Who were these false teachers? I answer, a careful reading of the epistle will show, that the great source of error in the Christian church, previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, was the Judaizing teachers, who forsook the purity of the gospel and mingled with it the forms, ceremonies and principles of the Mosaic law. This also seems to be evident, from the method by which Peter characterized them—"denying the Lord who bought them." Peter said to the Jews, in one of his discourses, recorded in 3d of Acts, "but ye denied the Holy One, and the just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you." The Jews were peculiarly bought by promises, bought by being the people among whom prophecies were spoken, bought by having the gospel first preached to them. From these Jews, thus bought, converts were made between the day of Pentecost and the destruction of Jerusalem—but these converts fell back from pure truth, as it flowed in the gospel, and sought to introduce their old notions in room of the principles of Jesus. Therefore, both Pyle and Gilpin, eminent commentators, style these heresy-dealers, "raging zealots of the Judaizing faction." It was they who introduced Sadduceeism into the Corinthian church, to refute which Paul wrote the 15th of 1st Corinthians. It was they who introduced those errors, so frequently alluded to in the letter to Galatians. And such was their influence throughout the ranks of Christianity, that Peter affirms in verse 2—"And many shall follow their pernicious ways; by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of." Thus fulfilling the language of Christ, which he spake to his disciples as one of the signs which should precede the destruction of Jerusalem—"And many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many." Matt. xxiv: 11. For this wicked conduct, the false prophets were not to escape due punishment—they were watched by the eye of the Deity, who certainly would visit them with a just retribution for their sins. This is declared in the 3d verse—"whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not"—the sentence upon their sins was not to linger, nor was their condemnation to slumber—it was ready to fall upon them.

The apostle's proposition is now clear and manifest.

1. There were false teachers in the primitive ages of the church. 2. These false teachers were to be punished.

He then proceeds further, and produces three direct instances to prove the certainty of their punishment and of the utter hopelessness of escape. These three instances are as follows, "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment;" 2d, "And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly;"—3d. And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly." The apostle introduced these three instances, showing that God did punish sinners, as proof that the false teachers would not escape. Now a question arises—from whence did Peter get these three instances? The history of the flood he derived from the Old Testament—and so did he the history of Sodom and Gomorrah. Where did he get the history of the angels? If it has reference to angels who were driven from heaven, it did not come from the Old Testament; for there is nothing said in the Old Testament about angels falling from heaven. True, we may be referred to the garden of Eden as proof of the common notion—but the account there given, can not be tortured even into an improbable account of a rebellion in heaven. On the supposition, then, that Peter refers to angels which fell from heaven, no source can be found from whence he derived information on such a subject, while the other two instances can be clearly traced. But on the supposition that he had no reference to angels falling from heaven, the whole subject is perfectly plain.

When therefore, a person affirms that those angels are angels which fell from heaven, it becomes him to remember, that not only is no account of such angels found in the Old Testament, but that the language of Peter affords no proof of such a notion; for the word heaven is not found in the passage. And when he also affirms that their doom is endless misery, it becomes him to remember that the antediluvians and the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah suffered no more than drowning and burning—why should the angels receive a punishment so awfully disproportionate, when they could not be much wicked than those people whose punishment was finite?

But the main difficulty in this subject, is the term angels. Most readers of the Bible, when they meet with this term, associate with it the idea of spiritual beings who live in heaven. This is a mistake, for the term is indefinite in its meaning, and may be applied to spiritual or human beings, as the case may be. Authority for this position shall be given. Buck in his Theo. Dic., p. 21, Art. "Angel," says—"The word angel (angelos) is Greek, and signifies a messenger. The Hebrew word signifies the same. Angels, therefore, in the proper signification of the word, do not import the nature of any being, but only the office to which they are appointed, especially by way of intercourse, between God and his creatures. Hence the word is used differently in various parts of the scriptures, and signifies, 1. Human messengers, or agents for others—David sent messengers (Heb. angels) to Jabesh Gilead." 2 Sam. ii: 5. 2. Officers of the churches, whether prophets or ordinary ministers. 3. Jesus Christ." To this view of the subject Cruden gives full assent. We see then, that the term angel is indefinite, and that its meaning is determined by the subject to which it is applied. Hence, when we read in Luke ii: "And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host," the very subject proves that it was a spiritual being. But when we hear John the Revelator ordered to write to the angels of the seven churches of Asia, we know that these angels were the messengers or teachers sent by the Saviour, as pastors of those churches. And when Paul says the Galatians—"And my temptation which was in my flesh, ye despised not, nor rejected; but received me as an angel of God," iv: 14, we know that Paul was a man, and that he was called an angel, only because he was sent of God. In this view of the subject, the question arises, who were the angels spoken of by Peter? There is but one way of deciding this point, and that is, by reference to the Old Testament, from whence Peter obtained the two instances of the Sodomites and Antediluvians. Before doing this, I repeat what has before been said, that there is no account of angels falling from heaven, in the Old Testament; and if such a thing ever did take place, it was never recorded until the time of Peter—which would be strange indeed, that a subject which is said to be intimately connected with our fate, should have been left unrecorded for so great a length of time.

Who were the angels or messengers that fell? The 13th and 14th chapters of Numbers give us the needed information. When the children of Israel with Moses at their head, came near to the promised land, God said to Moses, "Send thou men, that they may search the land of Canaan which I gave unto the children of Israel, of every tribe of their fathers shall ye send a man, every one a ruler among them." Num. xiii: 2. These men were messengers or angels, as much as Paul was a messenger or angel to the Gentiles. They were selected one from each tribe, a ruler—consequently, they were men of reputed worth and veracity—this was their first estate. These men went into the land of Canaan, and after examining the land, ten of them brought back an evil report which was not true. "And they brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel, saying, the land through which we have gone to search it, is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; and all the people that we saw in it, are men of great stature," 32d, and 33d verses. Now, in bringing back this report, they fell from their first estate—they had been men of veracity, but now they were traitorous liars. And surely this was a great fall, fully justifying the expression of Peter, "and the angels which fell from their first estate."

For this wickedness they were to be punished—and hence were cast into hell to wait for judgment. What hell? I put this question, because there are four words in the original, which are rendered hell in the common version. Which of these words occurs here? It is neither Sheol, Hades nor Gehenna; but Professor Stuart, affirms that it is a denominative verb, tartaroo, and occurs but once in the Bible; the passage we are now considering. This being so, is it not a singular fact, if the common views of the passage be correct, that a word which has reference to an endless place of torment, is used but once in the Bible—and even in that instance, not as speaking of destruction to men, but only to apostate angels? On a subject of such importance, we should expect frequent allusion and repetition—but it is not so, and how a person can suppose it means endless misery, when all the other writers of the Bible are silent about it, I am at a loss to conceive. If the Deity was spoken of but by one of all the scripture writers, we should think that his existence was doubtful, so far as the Bible is concerned.

The question then arises; what is the primary meaning of the word? Professor Stuart says, "In Greek, the word Tartarus is employed to designate a supposed subterranean region, as deep down below the upper part of Hades as the earth is distant from heaven. It is occasionally employed, in the later classic writers, for the under-world in general—but in such a connection as to show, that it is only when writers mean to speak of the whole as a region of gloom, that they call it Tartarus." Ex. Es., p. 137. What a striking figure this in the hands of the apostle, to denote the state of mind into which the Israelitish messengers fell! The judicious Campbell calls Tartarus the prison of Hades. We have only then to ascertain his view of Hades, to know what is to become of Tartarus. Speaking of Hades, he says, "In my judgment, it ought never in scripture to be rendered hell; at least in the sense wherein that word is universally understood by Christians. In the Old Testament the corresponding word is Sheol, which signifies the state of the dead in general, without regard to the goodness or badness of the persons, their happiness or misery." 6. Dis., p. 181. Hades then, of which Tartarus is the prison, means simply the state of the dead—hence, it can not mean an endless place of torments. Besides, Hades is to be destroyed. The prophet Hosea says, "O grave, (or hell, Hades,) I will be thy destruction," xiii: 14—while Paul said, "O grave, (hell or Hades,) where is thy victory? 1 Cor. xv: 54. If Hades is destroyed, its prison, Tartarus, must go with it.

From these remarks, it is evident that Tartarus or hell, whatever the heathen may have thought was in it, was looked upon as a lower region of gloom—and hence, was used by the apostle to denote the state of mind into which the spies fell, after their false report. When David committed a great sin, he said, "The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold of me; I found trouble and sorrow." Ps. cxvi: 3. He thus alluded to the gloom of Hades as indicative of his state of mind. So did Jonah, when in the fish, he said, "out of the belly of hell I cried." The messengers had enjoyed a good character as rulers—but when they went on a message of the Lord and brought a false report of the land, they fell from purity into the state of a benighted and troubled mind, prefigured by the gloom of Tartarus, where they were reserved until judgment was passed upon them and they were punished. What was their punishment? "And the men which Moses sent to search the land, who returned, and made all the congregation to murmur against him, by bringing up a slander upon the land, even those men that did bring up the evil report upon the land, died by the plague before the Lord." Num. xiv: 33, 37.

This view of the subject, is farther strengthened by the fact, that, although in common creeds, the antediluvians and Sodomites are supposed to be in hell, yet the apostle does not represent them as being in Tartarus—but the spies only. There are three punishments—the antediluvians were drowned, the Sodomites burned, and the spies died with a plague.

If these things are correct, and I know not how they can be doubted, the common notion fails, and the idea of fallen spiritual angels reverts to its true source—the poem of Milton.

These three instances of signal punishment from the Old Testament were adduced by the apostle, for the express purpose of proving that the false teachers of his time would not escape chastisement—hence he says, "making them an ensample unto those that should after live ungodly." Verse 6. Having established this point, he makes still another quotation from the Old Testament, "And delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked." Verse 7. The deliverance of Lot was, salvation of the body from the destruction of Sodom—which fact strengthens the idea, that the punishment in the other instances, was in the present world—and that the whole number of instances was brought up to illustrate facts existing in the time of the apostle. This we shall see, by considering the last verse of the subject, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." Verse 9. The phrase "day of judgment," is much misunderstood. People generally suppose that it refers to a period beyond death, where all mankind will be gathered before God; the sinner to be cast off to burn forever, and the righteous to enjoy endless peace. That this is an erroneous view of the phrase in the present instance, is obvious from the fact that Peter was speaking, not of all men, but of false teachers alone, whose judgment did not linger. But with what propriety could Peter affirm that their judgment lingered not, if he meant that they would not receive it until millions of years perhaps, at a supposed general judgment?

That the common view of the phrase in this passage, is incorrect, can be successfully argued from the term punish. In the government of God all punishment is intended for good, aiming at the correction of the offender. Any other view of punishment than this, is unworthy of the wisdom, justice, power and goodness of God; for "while his tender mercies are over all his works," he will always consult their ultimate happiness. In all Scripture views of punishment, this glorious object is admitted. Paul says, "Now, no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby." Heb. xii: 11. Consequently, the idea of unending misery can not be true. Besides, the phrase "day of judgment" has no reference to one particular day to the exclusion of all other days—but means any period when the judgment of God is poured upon any nation or people. Thus, the prophet Malachi, speaking of John the Baptist, says, "Behold, I will send Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." iv: 5. This great day had reference to the destruction of the Jews as a nation; as any person may see, who will examine the quotations, which our Saviour made from this chapter. Ezekiel, speaking of judgments against Pharaoh, says, "For the day is near, even the day of the Lord is near, a cloudy day; it shall be the time of the heathen." xxx: 3. In this instance, it will be discovered, that the punishment of Pharaoh is called "the day of the Lord;" which shows that the expression is not confined to eternity, nor does it have exclusive reference to a particular day, but it means sometimes a longer and sometimes a shorter period. The term is thus used in modern times. For instance; we say that such and such events will not be in our day—by this, we mean, our life-time. Hence, in the Bible, the term has relation to any and to every period, when the judgments of God are manifested.

The day of judgment spoken of by Peter, is the time of the destruction of the Jewish nation, when, not only its citizens in Judea were to be deprived of their influence, but also all those who were scattered abroad. The false Judaic teachers took part with them in this destruction, which is expressly called a day by our Saviour; for speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, he said, "but of that day and hour knoweth no man." Matt. xxiv: 36. Other instances might be adduced, but one alone is deemed sufficient to settle the matter.

With this view of the phrase: "day of judgment," the verse under consideration is clear. Let us dissect it and see.

The apostle says, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations." By this statement the apostle endeavors to comfort those to whom he was writing, assuring them that God would deliver them from all the trials which might surround them, as well as from the pernicious communications of false teachers. This fact he makes doubly impressive, by allusion to Noah and Lot, who were delivered from the drowning and burning, which came upon the people to whom they belonged. The apostle farther remarks, "and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." In this statement, he assures them that the false teachers could not escape just chastisement. But who were the unjust? I answer the Jews, for it is manifest from the book of Acts, that at the time this epistle was written, which was previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, they were almost the sole persecutors of the Christians and the inculcators of false doctrines—many of whom called themselves Christ, and deceived many, to which our Saviour makes express reference, in the 24th chapter of Matthew. These individuals were reserved, or put by, or kept in store for punishment. But because their punishment did not come immediately, it was no proof that it would not come. The instances which he adduced from the Old Testament fully settled that point. The Antediluvians were reserved for 120 years, while the ark was building—then judgment came upon them in the shape of a flood. The Sodomites were reserved until Lot escaped—their judgment was fiery destruction. In the same manner the whole Jewish nation, including the false teachers, were reserved until about the year 70, when destruction came upon them like a storm, their city was levelled with the dust, their temple with its worship ceased to exist, while the influence of the whole Jewish people, whether at home or abroad, was entirely lost; for, as they became scattered abroad among the nations of the earth, they were looked upon with contempt and treated accordingly. At the same time the deliverance of the godly from trial was effected, for not one was destroyed by the overflowing scourge which desolated Palestine.

An earthly destruction, Dr. Clarke expressly admits to be a day of judgment. On Matt. x: 15, which reads, "It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the day of Judgment, than for that city," (Capernaum,) he says, "In the day of judgment or punishment. Perhaps not meaning the day of general judgment, nor the day of the destruction of the Jewish State by the Romans; but a day in which God should send punishment on that particular city, or on that person, for their crimes; so the day of judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah, was the time in which the Lord destroyed them by fire and brimstone, from the Lord out of heaven."

With all these considerations, we shall close the explanation with a paraphrase of the whole passage, as containing a summary of our views upon it. "But there were false prophets among the ancient Jewish people, even as there shall be false prophets among you, who will cunningly bring in damnable heresies, denying the Lord who bought them, bringing upon themselves swift destruction. Many shall follow their pernicious ways; and by reason of them, the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. And through avariciousness, they shall, with hypocritical words, make merchandise of you: but their judgment, declared a long time since against sinners, lingereth not, while their condemnation slumbereth not. For God spared not the messengers, who sinned in making a false report, but cast them into the hell of debasement, and delivered them into the chains of a darkened mind, to be reserved for the judgment of the plague. And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person who was a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly. And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample for those who should live ungodly in after times. And delivered just Lot, who was vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked. So the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly believers out of trials, and to reserve the unjust Jews unto the day of destruction which ended their power to deceive." G. W. M.

THE U. S. CONVENTION.

Another joyful and we trust eminently useful annual meeting of this body has been held, and the proceedings will soon be published. But it may be interesting to distant readers to know some of the attendant particulars and circumstances, so far as we can give them.

The weather for several days previous had been pleasant, travelling good, and the season favorable—the "times," only, were against a large attendance, and a large political Convention at Syracuse was calculated to draw away some who would have been with us. On Tuesday evening a large number had already arrived. The Universalist meeting-house was filled with an attentive auditory to hear Br. P. Morse deliver an interesting Sermon from Isaiah xxxv: 10—in which the primary use of it to depict the return of the Jews from Babylonian Captivity, was ably shown to embrace and picture forth the present salvation by faith, and the final salvation from sin and death by the Redeemer, and a touching contrast was drawn between the nature of the joys afforded by each kind of deliverance promised by the Lord. After services, the council was called to order by Br. S. Laws, of Vermont, (instead of the Standing Clerk, who was not present,) and after prayer by Br. H. Ballou, Br. Ballou was chosen Moderator, and Br. P. Morse, Clerk. On Wednesday morning the Baptist meeting-house, (the largest in the place, and which was kindly granted us for the occasion,) was early filled, even to the occupancy of extra seats, and of the steps of the pulpit, to hear the occasional Sermon by Br. K. Haven, of Shoreham, Vt. As this sermon will soon be published, we will only remark that it was a strong, plain, practical discourse, delivered in a good style corresponding thereto, and was listened to with great attention and deep interest. In the afternoon more extra seats were provided and occupied, and the vacant places in the gallery, aisles, and around the pulpit were filled with those who stood and heard with attention and delight a very animated discourse by Br. W. S. Balch, of Providence, R. I. His text was—"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples"—John xiii: 35. After alluding to the various tests of discipleship among Christians, he showed that the test laid down by Jesus was one that enabled the disciple not only to hope, or to trust, or to believe that he was a disciple, but to know it—nor to know it for himself alone, but to manifest it so that it might be known of others—of all men—and not only that it may, but shall be thus known. Then commenced an examination of the various tests furnished by the creeds and practices of various professing Christians, including the practice of too many Universalists in calling any one a Christian merely because of the profession of a particular faith. The conclusion exhibited the true test, laid down by the Master himself, in precept and example—"that ye have love one to another." The sermon was a powerful one, and thrilled to many hearts with the power of sweet conviction. It can not fail to do great good. In the evening the house was again crowded nearly as full as in the afternoon (though many had left the village to seek places for refreshment and repose, a considerable distance in the country,) and Br. E. H. Chapin, of Richmond, Va., preached from Eccl. ix: 18—"Wisdom is better than weapons of war." My relation to the speaker forbids saying more than giving a sketch of the sermon. After an introduction stating the duty of man to leave the mere narrow or selfish, and consider his relations to others, and his connection with the world around him, and feel their calls on him for action, he proceeded to illustrate the text. 1st. The physical improvements of the Present age. He contrasted the country when a wilderness, with its present state—the difficulties overcome, and obstacles removed, before the canal could connect the lakes with the ocean, or the rail car speed from the one extremity of the land to the other—the facilities of commerce, agriculture and the useful arts, thus created—and the blessings of peace, prosperity and extensive social feeling resulting therefrom. These were further contrasted incidentally, with the effects of ancient war and barbarian feats of strength—all showing that "wisdom is better than weapons of war." 2d. Intellectual improvement of the present age contrasted with those ages when the mass of mind was chained down in ignorance—and the happy effects, even of deep political excitement created by the diffusion of knowledge among the people—the superiority of mental over physical conflicts—all proving the truth of the text. 3d. Moral improvements of this age over those ages when converts were made by the sword, the flame and the tortures of the Inquisition; and the results in the modified and abrogated creeds of the dark ages, and the advancement of Christianity in its true spirit and power. He then addressed all who touch mankind, and all who occupy the pulpit, and individuals, on their duties, in view of these improvements. On Thursday morning Br. R. Tomlinson preached a good practical Sermon, on the parable of the Prodigal Son, in the Baptist meeting-house—and Br. J. Boyden, of Woonsocket Falls, R. I., preached in the Universalist house, from Heb. xii: 1, 2, showing that Christ is the author of our faith in doctrine, precept and example, while in neither has he authorized a belief in endless sin and woe. The other subjects of the text were clearly explained and enforced in a pleasing, practical manner.

I had to leave at noon, but understand from those who remained, that a universal desire to hear our venerable Father in Israel, Hosea Ballou, prevented services in any but the Baptist house, which was accordingly crowded, jammed full, to overflowing. He dwelt on the importance of preaching Jesus Christ, and not ourselves, and laid down the rules by which the true minister of Jesus may be distinguished from others; and his peculiarly impressive, plain, and powerfully simple style sent it home to every mind. Br. D. Skinner delivered the customary addresses in his usual felicitous manner; and so closed this annual session of the United States Convention of Universalists. It meets next year in the city of New-York.

Br. T. J. Sawyer preached to a full house, in the evening, a thrilling discourse on the future state, its enjoyments, and especially on the pleasure of there recognizing our friends. It is highly spoken of by those who heard it.

Our friends in Auburn and vicinity deserve great praise for their hospitality—their unwearied exertions to accommodate the floods of people, and their general arrangements to do it in order and regularity. The Baptist house will seat very comfortably, about 1200 persons—add to these, those occupying extra seats and standing places, and the number in that house must have been about 1800, before Thursday afternoon; while the Universalist house held about 600 more. There were about 80 preachers present—and some 20 absent who should have been there but were not. I allude especially to some brethren from the East, who promised to attend; and to one, in particular, who very urgently invites the western brethren to come to the East whenever a Convention is held there. Does our Brother of the Trumpet know why this one, so well able to attend, did not enforce his invitations by a reciprocity of kindness?

In conclusion—the meeting was a very joyous one—will tell powerfully for the cause in this region, and I trust will long be remembered with profit by those who came from abroad. A. B. G.

Messrs. Perkins and Paine, Booksellers of Coopers-town keep a supply of Universalist books constantly on hand. Our friends it is hoped will encourage such Book sellers as are independent enough to keep our books.

POETRY.

[From "Ollapodiana," in the Knickerbocker.]

DIRGE IN AUTUMN.

Tis an autumnal eve—the low winds sighing
To wet leaves rustling as they hasten by,
The eddying gusts to tossing boughs replying,
And ebon darkness filling all the sky;
The moon, pale mistress, paled in solemn vapor,
The rack, swift wandering through to void, above,
As I, a mourner, by my lonely taper,
Send back to faded hours the plaint of love.

Blossoms of peace, once in my pathway springing,
Where have your brightness and your splendor gone?
And Thou, whose voice to me came sweet as singing,
What region holds thee in the vast Unknown?
What star far brighter than the rest contains thee,
Beloved, departed—empress of my heart?
What bond of full beatitude enchains thee,
In realms unveiled by pen, or prophet's art?
Ah! loved and lost! in these autumnal hours,
When fairy colors deck the painted tree,
When the vast woodlands seem a sea of flowers,
Oh! then, my soul exulting, bounds to thee!
Springs, as to clasp thee yet in this existence,
Yet to behold thee at my lonely side,
But the fond vision melts at once to distance,
And my sad heart gives echo—she has died!

Yes! when the morning of her years was brightest,
That angel-presence into dust went down:
While yet with rosy dreams her rest was lightest,
Death, for the olive, wove the cypress crown;
Sleep, which no waking knows, o'ercame her bosom,
O'ercame her large, bright, spiritual eyes;
Spared in her bower conubial one fair blossom—
Then bore her spirit to the upper skies.

There let me meet her, when life's struggles o'er,
The pure in love and thought their faith renew,
Where man's forgiving and redeeming Lover
Spreads out his Paradise to every view,
Let the wild autumn, with its leaves descending,
Howl on the winter's verge!—yet spring will come:
So my freed, soul, no more 'gainst fate contending,
With all it loveth, shall regain its home.

CREATION.

BY DR. S. WORCESTER.

For what purpose did the infinite Creator give existence to this majestic monument of his mighty power? For what purpose did he create the earth and the heavens, with their unnumbered hosts? Was it not, evidently, that he might communicate happiness: and does not this design appear conspicuous on the open face of nature?—What is the plain and unequivocal indication of those marks of infinite wisdom, and skillful contrivance in the general dispositions, and in all the parts of surrounding nature? Is it not, that the Creator of all things is infinitely good? Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the regular and harmonious disposition of the heavenly orbs? Instead of this benignant harmony of the spheres, why was there not a perpetual jar, and the most disastrous conclusion?

Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the grandeur and beauty of the creation—so favorably adapted to elevate, to inspire with admiration, and to fill with the purest pleasure, the devout and contemplative mind?—Why was not the whole creation so formed as only to excite amazement, terror, and despair? Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the beautiful scenery of our globe—so agreeably diversified with continent and seas, islands and lakes, mountains and plains, hills and valleys, adapted to various beneficial purposes, and abounding with productions, in endless variety, for the convenience, the support, and the happiness of its diversified inhabitants?—Why was not the whole earth like the burning sands of Lybia, or the rugged and frozen mountains of Zembla? Why was it not one wild dreary waste producing only briars and thorns, and poisonous and bitter fruits?

Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the grateful vicissitudes of the seasons: each bearing upon its bosom its peculiar delights: the spring arrayed in the most beautiful verdure, and decorated with flowers; the summer abounding with delightful prospects, and teeming with luxuriance; autumn loaded with golden harvests, and the richest variety of fruits; and even winter supplying in social enjoyments, and the nobler pleasure of study and contemplation, what it lacks in external charms? Why was not the whole year one continued scene of dull uniformity, or so irregular in its changes, as utterly to baffle all the calculations, and arrangements and pursuits of life? Why was not every sight a spectacle of horror, every sound a shriek of distress, every sweet a most pungent bitter, every gale a blast of pestilence? Is it not because the Creator and Preserver of the world is a being of infinite goodness?

Is it not strange, that we do not constantly perceive the glory of God, which the heavens declare, and gratefully recognise his goodness, so richly spread abroad through all his works? Happy, happy, were it for us, did nature constantly appear to us as it really is, animated and enlivened by the presence of its glorious Author! When the sun rises or sets in the heavens, when spring adorns the earth, when summer shines in its glory, when autumn pours forth its fruits, or when winter returns in its awful forms, happy were it for us, did we constantly view the great Creator and Preserver of all, continually manifesting himself in his various works! Happy, did we meet his presence in the smiling fields, feel his influence in the cheering beams, hear his voice even in the whispering breeze, and taste his goodness in every gift of nature and providence! Happy, did we feel ourselves every where surrounded with the glory of that universal Spirit, who fills, pervades, and enlivens all; and did we live in the world, as in a great and august temple where the presence of the divinity who inhabits it, fills the mind with awe, and inspires the heart with devotion.

THE NAME UNIVERSALIST.

This term was first applied, by way of derision, to those who held to the possibility of the salvation of all men. They prevailed about the year 1600, in various parts of France and Germany; and in fact this sentiment was embraced by almost all the Protestant Universalists. It was not what we call Universalism now, but was more like what we call Arminianism. Thus it will be seen that the word Universalist was not originally applied to those who believed in the salvation of all men; but to those who believed only in the possibility of universal salvation.

Believers in the final holiness and happiness of all the human race have been known from the earliest period of the Christian history. But they were not known by the name of Universalists. For three or four centuries after the death of Christ, they were not distinguished from the rest of the church by any peculiar name. Many of the highest and most orthodox of the Fathers maintained this sentiment. The church soon began to grow corrupt, and departed from the pure doctrine of Jesus Christ; and then it was regarded as an offence to believe in the final happiness of all. When the distinction took place, the believers in the salvation of all, were called by some, merciful doctors, by others Origenists; but they were not called Universalists.

We have shown that the word Universalist was not used until about 1600, and then it was applied only to those who held it possible for all men to be saved. At the time of the reformation by Luther, the Anabaptists of Germany, who believed in the final happiness of all men, were never called Universalists. But when believers came to multiply in Europe, especially in England, and set up a separate worship, the world gave them the name, UNIVERSALISTS. We have no objection to the name. It is now used to signify all those who believe in the ultimate holiness and happiness of all men, without any reference to their peculiar views on other points. By the same rule which gives the name Universalist to those who hold to universal salvation, we give the name Partialist to those who hold to a partial salvation. It is a proper name in either case, in one as much as in the other. Those who call us Universalists, certainly can not object to being known by a term which is the exact counterpart—Partialist.—Trumpet.

WASHINGTON'S REPUTATION AMONG ENGLISH VETERANS.—One of them said lately, that he might have shot the American commander, and pointed out the time and place. "Why not, then? It was your duty to have done so?" "No, it was not, neither," the old man replied; "it was him we depended on for treating our prisoners right; and we'd sooner have shot an officer of our own, my master!" This was expressed roughly, but I saw the old man was in earnest. It roused a tear out of him, and I took him by the hand, and thanked him. There never was a nobler eulogy upon George Washington since he was born.—Boston Transcript.

In Rome, on the 20th of August, of Dropsy on the brain, JANE, daughter of Ira and Phebe H. Gibson, aged fifteen years, two months and twenty-seven days. Her unassuming manners, retiring modesty, the memory of her unaffected dignity of mind, together with the graceful meekness of her pure and virtuous spirit, will remain, when the beautiful casket which contained it, shall have mingled with its native element. She has left parents, brothers, and sisters, to lament their loss, but they mourn not as those who have no hope; but they

"Weep for her though she hath fled,
In the blossom of beauty, and prime;
The flower's transplanted, not dead—
The sunshine of Heaven is her clime."

Sermon by D. BIDDLECOM.

In Duanesburg, August 15, Col. AMOS BENNETT, aged 70 years. Col. B. was for many years a Universalist, and in death was firm in the faith of his life. He was an active and efficient member of the society in the place of his late residence, and few of its members could be taken who would be more missed than will he, or more deplored. When such men die, the world suffereth loss, for he was a good man and delighted in goodness. L. O. M.

In Duanesburg, August—, Mr. FREEMAN S. SWAN, aged — years. Left early in life without father or mother, brother or sister, his condition was peculiar and lonely. But his mild, peacable and friendly disposition, and the uprightness of his general deportment, secured to him many friends who were unwearied in their attentions and contributed much toward his comfort in the last days of his earthly pilgrimage. Mr. Swan was a Universalist. No other faith could find a home in his bosom congenial to his hopes, desires and affections, and he testified his opinion of its worth by leaving to the Universalist Society in Duanesburg one thousand dollars. For this legacy and his many virtues his name will be long remembered. L. O. M.

In Conesus, August 19th, of fever, Mr. ALEXANDER L. PATTERSON, aged 22 years and nearly 7 months. The deceased was a young man of exemplary character. The mildness of his disposition, the kindness of his heart and virtue of his examples, endeared him to all around. He died without an enemy, and died perfectly resigned to the will of God, with a sure and steadfast hope of meeting a ransomed and purified world in heaven above. A large assembly composed of members of different denominations convened at the house of the deceased on the 21st, and were addressed in the words of consolation (Isa xxxiii: 24) by O. ROBERTS.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXXVIII.

Acts. This book was written by Luke, A. D. 64, at what place is not known. It contains a considerable part of the history of Peter and Paul, and of the Christian church for a period of about 30 years. Its authority is not questioned.

Acts vi: 2. "It is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables." By serving tables we are to understand, attending to secular affairs, in which purpose they sat and did business at tables.

Acts viii: 33. "Who shall declare his generation." Who will take his part by speaking in his favor, in a court of justice. Some understand it, as an exclamation against the wickedness of that generation.

Acts viii: 37. "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." How short and simple was the faith of the primitive Christians! Happy would it have been for the church, and the world, if no more articles of faith had been added to this apostolic, primitive, and Christian creed.

Acts x: 25. "And as Peter was coming in, Cornelius met him and fell down and worshipped him." This was the same worship which was paid to Christ on some occasions, but no more was meant by it, than that he showed him marks of the greatest reverence and respect.

Acts xi: 2. "They that were of the circumcision contended with him."

Let the reader take his Bible and read this whole chapter, and notice this one particular—viz, That neither Peter in particular, nor the apostles in general, were considered as infallible by the body of Christians, in those days of primitive simplicity, and freedom from arrogance and unfounded pretension. This is evident, otherwise they would not have thought of arraigning Peter, and censuring his conduct, as we find they did. Let the papists then no longer claim the infallibility of the Pope, nor the church of England claim the infallibility of their Church.

Herod. There are several Herods mentioned in Scripture, and unless we distinguish them, we shall be apt to confound the names with one another. The first Herod, was called Herod the great. This is the one who ordered all the male children, under two years of age to be slain, in order that he might be sure of putting the Messiah to death, being jealous of his throne, or government. The second Herod is called Herod Antipas. He had the kingdom of Judea left him in his father's will. He was a son of Herod the great, and the one that put John the Baptist to death. He reigned when Christ was crucified. The third Herod is called Herod Agrippa. He was a grand son of Herod the great, and father of that Agrippa, before whom Paul was arraigned. This is that Herod who was smitten by an angel, and eaten up of worms. See Acts xii: 23.

Acts xiii: 48. "And as many as were ordained to eternal life believed."

By "ordained to eternal life" we are not to understand that by an arbitrary decree of God they were predestinated to eternal life in a future state of existence, for the eternal life here spoken of is the life of the Gospel, and their receiving or rejecting it could have no influence over their destiny in a future world. By those who were ordained to eternal life, we are to understand those who were disposed to receive and believe the gospel. Wakefield renders the passage thus, "And as many as were so disposed believed to eternal life." The Imp. Version, and Kneeland, render it, "And as many as were disposed to eternal life believed." Archbishop Newcome renders it in this way, "As many believed as were disposed to receive the doctrine of eternal life."

NATURAL RELIGION.

BY REV. L. G. WARREN.

Man is a religious being. Yes; kind reader, we mean what we say, wicked man is naturally a religious being. Undoubtedly to some, it will appear very bold to aver this; yet it is no less true, and all history, as well as experience and observation confirm the statement. Go where you will; search the most obscure parts of earth, and wherever you find people, wherever you find a human being, there you will find religion; there you will find the creature worshipping a God which he regards as his Creator.

Even the light of nature is abundantly sufficient to teach man that there is a God, who created the heavens and the earth, and who is the fountain and source of all life, love, and intelligence. The simplest ideas, which we seem capable of forming in relation to this Being, are that he is intelligent, and that he is uncaused. Intelligent he must be, for there are in his works proofs of amazing and exquisite skill; "and if there is anything of which we may be certain," (says Dr. Smith,) "it is, that wherever there is contrivance, there must have been a contriver; and that an adaptation of means to an end can not possibly exist, without the operation of a Being who perceived and designed the end, and fitted the means to accomplish it."

If we were disposed to be skeptical upon this subject, we might possibly persuade ourselves that matter is eternal and uncaused; but then, we know, as well as we know that we exist, that we have thought and are intelligent beings; we also know that this thought or intelligence has not been eternal with us, and therefore must proceed from an intelligent and self-existent first Cause. It is this Being that we call God.

Hence, we see that "simple nature" has demonstrated to our minds, that there is an eternal, self-existent, and intelligent God. Although the discoveries of modern science have exhibited in the most striking light, how the matchless skill of the Creator is admirably displayed, in the simplicity of the means which he has adopted to accomplish his vast and mighty purposes; that by the one single principle of attraction, he preserves the planets in their orbits, regulates and adjusts their various movements, determines the descent of bodies to the earth, and retains them at its surface; notwithstanding the advantage of all these sublime and interesting discoveries, "the poor Indian, whose untutored mind, sees God in clouds and hears him in the wind," knows as well as the most enlightened astronomer, that there is a Great Spirit of wisdom. As says the poetess,

"There is a God—all nature speaks,
Through earth, and air, and sea, and skies:
See; from the clouds his glory breaks,
When first the beams of morning rise."

Of the existence of the Deity, it is impossible reasonably to doubt. We see his works—we feel his power; but in what manner he exists, we do not know, even as we understand nothing of the mode of our own existence. But although we can not comprehend the manner of our existence, still it is impossible to doubt the fact. So it is impossible reasonably to doubt the existence of a Supreme Power. Even the unbelievers of infidel France, when they had denied the true God, and had written on the tomb-stones, "death is an eternal sleep," set up the goddess of reason, and the people bowed down and worshipped.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

SECTION VI.

Specific Instructions.

Luke iii: 10 And the people asked him saying, What shall we do?

11 He answered and said unto them, He that hath two coats let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat let him do likewise.

12 Then came also the publicans to be baptized, and said unto him, Master, and what shall we do?

13 And he said unto them, Exact no more than that which is appointed you.

14 And the soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely, and be content with your wages.

Verse 10. The people asked him. John had been telling them that they must repent, and foretelling the awful consequences of crime. He had not however specified any particular duties which he would have his hearers perform, or particular crimes from which they should abstain; but had given injunctions of general application. It was for this reason that the several classes propose the question, what shall we do?

He that hath two coats, etc. General benevolence is here required. Our Saviour expressed the same thing when he said, "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thy self."

12. Then came also the publicans. The Roman tax gatherers are desirous of knowing their duty, and John gives them instructions adapted to their situation.

Exact no more, etc. The publicans were accustomed to exact of the people more than what they were authorized to receive. The excess of these exactions they put into their own pockets. Zaccheus had been thus guilty, and on his repentance offers to restore four fold. Luke xix: 5. The injunction of John to the publicans was intended to correct this evil.

14. And the soldiers likewise demanded of him. The Romans kept soldiers in all their provinces to quell insurrections, and keep the people in subjection. Such may have been those whom John addressed. About this time also, war was being carried on between Herod Antipas, and Aretas, an Arabian king, on account of the divorce of Herod's wife, the daughter of Aretas, that he might marry Herodias. And as the place of John's preaching was somewhere in the intervening space between the contending parties, it is not improbable that some of the soldiers of one or both these princes, were among John's hearers.

John's instructions were eminently adapted to the soldier's profession. To do unnecessary violence arising from an insensibility that war always produces—to accuse each other falsely, for self promotion; and to complain and mutiny on account of low wages, are evils to which the military profession is peculiarly liable; and to counteract them were John's instructions given.

Conclusion.

Luke iii: 18. And many other things in his exhortation preached he unto the people.

Remarks. It is here stated that John preached much more than what is recorded. But it is reasonable to conclude that what is not recorded was in harmony with what is. Hence we may understand the nature of his communications, and the sentiments he advanced, from what the Evangelists have recorded.

It may be remarked also that John preached many things, or in other words that his ministry continued for a considerable period after that to which the above language relates. For though Luke immediately adds an account of John's imprisonment, it is plain that that event did not occur till a subsequent period. As however, what is hereafter said of John is incidentally introduced in connexion with other subjects, I shall close the present section here.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

Chronology. The dates which we found it necessary to establish at the commencement of this section, in our comments on Luke iii: 1, 2, have suggested the propriety of offering in this place some remarks on the Chronology of the gospels.

The question has sometimes been asked, why did not the Evangelists observe some system of chronology in their history of the Saviour? Why did they not say for instance, of his birth, the commencement of his ministry, or his death that it occurred in such a year of the world, or of Rome, or of the Seleucidae, or in such a year of such an Olympiad? Or if they did not wish to adopt any of the systems of Chronology in use among the surrounding nations, why did they not adopt one of their own, by which we might have ascertained the precise time of the principal events which they record? In answer to this question it may be remarked, in the first place, that several plausible reasons might be offered why they did not adopt any of the Chronological systems then in use. And in the second place they did adopt a system peculiar (or mostly so) to themselves; and one that is equally accurate with any that could have been selected in its stead. Their system is that of associating the events which they record, with others, the date of which was well known when they wrote, and may be accurately ascertained at the present day.

What, I would ask, is the difference between saying that John the Baptist commenced his ministry in the 15th year of the reign of Tiberius Cesar, or in the 779th of the building of Rome, or in the 4030th of the world, or in the 338th of the Seleucidae; or in specifying the time of that event by any of the other chronological data that were employed for dating events at that time? The candid, honest man will answer, there is no difference, and the objection to the gospels, sometimes urged on this ground, is utterly foolish. We might make similar inquiries respecting some other important (and indeed all other important;) events recorded in the gospels; and we should find the answer to be the same.

That the statements of the Evangelists do not harmonize with well established dates, has been often and vehemently urged, but has never yet been proved. On the contrary, the more rigid the scrutiny with which the Gospel narrative has been examined, the more obvious it has become that the events therein contained took place at the time of other events with which they are associated. Out of the alleged chronological discrepancies, I will notice the following because they are intimately connected with the main subject of the present remarks. 1. It is said of the commencement of John's ministry that it must have taken place in the 12th, and not in the 15th year of Tiberias Cesar. Why it is supposed necessary to place the event at that time we have not seen stated. But whatever the reason may be, it is obvious that the objector overlooks the fact that Tiberias was associated with his predecessor in the government three years before the commencement of his sole reign, which, being added to the 12 years of his exclusive reign before John's ministry commenced, would make the 15 referred to by Luke. And that Herod, Philip, Lysanias, Anas, and Caiaphas filled the respective offices mentioned by Luke, (chap. iii: 1, 2,) in the 15th of Tiberias' entire reign, we have shown in our comments on that passage. Thus the veracity of Luke is not only vindicated, but attested by a particularity of reference, that will never be found associated with imposture. Even the apparent discrepancy above noticed is an evidence in his favor; for an impostor would have added some explanatory remarks, while Luke, from an unsuspecting and incautious integrity omits such explanation.

2. It has been objected, that Herod the Great, according to the best accounts, died two years before the vulgar era; that is before the birth of the Saviour, while Matthew places that event two years after the Saviour's birth, (See Matt. ii,) from which it is concluded that Matthew's account is not to be relied upon.

This objection may indeed be urged against the infallibility of Dionicius, the Little, who, in the 6th century established the vulgar era, and gave rise to the practice of dating events from the birth of Christ, yet that the veracity of Matthew is affected by it is yet to be proved. The era of Christ's birth should be placed four years earlier than the common reckoning. This will not only remove the objection we are noticing, but do away several anachronisms that would otherwise occur. Herod died about the year of the building of Rome 752, and the vulgar era corresponds with the year of Rome 754; but by supposing that the true era of the Saviour's birth was the year 750, we bring the death of Herod two years after the birth of Christ, according to Matthew's statement.

Here perhaps is the most proper place for offering some observations on the much controverted term (dietes;) used by Matthew (ii: 16,) and rendered two years old. This term has been greatly restricted by many critics, for various purposes. By some it has been thought to denote those infants that had just entered on the second year of their age. By such it is contended that the Jews called those children two years old, who were more than one year old, reckoning a part for the whole of the year. Others have restricted the term still more, even making it applicable to children of a single month, week or day! The reason offered is that it was customary with the Jews to call a child two years old, who, being born in one year, had passed into the next, however brief the space he had lived. Among the first class, may be named Parkhurst and Campbell. See Parkhurst on the word dietes, and Campbell's Notes on Matt. ii: 16. Among the second class, are Calmet and Horne. See Horne's Introd. Vol. II. p. 77.

This restriction has been made for various purposes. Principally, to diminish the cruelty of Herod, and make Matthew's account of the slaughter of the infants more credible, and thus answer an infidel objection.

But after having examined a large number of arguments (and we presume the strongest that can be urged) in favor of the restriction of the term as stated above, we must confess that they are altogether unsatisfactory. And though we have seen no arguments advanced by others, in favor of a contrary opinion, yet our own limited investigation has suggested those that preponderate in favor of the unrestricted sense of the term. That the Jews sometimes reckoned a part for the whole of a day or year is not doubted. The passages referred to by Horne, (Introd. Vol. II. pp. 76, 77,) make this perfectly obvious; but among all those instances where this practice is developed, I find none sufficiently analogous to the present, to have any just bearing upon it. And as to the cruelty of Herod, there can be no possible difference whether we restrict the term or not. The order of Herod to destroy the infants did not embrace all that were under the age denoted by this term, down to a month or a day, as some seem to suppose, (a supposition which ascribes extreme folly as well as great cruelty to Herod,) but all that were under that age, according to the time which he had inquired of the wise men; that is so far under that age, as to make it certain that the Saviour would be included. Hence if the period defined in Herod's order, in which the infants of Bethlehem were devoted to destruction, was one month, (and it could hardly have been more, as his inquiries of the wise men had been accurate;) it follows not only that the infidel objection drawn from the cruelty ascribed to Herod by Matthew, is founded in misapprehension of the extent of that cruelty; but also that nothing is gained toward removing that objection by limiting the term we are noticing. It is not probable that more infants would be embraced in one month under two years, than in the same space under one.

The reasons why I suppose the term is not to be understood in a limited sense are these. 1. It is obvious that Matthew intended to inform us of a particular period, embraced in Herod's order, beyond which the infants were not to be destroyed. The persons sent on this cruel mission were not to go beyond certain definite limits. Now the moment we restrict the term rendered two years old, all becomes uncertainty as to the extent of the massacre. Herod's order, critics tell us, was to destroy all the infants from those entering upon the second year and under. But who I would ask would know his duty if sent to execute such an order as this. The question would arise how far must those devoted to destruction, have entered upon the second year? One month or two, or more? It is plain that some definite period must have been stated and that dietes used by Matthew was intended to denote it; and as those restrictions we have named, render the period denoted by the term, wholly indefinite, we are constrained to reject them.

2. The same term, occurs, with a trifling variation of form, but with the same sense I think, in Acts xxiv: 27, and xxviii: 30, where it would be folly to pretend any restriction in its sense. And why in these passages it should be understood in its most extended sense, and in a limited sense in Matt. ii: 16, we are unable to determine. Finally, I see no reason why Herod should have been in haste to execute his ambitious and cruel purpose, since he could not certainly have apprehended any danger to his throne from a child not two years old.

We may with the utmost confidence therefore place the death of Herod two years after the birth of Jesus; and it probably exceeded that period some months.

We will now show the age of John the Baptist, when he commenced his ministry. In our notes on Luke iii: 1, we intimated that he was thirty years of age at that time, since the Jewish priests usually commenced their public duties at that age. How does this agree with what we have before said. Let us see. John was at least six months older than the Saviour, (see Luke i: 35, and the comment thereon,) which would probably place his birth in the year of Rome 749. Now by adding to this number, thirty years, we have the year of Rome 779 which was the 15th of Tiberias' administration.

Our Saviour commenced his ministry about six months after John commenced his. Hence after recording the baptism of the Saviour, Luke says, (iii: 23,) "And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age."

We did think of offering some remarks respecting the duration of our Saviour's ministry, and the time of his death, but these particulars will be reserved for another place, as our present remarks have been much farther extended than we had at first anticipated.

REMARKS.—The present session was one of the deepest interest to believers in the Gospel of universal grace. Our friends came from the East, the West, the North, the South, and sat down in sweet harmonious council together. Statistical information from various directions gave evidence of the general prosperity and triumphant onward march of the holy cause, which embraces the salvation of the world. The sermons, with perhaps one or two exceptions, were of a very superior character, furnishing undoubted evidence that those who ministered at the altars of the God of infinite grace, had drawn largely from the inexhaustible fountains of divine wisdom, knowledge and goodness, and came unto the furnishing multitudes in the "fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ."

Thronging numbers of hearers, who came in clouds, "like doves to their windows," till two houses of public worship, one very spacious, were more than filled, listened with tearful eyes and heart-thrilling delight to the glowing language of inspiration, revealing the unalterable truth of God, in the glorious system of man's redemption from sin and death, proclaiming the unlimited and changeless love of the Father of mercies in the reconciliation of all things to himself, and the production of final holiness and joy throughout the moral universe. Long will that season of "refreshing from the presence of the Lord" be remembered with indescribable joy.

May every true believer remember that "it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing"—good to illustrate our profession by our conduct, and produce harmony between theory and practice—"good for brethren to dwell together in unity"—good to let the moral light of the Gospel universally shine in our practice to the everlasting glory of God—good to labor and suffer reproach for our "trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men"—good to enjoy special salvation through faith—good to promote "peace on earth and good will to men." And may the God of all grace sanctify our hearts, and lives, redeem the world from all sin, and grant an incorruptible inheritance in the light and life to all for whom Jesus gave himself a ransom.

P. MORSE.

REV. J. BABCOCK.

The following certificates in relation to the case of Br. J. Babcock are published by the advice of the Alleghany Association, before which they were submitted at its last session, when they investigated the charge and acquitted him.

To all whom it may concern: I hereby certify that, in regard to the reports put in circulation in the summer and fall of 1839, prejudicial to the character of Rev. Judah Babcock, although at first I was of the opinion there was at least some truth in them, yet upon a full and thorough investigation, I became convinced and fully satisfied that the whole and sum total of them were false, and without the least shadow of truth, and remain of that opinion still.

Dated Centreville, June 29th, 1840.

Centreville, June 29th, 1840.

We the undersigned do hereby certify, that we have been acquainted with Rev. J. Babcock from ten to twenty years, and have witnessed, within that time, a number of attacks upon his moral character by the tongue of slander; but in every instance that has come under our observation, his accusers have uniformly shrunk from the task of proving their charges, or substantiating their allegations; therefore we feel disposed to regard him still as an innocent man, and one entitled to the confidence and good esteem of the community in which he resides, or wherever Providence may direct or call him to labor.

THE DISCUSSION WITH MR. CAMPBELL,
(Concluded.)

Utica, Sept. 23d, 1839.

MR. CAMPBELL—Dear Sir, Your favor of the 13th inst. has just come to hand. As you decline, and seem to think it useless, to correspond with either the Bible or any other societies heretofore named, on the subject of publishing our discussion, and also decline a partnership in the publication, I hereby accept the tender made me in the P. S. of your last published letter, and will see that an edition of as many as 2000 copies is published as soon as our printer can conveniently get it out. He is now absent and I know not how soon it will be convenient for him to go about it. You can have 1000 copies of the work in sheets at cost, and appropriate the profits as you see fit, and I shall bestow mine where I see fit. I do not calculate to reserve them to myself.

As to the insertion in the work of the two Notes from your Appendix, I deem that indispensable if we would do ourselves or our readers justice; and neither party can object to it without cashing his own honor and veracity. For they have been made the subject of controversy between us and freely commented on by both, I affirming and you denying that they were inconsistent with what you have advanced in this discussion. How can our readers tell which is right unless they see them? The Notes being from your own pen, and you as well as I having commented on them pending the controversy, and moreover you having said, of the one on Matt. v. 22, "I request our readers to examine the whole note," and subsequently asked me to "lay the whole note before my readers," it is now a most singular and unheard of requisition that you should ask the occupancy of a space equal in length to the Notes themselves, to gloss them over and try to neutralize their force. I shall consent to that only on condition that I also occupy an equal space with remarks of my own. I shall wish of course to insert the remarks which I prefixed to those in the separate article in which they were published in the Magazine and Advocate, unless you insist on accompanying them with additional remarks of your own. I will not object to your occupying half, or a whole page on this or any other point or points in the controversy, in notes or otherwise, I being allowed the same space. Yours truly, D. SKINNER.

Bethany, Va., October 4, 1839.

MR. SKINNER.—Sir, As you seem disposed to yield nothing for the advantage you suppose to accrue to your side of the question, from the publication of certain notes, and as you have already unjustly commented on said notes. I am not disposed to allow one single addition of any sort, note or comment, to the finished debate. And as you have consented to publish an edition on the offer that I first made you, go on and do it as expeditiously as possible. My booksellers will order what copies they please from you, when they see the work consummated. They, if they like your edition, as a matter of interest, will buy from you as many copies as they can sell. You are aware I presume, that I have sometime since given up the publication and sale of books, and that a house in Pittsburg does all that business. I will of course advertise, and take every pains to encourage the sale of the work, provided only, it is faithfully published without note or comment. If it should not be published correctly, I shall with their consent print for them an edition. But of this I hope there will be no necessity. I think 2000 copies a very small edition of such a work. Please inform us timously of the completion of the work, that all pains may be taken to get it into the market.

In all benevolence I remain as ever, yours,

A. CAMPBELL.

P. S. We would be glad to receive proof sheets of the work while in progress. A. C.

Utica, October 19, 1839.

MR. CAMPBELL—Dear Sir, Yours of the 4th inst., is before me. In reference to its subject matter I remark that we must know before printing, whether you take of us, and if so how many you take of our discussion, so that we may calculate on the size of the edition accordingly. I say we, because I suppose you are aware that I have long since given up the printing and sale of books; and hence the printing and sale of this discussion will be by Messrs. Grosh and Hutchinson, the publishers of the Magazine and Advocate.

You speak of printing an edition yourself if you do not like ours. In the first place I do not conceive that you have the right to do so, having offered me and I having accepted, the exclusive copy-right of the work. In the next place, if we agree to publish the work without alteration or addition, it will be so done. And we are willing you should have a voice as well as I, in regard to the title page, index of contents, (or reference to subjects, and scriptures discussed if there shall be any,) preface, etc.

In the next place concerning the two notes from your pen and your appendix—if you are really afraid to let them go to all our readers without comment, as I have no doubt you are—and indeed no one will wonder or blame you for this fear, but only for wanting candor to acknowledge it, and that the said notes are inconsistent with the ground you have taken in this discussion—if, I say, you are thus afraid to let your readers see the notes, we will print as many copies as you choose to order without appending them; but I shall claim the undoubted right to annex said notes in an appendix unaccompanied by comment, to that part of the edition, which we sell, if I choose, though I do not now say positively that I shall do so.

And now for the title page, preface, etc. I would propose something like the following:—

[Here I inserted the title page and preface as they appear in the book, (which it is unnecessary we should copy here,) expecting Mr. C. would add his signature to the preface, it being impartially written for both to sign, but he pays no attention to it, neither signing, nor approving, nor condemning it.]

I would have the questions and rules adopted for the discussion inserted at the commencement of the book (with a note at the margin informing the reader that said questions and rules were adopted and signed by the parties respectively, at the dates of letters 6 and 7,) as a matter of convenient reference to the reader, and to inform him in the beginning what questions are discussed in the work. As to an index, or table of contents and scripture references, or a running title designating the subject at the top of each page, I am not particular, and know not that it is of much consequence whether there is or is not any thing of the kind.

Any alterations you may suggest in regard to those matters or to the proposed form of the title page and preface consistent with the true exhibition of the facts pertaining to the discussion will be treated with due deference and respect. The size of the edition we publish will depend somewhat on the number of copies you agree to take. We shall probably publish 2000, and possibly 3000. We will endeavor to furnish you with proof sheets of the work as it progresses; but our printers may not find it convenient in all cases (especially where they know that no alterations can be made in the copy) to wait after sending it, for a return from you. Please therefore send us complete copies of your own letters just as you wish them printed, correcting any typographical or slight errors not affecting the general sense. Address Magazine and Advocate.

Your earliest answer, touching the several particulars mentioned in this, is respectfully solicited by, dear Sir, Your obt. serv't. D. SKINNER.

The second copy of the above was mailed to

Mr. C. December 20th, and the following added thereto, viz.

Having received no answer to the above letter, and having already waited over two months, I send you now a second copy, requesting an immediate answer. For it is time these matters were settled, and that our printers were at work, so as to get the work out by Spring.

P. S. If we sell you or your bookseller the quantity of the work you wish at cost, we shall expect payment to be made, and in funds at par here or in New-York, as early as we have to pay for the paper and printing. Printers generally expect pay down, and paper-makers either down or within three months.

What form would you prefer, 12mo. or 8vo? and what price do you think the work ought to sell for at retail? Our prices ought to be alike, and should be announced before the work is out.

Yours, etc., D. SKINNER.

Mr. C.'s pretended answer to the above was received January 21, 1840, and is as follows, being the last communication of any kind that I have received from him.

Bethany, January 9th, 1840.

MR. SKINNER—Sir, On my return from a tour to the South West, I found a letter from you of the date of October 19th, 1839, and before I had time to answer it I have now received another, a copy of the same under date of the 20th ult.

I am at a loss to understand your views of this matter. When I tendered you my interest in the discussion, or asked yours—it was not for a co-partnership concern—nor did I ask you to guarantee me, or to take any number of copies as a condition, etc.

Nor do I contemplate any other work than the actual debate, as it is reported in our periodicals—not a page more or less.

And now unless you design to insult me, I know not on what principle you should use such language as—"If you are really afraid to let them (the notes,) go to all our readers without comment," etc.

I now believe you do not wish to publish the book at all. If you publish the identical debate, I will notify the public of it, and my booksellers also and especially. But furthermore for myself I shall not contract with you. Should you not publish the identical work, I shall also inform my readers of it, and shall have nothing to do with it. I again say I do not believe that you will publish the work, and if you do not on your own responsibility alone, let me know, and I will relieve you from all risk in the affair.

As formerly, yours etc.,

A. CAMPBELL.

Such, kind reader, is the state of the matter between Mr. Campbell and myself. He apparently delayed on purpose, as long as possible, the adjustment of our differences respecting the publication. And after I had agreed to accept the copy-right and publish the work—even after I had notified the public that it would soon be issued, and got my prospectus out, and urged him to a speedy answer, because it was time our printers were at work—he delayed answering my last letter between two and three months, and when he did answer, had the unblushing effrontery to tell me he did not believe I wished to publish it, or would publish it at all, and repeated this insult twice in one short letter!

What will, what can an enlightened public think of the candor, honor and honesty of such a man; or rather of his effrontery and tergiversation? When I quoted from his note on Matt. v. 22, concerning gehenna pending our debate, he complained of my garbling and misrepresenting the note, and requested me to publish and our readers to examine "the whole note taken together." I did soon after publish the whole note and his whole note on aton and requested and repeatedly challenged him to do the same in his paper. He declined to the very last. And when

I demanded as an act of justice to me, and his and my comments thereon, that they should appear with the discussion in our appendix, he utterly refuses assent and virtually declares that such a procedure would be destroying the identity of the work and making another work of it! Notwithstanding the notes were entire and all his own, unaccompanied by any comments of mine! How courageous, how honest, how honorable is that man who dare not meet his own authority, nor face his own productions in print! Who is it that chooses darkness rather than light? Is it the honest or dishonest? He would reluctantly consent to his own notes being appended, if he could be allowed as much space as they occupy in glossing over or attempting to nullify their meaning! Would an honest man require this? The truth is, the notes were written before he engaged in this controversy and undoubtedly expressed the truth and the honest opinions of the man. When he found that they completely refuted all his criticisms in this discussion and established mine, he wished to keep them out of sight and had rather sacrifice both truth and honesty than acknowledge himself vanquished. How much to the honor of this redoubtable champion is it now to tell the public that I designed to "mislead the reader" by appending those notes, which he once asked me to publish, and called himself highly honored by my approval of them!

Again, Mr. C. now complains that I have "affixed notes to one of" his "letters, containing comments and assertions which no honorable man would have presumed to do." As to this matter I am willing both our readers and the whole world should read and judge between us. The whole of my notes do not amount to twenty lines. And to what do they relate? To matters of absolute and palpable untruth contained in Mr. C.'s last letter, to which he well knew (it being the last) I had no opportunity of replying to, or noticing at all in any other way.

In his last letter Mr. C. falsely stated the first and second propositions under discussion, and inserted the third in a mutilated form. Not only so, he stated that I had conceded the truth of the first proposition in his distorted form of it. Although this was absolutely false and Mr. C. knew it, yet when by a brief note I inform the reader it is "an error—I have made no such concession," why, such note is "what no honorable man would have presumed to do"! It was perfectly honorable in Mr. C. to state the propositions falsely and in a garbled and perverted form; but very dishonorable in me to inform our readers of the fact and refer them to the pages where they could detect the error! It was very honorable in him to state falsely that I had conceded his first proposition; but very dishonorable in me to inform our readers that I had made no such concession, and refer them to pages where they would find the falsity of the charge! It was doubtless very honorable in Mr. C. to make the many egregious misstatements contained in his last letter which he knew I was not permitted to answer; but very dishonorable in me to correct them by referring to the discussion itself, letter and paragraph!

Will Mr. C. have the goodness to lay the foregoing correspondence and all these facts before his readers and then let them judge whether or not the work is "unfaithfully published?" If he will we shall feel greatly obliged to him. And moreover, if he is anxious the work should be circulated and read by his friends and thinks I have done him injustice in the brief notes annexed to his last letter, I will supply him or his bookseller in Pittsburgh with a few hundred copies, if he applies soon, and allow him full liberty to occupy as much space as said notes of mine occupy, in correcting their errors if they contain them, and to paste the leaf on which they are printed in the last end of the book. Is not this fair, Mr. C.? If he can in twenty lines or less satisfy the reader that he stated the propositions correctly, and did not misstate facts nor misrepresent me in his last letter, I shall greatly rejoice at his exculpation, and will publish the same to the world. We shall see whether he or his party believe his triumph is complete over Universalism, or whether they are anxious the work should be circulated generally or not. Mr. C. does not pretend but what I have faithfully published all the Discussion from beginning to end, without alteration, diminution or addition, except the annexation of these brief notes of correction to his last.

CIRCULAR

To the Universalist Public.

To most of the readers of the Union and Messenger a statement of many of the circumstances to which I shall allude in this Circular would be unnecessary, as they are already aware of them. But as there are some who have only been readers of the present volume, and as this is designed for a wider circulation than the ordinary issue, and may, therefore, meet the eye of some who will wish to know the why and the wherefore of it, I am necessitated to go over ground familiar in a degree to others. But I will be as brief as possible.

It is known to many that in former years several attempts had been made to sustain a paper, advocating our peculiar doctrines, in this city. The pioneer in that work was the old Gospel Herald, by Br. H. Fitz. Then followed the Olive Branch, and I believe another small work entitled the Dialogical Review, or Instructor. Afterwards the New York Gospel Herald, which was suspended after a few numbers on the third volume, in the spring of 1831.

Subsequent to this I was strongly solicited to remove to New York and revive the Herald, or commence a new paper. And during the summer of 1831, I had frequent interviews with several friends in this city on the subject, which resulted in my final conclusion to embark in the undertaking, and I accordingly left a safe and increasing business in the country, and removed here in the fall of 1831, for the express purpose of commencing the Christian Messenger.

To all of our friends in this city, and many abroad, it is unnecessary to speak of the state of Universalism here, about that time. It was emphatically dead—prostrated in the very dust of the earth—had hardly a name to live. I thought at the time I had weighed all obstacles—had fully counted the cost—but experience has taught me differently. I was sensible of great difficulties in the way, but like thousands of others, I was full of hope—confident in my own ability to shun the rocks on which others had made shipwreck, and having a small capital (some two or three thousand dollars) to start upon, with, I believe tolerable habits of economy, I embarked confidently upon the work. For three years, the business did not sustain its own expenses, aside from any consideration for my attention to it. Such had been the vicissitudes of other papers here, that the Universalist public were slow in reposing confidence in any publication of the kind from New York. But the aspect of affairs was constantly improving, which encouraged me to continue on, and the fourth volume of the Messenger began to yield something of a support over its expense of publication.

Encouraged by the brightening prospects of the establishment, and the general prosperity of business, in the latter part of 1835, arrangements were entered into for a considerable extension of its business, in the book line, etc., and its expenses much enhanced by enlarging the paper, though at the same time its issues were much increased, and provisions were made for what was deemed a suitable additional capital to be brought into the concern. On the strength of this, the book business was much extended in the fall of 1835, and through 1836. But the arrangement for additional capital failing, the whole responsibility of the concern reverted back, as before, on myself individually. My original capital was mostly scattered the first two or three years of the paper—that is, swallowed up in the expenses and changed into out-standing subscriptions which are not exactly available capital to do business upon—and under the new arrangement a large amount of additional debts had been contracted, though the debts due the establishment for books and subscriptions had increased in a corresponding ratio. But the total prostration of business in 1837, and which began to be felt in the latter part of 1836, and the great trouble of collecting from that time forward, will best explain to those concerned or interested, the difficulties under which I have since labored.

In addition, at the close of the fifth volume of the paper, (the first volume of the Union) it was found necessary to discontinue a large number of papers, owing to my inability to incur the expense of sending them out to individuals who had been notified of their indebtedness, and failed to cancel it. And such has been the state of business from that time to the present, that no one could look for an increase of subscription, unless under peculiar circumstances, and few have been able to retain their usual number. Retrenchment has been the order of the day, and periodicals have felt it as much as any one branch of business.

At the commencement of the present volume of the Union and Messenger, I was compelled by my circumstances to adopt an entire new course in regard to its publication, of which previous notice had been given; that is, to send out no paper but such as was expressly ordered under the new published condition—payable in advance or guaranteed by some known subscriber or agent—that I might know my reliance, and whether I could safely proceed with another volume. As was expected, it greatly reduced the circulation of the paper, but I had no alternative. In justice to those I was owing, I could not proceed with the business on the old conditions, and to be continually dunning in its columns, was out of the question altogether. As a final result, the present volume will not much if any more than meet its own expenses, leaving me little or nothing for a close and undivided attention to its business for the whole year, amid many other troubles and trials.

I can not continue thus. Indeed, such has been my accumulated difficulties, from one cause and another, though resulting in a good degree from the state of the times, that I have already been compelled to assign for the benefit of my creditors—not for the want of property and debts sufficient to meet my liabilities, for there is enough, at fair estimates, with my debts, could I collect them, to meet all claims, and still leave a considerable surplus—but because of the large amount of out-standing debts, and the almost utter impossibility of collecting back debts for some time past. The lessened circulation of the paper, also, and the limited sale of books the present year, has increased the difficulties, and left me no other course. And to close my business now, with such an amount of out-standing debts, would be attended with ruinous sacrifice. And this must be done with the present volume, and I be compelled—(after nine years of unremitting attention to its business, with an economy in my home expenditures which I doubt not will satisfy the most scrupulous)—to retire from it, and see all pecuniary benefit of my past labors pass out of my hands, and go for naught, with the capital which I brought in, and which constituted my little all, without some special exertions in my behalf at this particular juncture. If I can have the necessary encouragement on the next (and thus in prospect for succeeding) volumes, to put the paper in a saving condition, there is fair prospect that I may so arrange my affairs, as to retain a hold upon the business, and be able to go on with it under a hope of better times, and in the course of time, succeed in collecting a considerable amount of my out-standing debts, and event ually save the business, and something from the wreck of its present affairs. I feel it incumbent on me to make one effort to this end, ere abandoning all, and throwing myself upon the world again, to begin it anew, at my time of life. I am the more strongly moved to this, on account of those who are dependent upon my exertions. Some it is true are removed to a state where want or vicissitude can not come, yet there are others left, dearer, perhaps, for the very consideration of their lessening number, who have claims upon my protection and support, which can not—must not be disregarded.

Thus circumstanced, I am induced, though with much reluctance, to make this special appeal to the Universalist public for one united and persevering effort to extend the circulation of the "Union and Messenger" on the next volume, whereby I may make such arrangements as will enable me to retain possession of the business, and proceed with it, and be enabled finally to derive whatever benefit may result from the many years hard labor I have devoted to it.

Its main embarrassments are the result of three principal causes—the sacrifices incident to all new undertakings of this kind, and particularly under the circumstances of this; the extraordinary hard times through which it has had to struggle for four years past, and the credit system on subscriptions, which has paralyzed almost every periodical in the country. The first difficulty is now overcome, and the last done away with, and with the hope of a more safe and regular business, as is now generally anticipated, I may confidently expect to recover it from its embarrassments, within a reasonable time, if I can have the necessary encouragement to start anew. But without this, I can not safely make any propositions, and must see it brought to a close.

If, then, the paper has been of any service in our common cause—if I have been faithful at all to the charge which has devolved upon me, shall this appeal be in vain? Will not the more active friends throughout the country make one powerful effort, as a free-will offering in this case?

I ask not to interfere with other, and equally, and perhaps more deserving laborers. But is there not other and ample room for an effectual effort for this temporary aid? Are there not some in almost every vicinity who may be induced to take the paper a year or two for this purpose, till it surmounts some of its difficulties? Are there not many throughout the country who will subscribe under these circumstances, even though they are taking other papers? Can not almost every one of our four or five hundred preachers get a few in their respective vicinities? Can not almost every one of our present subscribers get one—at least, average one each?—and even this latter would probably enable us to proceed.

The necessity of sustaining a paper here can not be questioned. That the Messenger and Union has been of some service in its "day and generation," I hope admits of as little doubt. That it must draw its largest support from abroad, is equally certain. The idea has extensively obtained, that New York, of itself, afforded ample support. But this is a great mistake. I have never received the average cost of my city circulation, after deducting expense of delivery and collecting. In all probability there is not equal ability here, according to numbers, as in the country. And then people are not so remarkable for their reading propensities, in populous places, as in the country, especially religious periodicals. So that I have had to look, and must continue to look abroad for a good share of support, though I hope every one in the city, feeling an interest in it, will not spare exertions. And I should be glad, if the influence that it has exerted thus far entitles it to that favor, to see an early meeting of its friends here in its behalf.

The course, and general character of the paper is known, and unless I am misled by many whom I have been accustomed to esteem, has been generally approved of. May I then, under the existing circumstances, look with confidence to the Universalist public for the desired aid? Whatever effort is made, should be done immediately, that I may arrange, if possible, and give seasonable notice before the close of the volume.

I shall not commence a new volume without the necessary arrangements to complete it.

Let every one then who feels an interest, make the effort in his vicinity without delay, and advise me immediately. They can request their Post Master to send in the names, or write the letter after this manner—"Send Union, (the octavo) or Messenger, (the folio, as the case may be,) on the next volume to," (here insert the names legibly,) and hand it to the Post Master for signature and to forward. They are privileged to do this, and few will refuse. I do not ask a remittance of the subscriptions till I determine to go on with the volume. But as this is a call for substantial and prompt aid, send no names but those who will comply with the terms—payable in advance, or on receipt of first No., unless the name is guaranteed by some known individual or agent. I now simply ask the return of names, present subscribers, as well as new ones, of ALL who will take the next volume on these terms, that I may see what arrangements I can make, what I can depend upon, and whether I can go on with the volume, and so give timely notice thereof.

Trusting that my past labors in the management of this paper have met with a reasonable share of approbation, I look with confidence for indulgence in this special appeal for aid in my present emergency, hoping it may meet with a prompt and favorable consideration, from both preachers and laymen.

PHILO PRICE.
Union and Messenger Office, 130 Fulton-st., New York.

THE APPEAL TO UNIVERSALISTS.

I know not when a heavier cloud fell on my spirits, for months past, than when I read that Br. Price, of the Messenger and Union, had been compelled to assign his property, and appeal to the Universalist public for aid to recover himself out of his pecuniary difficulties. Independent of the friendship always subsisting between us—a friendship increased by uniform acts of courtesy and kindness as publishers, and strengthened by mutual sympathy with each other's similar cares, perplexities and embarrassments; I was compelled most painfully to feel that unless those indebted to us, soon made payment better than they lately have done, and unless our friends procured us more subscribers—good, prompt paying subscribers—we, too, must follow the same course. The number of papers circulated in this large State, embracing so many professed believers in Universalism, is but little more than half as large as it was three years ago. There are thousands who could, and who should take a paper, (and some of them, two papers,) who do not take any. Could their support be obtained, with advance pay, both the papers could be well sustained, and their publishers and editors, live. Add to these, those who now take one paper, and are able to take both, and who might be prevailed on to take one copy of each, and the support for each paper would be as abundant as we could ask.

But, at present, the main difficulty with Br. Price and ourselves, is, that those who owe for former volumes, do not pay up what they owe. Give us the half of what we have earned so hard, and waited for so long, and we shall get along without difficulty; provided our present subscribers will pay promptly in years to come. We know—we have long felt the pressure of the times, which prevents many from paying, and others from subscribing; but is it not easier for each one of these to pay a small sum, than for us to suffer so much anguish and care for the want of a great number of those small sums combined? Nor are we the only sufferers—our creditors—the very cause we advocate, suffers severely for the want of papers which have been withdrawn from circulation, and the inferior quality of periodicals issued under these difficulties.

Friends and Brethren—may we not respectfully appeal to you for a reformation in these particulars? Will you not sustain your papers, and prevent the further sufferings and losses of those who have endeavored to conduct them so as to advance the good cause? The State Convention at its last session passed approbatory and recommendatory resolutions in favor of Br. Price's paper and this—will you not heed their voice by action? I humbly believe that our papers have done much good, and could do much more if we could increase their circulation, and somewhat improve their course—I verily believe each is well worth its subscription price to every family where it is taken and read—and hence my endorsement of Br. Price's appeal in these remarks. Permit me, then, to point out how you may aid us.

1. Let every agent of each paper, collect all that is due in his neighborhood, and remit it immediately to where it is due. If any has not the money, let him borrow it—each one can borrow the small sum, easier than a Publisher can borrow the large sum which those small sums would make. If there is no agent, let each one owing, immediately get the Post Master to send on what he owes—even if it be only a dollar. These many small sums make up our all.

2. Let every subscriber to each paper, who is able to take the other paper also, immediately order the other paper and pay for it in advance. After it has been read by the family, it can be circulated among opposers, and thus do great good. Besides, one paper seldom copies from the other, and both may therefore be read with equal interest and profit.

3. Let every agent and every subscriber to each paper, look around in his neighborhood, and see what liberal Christians take no paper of the kind. Go to them—show them the papers, and the cheapness of each—and you surely can get a number of paying subscribers. What a benefit would result to these new subscribers, to their families, and to the cause at large, if this was faithfully done in every section of our State! In less than six months the circulation of our two papers would be doubled—double information be diffused among the people—double interest be taken in the cause; and Universalism, now retrograding in New York, would advance in all her borders!

Brethren—shall it not be done? It can be done—it should be done—and will not each one of you arise, and do your share of the great and good work?

4. Be sure however, in procuring subscribers, not to load us with a greater burden, by getting mere patrons—we want supporters—those who will pay. And while procuring subscribers collect all you can from all who can pay—and let those who owe, remember that it is but justice we ask—that we have waited long and suffered much on their account, and that every week's delay is inflicting on us more care and anxiety. Let them remember this, and we are sure that no real Universalist—no truly honest man, will refuse to pay immediately the small sum owing to either of the old or new partners of this establishment, or to Br. Price, even if he has to borrow the money from a neighbor to do it with. Let every one imagine himself in Br. Price's or our situation, and realize the importance of his action on the cause at large; and I am persuaded that these united appeals to the honor, justice and generous feelings of our brethren will not be in vain. A. B. GROSH.

N. B. Let our friends and agents who are engaged in the political meetings of the day—those in each party—remember at the various meetings they attend, to find some time to speak to their religious brethren on these matters, and induce them to support the papers engaged in advancing the great cause of God and humanity.

STUDY.

If the existence of mind, with the human species, depended upon the exertions of each individual, we should not see many idle persons, admitting they could in that condition perceive its dignity, importance and office. Such a supposition, I am aware, is preposterous. The nearest such a condition can be approached is to suppose man a mere animal, but endowed with instinctive powers which teach him that there is such a thing as mind—a principle which is capable of originating, of perceiving, of striking out a new path in the onward course of progression, which shall lead him above the everlasting sameness, the intuitive imitation of the brute, to the bold constructions, and creations, and conclusions of intellect, and which shall live forever, with the capacity for progression and expansion. How hard would he struggle—how would he strain every nerve, even to desperation—how would he rush into the strife regardless of the sacrifices he might make, or the obstacles he might encounter—how would threatenings, and intimidations, and discouragements fall upon an ear deaf to all but the voice of thought and of hope, in his efforts to secure that prize, that rich treasure, which is to raise him thus far to the sphere of angels and to the image of God!

And is this treasure less valuable because God has conferred it upon us without our aid? Shall we neglect to polish, and refine, and beautify it, because we have had no hand in its creation, and no agency in our possession of it? Alas! how many in the possession of mighty intellects, the native powers of which are capable of learning, and admiring the lessons of wisdom, and the calls to duty, and the bliss of usefulness, which greet them on every hand, have stupified their powers by mental idleness, and debased their faculties by stooping to unworthy and insipid and useless pursuits, rather than use the necessary exertions to seize the golden privileges before them, like beings hastening to an immortal destiny! Many would like to improve their minds if they were not obliged to encounter the first fatigues of study—the first wearings of unaccustomed application. They have found that effort is necessary to bring the mighty energies of mind into the field which they should occupy, and, despising the fact that the toil of their first exertions will merge into the bliss of habit, they prefer to remain as God has made them, or sink even beneath that condition, regardless of what he has made them for. Give such men ten talents—yea, give them the talents of seraphs, and they will bury them in a napkin, and call their benefactor a “hard master,” for imposing duties upon them in connection with his gifts.

The reader has doubtless read the story of the young man, who, on his leaving the paternal roof for college, was presented with a Bible, with the solemn charge to read it through. The parent had conceived a plan by which to ascertain the studiousness of his son, and at the same time strengthen his moral capacity. But the son locked up his Bible, and gave himself up to the extravagance and indolence of fashionable students. After awhile he became destitute of spending money, and appealed to his father for a new supply. But the old gentleman knew that if he attended to his collegiate studies as he should do, he would find no occasion or opportunity for his spendthrift habits. Besides, he knew that if his son had attended to his private Scripture readings according to instruction, he would have found generous supplies of money which had been deposited occasionally along between the pages of his Bible. So, as often as he appealed to his father for money, he received for an answer the command to study his Bible, but no remittance. All he needed was there, but he knew it not. So men have had the blessing of intellectual existence bestowed upon them, and the field is open before them for its improvement. In giving their mind, the book of Wisdom is placed in their possession, and the voice of God calls upon them to study and reflect and ponder upon its instructions. There may be found the records of experience, philosophy, science, and revelation; and all that man needs, aided by moral principle, is to bend his powers of thought and contemplation to its rich lessons. The treasure is there whether he uses it or not. The fountain from which he is to satisfy his present spiritual wants, is there, whether he has discovered it or not. And though he may complain that he is not qualified for the high offices of humanity—though he may grieve that the enjoyments of an active and cultivated intellect are wanting—though he may pine that he can not meet the same responsibilities which are met by his associates, yet the only answer he gets, is the stern command to study the book of Wisdom—to train and discipline his mind. He will not murmur long after he does this.

The fact is, men must study if they would know what are the capacities, the strength and power of mind. Study—not merely for the sake of variety of employment, and with a disposition to make it as light as they can, but with the determination of gaining something by it, let the cost of labor be what it may. God never gave man a blessing without designing that his improvement of that blessing should increase it and enhance its value; while many which he has conferred upon him are perverted and abused by neglect. This is the case with the mind. Exercise strengthens, and invigorates, and expands the powers, so that every advance we make does but add to its value, and increase its happiness. While on the other hand, neglect depraves and weakens it, until it is almost paralyzed by the errors and vices with which it is surrounded. What blessing does man derive from mind, when its powers are corrupted by apathy, and it sees no temptation strong enough to draw it from its unnatural indolence? Boast as much as we please of our strength of intellect; that mind never existed in man which could not find ample compensation for study, in the advancement which it would enjoy. Boast as much as we please of our natural strength of mind; that mind never was upon mortals so strong that it could not be shamed and disgraced by neglect and mental indolence.

Every man can find time to devote to study. Books are around him in profusion, and if he can not find time in any other way, let him take fifteen minutes every day for reading, and reflect upon that in the workshop, in the field, and at his meals. But he need not be confined to such narrow limits. He can find time enough to heap up gold and silver, and time enough to count it over and over, and time enough to devise means for its preservation. If he can do this, it is a shame to him to say that he can not find time to study. Let him devote a little less time to the accumulation of wealth, be content with once counting, and trust to prudence, honesty, and to God for its preservation, and the time which he will gain thereby, if devoted to mental culture, will give him riches more valuable than all the gold and silver of earth.

Upon the minds of youth the importance of these considerations should be impressed. Early study—early, sober reflection, is easiest identified with the habits of mind, and will surely lead to after usefulness and peace. Let the youth watch the progress, and actions, and enjoyments of the wise in middle age. And where he finds high usefulness, conspicuous excellence, and brilliant talents, enjoying the confidence of community, he will generally find the result of deep if not early study. Let him observe the aged, after their loss of sight and hearing, and see if there are not some among them who rejoice even in the midst of their deprivation. And who are these? They are men who, in their younger days, garnered up, in the storehouse of mind, the rich treasures of study and mental discipline. And now, in their age of helplessness, when the world is gradually closing its scenes upon them, memory furnishes themes of amusement and instruction, and keeps up the holy impetus which has been given to the intellect, even though the body may be hourly descending to the dust.

But while studying to improve the intellect, the moral powers should neither be neglected, nor made secondary to the former. The importance of study is not greater than the importance of what we study. To study how to avoid duty, or how to escape detection in vice, or how to cheat and deceive the unwary, or how gain favor without deserving it, is but to superinduce mental and moral depravity. All this is but the perversion of mind to unholy purposes, and will lay the foundation for disappointment and sorrow. But to study books and ideas with a view to usefulness, to read the lessons upon nature's wide spread chart, to know one's self, to learn the capacities and incapacities, the qualifications and weaknesses, the virtues and deceptions of human nature, and last of all, to ponder upon the word of truth—these are the sources from which the mind is to draw its strength, its usefulness, its glory and its happiness.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CELEBRATION IN AUBURN.

The Sabbath School attached to the Universalist Society in Auburn, held a celebration of the most pleasing and beneficial character, on the 26th of August, in the afternoon. The School numbers fifty scholars, and is moderately flourishing. On the day mentioned, the scholars, with many of the society, repaired in teams to a mineral spring, a few miles from Auburn, where a bower was erected. We then engaged in prayer, singing, and speaking by the scholars. There was next a recess, during which the scholars engaged in mirth and play, such as the observer of childhood loves to see. Next, we all sat down to a table bountifully spread with the good things of this life, of which all partook freely—things provided by the liberality of our friends. After this, we enjoyed a ride, and then parted to our homes, delighted with our excursion, while the scholars were incited to love their Sunday-school more, and to learn their lesson a better.

In concluding this article, I remark, that our Sunday-school has advanced our cause in this place, and our celebration has increased the interest of parents in the school. While the whole institution warrants us in recommending all our societies who are without Sunday-schools, to speedily establish them—for they will find that Sabbath-schools will enlarge their zeal in the cause of truth.

A REQUEST.

To BR. T. CLOWES:

Dear Sir.—Having heard one of your discourses, in which you dwell upon an intermediate state for departed spirits, and which caught my deepest interest—interest, which excited not only my admiration of the doctrine, but increased my desire for more means of examining it thoroughly—I take this method of requesting you to favor us with an essay, or a series of essays on the subject, in the columns of the Magazine. I make this a public request, that it may, should you comply with it, have a public answer; so that our brethren can have access to your views of an intermediate state, as well as myself. Respectfully Yours in truth.

G. W. MONTGOMERY.

P. S. A compliance with the above request by Br. Clowes, would oblige many of our brethren in this section, who differ from the Dr. in opinion on the subject; but who, without wishing any controversy about it, are desirous of reading his opinions for themselves.

POETRY.

[From the New England Magazine.]

A REAL SCENE.

It was a lowly dwelling. Round the room,
The half raised curtain threw a twilight gloom;
Beside a scanty fire, upon her breast,
A mother rocked her infant to its rest:
Coarse was their humble fare and hard their lot—
Yet, mid their keenest wants they murmured not.

In that small room, through each successive day,
In lingering pain, a grey haired woman lay.
Her body worn by toil and ill at ease,
Stricken in years and feeble with disease.

I stood beside her bed. Her quick-drawn breath
Brought to my saddened mind the thought of death—
(If by the name of death we call that strife
Which leads the spirit to Eternal Life.)
I gazed upon her face. Her sunken cheek
The trial told, of which she did not speak:
Trusting by kindness, to give faint relief,
I spake in love and sorrowed for her grief.

"Oh, sir," she said, "how can I speak the praise
Of Him, who so has blessed me all my days,
And, mid the sickness and the wants I've known,
Has taught my heart His holy will to own?"

I stood amazed. What! could the human mind
Remain, amid such bitter pangs, resigned?
Still feel that every grief was sent in love,
And meekly drink the cup, and look above?
Could Christian faith have such stupendous power,
To sooth the mind in such a trying hour?—
I looked upon her pallid face again;
Her parted lips were quivering with pain—
Her cheek was ashy white—her spent frame shook;
Yet there was calmness in her tranquil look—
A leaning upon God—a faith sublime,
That he would aid her in his own good time.

The following resolution was introduced by Br. LeFevre and adopted:

REMARKS. The meeting of this Association was very delightful. The weather was very pleasant and the services of the sanctuary very fully attended. The congregation was attentive and devout. It will be seen from the minutes that an alteration in the Constitution of this Association was resolved upon. This was rendered necessary from several considerations. There has been no alteration since its first adoption, and as it now stands, it would take within its territorial limits that portion which has been since set off for the New-York Association. There are also some articles which clash with the provisions of the New-York State Convention.

It was deemed advisable to bring to the more immediate notice of the clerks of societies the importance of furnishing delegates with letters respecting their condition, which might serve as a valuable record of statistics of the respective societies. The constitution provides for such reports, but as they have been neglected, it was deemed necessary again to invite attention to the subject.

The importance of Sunday schools has of late been felt and appreciated, and attention is now called to the subject. In some country churches, where the population is sparse, it may not be feasible to establish such schools; but wherever it can be done, it is urged upon our societies to pay that care to these "nurseries of the church," which they demand from the friends of our cause.

C. F. LEFEVRE.

DEATHS.

In Brooklyn, Susquehanna county, Pa., Mr. EPHRAIM HOWE, in the 68th year of his age.

Mr. Howe was among the first settlers of Brooklyn—hence has endured toils of which the rising generation have but little experience. But it was his to look forward to a better day. Long has he known by happy experience, the joyful sound of the Gospel, which has been his soul's anchor in life, his support in his long, tedious illness, and his triumph in death. By faith he saw the world redeemed from sin, death and the grave, which he lived but to honor, and died but to evince its saving power.

May the consoling influence of the Gospel be with the widow, children and numerous friends who are called to mourn the loss of a kind husband, faithful father, and good neighbor. A Sermon was preached at his funeral by the writer from 2 Timothy iv: 6, 7, 8.

In Henderson, Jefferson county, on the 6th of July last, Mrs. NANCY STANLEY, consort of Mrs. Jedediah Stanley, aged 65 years. Mrs. S. possessed many excellences of character, rendering her very useful in all the duties of domestic life. She enjoyed the faith of the Gospel of universal grace, the rich consolation of which she greatly needed to sustain her during twelve long years of pain and sickness, which she endured with Christian patience and resignation. Her bereaved companion, children and friends will fondly cherish her memory with the confident hope of meeting her again in that world where death, sorrow and pain shall be unknown.

OCCASIONAL SERMON,

Delivered before the UNITED STATES CONVENTION of Universalists, at Auburn, September 16th, 1840.

BY REV. K. HAVEN, OF SHOREHAM, VT.

In addressing this enlightened and Christian audience, on this truly joyful occasion, it is proper to remark that the position of your speaker is not like that of a pioneer travelling over a new and unfrequented country, where the hills, and valleys, and plains are loaded with the richest fruits and decorated with the most fragrant flowers, which have not before been beheld and tasted by man. Yet the consideration that he is addressing a fraternity to whose moral taste the riches of divine grace are ever sweet and palatable, however frequently participated in, or humble the presenter of them, or uncomely the "vessel" that contains them, shall sustain him, while he attempts to illustrate the Gospel truth that this, too, is the lowly yet truly enviable station of every ambassador of Jesus Christ.

For this purpose he has selected the following portion of divine Scripture as the foundation of the present discourse, to which he solicits your undivided attention.

"But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." 2 Cor. iv: 7.

In amplifying on our subject, we shall not come to you with "excellency of speech," nor "with the enticing words of man's wisdom," being assured in the context, that it is the duty of the ministers of the Gospel to "preach not themselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, and themselves your servants for Jesus' sake." Hence it is their duty to stand behind the throne, and veil themselves in the greater glory and effulgence of the "Sun of righteousness," and while they listen to the "voice from the excellent glory, saying, I have glorified his name on the earth, and I will glorify it again," they should proclaim him, "The only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

We shall not now call your attention to the rise and spread of the distinguishing doctrine of our denomination, in our widely extended domain; nor to the humble condition of those individuals who first proclaimed the Gospel, in all its fulness, on these western shores. Those fathers in our Israel, those humble vessels of mercy, have gone down to the grave, like a shock of corn fully ripe, and we have entered into their labors. Having, therefore, through our well directed ministry, measurably cleared away the rubbish in which errorists had enveloped this "treasure," it becomes us to pause and take a deliberate and elevated view of its divine excellency, and of our humble instrumentality, as earthen vessels, in conveying it to our fellow men, and in transmitting it down to the latest posterity.

I. The nature of "this treasure," and its superior excellency over all other treasures, claim our first attention. The phrase, "this treasure," is not to be confined to any one distinguishing truth of the gospel, to the exclusion of others. It is to be received as a designation of the whole plan of divine grace, "the glorious Gospel of the blessed God." Viewed in this light, it is, in all its celestial assurances, its quickening influences, its spiritual consolations, and its moral requirements, to the Christian, a treasure that is above all price. Such being its divine nature and intrinsic excellency, he can say,

"It is a land of wealth unknown,
Where springs of life arise;

Seeds of immortal bliss are sown,
And glory never dies."

Indeed, to feel its renovating operations, its chastening influences, and its soul-melting and passion-subduing power, is to be furnished with indubitable evidence of its inestimable value. Hence it is, by way of pre-eminence, denominated "the unsearchable riches of Christ." Why? Because it can not be searched out, scanned, weighed or measured, like worldly treasures. No one "can fully comprehend the height, and depth, and length, and breadth of the love of God which passeth all understanding." Other treasures may be exhausted, but this is inexhaustible. The richest mines of Peru, or Golconda, may be excavated, till by the deepening and deepening process, the last particle of shining dust is laid open to human view; but eternity, ETERNITY, would be too short for either men or angels to comprehend the height and depth of "this treasure."

Again—earthly treasures "perish with the using"—the moth doth corrupt them; the rust cankers them, thieves break through and steal them; or, in an unexpected moment, when their possessor thinks he holds them firm, or has permanently secured them, they make to themselves wings and fly away—they are gone—scattered—like chaff before the whirlwind, or stubble before the flame!

Such is the perishable nature of human wealth, whether it consist in gold and silver, houses and lands, splendid edifices and richly adorned palaces, with marble domes, Corinthian columns, and all the appendages, drapery and gewgaws, the offspring of human vanity, pride and glory. When these shall all have perished; when the last monument of human art, and skill, and genius shall have crumbled into dust; the last gem, though as rich as that which dazzled on the bosom of a Cleopatra, or sparkled in the royal diadem of a Cesar, shall have faded away, then this treasure will be as pure, as bright, and as beautiful as ever. Being a treasure which moth can not corrupt, and safely deposited in heaven, where no thieves can break through nor steal, it is emphatically one that is "incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away." Hence it is called "durable riches and righteousness;" and it is for this reason that we are to sell all that we have, and purchase it; to part with "houses and lands, father and mother, brother and sister," every thing however dear to us, and "go and buy this field," this "pearl of great price," whose "merchandise is better than silver, and her treasure than fine gold, and all things that may be desired are not to be compared with it."

Permit me to state that I esteem this treasure to be the whole of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, who denominates himself the bread of God, that cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world. Hence, unlike gold or silver, or precious stones, or pearls, it is a nourishing, life-sustaining, life-imparting treasure. Indeed, it is the "revelation of grace, mercy and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ." It is the un purchased grace of God to sinners, the unsought, unmerited love of God to the world, the death of his dear Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, who by his own blood hath ratified and sealed the testament of God's eternal love and grace, and brought life and immortality to light by his resurrection; and the glorious assurance we have, by all the "great and precious promises" made to the patriarchs, prophets and apostles, that all nations, families and kindred of the earth shall be blest in Christ.

These divine favors, these holy truths constitute the treasure spoken of in our text. And oh, how priceless it is! How precious to sinners! How invaluable to the world whom Jesus came to save! Well might the apostle say, "To you who believe he is precious!" He is precious to every saint, to every believer; and not only to them, but to every sinner, every unbeliever; for he is "the DESIRE of all nations,"—as Dr. Whitley says, "all need him, although they know nothing of him." Hence "the earnest expectation of the creature," (which Clarke says, "we render the creation,") "waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God."

This is the Gospel which Christ's ministers should, or, rather, do preach. It is not of human origin, like the vain religions of the heathen, who "change the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man," and seek to appease his wrath and propitiate his favor by human and brutal sacrifices. Neither is it like the paradise of sensual delights anticipated by the deluded followers of him whose ashes lie immured on the plain of Mecca, dishonored by the pomp and pride of human glory. Nor like the false creeds of men; which are the legitimate offspring of worldly pride, hypocrisy, and partiality, which rob God of his glory, and limit the "riches of his grace," and the operations of his love, to only a part of his intelligent, moral, sinful, dying offspring.

Such, my hearers, is the elevated view we would take of this treasure. And such is the view that every child of Adam must take of it, before he can be brought to love it, to set his heart's best affections on it, to see its perfect adaptation to his moral wants and sinful condition, and to honor it with a holy walk and godly conversation.

Do you, dear brothers and sisters, so receive it? Then we can verily say, To you it is precious. Do not, then, withhold from the world an open and unwavering profession of a belief in it, but let your light shine by glorifying God in your body, and spirit which are his.

We shall now proceed to present several reasons why "this treasure" of universal love and grace is calculated to have these salutary influences on our affections and practices.

1. Because it presents to the mind of the believer a rich feast, a feast of divine knowledge. The mind can no more exist without nutritious aliment, than the body. It craves that which is adapted to its constitution, want and appetite. And it will as surely become diseased and sickly under the opposite of these, as the body will while subsisting on unnutritious or deleterious food. This position is supported by the laws of our moral nature, and by facts. No natural effects of natural laws could be more clearly demonstrated. Hence if man is an intellectual, moral being; if he partakes, in any degree of "the divine nature," that nature must have food suited to its capacities and requirements. This food the Gospel pre-eminently furnishes, and that, too, of the richest kind, and in the most ample degree. It imparts to the mind the knowledge of life and immortality beyond the grave; hence "It brings a better world to view."

If it be "eternal life to know God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent," it is through the Gospel that the mind obtains this knowledge. If the Christian "grows in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ," it is only by drinking deeper and deeper of this divine and unfailing fountain, and by becoming more and more acquainted with its eternal truths and moral excellences.

To know that we all have one Father in heaven; that he is changeless and immortal; that his divine and eternal nature is Love; that his omnipotent power constantly sustains us; that his infinite wisdom guides, guards and defends us; and that his superabundant grace, benignity and mercy crown our lives with the richest blessings, and by the cheering influences of faith and hope, add thereto the glories and beatitudes of eternity—surely such knowledge must fill the soul with unspeakable joy, and engross its warmest affections.

To not only know God here, by being the recipients of his natural bounties, and becoming, in some degree, acquainted with the mysterious ways of his Providence; but to know that we shall, hereafter, see him as he is, infinitely amiable and lovely; that being clothed with immortality, like the angels of God in heaven, we shall tread the fields of light, and pluck ambrosial flowers from the tree of life, fast by the throne of God; that our society will then be that of God and Christ, of angels, saints and glorified spirits innumerable, and that among that blessed throng we shall recognise the objects of our dearest attachments, where we and they shall enjoy a higher, holier, indissoluble union, purified from all the sensualities of earth and forever exempt from all the ravages of pain, sickness, disease and death—these present to the mind, by the eye of faith, a prospect indescribably beautiful and overwhelming, and one, too, that fully meets its moral wants, its yearnings after immortality, and its vast capacity for boundless joy. He that possesses this knowledge is rich, though clothed in rags. He that is deprived of it is "poor indeed," though decorated in the gorgeous trappings of royalty, and swaying an earthly sceptre.

2. The perfect adaptation of the riches of the Gospel to all classes and conditions in life, is another evidence of its salutary, reforming power. It is suited to the rich and poor, the high and the low, the bond and the free. Neither circumstances, changes, sufferings, or disappointments can deprive us of its blessed influences; but its happyfying, sustaining power is most felt in the dark hour of adversity, sorrow and death. These only furnish this treasure by bringing its excellences to be more and more beheld and enjoyed. O, how poor is man without it! How wretched in the hour of dissolving nature! To have no Father to love and trust, in this trying moment; no Saviour on whose soft bosom we may repose our aching head; no home to anticipate beyond the tomb; no re-union with the dearest objects of our hearts' gushing, warmest, best affections—but to behold death as a leap into the dark, an extinguishment of life, light, hope and joy, and all that is beautiful and desirable—surely this is poverty and wretchedness indeed! It is not only natural, but intellectual and moral death. We do therefore affectionately beseech all those who reject the Bible, the Saviour, and a Father in heaven, yea, even their own lives also, to buy this pearl of great price. It will make them rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom.

And we would also entreat all who are under the greater fear of the ceaseless agonies of a death that never dies, to come and take of the waters of life freely, "without money and without price." Leave it to the heathen whom God has not blessed with a revelation from heaven, and whose ignorance he "winked at," or "suffered," leave it to them to pay to senseless idols or imaginary demons the servile homage of slavish fear and selfish adoration, but do not thou, with the Bible in thy hand to "get wisdom," and this priceless treasure before thee, attach to thy Father in heaven a character that robs him of all his essential glories and perfections, while it deprives man, his moral offspring, of every pure motive and elevated incitement to love and obedience.

To some this may appear dogmatical; but we esteem it consistent with the truth of Heaven, right reason, and pure morality. We lay it down as an unquestionable position, that we can not love that which does not appear to us lovely—that is, that has not to our minds some charms or attractions. If it be said, "We can not then love our enemies;" I reply, mercy always has misery for its object, and their condition is such as to attract our attention and excite our sympathy; for we do not love them for their enmity, but because they are human beings, and hence our brethren, and it is this affinity that is still lovely, though enveloped in ruins.

3. I am led, therefore, to remark that the Gospel has the most salutary influences over our affections and practices, because it lays the foundation of moral duty to God, to our neighbors and to ourselves.

Do you ask whether those who know not this Gospel are absolved from all moral duty? We answer, no. They are under obligations just in proportion to the light and knowledge they enjoy. But those who know not or can not appreciate God's love to them, can not love him as we should; for "we love him because he first loved us," "and we know the love which the Father has for us; God is love." Do the heathen know this? Neither can we love our neighbor until we can answer rationally and scripturally the question, "who is my neighbor?" Or until we shall be able to behold in him a brother, a precious rational, (however degraded) being. Neither can we love ourselves, in the sense the Gospel requires, until we have proper views of our high origin, exalted relationship to God, noble intellectual and moral powers, and future immortal destiny—that is, all the incitements to virtue, to noble purposes of soul, to high attainments in mental and moral culture, and to cherished hopes of future good depend much on a proper knowledge of ourselves. Hence all these duties are summed up in the two great commands of the Gospel, viz, the supreme love of the Divinity, and the equal and impartial love of humanity. On these two injunctions, all the moral law, all the Gospel is suspended. Hence there is no act, the performance of which will increase our real happiness, which the Gospel does not enjoin. There is no vice, however specious, which it does not prohibit.

Now, is it the duty of man, imperfect as he is, possessing the light of the Gospel, to obey these commandments? And can it be possible that a holy God can be governed by any other principles? Does he enjoin it on man to overcome evil with good, and can he overcome evil with evil? Does he command us to forgive those who trespass against us, while he will never forgive those who disobey his laws? Does he require us not to let the sun go down upon our wrath, while his wrath will burn throughout an eternal day? Does he forbid us to give place to anger, (assuring us that it rests only in the bosom of fools,) while he will be angry with his moral offspring forever?

He has laid us under all these commands and prohibitions, and can he practically contravene every one of them? No, it were the height of impiety to ask such questions concerning the principles of action and of government of a holy God, did not the unwise teachings of a false theology force them on our notice. True, language is applied to the Deity which is erroneously construed so as to attach these imperfections to him whose government is, and always was, in accordance with the purest parental principles. But shall we, in this day of light and knowledge, when the Gospel, like a lens, is pouring directly on us the beams of infinite grace and love, so apply it? Shall we not rather say that God's anger is his justice, and that this is so exercised as to accord with his mercy, seeing "that to him belongeth mercy, because he rendereth to every man according to his works"? Hence his anger and jealousy are but the fervency of that righteousness, truth and love by which he governs the moral world. It is only by this construction of these terms, that we can avoid attaching infinite imperfection and misery to the Almighty; for as anger (as a passion) in finite beings will always produce finite misery, so in an infinite being it must produce infinite misery. Hence God would be the most miserable being in the universe.

Lastly. The Gospel is not only an unerring guide to the path of every duty here, but it teaches man to appreciate, in some degree, his true dignity and standing in the scale of intellectual existences. He does not contemplate himself as a mere animal that is doomed to sweat and toil, and eat and drink, and sleep and die. No, it shows him that he is a child of God, and a joint heir with Jesus Christ—that though clothed with mortality, he stands on the confines of eternity, "and the next step is spirit." Although to him the objects of earth are beautiful, however fading, because they are the productions of infinite wisdom and goodness, and the love of kindred, and the attraction of friends are strong and indissoluble, still he longs to depart and be with Christ which is far better; for "he seeketh a better country," where the inhabitant shall no more say, I am sick, but pain will be exchanged for pleasure, misery for happiness, death for life, and earth for heaven.

It is then that man's happiness, which is his being's end and aim, will be consummated. And it would seem that then, and then only, will he perfectly answer the end for which he was created, viz, to "glorify God and enjoy him forever." Neither are we to suppose that he has then arrived at a point beyond which advancement is impossible. No, the riches of divine grace and knowledge will be developing themselves throughout a ceaseless eternity. The soul will be drinking deeper and deeper at the intellectual fountain, as it ranges the fields of light, and unceasingly contemplates the glories of their divine Author. And will not its moral advancement be commensurate with its intellectual? Or rather, will not divine knowledge (for it can have no other when it shall see God as he is) produce supreme love, reverence and adoration?

Let no one suppose that, by these views, we set aside the operations of divine grace in the salvation and sanctification of sinners; for it is by the blessed influences of the Gospel that all men are to obtain these. Jesus Christ "will draw all men unto him;" not by physical force, contrary to their volitions and inclinations, but through the instrumentality of moral means. These are the teachings of the Gospel, the influences of the Holy Spirit, and the manifestations of the infinite love of God to the world. The last of these possesses a blessed constraining power. "The love of Christ constrains us." "We love God, because he first loved us." Like the fabled golden chain of Jupiter which he let down from heaven, and "winding it round the huge Olympian, lifted the earth and its inhabitants to himself," so the chain of divine love, which reaches from heaven to earth, and winds around the eternal throne will draw the moral world from the depths of human woe, wretchedness and guilt to heaven, where, through its regenerating influences, all men will be sanctified, redeemed and restored, and the Son become subject to him who did put all things under him, and God be all in all.

II. We now pass to a consideration of the medium through which God has seen fit to convey this treasure to mankind. This is through the instrumentality of human agency. The agents thus employed are denominated "earthen vessels." There is a peculiar fitness in the figure of earthen vessels, to represent the fragile nature and humble condition of the apostles, and all succeeding ministers of the Gospel. These vessels are not of gold, or silver, or the finest porcelain; but earthen, that is, they are manufactured of earth or clay. These vessels are esteemed of less value, from the fact that the materials are found in every part of the globe.

Let us now notice the adaptation of this figure to men. First, an earthen vessel is one that is made of earth. So "man is of the earth, earthy." He was "formed of the dust of the ground," or of matter. Second, an earthen vessel is perishable. It is not only liable to be dashed to pieces by unforeseen accidents, but it certainly must perish with the using. So man is exposed to instant death in a thousand unforeseen ways; and should he escape all accidents, such is the construction of the material system, that it must decay and die. Hence it is emphatically denominated mortal. "For this mortal must put on immortality." Hence the apostles "always bore about in their bodies the dying of the Lord Jesus," (who was also mortal), "that Christ might reign in their mortal body." They were "always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake." Thirdly, earthen vessels are devoted to the most common uses. This is owing to their cheapness, which enables all to obtain and use them. Hence they are called vessels of dishonor. But this is not the case with golden vessels; they can only be possessed by those who are rich in this world's goods. In like manner, the Gospel is designed for the poor as well as the rich; yea, for all classes and conditions in life. And this stamps on it the impress of divinity. It shows that it is not of human origin; that it was "not received of man;" neither was it taught "but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." Such being its nature and object, it was peculiarly befitting that it should be committed to poor, obscure fishermen who had no worldly wealth or power to give a false consequence to their religion, or to recommend them to the notice and favor of their fellow-men. Doubtless from their obscure origin, their lowly condition, their humble appearance, and the impartiality and apparent cheapness of the religion they inculcated, the people were ready to exclaim, as they did of their Master, the despised Nazarene, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Such, my friends, are the agents whom Jesus commissioned to "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." Such the weak and fragile vessels in which are repositied its spiritual and immortal treasures. These men were sent forth two by two, like sheep among wolves, with no carnal weapons of defence girded on them; no sword, no purse, no scrip; no wealth, no popularity, or worldly power to sustain them; yet they were sustained by God, in their ministry, and lived to see the standard of the cross planted in all the then known world.

By this we see fully verified the last declaration in our text, viz., "that the excellency of the power is of God, and not of man." Here its divinity shines forth in its unclouded lustre, in its omnipotent power. As the plainness of the casket only serves to add lustre and beauty to the jewel it contains, so the weakness and frailty of man, only increases the apparent richness and potency of this treasure. It also prevents them from worshipping and admiring the vessel instead of the treasure it contains. So, if God had committed it to immortal, sinless beings, it would have been shorn of its chief glory and efficiency. They could never address mankind as fellow-sinners, fellow-sufferers, fellow-prisoners of hope. They could not groan with the whole creation, for a deliverance from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. And there would be something manifestly incongruous with the condition of an ambassador of Jesus Christ, in their preaching in earthly temples, in the open fields, in the market places, and "from house to house;" or in their visiting the sick and the dying, and pouring the balm of consolation into the bosom of sorrowing friends. These kind and holy offices must be performed by those who have a community of feeling and of interest with those who stand in need of them; who can weep with those that weep, and rejoice with those that rejoice. Again; there could not be that constraining love and attraction, in the mission of angels travelling over the world to preach the Gospel, that there would be in men of like passions and frailties. To the former, the calumny, hatred and persecution of a wicked world would be perfectly harmless. The scoffs of the opposers of God's truth; the cold heartedness of professed friends, and the open hatred of enemies, could not reach them; neither could they die "for Jesus' sake." All these things the apostles endured; and all these things "the Great High Priest of our profession" endured, who was himself made perfect through suffering. And these sufferings and persecutions have been, more or less, the lot of all the ministers of God's truth, down to the present time.

Now it is from these attendant circumstances, that the apostle compares the ministers of Christ to earthen vessels. If they were golden vessels, men might pay them that homage that is due to God alone. If they were angels or archangels, men would be filled with fear at their presence, like the shepherds on Bethlehem's plains, or be induced to exclaim, "Behold the gods have come down unto us in the likeness of men."

FINALLY; the crowning excellence of this Gospel is, that it is "of God," that is, all of grace. It is the free gift of Heaven to man. Therefore the vessel that contains it and conveys it to others, could no more claim to be its author and bestower, than the prism that receives the rays of light could claim to be the sun.

Now it is the duty of the minister of Christ to preach his Gospel in its fulness. In doing this, he will never preach himself as the Saviour, but Christ Jesus the Lord. He will never preach his own affections for men, or love for human souls, (however ardent they may be,) as paramount to the love of God for them. He will never preach to please the ear, or the fancy of his hearers, or to gain the wealth, honor or applause of the world; but his great object will be to make his fellow-beings wiser, and better, and happier, by preaching unto them the unsearchable riches of Christ. Instead of being "conformed to this world," to its spirit, its errors, and its practices, his chief object will be to inculcate the spirit of love; to disseminate the light of divine truth, and to reform his fellow men. And instead of striving to be greatest in the kingdom of heaven, he will be emulous only to serve his Master faithfully, in whatever station he may assign him in his vineyard. In fine, he will determine to know nothing among men save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

To such men, and to such only, has Christ committed this treasure. And O how solemn, how responsible is the office which they hold as stewards in the kingdom of their Master! We read, "It is required of stewards that they be found faithful." Mention also is once made in the Scriptures, of "the Lord's treasury." Now the treasury is the depository of the treasure of the nation, or of the ruler, whether it consist in gold or silver coin, or in bills, notes, or drafts, or other materials. Hence there must be a treasury for God's treasure. This treasury is the earthen vessels alluded to in our text. Christ's ministers are the receivers, keepers and disbursers of this treasure. It is their duty to be faithful in applying it according to the declared will and purpose of the owner, whose will is that "all men shall be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth," and consequently equally share its blessings; and whose purpose is to gather together, in one, all things in Christ.

Brethren in the ministry of reconciliation, the ground on which you stand is holy. Your position is one that awakens a thousand thrilling emotions and interests. To be the bearers of these heavenly gifts to mortal man, is an employment which angels might desire. Yet when we think of the magnitude of the blessings designed to be conveyed; the responsibility devolving on those whose duty it is to expound the "lively oracles;" the nature and importance of the instructions they impart, and the influence of their example; when we reflect that these will tell on the records of time, to the latest posterity, and, if we recognise the past, on the records of eternity, we are led to exclaim, Who is sufficient for these things? You have, however, much to strengthen your hands and encourage your hearts. God has prospered, in a high degree, your labors in promulgating what you sincerely believe to be the truths of Heaven, the divine riches of the Gospel. Millions have been brought to a saving knowledge of it, and thousands are anxiously inquiring the way to Zion. It will be your duty and joy to lead them there, and while you break to them the bread of life and present to them the waters of salvation, you will "send none away empty?"

For encouragement in the Christian cause, we refer you to the primitive apostles. They had the world, with all its pride, fashion, wealth and power, to oppose them, yet by their zeal in the cause of truth, their love of the religion of their Master, their devotedness to the welfare of their fellow men, their spotless life and character, and their Christian fellowship and brotherly love, they were enabled to see the Gospel so rapidly spreading, that, in three centuries, it changed the religion of the most powerful and extensive empire on earth, and millions were brought to rejoice in its divine truths. Indeed, so astonishing was its progress, that its goings forth were "like the morning," even like the sun travelling in the greatness of his strength. And why shall not similar means produce similar effects in the present age? What hindereth you my brethren, from going on to prosper, until under your labors, and those of kindred minds in other lands, the world shall be redeemed from mental and moral slavery, and, through the sanctifying influences of the Gospel, illuminated with the light of life, truth, peace and love?

Three things are essential in obtaining "a consummation so devoutly to be wished." These are, first, unblemished moral character. "Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord." Or, as vessels, "present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." Secondly, union in feeling and in action. Without these no cause, however good, can prosper. Remember then that "union is strength," and be careful to "let brotherly love continue." And thirdly, zeal and perseverance in the cause of your Master. Eternal vigilance is no less the price of spiritual than of civil liberty. With the possession and practice of all these, you can not fail of seeing the cause which you ardently love, going rapidly onward, for the future, as in the past, until the riches of free grace are enjoyed by a regenerated world. Amen.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XXXIX.

Acts xx: 28. "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood."

This passage of scripture demands particular notice and candid examination. I shall therefore throw all the light on it that lays in my power, after having consulted the best commentators on this difficult passage; difficult as we have it in our common version.

The passage is variously rendered in the ancient manuscripts, and by different translators. The authors of the Improved Version, and Kneeland, and Priestly, render the passage thus, "Feed the church of the Lord which he hath purchased with his own blood." And in a note the authors of the Imp. Version say, "The received text says, 'God,' upon the authority of no manuscript of note or value, nor of any version but the modern copies of the Vulgate. The Ethiopic uses an ambiguous expression, but this version is avowedly corrupt. See Marsh's Michaelis, volume 2, page 96. The word Lord is supported by all the most ancient and valuable manuscripts, whether of the Alexandrian, or the Western edition, by the Coptic, Syriac, and other ancient versions, and by citations from the early ecclesiastical writers. See Griesbach's excellent note on this text in his second edition. The expression, blood of God, is not quoted by the earliest ecclesiastical writers, and is rejected with horror by Athanasius as an invention of the Arians." Dr. Priestly supports the above in the following words, "In the best manuscripts it is the 'church of the Lord,' that is of Christ; and the Syriac version has it, 'the church of Christ.'" Again he says, "The best manuscripts and the oldest versions have a different expression from that in the common version, and therefore our translation ought to have been different from what it is." Wakefield, however, a very learned divine, translates the passage thus, "Take care to tend the church of God which he gained for himself by his own Son." This, it will be perceived, does not vary materially from the Improved Version. Instead of "church of the Lord," he renders it "church of God," and this he does on the authority of the Ethiopic version, and taking into consideration the variation of the Syriac and Coptic versions, the former of which has it, "church of the Messiah," and the latter "church of the Lord." Either of these translations probably comes nearer the sense of the original than our common version.

Let us now consider what is meant by redeeming, gaining, or purchasing the church, by his own blood, if spoken of Christ, or "his own Son" if spoken of God—for surely it will not be contended that God spilt his blood to redeem mankind, in a literal sense at all events. God is often said in a figurative way to redeem or purchase us to himself by the death of his Son. But be it remembered, we are no where said to be redeemed from the wrath of God, or the just punishment of our sins, but from sin itself. "He shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins," not from punishment only as we are saved from meriting it—not from endless misery in a future state of existence, for no such salvation is mentioned in the Bible. God sent his Son into the world to recover men from a state of sin and wickedness, and this his Son does by his Gospel which he confirmed by his death and resurrection, and sealed with his own blood. And Christ is said to redeem us from all iniquity, and to wash us from our sins in his own blood, because he gave up his life in the undertaking. But that God can give his blood, which our translation implies, is impossible.

The word here rendered "overseers," is the same that is elsewhere rendered Bishop, which shows plainly that at this time, as there were several of them, there was no one person to whom the care or government of the church was committed; but that like the Jewish synagogues, the business was conducted by a number of persons called elders, as these overseers or bishops of the church of Ephesus are here called. Now mark the singular gradation to Popery.

In process of time, one of these elders or bishops, had first a nominal, and then a real pre-eminence over the rest; in consequence he alone had the title of bishop, while the rest retained that of elders only. This change from the primitive custom went on till the bishops of particular churches, or congregations, became what are called diocesan bishops, having an extensive authority, both spiritual and temporal, over other churches; and finally one of them, viz, the bishop of Rome obtained dominion over the whole Christian world.

ESSAY ON WAR. NO. XIX.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"And he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plough shares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine, and under his figtree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it."—MICAH iv: 3, 4.

How refreshing and encouraging is such a declaration in view of the desolations of war throughout the earth. The day of aggression and retaliation will certainly come to an end. But what can be done to bring on this bright and beautiful period? "It seems," says an amiable writer, who appears to have drank deeply at the fountain of truth and love, "it seems from the very nature of the case that the principal of non-resistance, based upon emotions of true and heartfelt love, must be the forerunner, the attendant and the grand security of that blessed state of the world." To hasten the time spoken of in our motto, we must show that peace principles are not only safe but in accordance with the word of God. In a warlike age, a peaceful man came and dwelt with a people trained to constant warfare. Degraded, ignorant, and fierce they were; but this unarmed man, relying on the protection of God, dwelt with these people secure and honored. None rose up against him. Even while the North and the South re-echoed to the bloody war whoop and the groans of the tortured white man, William Penn lived in peace and safety.

We must also enforce with power, the precepts of Jesus, such as "Love your enemies, bless those that curse you," etc. It must be shown that the laws of his kingdom are binding on nations as well as individuals, that if it be right for men in a collected capacity to fight, that it is right for individuals, and then duelling and private quarrels of all descriptions are right!

Another duty enjoined upon us, is to be willing to suffer and die ourselves, and not make others suffer and die for us. Such was the example set us by the great Saviour upon the cross. If we follow not him, then we are not Christians. If our blessed Saviour died for us, then we certainly ought to be willing to die for him or for his cause.

In the next place, we must disapprove all celebrations of victories. It is but celebrating evil or deeds of human slaughter. "Suppose," says one, "that the injustice of my neighbor had occasioned a sanguinary quarrel between him and me, which terminated to the advantage of myself and my family—my neighbor, however, was not killed, but one of his sons: would it not be unchristian, inhuman, and barbarous in me and sons publicly to celebrate my bloody feats by which calamity was brought on my neighbor and his family? If so, what ought we to think of the custom of celebrating the victories or feats of public wars? This custom, surely, must have been derived from savages, and to savages it should be confined.

It must be shown that men do not die for their country when they die in battle. "Of those who fall in battle," says Dymond, "is there one in a hundred who even thinks of his country's good? He thinks, perhaps, of its glory, and of the honor of his regiment, but for his country's advantage or welfare he has no care and no thought. He fights because fighting is a matter of course to a soldier, or because his personal reputation is at stake, or because he is compelled to fight.*** He fights in battle as a horse draws in a carriage, because he is compelled to do it, or because he has done it before; but he seldom thinks more of his country's good than the same horse if he were carrying corn to a granary would think he was providing for the comforts of his master."*

In conclusion. I have now finished all I have to say, upon the subject of Peace unless I should be requested to resume my labor again. I hope the reader who has followed me in my arguments and illustrations will weigh the whole matter candidly, and come to right conclusions. The cause which I have been permitted to advocate in this paper (and thanks to the conductors for their liberality and independence) lies near to my heart. I have done what I could. I am aware my arguments have often been imperfectly stated, and feebly illustrated, but this was greatly owing to the limits to which I have been confined. In drawing my series of essays to a close, there is one thought that gives me great consolation, and that is that wars will ultimately cease. But then, I feel that Christians ought to be actively engaged in hastening the period so luminously presented in prophecy. Let us all then labor in this great work, and at last the period will arrive when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. Amen and amen.

AFFAIRS IN PITTSBURG.

BR. GROSH—I am now "cast down 'mid fire and smoke;" not the fire of brimstone nor the smoke of torment, but something which bears so striking a resemblance to that imaginary place of which we have heard so much, that one is almost convinced of its reality! I am now in Pittsburg. The "blackness of darkness is round about me," and it is emphatically true that this city verifies a portion of the Scripture—for we have "a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night," and here too, the smoke ascendeth up forever and ever, both day and night! By the constant falling of smoke dust, which arises from the burning of stone coal, everything is made to wear the shade of darkness; a fit emblem of the religious state of society in the city. The majority of the people here possess a religion as black as Pittsburg, which destroys the light of truth, darkens the understanding, throws a gloom over the mind, and presents nothing but—

"Eternal plagues—and heavy chains,
Tormenting racks, and fiery coals,
And darts to inflict immortal pains,
Dipped in the blood of damned souls," for their contemplation. A fine place is Pittsburg in which to make converts to popular religion!

I commenced my labors with the Universalist church in this city on last Sabbath. The meeting was very well attended in the morning, and in the evening there were many more "who came out for to see"—perhaps—"a reed shaken by the wind." There are quite a number here, like Nicodemus, who will go after dark to learn of the Saviour, and I am glad that there are such, for it denotes a spirit of inquiry, and they will soon be enabled to "put a candle upon the stand," that it may give light to those who are in the room, or in the same church with themselves.

It is far better to come in the night, than not to come at all, and I think that those who can leave their own church and go to hear Universalism, even though shaded from public view by the mantle of night, should be commended for their courage. It would be well for Universalists to think of these things, and not speak disrespectfully of this class, for some of our most zealous friends were once Nicodemuses!

I must confess that I found our cause in this city in not altogether so flourishing a state as I had anticipated. The society here for nearly three years past has been worse than destitute of preaching. The preaching which they have enjoyed has been very irregular. After Br. Davis left, they were without meetings for one year—thereby affording an opportunity for the friends to become scattered, and for the wolves to enter the fold and make captives of the sheep. Then Br. Andrews came and remained only a few months, for just as he had succeeded in waking the church out of its first sleep, and had collected a large congregation; when the circumstances of the society were prosperous, when the friends began to revive in the spirit, and to put forth their strength, and every thing around them was cheering; when the state of inquiry and public feeling foretold the prosperity of Zion, then, he bid adieu to the friends and left the city. And hence, the church were compelled to struggle with the agonies of the “second death.” The car of opposition was rolled on them still more heavily—some were disheartened and discouraged, and others were “filled with hope when nearest to despair.” As a necessary consequence, the majority of the society became rather cold, indifferent and lifeless.

But, however, on arriving in the city I was met with cordiality, and we have now, again, raised the standard of Truth, and our friends are rallying under the banner of Love, determined to press with vigor on, until they have permanently established Universalism in Pittsburg, where Truth had for a season fallen in the street, and equity could not enter. The opposition with which we are necessitated to contend is strong and bigoted—there seems to be a united and simultaneous movement on the part of the Orthodox churches to oppose the cause of God—they will resort to almost anything to effect that purpose, even to the tearing down of handbills by which we notify the public of our meetings—but vain are all the endeavors of man when directed against the arm of Omnipotence!

We consider that the prospect is now favorable for the permanent establishment of Universalism in this city. Our friends seem to be actuated by the right spirit, and have taken hold of the work with zeal and energy. We are firmly persuaded that God is for us, and that nothing, therefore, can be against us; and as “truth is mighty and must prevail,” we might anticipate the day when the morally lame, shall walk—the religiously blind shall see—and the intellectually dumb shall speak; when true religion shall take up its abode in the hearts of men, and Peace shall wave her bright banner over the wide world; when “truth shall spring out of the earth, and righteousness look down from heaven”—when all shall acknowledge with adoring gratitude that God is a universal Father—man a universal brother, and heaven a universal home.

REFLECTIONS.

It has been beautifully remarked by some writer, that every thing in nature bears the impress, “passing away.” At no time is this sentiment more forcibly impressed upon us, than at the present. Nature but a little while since was decked in all the loveliness of spring and summer. The earth was robed in green and a thousand variegated colors; the little rivulet danced gaily along to its ocean bed, and flowers, bright and beautiful flowers, those silent ministers of heaven, bloomed all around in rich profusion. All nature seemed to join in one grand te deum to the great Author of the universe! And now what a change! Nature is now robed with the greyness of age. In place of the soft flowing rivulet, rushes the deep toned torrent on to the mighty ocean, passing away to its resting place.

And thus it is with man. All are passing away. The young heart feeds on nought but the ideality of future happiness. Every cloud wears a golden hue, which is lost in the dazzling brightness of happy anticipations. And oh! how many are destined to be disappointed in their ethereal imaginations. Look at the young bride. Witness the joyous brightness of her eye, and that look of confiding affection as she pledges herself forever to the loved one at her side. She dreams of nought but happiness. She has become a mother, and oh! how her bosom swells with intense affection, as she presses the sweet cherub to her heart. But the destroyer has come, and has taken the sweet rosebud from her bosom. “Passing away,” was written on its innocent and lovely face. But this is not all. Her husband—he on whom she leaned with that confiding affection which every wife knows, he to whom she gave her heart’s holiest and best affections, is taken from her “by death’s resistless hand.” Oh! is not her cup of woe full? Where will she find balm for her wounded spirit? Will she sink beneath this accumulated load of grief, or will she fly to the creeds of men for the healing balm in this sad hour? Oh! no; she will look with an eye of faith through opening vistas into heaven, and there behold the loved objects of her heart, happy in the smiles of her Redeemer. There surrounded with the bright and glowing radiance which emanates from the throne of the Eternal, is the husband and the bud of their early love. Will she wish to call them back to the changing world, where all are passing away? No, for she sees not the blighting change there. The deep and lofty toned strings of the seraph lyres, re-echo through the cerulean domes of the house of many mansions. She longs to join them in the spirit land, where there is no passing away. How important then, that we should seek to place our affections on things eternal and that fade not away.

MORALITY OF THE YOUNG.

I seldom see a grossly immoral young man, but what I feel a disposition to weep. It brings to mind the fond hopes of community, the anxious expectations of parents, brothers and sisters, all blasted in the blight and desolation which he has gathered around him—blasted did I say? yea, worse—mocked by his ingratitude, tantalized by his recklessness, insulted by his high handed daring! Only think of the bitter moments, and hours, and days, which such a character imposes upon those who look to him for comfort; of the scalding tears of the mother when she hears that he is away amid scenes of revel and shame; of the ashy paleness of the sister, who has clung to him like the tender vine to the unbending oak, even long after the death blast has chilled the heart; of the deep anguish which throbs the bosom of the wife when she follows him with her aching memory, an unreformed besotted inebriate as he is, and then tell me if the young man should not begin early, and sternly, and resolutely, to lay the foundation, and build the superstructure of moral character.

This is an extreme case, and it may be said that it is too highly drawn to be of extensive application. It may be. Would to God it was not as applicable as it is. Let the young man who tampers with small misdemeanors, remember that the same excuse which he uses answers for more bold offenders, and that if he would escape the extreme, his surest way is not to tolerate, or countenance, or indulge in the beginning.

To whom must we look for the defenders and supporters of the institutions of this country, but to the young men? And yet these institutions can not abide the shock of depravity—can not live where virtue and morality does not. Leaving, then, the extremely immoral out of the question, shall we look for the perpetuation of our laws and our liberties to those who merely neglect to cultivate moral character? Suppose that here is a large number of young men, not infamous, but mere epicureans in character—given up to the gratification of the passions, as far as they can do so without open and shameless violation of social order. They will not steal nor rob, but they dislike the necessity of industrious habits. They will not get drunk, but they have no objections to associating with, and considering as rather “funny,” those who do—perhaps they will even offer the cup to their lips. They will not cheat, nor counterfeit, though they think it no harm to make a bargain out of a broken winded horse, or get rid of a spurious half dollar. They dislike to be called brawlers, yet they hesitate not to become the secret authors of scandal, or of insinuations, which will produce a brawl, or lay the foundation for future disorder where peace would have prevailed had it not been for them. And is it safe to trust the preservation of our laws to such men? All just laws and institutions are founded upon moral principle; and who does not know that he will dishonor laws which are based upon principles that he tramples upon every day of his life? Every young man who loves his country, will strive to preserve his moral character inviolate. And—yes—I must say it—every man who professes this love, and does not thus strive, is a defamer of his pretended integrity, and the truth is not in him!

And again. God has made the youthful mind tenderly susceptible of impressions, as if it was the design of divine Providence that he should begin early to lay the foundation for future excellence and usefulness.—To guard against necessary evil resulting from this arrangement of human nature, God has given him a native love for the good, and surrounded him with innumerable tokens of infinite goodness. The young man reads, and studies, and imbibes principles, from this very impulse of his nature to early impressions. Without some guidance in the way of righteousness, he would inevitably sieze upon some evil. But this guidance he has. Appealing directly to his judgment are the works of Heaven, declaring that God is good unto all and his tender mercies over all his works; the testimony of Holy Writ, that God will not look upon sin with the least degree of allowance; and the wise regulation which gives great peace to those who love the law of the Most High. Here are all the powers of guidance which are necessary to lead the tender mind in the proper direction. Here are the laws of God, in accordance with which, all the blessings which he enjoys are bestowed upon him; and it is a part of the laws of the same wise Being, which establish his happiness only as they succeed in establishing his moral purity. Shall he then receive the blessing of one part of these laws and refuse his allegiance to the other? No, he is bound to respect those instructions, and influences, and regulations in the divine government which provide for his happiness. How shall he do this? By striving with all his heart to become pure, as these regulations and instructions, and the source whence they originate, require. And I say again—he who professes thus to respect the principle, and does not thus strive for the perfection, detracts from the reputation which he should maintain—the truth is not in him!

Yet again. Man may struggle as much as he pleases, he can not be happy in any capacity unless his soul is exalted and elevated by active moral principle. Without this he can not enjoy the physical blessings which God has placed around him, because he is engaged in abusing them. He can not enjoy the promises and word of God because he has perverted them; and if he has not done this, they place the seal of condemnation upon his actions and desires. And it is equally clear that he can be happy with this, though he fails to excel in every thing else. Let him be capacitated only for a low station in life; let him have little or no talent as a literary or scientific man; let his name be known only to a few, and to those only as an unassuming and undistinguished one, and be associated with strict integrity, and he will occupy a station, and exert an influence for good which will be felt, when the proudest and most brilliant intellect, without morality, will blush at its own vain aspirations. These facts are felt and acknowledged by universal humanity. And especially is it so with reference to the young, whose minds are open to receive the impress of their future character. Hence parents, and brothers, and sisters, and friends feel a deep interest in every step which the young man makes on his entrance into manhood. They watch the deviations, and sinuous wanderings, and immoralities of the more advanced in abandonment, until with aching eyes they are compelled to turn to the young for some redeeming quality with which to comfort themselves. And they feel that they have a right to expect and demand that he step discreetly, and circumspectly, and to withhold their approbation and confidence until he does so. Are these feelings consistent and praiseworthy? Will the young respect them? If so, they will not profess without cultivating strict morality. Reader, these remarks are simple, and unadorned by aught but solemn truth, but they will do you no hurt if you reflect upon them often—may they do you good in the inner man. A. R. B.

THE ENHANCED PRICE.

Some of our subscribers feel unpleasantly toward us, for demanding two dollars and a half, when payment has not been made within the year—or two dollars, when payment has not been made in advance—and complain of the hardship, if they do not discontinue the paper. We feel very much to regret that they should feel thus about it—especially as we have stated to them, over and over again, that it is not our interest, nor our choice, to have payments delayed—that we prefer the advance price, within the four months, to the enhanced price afterwards. If the subscriber has the choice of time, it is but fair that we should have the choice of price, according to our published terms. We are now collecting in our accounts at an expense which nearly swallows up the difference between the enhanced price and the advance price; while the loss we have sustained by delay in payment, more than sweeps away the balance. Add to this, the losses we have experienced in consequence of giving credit, according to our terms, and every one must see, at once, that we are much worse off, than if every subscriber had paid in advance.

Why, then, the complaints? We compel no subscriber to delay his payment till the addition to the advance price is incurred—on the contrary, we beg and entreat every one to pay in advance. Each subscriber knows the terms—each one has been solemnly assured, over and over again, that we must and will enforce those terms in all ordinary cases—and if any one prefers to delay after that, he does it, knowing the price of the delay, and should not grumble at being held to his bargain—especially when we are not gainers, but losers, by the delay of so many of our subscribers.

"But," says one, "why not bring your paper to the cash plan at once, and so end subscribers' complaints and your losses together?" Our reasons are these.—People have been accustomed to credit on papers so long, that the habit can not be changed at once. To adopt the cash plan at once, would be to cut off thousands of responsible subscribers, and so lessen our list that it would be doubtful whether we ever could pay what we owe Br. Skinner for the establishment—yes, even so that we might not be able to continue the paper at all. This consideration alone, prevented us from going into the plan which Br. Price did—and very probably it saved us (for a time, at least) from being compelled to make an assignment as he has been compelled to do.

Another reason—we hope, by rigidly enforcing our terms, to induce our subscribers to adopt the cash plan in dealing with us, and so save us from the necessity of our first adopting it toward them. People do not like to be driven into new measures—and we have no desire to drive them. But if we can get people to see that it is their interest (as well as ours) to pay in advance, we have no doubt that they will, nearly all, come into the measure, of their own accord. Now, how shall we persuade our subscribers that it is their interest to pay in advance? We know but one way—and that is, by rigidly adhering to the terms of the paper—the very terms on which each one who takes it, agrees to pay for it. And this, above all other considerations, induces us to be so firm in demanding the enhanced price from all who, by the terms, owe it to us.

I have said that this course will induce nearly all, ultimately to pay in advance for their papers. Some there are, who prefer to pay more, out of good will to the publishers, or because they deem the paper worth more, or because the delay is worth more to them than the difference in money. As to irresponsible subscribers, (of which class we fear there are yet some on our list, notwithstanding our care to strike them off during the past year,) we shall cut them off as fast as we find them out—and we hope our agents and friends will aid us by letting us know who they are, and by never sending us any more such. These are our plans—these our views and determinations—and these our reasons for adhering to, and insisting on, our terms. A. B. G.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"The Rose of Sharon: A Religious Souvenir, for 1841. Edited by Miss Sarah C. Edgerton. Boston: A. Tompkins and B. B. Mussey." pp. 304, 12mo.—4 engravings—bound in embossed morocco, with gilt edges—retail price, $2.00 per copy.

I have not had time to peruse the entire work here named, and not wishing to delay any longer a notice thereof, I will only say, in few words, that its general appearance and binding is better than last year's volume—that the New World, the New Yorker, and other newspapers, speak of it in very flattering terms, some even declaring it superior to any annual that has yet made its appearance. Miss Edgerton is the principal contributor; Mrs. Scott has furnished four articles, some of them of great merit; Mrs. Broughton, four; Br. Chapin, two; Mrs. Sawyer, three—one tale, very good; and so on. Horace Greely, Esq., appears as a new contributor, in a good, but too brief, sketch of Mrs. Hemans. The other contributors are old acquaintances, except "Fanny," who makes her "first appearance" here. The article by the writer, reads better in the Rose, than it did in manuscript as he read it with neck and shoulders aching with rheumatism, just after writing it—he then hoped it would be rejected—it must have had a "narrow escape"!

The Rose deserves to be well patronized—even better than last year—and we heartily and sincerely recommend all our readers who can procure a copy, to do so immediately. A cheaper, better, handsomer, or more appropriate present to a parent, brother, sister, child, or other dear friend, no Universalist need desire—for though not controversial or argumentative, it breathes the full soul of grace, affection and beauty inspired by the faith, hope and charity of Universalism.

"A Discourse on the Second Death. By Edmund Pray." pp. 170, 18mo.

At the request of the Author, who, I am informed by a ministering brother acquainted with him, is a man of good moral character, I have hastily perused this little work. Its exposition of the second death, is undoubtedly correct, and the work is calculated to do much good wherever circulated and read. True, there are some things in it, in which I should not agree with the author, and others which I do not profess to understand, and have not time to inquire into; but on the whole, the main subject is, in my opinion, correctly explained. His general expositions of the book of Revelations, are probably as good and may be more correct, than those given by others who are fond of revelling among the mysteries of the Apocalypse—I do not pretend to understand that book, and therefore am no judge of the matter. To those desirous of investigating the subjects of the second death, the lake of fire and brimstone, hell, and the dragon, I recommend a perusal of this little book. A. B. G.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.....NO. XVIII.

The passage which occurs in Jeremiah xvii: 11, needs explanation. "As a partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not; so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool." The partridge here mentioned, is not the partridge of England and America; but is a species peculiar to Eastern countries. This bird makes her nest in the sand, where she is likely to be disturbed by men and wild beasts, and have her eggs crushed. Now, conceive one of these partridges sitting upon her nest, and before her eggs are hatched, driven off and her eggs crushed, and we have the figure mentioned by the prophet. And a figure of what is this fact made? Why, of a man who gets riches by fraud—who, as a partridge is driven from her eggs, leaves his riches in the midst of his days—that is before his time to die has come—and "at his end," or death is a fool. How many melancholy cases the history of the world presents to prove the aptness of the figure! Multitudes have been enticed, by the prospect of gaining riches in a quicker way than by honest industry, into wicked fraud; by which they have obtained property that another person has earned by the hands of integrity. This conduct is fraught with ruin to its follower; as well as fraught with injury to him who is deprived of his property. Such wicked men can not enjoy their ill-gotten gains, for they are stripped of them; while ever after, they live dishonored, and at last die, as the fool dieth.

Take the instances of those who have committed forgeries, and the fact manifested in the declaration of the prophet, is very forcibly set forth in them. By forged paper, they sometimes obtain immense amounts of money; but do they enjoy that money? They are deprived of it in the midst of their days—either by being discovered and the money taken from them, or being stripped of it by those with whom they engage in dissipation. So that they never accomplish what they expected, viz., to get wealth by fraud and then enjoy it. In some countries, they get discovered, and not only lose the money, but are executed, and thus die like fools, felons and criminals, instead of living honorably and virtuously, and at last dying in respect and peace. In this country, not only are they almost uniformly discovered, but they lose all reputation, are sent to prison, and when they leave it, leave it poor in the midst of their days, walk through life in disgrace, and in the end die as fools, because they heeded not the wisdom which ever declares in precept and practice, not only that the righteous will be fully recompensed, but that the way of the transgressor is hard. Truly do the instances of men who attempt to obtain wealth by fraud, and then retain it and be made happy by it, appear as futile as the expectation of the partridge who is driven from her nest and her eggs crushed.

From these facts, we should draw a lesson, which will not only be profitable to men of mature years, but more particularly to young men. It should ever be impressed on their minds, and they should ever remember, that a course of wrong-doing will never ultimately succeed. Their motto should be "honesty is the best policy." And this principle they should pursue with undeviating integrity—never suffer any reverse of fortune to swerve them from it, but they should cling to it as alike a duty, an honor, and a blessing. It is the best way of obtaining wealth. For, though a young man may obtain possession of considerable property by fraud, and even retain possession of it, yet when the reflection continually intrudes itself into his thoughts, that that property is gained at the expense of his reputation and of his high standing in society, it will render him miserable, while his guilty conscience will continue to bring up the fear of being discovered. While, if a young man, by pursuing an honorable course of conduct, gains but little property in advance, the consciousness that he has wronged no man a single penny in obtaining it, but that it is the result of honorable and worthy industry, will give him more satisfaction than all the gold of Ophir and Brazil if accumulated by fraud.

DISTRICT SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

Don't forget the "nurseries of freemen" in the present political excitement. Provide in time for these libraries. Remember that the booksellers should have your orders in time to get supplies from the cities, before navigation closes. Remember, too, your forfeit of the State Bounty, unless you raise the amount by tax, and employ the whole in time. Remember these things, and attend to them, before it is too late. No time better than the present to see to these matters.

N. B. Br. Hutchinson will be able to supply the different series published by the Harper's—or, what are generally preferred by those who have examined both, the two series published by the State of Massachusetts. Let neighboring districts purchase different books, and after each has read its purchase, let them exchange libraries with each other. Thus will double reading be obtained for the same money. Let this advice be considered in time. Books in great plenty, not to be found in either of Harpers' or the Massachusetts, can be found suitable for such libraries, at Mr. Hutchinson's and other bookstores.

THE UNIVERSALIST UNION.

In noticing the circular of Br. Price last week, I omitted to state the terms of the Christian Messenger and the Universalist Union. The prospectuses are given below. As new volumes commence in November, the present month is the proper time to collect and forward the names of subscribers who will pay on the reception of the first number. Let it be done generally, and immediately; for those papers must not be discontinued—need not be, if our friends will do their duty to the cause of God's impartial grace.

As our new volume commences with January next, we shall defer any further appeal for new subscriptions for some weeks, when we hope to find our friends resolved to sustain the Magazine and Advocate, also, and to benefit the cause by increasing its circulation. Till, then, aid us by payments—they are most needed now, and will be for some time to come.

I do hope the agents and friends of both papers will not forget or neglect our wants.

NEW-YORK CHRISTIAN MESSENGER.

A Weekly Journal of Religion, Literature and Intelligence.

This publication is a continuation of the quarto form of the Universalist Union, being changed to a folio, or newspaper form, and resuming the original title—CHRISTIAN MESSENGER. Its religious department supports the views entertained by Universalist—a final salvation from sin, and its consequences—misery; the restoration of ALL men to holiness, and consequent happiness. To this end, its columns are occupied with Sermons, Expositions, Essays, Comments, etc., having a direct reference to that sentiment as well as a general religious bearing. In all its teachings, it aims to put on that charity which "thinketh no evil." If at any time it "rebukes," severely, the errors and follies of men, it does it not "willingly" but through a sincere conviction of duty, and in the friendly hope that it may be "profitable" to those on whom it is bestowed. In its literary and miscellaneous department it will aim to present choice articles, original and selected, from the current literature of the day, comprising Tales, Essays, Sketches, Poetry, etc., believing that its general interest may be enhanced by a portion of lighter reading. In all this, however, pains will be taken that it shall inculcate a sound morality. But it does not profess infallibility in this respect. It may err in its choice of articles, but if it does, they will be errors of judgment, and it is hoped it will be regarded with a lenient eye. In its secular department it will aim to give as full a record of passing events as the space allotted to that department will allow. It can not pretend to be very elaborate, but will aim to present a faithful record of the most important news of the day; sufficient, it is hoped, with its other departments, to render it an acceptable Family Paper. Terms $2 per annum.

THE UNIVERSALIST UNION.

This publication embraces the Religious and Literary articles of the Messenger, excluding the News and Advertisements. It has been so long before the public that little need be said in explanation of its general character. No efforts, as heretofore, will be spared, to render it a useful, though quiet, visitor in the domestic circle—a faithful, yet persuasive advocate of the great salvation.

The Union is published every Saturday on a large superroyal sheet, in Octavo form, (a very convenient size for binding,) making a large volume of eight hundred and thirty-two closely printed pages for the low price of Two Dollars and Fifty Cents per annum.

Clergymen and laymen, in the Universalist denomination, and all postmasters friendly to the objects of these publications, are respectfully requested to aid in extending their circulation.

Specimen numbers will cheerfully be furnished to order.—Address, N. Y. Christian Messenger, or Universalist Union, 130 Fulton street, between Nassau and Broadway.

BR. PICKERING'S CASE.

BR. GROSH.—In justice to myself and the friends in Fredonia, I must be allowed to say a few words on the objections of Br. Pickering to our certificate. Br. Pickering's explanation places us in a singular light before the Council of the Genesee Association; and if correct, our friends in Chautauque county have greatly erred.

I. Br. Pickering seems to think that our certificate conveys the idea, that his habits had been bad for a long time. We meant no such thing. The very expression, "remembering his great usefulness as a minister," etc., forbids such a construction of our language.

II. I object to the sentence in his explanation,

"there might possibly have been one instance and only one," etc. Br. Skinner and others, who "conversed with Br. P. feelingly on the subject," when they "convinced" him he had been in an error and received his pledge, think there was no doubt on the subject. They were "acquainted with all the material facts" and believe there was more than "one instance;" and the Council of the Genesee Association was satisfied, from direct testimony, that the "charges were fully sustained." And besides, if Br. P. was unconscious of the one time, (when he admits he might "possibly have been affected," "because the evidence was against" him,) how can he positively declare that there was but that one time. The evidence is equally positive and clear as to other times, and he seems equally unconscious of them.

III. We gave our certificate to induce the Genesee Association to withdraw its recommendation, by convincing it of Br. P.'s reformation. It was given with the express understanding between us, and Br. Pickering and his friends in Buffalo, that it should only be published in connection with his penitential letter to the Fredonia society, and expected that the whole should proceed from the proper organ of the Genesee Association, to whose Clerk we sent copies. I still think, both should have appeared.

IV. With all due respect to the age and experience of Brs. Skinner, Grosh, and others, who advised Br. P. to go on and fulfil his engagements in Herkimer county, I give it as my opinion that he should have first received the sanction of the brethren in the Genesee Association, who, if they had been addressed on the subject, might have been induced to give the same advice, and to publish all that should have been laid before the public on this subject—in which case I had been spared the painful duty of making these remarks.

I have done, and will continue to do all in my power to restore to Br. Pickering the confidence of the community; for I believe he has reformed—but his explanation casts needless doubt on the veracity of some of our best friends, who know whereof they have affirmed—therefore have I spoken. I trust what I have offered is in a Christian spirit. If I have said ought unkind or incorrect, I will cheerfully correct on its being pointed out.

A DREAM.

"Father forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Beneath a rustling grove I sat. The birds
Made melody above; the flowers around
Lent fragrance to the breeze: the merry brook
Wandered sweetly by: the distant hills
Resounded with the low of happy herds;
The fields rejoiced beneath their heavy loads
Of golden grain. O lovely, lovely scene!
The earth, and all creation, seemed to rise
In one continued anthem to the praise
Of God the great Creator—till my soul,
Catching the strain celestial, sought the fount
Of never failing love. But suddenly
A thought—a dreadful thought, flashed o'er my mind!
O, that the pampered priest had never told Me of Almighty wrath, and endless hell,
From which eternal curses would ascend,
Blaspheming God! But so it was. My brain
Grew wild with din confusion, until sleep,
Impartial friend—approached to my relief.

I dreamed. I thought myself in Palestine,
Land of our Saviour, where he lived and preached
The everlasting Gospel; where he died—
Died to redeem a world from sin and wo.
And even then, that scene was passing. There,
On Calvary, the Saviour and the thieves
Were brought around, a mighty host here met
To know the tortures of the Son of God!
There stood the haughty priest, the scribe was there.
The Pharisee and Sadducee were there,
All laughing out infernal hate, and all
Rejoicing that the deed was almost done!
There, too, the Roman guard, sullen and stern,
With no concern, save that he should obey
A tyrant's bidding, and a tyrant's nod,
And then they took the innocent, the pure,
The spotless one, who ne'er had done a wrong—
Who healed the sick, and raised the dead—they took
The Lamb of God, and nailed him to the Cross,
And while the blood ran free, and pain acute
Contracted every fibre of his frame,
They even mocked him, and reviling said—
Others he saved, himself he can not save."
I trembled—for I feared Almighty wrath
Would strike the wretches dead. But hark!
A sound from off the cross—"Father," he said,
"Forgive them, for they know not what they do!"
O, burning words of Heaven's love divine!
O, how my soul was kindled with the flame!
The human passions—envy and revenge—
I oft have felt: but never—never had I known
The majesty of God's unbounded love.

While thus surprised I stood, an angel came—
(His name was Time)—and in his rapid flight
He bore me off;—while suddenly as thought,
Lo! eighteen hundred years had passed away.
Again I stood amid a multitude
Of human beings. Silently they sat,
With downcast looks, as if impending death
Stood waiting at the door. But one arose,
And with a proud self-righteous tone, he said
"He was a preacher of the living God,
And of his Christ—that all mankind had sinned—
That every sin was infinite—that man
Was totally depraved, and must repent
In life, or feel God's wrath beyond the tomb—
That Christ was very God, and God had died
To magnify his law, which law required
The endless death of every soul that sinned!
O, solemn nonsense! But he farther said,
They might escape, by penitence and tears,
The wrath and justice of Almighty God.
That God was now unreconciled; and hell,
With all its fiery depths, and dismal walls,
And devils, waited to engulf their souls!
Oh, Heaven! what frightful groans and shrieks arose
From that assembly! How they rang their hands,
They prayed, they cried for mercy and for help!
I stood in wonder, and in doubt. Could this

Be earth, and these be some of Adam's race?
Or was I in the horrid pit of wo,
Where Milton's angels fell—and these around
The ghosts and fiends of his deluded brain?
I raised my eyes to ask my God, and lo!
The heavens were opened, and I saw within,
The throne of the Eternal: on his right,
Reflecting forth the brightness of his love,
Emmanuel sat. He was the same I saw
Upon the cross in all the agony
Of utmost wo. The Father's eye of love
Looked down upon the concourse where I stood,
And to the Son he said—"To thee 'tis given
To bring these sinful erring mortals up,
With every nation, kindred, tribe and tongue,
Of Adam's race, to duty and to heaven."
The Son replied in tones of deepest love—
"Father forgive, they know not what they do."
I woke—the same was ringing in my ear
And echoed forth from every object round,
"Father forgive, they know not what they do."

ALCHYMY.

I HAVE NEVER BEEN ABLE TO UNDERSTAND why the alchemists of former times are considered by the philosophers of modern times as little better, if at all better, than fools. I am quite serious; though I know I make the declaration at the hazard of being accounted an egregious fool myself. But let me state my own case. I renounce, at the outset, not only as utterly futile, but as a presumptuous denial of Heaven's declared will, the dream of compounding an elixir, which, by the subtle concentration of the essence of vitality, or, in other words, by the discovery of the elemental principle of life, should enable the fortunate possessor of it to renew his youth, as the vegetable world revives at the approach of spring. I give this up, I say; not merely as a visionary bawble of the imagination, but as a direct attempt of the creature to contravene and abrogate a decree of the Creator. But I make my stand in defence of alchemy, upon that other grand object of its followers—the discovery of the philosopher's stone, as it is called; or of the tincture, or powder, or art,—not of transmuting metals, by converting a lump of lead into a lump of gold,—but of bona fide making gold by a regular and scientific process. "It never has been done," is the triumphant answer of philosophers; but that it therefore never will be done, is not the deduction of philosophy. He who should have attempted, when alchemy was in fashion to discover the means of navigating rivers, and seas without the aid of wind or canvass, or of producing a brilliant and permanent light without employing any combustible substance, would have been deemed as confirmed a disciple of folly by his own generation, as the seekers after the philosopher's stone have since been by succeeding generations. Yet the steam-boat and the gas-lamp are now too common to excite the wonder or attract the notice even of the vulgar; and there are many of our mechanical inventions and discoveries of science, which might be adduced to fortify this mode of argument. Why, then, should the notion be treated as an absurdity too gross almost for serious argument, that one of those incidents to which we owe various discoveries, or some of those experiments which have led to such astonishing results in chemical science, may one day penetrate the laboratory of nature, and detect her process in the formation of this precious metal? In short, is there any difficulty in conceiving such a progress to be made by the gradual triumphs of science, as to acquire the power, by analytical investigation, of ascertaining not only what are the component parts, but what are the respective proportions in which those component parts exist, in a piece of gold? And if one chemical science gets thus far,—if once she is able accurately to detect and separate whatever those component parts may be, and to determine, with equal accuracy, whatever may be their several proportions,—I should not despair of the synthetical process soon accomplishing all the rest. In conclusion, this is the sum and substance of my doctrine—that it is within the reasonable calculation of chemical science to be able to resolve gold into its primary elements; that when so resolved, the relative and positive quantities of those elements may be ascertained; and, lastly, that when we know what are the separate ingredients, and what are their combined proportions, to make gold will be no more difficult than it is now to make any other artificial metal. They who deny these propositions a priori must be prepared to do so upon the grounds that there exists some moral, physical, or philosophical impossibility of decomposing gold, as palpable and self-evident as that which would stare a man in the face who should seriously set to work to contrive how he might get the sun and moon, into a crucible, in order to make suns and moons, or stars and comets. And so ends my argument in defence of that branch of alchemy which sought to discover the philosopher's stone!

EDUCATION.

It was finally and forcibly said in the rhetorical language of the venerated Stoughton, "that God sifted a whole kingdom for the wheat which was sown in the American wilderness." That seed was not confined to New-England. It has been scattered broadcast over the now fair and flourishing domain which we proudly call our country. It has shot up, not thinly, but luxuriantly, and in evidence of its effects, we have only to point to the innumerable seminaries of elementary and general instruction; to the schools and academies, the colleges and universities, which, dispersed through the Republic from Maine to Florida, constitute the glory of our beloved land.

Nor are they less our defence than our glory. Knowledge is power. A people generally enlightened can not be enslaved. Other eyes may look with complacency upon our national fortresses; upon our armaments, naval and military: for my own part, I contemplate with livelier satisfaction, and more assured conviction of their efficiency to the end in view—our security and repose as a people—the institutions of learning, which in every gradation of excellence adapted to the age, the capacities, the wants, of a rising generation, abound in our land. I am no enthusiast: I am neither a pedagogue nor bookworm.—But I hazard nothing in saying, that the humblest village school-house is a little bulwark of our country's liberties. Our seminaries, small and great, for the diffusion of useful knowledge among all classes of the community, collectively present an impregnable wall of defence. Whilst these remain, no Agamemnon, no Achilles will be able to take our city. It will abide in fearless security, and unshaken, indissoluble strength.

The idle levy a very heavy tax upon the industrious, when by frivolous visitations they rob them of their time. Such persons beg their daily happiness from door to door, as beggars their daily bread, and like them sometimes meet with a rebuff. A mere gossip ought not to wonder if we evince signs that we are tired of him, seeing that we are indebted to the honor of his visit, solely to the circumstance of his being tired of himself. He sits at home until he has accumulated an insupportable load of ennui, and he sallies forth to distribute it amongst all his acquaintance.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION....NO. XIV.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"As touching the dead that they rise, have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, 'I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob?'"

"Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush."

It is related that during our Lord's last visit to Jerusalem, he was severally attacked by the chief priests, the scribes, the elders, the Herodians, the Pharisees, and the Sadducees, each party of whom endeavored by artful questions to confound the great Teacher, hoping thereby to bring disgrace and ruin upon his cause. The Sadducees, it seems, had contrived a case respecting a woman who had had seven husbands, all of whom with herself, were then dead; and presenting the case to him, they demanded which of the men should have the woman in the resurrection. This question of theirs involved, as they thought, an unanswerable objection to the doctrine of the resurrection—a doctrine which, in the form the Pharisees held it, (and which, aside from the teachings of Jesus, appears to have been the only form in which the doctrine was then taught,) they utterly discarded and denied. Jesus' reply showed that he was not a Pharisee, since he taught—1st. that in the resurrection, or when raised, mankind are not "children of this world," that is to say, do not belong to this state of being;—2d. that in "that world," or the resurrection state, matrimonial connexions are not formed;—3d. that when mankind "obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead," they become immortal, and die no more. He then proceeds to prove from the Scriptures that there is a resurrection; citing the teachings of Moses, most probably because his writings, as I gather from what our Lord himself says, were considered by the Sadducees as paramount to the other portions of the Old Testament, so far at least as respected their authority in matters of doctrine.

Matthew's version of Christ's argument, is, "As touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." Here it is manifest that the fact of Jehovah's being the God of the three Patriarchs after they had undergone the death of the body, is adduced by our Lord in proof that there is a resurrection. And it is truly interesting to attend to the method by which the Heaven-sent Teacher brings this text to bear upon the subject in hand. "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." His argument is, then, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, must have been in some state of existence in Moses' day, else God could not have been at that time their God. And the justness of this argument will be perceived by considering that the name God, which denotes an object of worship, is clearly a relative term, having relation to worshippers, and as obviously implies some being that worships, as parent implies child. As, then, Jehovah was at that time their God, they must have been at that time His worshippers, and of course must have been alive, not to say, must have been conscious of it.

It may not be improper to observe here, that the Hebrew language, in which the Old Testament is written, and which, on a dialect of which, was spoken by our Lord, has properly no present tense; and that as sometimes the past tense, sometimes the future, sometimes the ellipsis of the verb, is used to express present time, the time of verbs is in some instances quite uncertain, and an argument based upon mere tense, is often extremely fallacious. In the passage in question, the verb to be, according to our version, is wanting in the Hebrew, the expression being literally, "I the God of Abraham," etc., which form of expression is really less indefinite than that in which the verb is used; hence the time of the unexpressed verb in this passage is rendered pretty certain from grammatical considerations alone. But waving this, and every thing like it, we observe that as the commentary of Jesus upon the passage expresses a general truth, or one belonging to all present time, that God IS not the God of the dead, (not merely was not, or will not be, as if He were changeable,) we therefore, independently of learned criticism, which, however, we have no reason to think would be against us, set it down as a philological fact, resting on the authority of Jesus Christ, that the sense of the passage quoted by Him from Ex. iii: 6, is, "I am the God of Abraham," etc., in the then present or passing time.*

This point being settled, we may now observe that Jesus cites this passage "as touching the resurrection of the dead." We have it, then, from the highest authority, that there actually is in the passage something concerning the resurrection. And this being the case, the question is fairly before us, whether the passage teaches a passing resurrection, or one that is exclusively future. The writer is decidedly of the opinion that it teaches the former. Some of his reasons are as follows:

1. The passage teaches life after death for Abraham, Isaac and Jacob—therefore for others; it also, as we have seen, teaches a resurrection for them—therefore for others. But in respect to life, it teaches that they were then in possession of it, not merely that they will be some time or other; and as there is no intimation that the like is not the case in respect to the time of their rising, it seems most probable that they were then raised—hence that others are raised at death.

2. Jesus seems to speak as though to be alive after death, were proof that an individual has undergone the resurrection. Thus to evince to the Sadducees the truth of the resurrection, in the case of the three patriarchs, and hence, as respects all, he quoted scripture to prove merely their existence. Having proved this, he seems to consider their resurrection proved also, as he uses no further argument. It does seem to me, then, that as they were already alive, so they must have been already raised.

3. Christ's argument is worded by Mark thus: "As touching the dead that they rise, have ye not read," etc., "That they rise!" Here our Lord applies to the resurrection the same tense of the verb that is found in the Greek of the passage he quotes, as also in the general truth put forth by him, that God is not the God of the dead. And as the time of the verb in the quoted passage is evidently present, I can not but think that present or passing time is intended in the expression "they rise."

* As an excuse for introducing the unusual expression, "present or passing time," take the following from Ingersoll's Grammar: "Every point of space or duration, how minute soever it may be, has some degree of extension. Neither the present, nor any other instant of time, is wholly unextended. Nay, we can not conceive, as Dr. Beattie justly observes, an unextended instant; and that which we call the present, may in fact admit of very considerable extension."

4. Luke gives the same tense as Mark, yet points out the time with greater definiteness by putting the verb in the passive form. He gives the substance of Christ's argument thus: "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush," etc. "That the dead are raised!" On this we remark merely, that whether he did or did not design to represent our Lord as teaching that the resurrection is in progress, one thing is clear—he used just such language as he might have used had he designed to give exactly that representation.

To these arguments it may be objected that the tenses of verbs in the Greek Testament are, as in Hebrew, sometimes equivocal, one tense being occasionally substituted for another. We reply, all this may be perfectly true, and yet it may also be true, that the use of the present tense is prima facie evidence that present time is intended. Indeed each particular tense is proof of a particular time; but circumstances may set that proof aside. The time of the present tense should be considered present, unless there is something that clearly shows the contrary.

We, however, have not argued either exclusively or principally from the tense of the verb. The doctrine we have advanced rests not upon mere verbal inflection. Our principal argument in this number, thus far, is this: Jesus Christ, in view of the general fact that God is not at any time the God of the dead, but is at all times the God of the living, did argue the resurrection from the special fact that God said to Moses, "I am the God of Abraham," etc. The general fact is constantly present—the special fact was present then, and is present still—hence the resurrection is present in like manner. The evidence arising from this, we claim to be direct and positive—that arising from tense alone, we admit to be merely corroborative.

5. In further proof, and we consider it positive too, that the three patriarchs had been raised from the dead in Moses' day, and hence that the resurrection is in progress, take, along with the teachings of Christ, a text from the apostle Paul. After saying, "If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised," he adds, "Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." 1 Cor. xv: 16, 18. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, had "fallen asleep," that is to say, had experienced the death of the body; and we should think they fell asleep "in Christ," for we are assured in the scriptures that they "died in faith," that is, died believing—or that Abraham did at least. But be that as it may—whether the phrase "fallen asleep in Christ" does or does not apply to them, and whether it does or does not apply to all, one thing will not be disputed—those, if any, to whom it does not apply, are quite as likely to perish, in case they rise not, as those are to whom it does. If, then, the three patriarchs rose not, they perished. But they did not perish in the sense Paul intended, as Jesus himself shows; hence they must have been raised. And since, according to Luke, the Saviour declared to the Sadducees that "all live unto" God, it is hence certain that all the dead "rise."

It will now be requisite to attend to some objections drawn from certain passages of scripture.

In Acts ii: 34, we read, "For David is not ascended into the heavens." This was said by Peter on the day of Pentecost; and it is argued from this text that David was not then raised, therefore not others. I reply, the passage gives no intimation that David will ever ascend into the heavens in the sense there intended; since it does not read as it is sometimes quoted, that he is not yet ascended. Besides Peter was not then speaking upon the subject of rising from the dead, but upon that of Christ's "being by the right hand of God exalted." See verse 33. He then says, "For David is not ascended into the heavens: but he saith himself, 'The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool.' Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." As if he had said, It is not David who is ascended into the heavens, but David's Lord, even Jesus, who now occupies, in relation to human beings, the highest station of honor and authority.

In the 6th chapter of John our Lord speaks in four instances of raising up some at the last day; and these texts are cited, or rather one of them is, to prove that there is no resurrection yet, and that there will be none until all shall be raised at once. I am perfectly convinced that the time here intended by the last day, is not the day when death shall be swallowed up in victory, but is the close of the Jewish age or dispensation: of course that the rising here mentioned is not a rising to immortality. Various considerations, apart from my general views, operate upon my mind to induce this conclusion—some of which follow.

1. In three of the four texts where our Lord speaks of raising up some at the last day, he very obviously has reference to believers, and, to no others. Thus verse 40—"This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day." Verses 44, 54, express the same, but in highly figurative language, which let the reader consult. Now the Bible teaches not a resurrection, to immortality, of believers as a reward for believing, or as the result of faith; hence I conclude that the rising here mentioned as to be in the last day, is not a rising to immortal life; and consequently that the doctrine of these texts forms no objection to the view of the resurrection which I have advanced.

But it is thought that the rising mentioned in verse 39 must be a rising to immortality, since the text is so generally supposed to have reference to all. The verse reads, "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." Universalist writers have so long applied this text to all our race, that it will seem to the reader to be quite impossible that it can have reference to but a part. I am perfectly convinced, however, that though it is a fact that in some sense all mankind belong to Christ by gift from the Father, and that he will not lose any, yet that this text does not teach all this, unless by implication. But we shall defer the exposition of it until we have considered the phrase "the last day."

2. In proof that "at the last day" means at the close of the Jewish age or dispensation, take the following: In the epistle to the Hebrews, first two verses, we read that "God.....hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." In Acts ii: 16-20, we are told that Peter on the day of Pentecost, declared respecting the gift of languages, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel, 'And it shall come to pass in the last days' saith God, 'I will pour out of my Spirit.' ".....He continues the quotation in reference to other events, as follows: "And I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, and vapor of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord shall come." These events, excepting the coming of the great and notable day, are represented as happening, having happened, and being to happen, "in the last days," not all at once, but in such order as that all should be accomplished before that great and notable day should arrive. And as Jesus used almost precisely the same words when announcing the "signs" which should precede the destruction of Jerusalem, the conclusion seems inevitable that the great and notable day here mentioned, is the time of that destruction. See Mark xiii: 24-30; Luke xxi: 20-32. It is manifest, then, that the time intended in the expression, "the last days," is that period which intervened between the advent of Christ and the destruction of Jerusalem. As, therefore, "in the last days" is towards the close of the Jewish age, it seems perfectly natural that "at the last day" should mean at its close; the last day being the same as that great and notable day, namely, the last of the last days. And that this is the true interpretation of the phrase, is further proved as follows:

3. "In the last day," as we learn from John xii: 48, the unbelievers were to be judged or condemned, as well as the believers raised up. Thus Jesus says, "He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day." Now it is certain from many passages of Scripture, that there was to be a judgment at the close of the Jewish age or dispensation; and it is also certain that the judgment and rising of the dead to immortal life, are not, in the Scriptures, described as accompanying events; all which corroborates the position that the phrase "the last day" signifies the close of that age. See No. 7 of these articles.

4. The rewards and punishments which were to be dispensed at the end of that age, or at the coming of Christ in that generation, are set forth in John, 5th chapter, as in Daniel 12th, under the figure of two resurrections. See Nos. 4, 5, 6, of these articles. It would seem highly probable, then, from this circumstance alone, that when our Lord in John, 6th chapter, promised to raise up at the last day those who believed in him, he meant the same as he did in the 5th chapter by "the resurrection of life," especially as in both the passages he represents the believer as having everlasting or eternal life at the time he was then speaking. Also, that when he spoke of the unbeliever's being judged or condemned in the last day, he meant the same as he did in the 5th chapter by "the resurrection of damnation," (properly of condemnation or judgment.) Whatever, then may be the meaning of the passages, they must be understood as referring to the same period. If to be raised up at the last day, is to be raised into an immortal state, then to come to the resurrection of damnation, is to be condemned in an immortal state. But the latter is not the fact—therefore not the former.

5. Our Lord often used highly figurative language. Thus in John vi: 53, 54, he uses this to us strange figure to signify belief in his doctrine—"Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." And in every or nearly every instance where the phrase "the last day" occurs in the Scriptures, it is found in close connection with figurative language of the most bold and striking kind. Whereas in Christ's conversation with the Sadducees, he employed no metaphors but such as were familiarly used in common speech. Moreover, what he says where the resurrection of damnation is mentioned, if it be interpreted of a rising to immortality, disagrees with what he said to the Sadducees, inasmuch as in the former case the rising is represented not as progressive, but as simultaneous; not single, but two-fold. As, then, His teachings where "the last day" and "the resurrection of damnation" are mentioned, do not seem to agree with what he said to the Sadducees, we assert with confidence, that either in this or in those passages the resurrection is figurative, since all Christians will agree that our Lord was always consistent with himself. But there was never any dispute or doubt that in His conversation with the Sadducees, he spoke of a truly literal rising to immortality; hence it must be evident that the simultaneous rising of all, some to life, and some to damnation, is figurative. Moreover, we claim that that must be considered figurative which is found amongst figurative language, rather than that which is not; hence that the last day resurrection, in all the four texts wherein it is mentioned, is also figurative. This brings us to consider more particularly John vi: 39, the first text in which rising at the last day is mentioned.

The text reads, "This is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." Now the phrase "the last day," in every other instance of our Lord's using it, signifies the close of the last days or Jewish age; and we see no reason why it should not have that meaning here.

But we shall be told that all were to be raised who had been given to Christ, and that God gave him all mankind; hence that the resurrection, being universal, is yet to happen, and is therefore a rising to immortality. To this we reply that it is our conviction that not all of mankind are here intended. For

1. The expression "all which he hath given me," indicates of itself there were some not given to Christ in that sense, the "all" being limited by the phrase following it.

2. If Jesus, after saying "that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing," had added "but should raise all up at the last day," the latter all, having no limitation expressed, might seem to include mankind universally. But instead of all he employed the word "it"—("but should raise it up," etc.—) and as it in this place can not include any more than all which the Father had given him, that is to say, all with a certain limitation, the text most naturally refers to but a part of our race.

We then, in dissent from Universalist writers generally if not altogether, interpret John vi: 39, in a limited sense as respects mankind, and consider it as referring to our Lord's apostles only. Our reasons, over and above what we have advanced, follow:

3. Jesus in a number of instances speaks of those that God had given him, when it is evident he intended but a part of mankind. Thus in John xvii: 6, 9, 12, he speaks of, and prays for, his apostles, as follows: "I have manifested Thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world: thine they were, and thou gavest them me." "I pray for them: I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me." "Those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition." In the following chapter we are told that when his enemies were approaching to apprehend him, he, knowing his fate, went forth to meet them, and asked, "Whom seek ye?" They answered, "Jesus of Nazareth." He replied, "I am he," and "they went backward and fell to the ground." He soon repeated his question, and receiving the same reply, he answered, "I have told you that I am he. If therefore, ye seek me, let these [my apostles] go their way: that the saying might be fulfilled which he spake, 'of them which thou gavest me have I lost none.'" John xviii: 3-9. * Here the

* Some writer has suggested the idea that the "it," in John vi: 39, refers to Judas. Whether this interpretation is or is not consistent with the Greek, let learned critics decide. All I have to say respecting it, is, that it is perfectly in agreement with facts, and that it helps to explain very satisfactorily an apparent contradiction among certain of our Lord's statements. Thus Jesus speaks in the first place as though he should lose none of those whom God had given him—secondly, that one was lost though only one—after which was fulfilled, as we learn, this saying of his, "Of them which thou gavest me have I lost none." Now Judas was lost to the Saviour for a time, that is, was lost to the interests of his cause. But he was restored again in that respect; and by the ample testimony which he bore to his Master's innocence—in word, as addressed to the chief priests and elders—in deed, by returning the price of Jesus' betrayal—in suffering, by the excessive grief which terminated his existence—(for he did not hang himself, the opinion of king James' translators to the contrary notwithstanding)—he as truly assisted in the establishment of Christianity as any of his fellow apostles. He was lost to Chrisreader can not fail to perceive that the same expressions are applied by our Lord to his apostles, in distinction from even his other disciples, as are found in chapter vi: 39, the text in question.

4. In chapter 17th, after praying for his apostles, our Lord adds, "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word." Verse 20. So in the 6th chapter, he first speaks of God's will respecting those whom He had given him, then adds in the next verse, "And this is the will of Him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day." We think, then, that as in the 17th chapter, so in the 6th, he first speaks of his apostles, then of believers in general.

Another text which is thought to imply the doctrine that the resurrection is all future, is found in John xi: 24, where Martha says to Jesus respecting her deceased brother, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." But this text does not in my mind establish, or go to establish the doctrine of an all-future resurrection, and that for various reasons:

1. The opinion of Martha, especially at that stage of her discipleship, is not, of itself, sufficient authority to establish any point of doctrine; since even the apostles, at a time not far from that, knew so little of their Master's doctrine, that they asked of him such a question respecting a blind man, as shows very clearly that they were at least tinged with a belief in the Pharisee's doctrine of transmigration. See John xi: 1-3, considered in No. 2. of these articles.

2. Though Martha stated respecting her brother what was true in word, as Lazarus was doubtless one of those whom Jesus promised to raise up at the last day, he yet does not seem to allow that she was really right in what she professed to know, as the instruction he goes on to give her relates to points other than a rising to immortality. See John xi: 25-27. Had Jesus endorsed her statement, the case would be radically different.

3. All the arguments which go to establish the conclusion that "the last day" in John, 6th chapter, means the close of the Jewish age, go equally to show that, let Martha have understood the phrase as she may, its proper meaning here is really the same as there.

The following paragraph will indicate my view of the passage in question:

Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, is dead and buried, and Jesus is approaching the dwelling of the bereaved sisters. Martha learning the fact, goes out to meet him, and says, "Lord, if thou hadst been here [while he was sick] my brother had not died. But I know that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee." Here are apparent a strong desire, an unexpressed wish, and a glimmering of hope, that her brother might by the Saviour's power be raised to life as others had been. Jesus knowing her thoughts, her feelings, her desires, replies to the request she wanted the courage to make, "Thy brother shall rise again;" that is, he shall be restored to life. Martha does not understand that he is to be raised just now. But she remembers that Jesus has promised to raise up believers at the last day, which in her mind is a Pharisaic rising to immortality when Jesus shall have established his kingdom. She therefore says, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection of the last day." Jesus perceives that she does not understand what he has just said, and that she has also misunderstood what it is to have everlasting life, and to be raised up at the last day. The first mistake he knows will be rectified in a few minutes by the resuscitation of her brother; he therefore proceeds to give her instruction in the other particulars. After saying, "I am the resurrection and the life," he adds, "he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." As if he had said, Those who believe in me, though morally dead before believing, shall then have and enjoy everlasting life. And when by the fulfillment of my prophecies in the destruction of Judaism and the establishment and general spread of my religion, the crowning evidence of the divinity of my mission shall be given to the world, and the truth of my doctrine be established beyond all reasonable controversy, the faithful believers of this age shall live in the remembrance of my future followers as long as my religion shall endure. Note. The primitive Christians will be remembered in a body as long as Christianity exists. The apostles will be remembered by name among men as long as Jesus himself.

THE POWER OF HABIT.

BY MISS H. J. STONE.

But few are aware of the almost unlimited power and ascendancy which habit gains over our very natures. Indeed we can scarcely make the distinction between habit and nature. We begin, with the very first dawn of existence, to imbibe habits which cling to us through life. The looks, the words of the fond mother, were the first lessons which we began to learn, and very important and lasting ones they were, too; the influence of which will affect every day of our future lives. How vividly bright are the transactions which occurred in the old familiar home of happy childhood. Every spot is sacred to the remembrance of hallowed joy—every scene recalls some token of love and tenderness, from dear, early friends. It was there we began to think and to act—to imitate the actions, and imbibe the spirit, in a great degree, by which those were actuated around us. We there formed habits according to the examples which were given us, but we are now as then still receiving impressions from others, and forming new habits of thinking and acting. But those formed in the dawn of life will be more closely interwoven with our natures, and will require not a little moral decision to eradicate them. It seems to be of the utmost importance, therefore, that those who have the care and instruction of children, should watch over them in the strictest manner, and see to it that good habits are formed within the mind.

In the first place we will consider the habit of speaking of the conduct of others and judging them by outward appearances. This, although it may be thought of minor importance compared with some, yet it is in fact the cause of more trouble and bitterness among men, (and women too,) than any other habit, however evil it may appear. It not only kindles up the fires of anger, wrath and strife among neighbors, but it degrades the noblest faculties of the soul—it narrows down the capacities of the free born mind to things grovelling and earthly. Better that children be taught to weed and cultivate their own hearts, instead of learning to peep into the hearts and intentions of those around them. Children of a larger growth would, methinks, find sufficient employment were they to enter and examine closely their own hearts, without meddling with the faults of others.

The second habit I shall notice is, that of sleeping away the brightest part of existence—the morning; this habit does not so immediately effect community as the one before mentioned; still it has its evils. It effects not only the health of the physical but of the moral parts of society. The longest life would be too short in which to obtain a knowledge of the useful and interesting, with which we are surrounded. Every hour saved from unnecessary repose, might afford us a little treasure, if rightly improved. How many thoughts pass through the intelligent mind in one short hour! If registered they might be a valuable blessing to mankind. One evil habit begets others. So in late rising, our spirits are depressed and weakened, ambition is destroyed, and we slide imperceptibly into the habits of indolence and sloth—not doing our duties in time, nor at all—instead of persevering, we remain stationary, or nearly so, when, if we arose with the first dawn, we should learn of the inferior tribes the duty and pleasure of early rising. The sweet warblers which hymn their Maker's praise with the first glimmer of the morning light, call upon every rational being to awake and arise, and "pay their morning sacrifice." The longer we indulge in any habit, the experience of the wise and the aged tell us, the harder will be the contest between reason and habit. It is so, every day experience confirms this truth. How vigilant, O, how watchful, then, should we be over ourselves! How often hold communion with ourselves, and scan every motive and feeling of the soul. Nothing but a firm and unwavering trust in the Lord, and true decision of character, can enable us to break away from long and darling habits with which we are completely enthralled. It is indeed cutting off the right hand, and plucking out the eye of sin and transgression; and happy are all they who resolve to part with all they hold dear, rather than be knowingly servants of sin, or slaves of pernicious habits. Youthful friends, let us beware of forming habits which are useless and injurious. Let us abstain from the very appearance of evil—and endeavor to live patterns of morality and unfeigned religion. Let us form one and only one habit, that of doing at all times as we would wish others to do by us.

THE WICKED.

"There is no peace to the wicked, saith my God."

And is it so? Is there no peace to the wicked? No rest? No comfort? Alas! poor sinner, how true. The mandate of the Eternal has gone forth. The fact is established in the economy and purpose of the eternal Mind, and must stand forever. Wherever you are, wherever you go, you are sure to have no peace. Poor sinner. What an awful thought, that you can have no peace—no rest day or night forever and ever. You may revel in all the gaudy wealth that earth can afford. You may have at your disposal all the riches of the south, or glittering gems of the east, but if you are wicked you can have no peace. You may roam over the snow cap'd hills of Lapland, or tread the burning sands of Ethiopia, but there you are to find no peace. You may fly on the wings of the morning to the uttermost parts of the earth, and revel amid the beauties of nature, but if you are wicked, the eternal God hath decreed that you can enjoy no peace. Should you rise on airy wings and dwell in ether's broad expanse, or descend into the dark, subterranean caverns of earth, and dwell in the dreary wilds of solitude: there active conscience will thrust her deadly fangs into the very vitals of the soul, and there too you can have no peace. Could you conquer the whole world, and be crowned emperor of all the kingdoms thereof, you, Alexander like, would sit down and weep that you could not conquer others, and you could have no peace. God have mercy on the sinner.

LOVE AND FEAR.

"There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear; because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love."—JOHN.

There is no individual who has read the writings of the beloved disciple John, with any degree of attention, but what has noticed the pointed distinction which he has made between the two passions, love and fear. And no sane mind can be insensible to the different results which human actions arrive at, according as they are influenced by the one or the other of these passions. Actuated by the one, individuals confide with the utmost confidence in each other. They rely with that degree of certainty and composure upon one another, that they feel no unpleasant sensations—no tormenting fears, when the highest interest of the one is at the disposal of the other. And the wholesome influence which is exerted in consequence of this reciprocal attachment, is beyond the power of calculation. It checks dishonesty and fraud, destroys jealousy and prejudice, and lends a helping hand to sustain every virtue which graces the moral universe. Well, then, might the divine disciple dwell upon this subject with that deep interest and intensity of feeling that ever appeared to characterize him when speaking of it. "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear." Love and fear, therefore, never can be made to coalesce—never can be brought to harmonize and agree. They are repulsive in their nature, and the presence of the one can only be in the absence of the other.

It is astonishing, that notwithstanding the baleful, and peace-destroying effects of fear, are so clearly and cogently pointed out in the Scriptures, any one should so far overlook the fact as to make it a supreme, ruling motive, in regard to human actions. Yet strange and inconsistent as this may appear, it is the first means employed by many Christian teachers as the grand panacea to awaken the sinner to a sense of his duty! What, says an orthodox divine, must we be robbed of the privilege of pointing out to the sinner the fearful and horrible condition to which he is exposed? Must we waive every means that will necessarily cause him to fear and tremble in consequence of the misery and despair which awaits him in the future world? Rob us of this privilege—strip us of these means, and we will cry out in despondency, like one of old, "who then can be saved?" Verily, the moon is no more indebted to the sun for the natural light which she bestows upon us, than these teachers are to the animal passion "fear," for the moral light that they profess to be spreading in wondrous profusion among the benighted children of humanity. But would any unprejudiced mind suppose, after a careful examination of what John has said on this subject, that these teachers are right—that they are truly in the way which leads to life? Would any one contend, who believes that love is the fulfilling of the law, and that great peace have they who keep the law and nothing shall offend, that it is necessary to frighten an individual nearly or quite out of his senses in order to render him obedient to the divine command? Would not that "great peace" which those enjoy who keep the law, be utterly inaccessible to those who are exercised by that slavish fear which John declares "hath torment"? It certainly would; and the commandment of God is thereby made of none effect through the tradition of the elders.

But what will more effectually induce mankind to render that perfect love to God and man, which the Scriptures so imperiously demand? We answer, a knowledge of the fact that God loves them. "Herein," says John, "is love, not that we love God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be a propitiation for our sins." "We love Him because he first loved us." Thus we discover the true cause of John's love to God; and that fear had no part nor lot in the matter.

Our conclusion, then, is that this slavish fear has nothing to do in the accomplishment of the great plan of salvation: but on the contrary is well calculated to carry into effect all the devices of the wicked one.

But perhaps it will be objected here that we are commanded to fear God. Very true; but does any one suppose that we are commanded to fear him with that kind of fear, which perfect love casteth out? Does any one contend that we are to fear him with that kind of fear, the exercise of which would prove to the world that we are not made "perfect in love"? Surely no one will contend for these things. What, then, are we to understand by the fear which we are commanded to exercise toward God? We answer—a filial fear; a fear of violating a just and perfect law—a law designed in infinite mercy for our own good, and on the obeying of which, our highest happiness depends. This in our opinion, is what we are to understand by the fear of God. And this "fear" is nearly or quite synonymous with love itself, as we think we shall be able to show. Solomon says "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom;" and that "wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace." Here then we discover that the fear of God is not that tormenting fear of which John speaks; but on the contrary, inasmuch as it is the beginning of wisdom, the ways of which are pleasantness, and all her paths peace, it is precisely what he denominates love, in which there is no torment. Again, we are commanded to "fear God and keep his commandments, which is the whole duty of man." But what are his commandments? Our Saviour answers this question as follows: Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy strength and thy neighbor as thyself: on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets. If the law, then, the whole law and the prophets, consist in loving God supremely, and our neighbor as ourselves, then it follows that the fear which Solomon enjoins us to exercise towards God, is nothing more or less than love; or that it constitutes no part of the law and the prophets. Hence we discover that what might at first appear contradictory, is only a contradiction in terms, and not a contradiction in facts: for Solomon doubtless intended to convey the same idea by the term "fear," as John did by "love," and consequently John used "fear" in a directly opposite sense from what Solomon and others used it.

We are satisfied, then, that this slavish fear constitutes not the least item in the chain of means in accomplishing the great end for which the Gospel was designed. It can be made to operate only upon the animal propensities of our nature, and not upon the moral sentiments; for they are entirely above its reach, and can not be moved in the least degree by it. The ox and the ass may be made to perform the labor of their owners, in consequence of the fear of the continual lashings and goadings which their drivers inflict upon them. The poor oppressed slave may also, by the same principle, be led to perform the task and drudgery that are imposed upon him, in order to avert the severe castigations that he is subject to, in consequence of his unfortunate and pitiful situation. The deluded devotee of a false religion may also be coerced into a servile homage of his false divinity, for fear of the awful punishments and retributions in another world, which he believes ever await a non-compliance of such duties. But the Christian who takes the Gospel as the man of his counsel, will ever act from far different motives than these. He will serve him whose name and nature is Love, with a perfect heart and a willing mind. He will "enter into his gates with praise, and into his courts with thanksgiving," and "serve him with gladness." No low means like that employed to drill the beasts of burden, or to drive the slave to his labor, or the poor deluded suppliant of a dogmatical creed to the altar of his angry God, is necessary to cause the Christian whose mind is thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the Gospel, to perform his duty. No—he will perform it because it is identified with his highest interest and his highest happiness. He will keep the commandments—because he knows that they "are not grievous." He will take the Gospel yoke upon him—because he knows it is easy, and the burden, because he knows it is light. He will be willing to learn of him who is meek and lowly in spirit, because he knows it is the only means by which he can find rest to his soul.

The contemplation of this subject very naturally leads us to make the following inquiry: Of what benefit is the doctrine of endless misery to mankind in this world? Or in other words, what use can it be put to in order to make mankind better—more virtuous, more pious, more devotional, and more charitable, than they would be without a knowledge of it? Will the belief, that God has made a prison-house of hopeless and never-ending despair to confine myriads of his intelligent creatures in, enable us more effectually to keep the first and great commandment—to love God with all our mind, might, and strength? Will the belief that the conduct of our neighbor, as viewed by a just and righteous God, merits no other treatment than endless punishment, be likely to cause us to render more perfect obedience to the second commandment, which is, to love our neighbor as ourselves?—Shall we be more likely to obey the injunctions—"love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven," from the belief, that God hates his enemies with that inflexible hatred which will make them miserable throughout the endless ages of eternity? Shall we be more likely to "undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free," from the fact that we are commanded to imitate God, and that he perpetuates the existence of a world of intelligences even to an eternal bondage of misery and death?—Surely the east is not farther from the west, nor the nadir from the zenith, than those who advocate the affirmative of the above questions, are from the light of truth. For nothing can be more unscriptural and inconsistent than such views. And it is an exhibition of the depth of human weakness or human depravity to advocate them. For so long as "love is the fulfilling of the law," just so long will the fear produced from the belief in the doctrine of endless misery, be rendered nugatory and void in fulfilling the least jot and tittle of the divine command. And so long as mankind are actuated by this slavish fear, so long will they be strangers to that "faith which works by love and purifies the heart." It was for these reasons that the sacred writers were so explicit on this subject. "For God," says Paul, "has not given unto us a spirit of fear, but of power, of love and of a sound mind," "because fear," says our sacred motto, "hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love." Fear not, was the language which was first uttered by the angel of peace, who came to bring the good news of light and salvation to a perishing world, to the trembling shepherds who were surprised and frightened in consequence of the light that shone around them:—"Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people." Fear not, was the cheering language of the Messenger of Heaven which first saluted the ears of the women when they came to the sepulchre in which the body of Jesus was laid after he was crucified. Fear not, is the united language of reason, nature and revelation, to the trembling children of humanity, wherever they may be found distrustful the kind providence of their Father in heaven. Fear not, be not dismayed, look around you, and behold all nature cheerful and smiling, as if to relieve you from the unhappy condition into which you have fallen. Look at the beasts of the field; do you not discover that they are amply provided with every thing necessary to their comfort? and are they not richly, wisely, and happily adapted to the respective situations in which they are found? "Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?" Dispel your fears then! Drive away your despondency; shake off your gloom; and "hope thou in God," for he "openeth his hand and satisfieth the desire of every living thing."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XL.

ACTS xxii: 28. "And Paul said, but I was free born." It is probable that Paul's father had either purchased his freedom, or obtained it as a reward for services done the state, so that his children were free born.

ACTS xxiii: 5. "I wist not brethren that he was the high priest." Paul must certainly have known him, but his meaning is, that being irritated as he was by the insult offered him, he did not consider that it was the high priest.

ACTS xxiii: 8. "For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit, but the Pharisees confess both."

The Sadducees allowed the existence of no intelligent beings besides God and men. Spirits do not in this place mean spirits or souls of men, for it is afterwards supposed (see verse 9.) that a spirit might have spoken to Paul, so that they must have meant some invisible being, the messenger of God to men—a kind of apparition, or something at least similar to an angel. And we are led to this interpretation by all the articles of belief—viz, "resurrection, angel and spirit"—being comprehended under two; it being said that, "the Pharisees confessed both"—that is both the resurrection, and the doctrine of angels or spirits.

ACTS xxiv: 5. "And a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes." The Jewish Christians were always called Nazarenes by the other Jews of their own country, and these who were original believers in Christianity were always afterwards distinguished for their zeal for the law, in conjunction with their belief in Jesus, and likewise for their holding that Christ was simply a man; some believing in his miraculous conception, while others maintained that he was the natural son of Joseph and Mary. And not a single instance can be produced of any Nazarenes, or Jewish Christians of that day, holding any other doctrine, which they certainly would have done had it been taught by the apostles of our Lord.

ACTS xxviii: 11. "Whose sign was Castor and Pollux." Castor and Pollux were supposed to be sons of Jupiter, the chief of the heathen gods. Images of these were fixed at the heads and sterns of their ships.

ENDLESS MISERY A CAUSE OF INFIDELITY.

Nothing is more common than for the advocates of a partial salvation, to affirm that the doctrine of Universalism tends to infidelity. We do not say, that professed Universalists, have never been known to embrace infidelity, but we do say that such cases are few and far between, the assertions of our enemies to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is not the object of the writer to turn the tables upon our accusers, just, and only, for the purpose of manifesting a disposition to oppose them, as they do us and our sentiments, but for the purpose of stating what is believed to be plain matter of fact. And in the first place I would say that nine tenths of the professed Infidels in our world have been believers in the cruel dogma of endless hell torments; and which belief was the direct cause of their abandoning the Bible as the rule of life, and casting it from them, as a fable and a tissue of lies.

The object I had in view at the commencement of this article was, to notice a case which came under my own observation, and which goes directly to show that the doctrine of endless misery is a fruitful cause of infidelity.

The case to which I allude, is that of the Rev. Mr. Church, of Stafford, Conn., who renounced the Bible, together with all forms of religion, I think in the spring of 1836. He had been what is termed a preacher of orthodoxy for 12 or more years. How long he had been settled in Stafford I know not, but for some years.

In an interview which the writer had with him, about the time of his renunciation, he frankly stated the reasons he had for so doing, and which were in substance as follows:

"I believe the doctrine of ceaseless woe, too repugnant to all the better feelings of human nature—I believe it can not be made to harmonize with the attributes of a kind and merciful God. This doctrine I believe is taught in the Bible, consequently I cast it away, believing that it never came from a God of love, and that its teachings are unworthy of my regard." I asked him if he did not think the scriptures could be made to harmonize with the doctrine of universal holiness and happiness. He replied that he did not, but if he could, he should be one of the happiest of beings.

This is but a single case out of the many which might be noted, all of which go to show that the doctrine of endless misery is a fruitful source of infidelity. Brethren in the faith of a world's salvation, we have a work to do. It is a work of immense magnitude. It is none other than to save our fellow men from the vortex of infidelity. It is believed that the principles of our doctrine will do it, while all else will fail. Let us see to it, then, that we do all in our power to enlighten the world, by diffusing right principles—principles which will cause the heart of man to leap for joy, and to impose implicit confidence and trust in the Father of our spirits, and in the religion of his Son, Jesus Christ.

THE BAPTIST REGISTER

Of this city, of October 2d, contains the following precious exhibition of its Editor's spleen and illiberality. Yet disgusting as is the Pharisaic bigotry here manifested, we can not forbear smiling at the various excuses he suggests as the reason why the Auburn Baptists were charitable; and most of all at the "forlorn hope" from whence the poor fellow tries to extract a little "comfort." The man who can derive comfort for a Partialist from the effects of Mr. Whittaker's renunciation on the cause in New-York, could extract at least a bushel of sun beams from a quart of cucumbers! But read Br. Beebe's charitable effusions.

UNIVERSALISM.—We hear that a great convention of these perverters of the gospel was recently held in the large town of Auburn, in western New York; that the assembly was so numerous it could not be convened in their own meeting-house, and the large Baptist chapel in that place was opened for their accommodation. The consideration of the great number of delegates is afflicting to the lovers of truth, but that a Christian society should have aided to enlarge their ability to spread their poison, and by their misguided courtesy dispel the dread of their ensnaring and delusive doctrines, must add to the aggravation. We should fain hope that there might be some mistake or palliation of the last part of this report. If true, it will be pondered over in amazement by all who love Christian consistency. Perhaps the great chapel here was built with the understanding that it was to be opened occasionally for the accommodation of any society. If so, the compliments paid by Universalists to the charity of Baptists in Auburn, will be entirely gratuitous. However this transaction may appear, as reported in different parts of the State, Baptists are the last people to give the slightest countenance to the ruinous sentiments of Universalism. If however the above mentioned intelligence be without palliation, there is no small comfort in the announcement contained in the following, from the New York Evangelist. It will be remembered that a short time ago we published an article from this paper giving the cheering intelligence of its prostration, which, according to the following, the Universalist press does not attempt to deny.

"PROSTRATION OF MODERN UNIVERSALISM IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK."—It may be interesting to our numerous exchanges, by whom the statement which we made lately, with the above title, has been circulated among nearly a million of readers, to be informed that the Universalist press in this city does not attempt one word of denial. Its truth is so palpable that even those who would be interested to prove it false, durst not even suggest that it is in the least particular incorrect.

The Messenger replies that there is not a Presbyterian minister in New York, who preaches the doctrine of election, reprobation, or infant damnation. To this we answer, that there is not a Presbyterian minister in the city of New York, who does not believe, profess, and preach the doctrine of particular election; and that the doctrine of reprobation is taught just as true Presbyterians have always taught it; and that there never was a Presbyterian preacher in the city of New York, that ever preached the doctrine of infant damnation. This we assert, knowing where we stand.

Still, this has nothing to do with our original assertion, respecting the forlorn condition of modern Universalism in this city. That remains unimpeached and unimpeachable.

We would also remind them, that while the application of the term—fool, is just as dangerous as that of "Raca," it is not half so well calculated to correct us of a mistake, as some kind, but positive proof our of being mistaken, would be.—N. Y. Evangelist.

"Perversers of the Gospel." The Gospel is "good tidings of good," "glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people." But the salvation of mankind from sin and misery, is gall and wormwood to Br. Beebe's holy and benevolent soul, and therefore Universalists are "perverters of the Gospel!"

"The assembly was so numerous" that it not only filled the Universalist house (which was once a Baptist meeting house,) but also filled every seat and a number of extra seats, in the "large Baptist chapel"—the first time it ever was filled since its erection, if we have not misunderstood what the citizens of Auburn told us. Very "afflicting" information, indeed, that so many should meet in Auburn to worship "the living God, who is the Saviour of all men!"

"The great chapel" was not "built with the understanding that it was to be opened occasionally for the accommodation of any society"—but was opened to us by the liberal Baptists who are its sole owners, to reciprocate some kindness shown them by the liberal Universalists, if I understand the affair rightly. And whatever Br. Beebe may think, feel, and say on the subject, liberal Christians of every denomination will rejoice to find increasing manifestations of brotherly and neighborly feeling in these acts of courtesy and accommodation which are being extended, more and more, by the different denominations to each other. In June last, the Universalists in Watertown opened their house to the Baptist Association; and a few weeks afterward, the Baptists opened their house to the Universalist Association.

tion. Other instances might be named, and they are increasing yearly in number—"it is the Lord's doing," and the wrath of Br. Beebe can not stay it.

The "no small comfort" of Br. Beebe, is less than a homœopathic dose, after all; as it is evident from the facts. There are three Universalist societies in the city of New-York. Early last Spring, Br. Lefevre, the pastor of one of them, removed to Hudson, leaving the desk to be supplied by various preachers, as the society could procure them, until they could settle another pastor. In the Summer, Mr. Whittaker, the pastor of another society, renounced Universalism, after being informed that the society was running down under his management, and would not be able to pay him his salary if he staid the year out. Thus Br. Sawyer, the pastor of the remaining society was left alone—the only settled pastor, but not the only preacher, of our order in the city. Hereupon the New-York Evangelist came out and announce! that what he calls "modern Universalism" (in contradistinction to "ancient Universalism," which latter he supposes is held by Br. Sawyer), was prostrate in the city, not being promulgated there by a single preacher. Br. Sawyer answered "a fool according to his folly," by showing that "true blue Presbyterianism" was prostrated in New-York, inasmuch as the doctrine of the "Confession of Faith," special election and reprobation, foreordination, absolute and total innate and connate depravity, infant damnation, etc., were not taught in a single desk in the city of New-York. This reply has given rise to the article which gives Br. Beebe, "no small comfort"—and what is it? Why, when the facts are known, it amounts to this—Br. Sawyer preaches what he always did—what Br. Whittaker preached—and what Br. Lefevre preached—that God "will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." The three societies yet remain steadfast in what they always believed, increasing in numbers and in strength. The youngest society (of which Mr. Whittaker had been pastor) rose as soon as that mill-stone moved off, and have now engaged Br. I. D. Williamson, of Baltimore, as their pastor, at a higher salary than they ever paid before, and with a unanimous vote. Not one single individual, known to be a member of either society, has been in the least shaken in his or her faith, or in his or her adherence to and support of Universalism, by Mr. Whittaker's renunciation, or by the assaults, boastings, and glorifications of Mr. W.'s new friends. On the contrary, Mr. W.'s late society is far stronger now than it was at his renunciation—abler and more united than it ever was—and Br. Sawyer's church has had a considerable increase of members also. This—is this the "no small comfort" which Br. Beebe hugs to his bosom to heal the "affliction" of the large meeting in Auburn! We sincerely wish him many and frequent "comforts" of the kind!

In conclusion, the false "electioneering" cry of our opposers, that Universalism is waning, will not answer their purpose one whit longer than any other falsehood. Its falsity will soon be found out, and the "lying watchmen on the walls" of Partialism, will lose the confidence of those they have deceived by it. So far, we care not how often they reiterate it. But it has a further pernicious effect. Identifying these leaders with religion itself, their dupes are in danger of a distrust of Christianity itself, when they come to the knowledge of the deception played off on them. For this reason, we would that the press in general, and the religious press in particular, would be careful to learn the truth on all subjects whereof they speak, and to affirm only what they know to be true. And that they may know the truth on this subject, we refer them to the 71st and 72d pages of the "Universalist Companion and Register for 1841," just published. They will there learn, that Universalism in the United States has gained 60 per cent. in preachers, 30 per cent. in societies, and more than 100 per cent. in meeting houses within five years, or at an average rate of about 14 per cent. per annum!

A. B. G.

P. S. Since writing the foregoing, which was unavoidably crowded out last week, we have received a communication from "W. R.," who, being better acquainted with Br. Beebe's standing among the Baptists, touches on points different from the foregoing. We therefore give both articles, (his and mine,) a place in our columns.

A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Mr. Beebe of the Baptist Register is lamenting that the Baptists in Auburn should be so liberal as to permit the Universalists to hold their Convention in their chapel, says that "however this transaction may appear, as reported in different parts of the state, Baptists are the last people to give the slightest countenance to the ruinous sentiments of Universalism." Now it is more than probable that our Christian (!) Br. Beebe, judges his denomination by his own malignant feelings toward Universalists—by the persecuting and revengeful spirit he has so frequently exhibited towards them; for nobody who knows Mr. Beebe has the least doubt, that if he had the power, the rack and the stake would soon be their portion. Heaven forbid that he should ever get possession of the keys of St. Peter!

So far as the liberality of the Baptists is concerned, we rejoice that we have it in our power to state that there is no denomination in the State which more frequently opens its meeting-houses to Universalists, than the Baptist. What Br. Beebe says about the "misplaced courtesy," of the Baptists in Auburn, will no doubt be properly appreciated by them—we do not believe they will thank him for this gratuitous interference with business that does not concern him. It is quite gratifying to think, that notwithstanding Mr. Beebe's outpourings of wrath, he is in reality as harmless as a "toothless cur," possessing, as is the case, little or no influence among Baptists generally. A Baptist clergyman gave him, not long since, through the columns of the Vermont Chronicle, a severe castigation for the intolerant spirit so frequently exhibited by him towards those who could not see in the same light that he did—and charged him with being more so of applying opprobrious epithets, than to win by love and convince by argument. The writer of this has frequently heard Presbyterians and Methodists speak of the abusive and insulting terms applied by Mr. Beebe to them and their views of the subject of baptism. And this is the man who presumes to read to others, lessons on Christian courtesy and consistency! O fie!

THE CHRISTIAN PALLADIUM.

I will be recollected that in number 37 of the Magazine and Advocate, the writer noticed the eagerness with which some of our opposing religious, and other periodicals, seized upon certain renunciations of Universalism. In that article the Christian Palladium was alluded to as having made and copied statements in relation to Universalism and certain renunciations of the same, which were untrue; and its editor was interrogated as to his reason for such proceeding. By publishing, the editor of the Christian Palladium had endorsed, or sanctioned, the account of M. H. Smith's renunciation, without the ingenuousness of giving the true issue of the matter, which it is presumed he must have known, if he read his exchange papers. He also did the same in reference to the position which Mr. Whittaker occupied in New-York previous to and at the time of his renunciation. This too, I think, he must have seen corrected, before he copied the statement. He now comes out with a reply to my article. And what does he say. I will insert his remarks entire.

"THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.—This organ of the Universalists complains a hile of the Palladium for endorsing and publishing Mr. Smith's and Mr. Whittaker's late renunciations of Universalism; says Mr. Smith has 're-renounced,' and that it is 'untrue' that Mr. Whittaker had charge of the oldest Universalist society in New-York, etc. Now this and more may be true of these men, but it does not make one hair white or black in reference to the unanswerable reasons assigned by Mr. Whittaker for renouncing his former philosophy. It was the truth, the influence of Universalism on the morals of the community, that induced me to copy the renunciation: I knew this doctrine to be a delusive and soul destroying error, from its fruits. It lays no restraint upon the vile transgressor of God's holy law: but assures him that if he dies in his blackest crimes, heaven will be his immediate and everlasting home. 'The doctrine which teaches men to do good as they have opportunity, and to love God because he first loved them, etc.' is not Universalism undisguised, as the 'Advocate' intimates. It is a covering under which it attempts to hide its pollution. It teaches that the liar and man of truth, the swearer and prayerful, the dissipated and temperate, the debauched and pure, the assassin and his innocent victim, and every sinner and saint, will all enter heaven together, and alike be happy. This is Universalism unmasked. And will the 'Advocate' say it is not?"

Look at this matter, reader. I stated that the editor of the Christian Palladium had alluded to a renunciation which had become a "broken cistern." I stated also, that it copied a representation, (or "important document," if he will contend for the application of a misnomer,) of Mr. Whittaker's which was untrue. What does he say about this? Why, "this and more may be true of these men." Why then did he, without explanation, copy the former statement? "It was the truth, the influence of Universalism, on the morals of community, that induced me to copy the renunciation." Put these two together and what does it amount to? Just this. The fancied (for it is nothing more than fancied) unfavorable influence of Universalism on the morals of community, induced the editor of the Christian Palladium to copy a statement which is untrue!—Either this inference is correct, or the editor has evaded my questions in the former article. Is this the effect of a belief in the all potent and very restraining doctrine of endless misery?

But I am told that "the doctrine which teaches men to do good as they have opportunity," etc., "is not Universalism undisguised." I advocate no other than undisguised Universalism, and shall allude to this unsupported and gratuitous assertion accordingly. Who is to be believed in this matter? I have no necessity for any other creed, than what the precise words of the Bible furnish me. This I have already intimated. The Bible teaches me to do good as I have opportunity, and to love God because he first loved me, and these are two principles inseparable from undisguised Universalism; these are principles which all Universalists believe and advocate; the assertion of the "Palladium" to the contrary notwithstanding. The Bible teaches me that the "Lord will not cast off forever," and that "God is love," and that he changes not, and these are matters inseparable from undisguised Universalism, and which from its prominent and distinguishing character, the doctrine of endless misery, and endless hatred, to the contrary notwithstanding. Now why do opposers to Universalism call that doctrine by its name, which no Universalist ever advocated or believed? Is it not because the spurious, and home made, they can successfully oppose, while the true undisguised, they are powerless against, and therefore choose to fight against a man of straw which they have misnamed Universalism.

But what does the Palladium say is Universalism? After denying that the Universalists believe as they say they do (is this a covering under which it attempts to hide the polluted head of opposition to true Universalism?) it goes on to say that undisguised Universalism teaches that the liar, and the swearer, the dissipated and debauched, the assassin, and every sinner, in conjunction with every saint, "will all enter heaven together." This, the Palladium says, "is Universalism unmasked. And will the Advocate say it is not?" Had the phrase been Partialist coined Universalism, unmasked, the Advocate would answer, no! But as the question and representation are stated, the answer is unqualifiedly, it is not. Undisguised Universalism teaches that the soul that sinneth it shall die. It teaches also, that with the saints in heaven there will be no liars, no swearers, (except those who swear in accordance with the pledge of Jehovah, recorded in Isaiah xlv: 23, 24,) no sinners, but that all these characters, as all the rest of mankind, all of whom have gone out of the way, will be reconciled to God, in accordance with the mission of the Saviour, who will "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied"—will exclaim—"in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." When this is accomplished what or who will shut them out of heaven? Will the editors of the Palladium?

But I have said enough on this subject—more than was at first intended. I am too much used to sullen misrepresentations of my faith, and too well aware that the eyes of community are open to these matters to fear them. I now say that Universalism is a doctrine which teaches mankind to do good as they have opportunity, and to love God because he first loved us—it does not that sinners and saints will go to heaven together, and the question is, Can this doctrine with its accompanying triumph of eternal love over the sinful, be a licentious one—not. What is the tendency of the "Palladium's" imaginary Universalism? If the "Palladium" has any thing to answer upon this point—any thing to urge against the true, undisguised Universalism, I will listen to it. In relation to the difference between disguised and undisguised Universalism, and the origin of the former, I will endeavor to administer a wholesome opiate to the sensitiveness of our opposing brethren hereafter.

QUERY.

The Christian Palladium has for a motto over its obituary notices—"O death! I will be thy plague."—I believe this sentiment with all my heart, but I allude to it for the purpose of inquiring what is its meaning when used by those who believe that the door of mercy closes at death. Who will be death's plague? Will death be plagued by endlessly damning immortal souls? If so, will not death be more merciful than He who gave immortality a triumph over it? If not, will not the plague spoken of, consist in the destruction of "death and him that hath the power of death, that is the devil?" Will some Partialist brother answer?

CASE OF REV. JOHN GREGORY.

The following brethren, viz. H. Ballou, O. A. Skinner, L. Willis, W. Balfour, J. C. Waldo, E. Hewitt, Clergymen, and B. B. Mussey, layman, were appointed a mutual council to consider the complaint of bigamy with which Br. John Gregory has been charged. The council met at the house of Br. Gregory, in Quincy, Thursday, the 3d inst. and after solemn prayer to God by Br. Ballou, proceeded to business.

A large number of documents were read and considered, both with respect to the complaint submitted, and the defence made. Every member of the council was greatly surprised that so abundant evidence had been adduced by Br. Gregory's lawyer, by one of the judges of Vermont, by the magistrate who officiated on the occasion of his marriage, by the father of his present wife, and others, which go to exonerate him from a blame in contracting his late marriage under the circumstances of the case. It appeared to the council that he had done all in his power to do, and all the statute of Vermont, (where he applied to be divorced) required him to do, in order to entitle him to the bill of divorce from the woman to whom he was married several years since, and who had wilfully deserted him more than three years.

Such being the unanimous opinion of the council, it was requested as justice to Br. Gregory and his worthy family, that the views thus entertained of the case, should be made public, and hence the following report. (which it is hoped will be published in all our religious periodicals) was drawn up as expressive of the views and feelings of every member of the council, in regard to the merits of this case.

The council having examined with due care all the evidences which were presented in relation to the case submitted, found themselves unanimous in the opinion that Br. Gregory having complied with the requisition of the law of Vermont necessary to entitle him to a bill of divorce, was led to believe by the advice of his counsel, that he was legally safe in consummating by marriage a contract entered into for that purpose with his present wife.

The council were also unanimous in the opinion, from ample proof, that Br. Gregory had acted openly and honorably towards his present wife, her parents, and all her connexions, and used no deceit in any particular, relative to the formation of his present marriage.

Furthermore, that the marriage was solemnized by a magistrate who, by letter to the council, certified that he was knowing to all the circumstances of the case, and that with this knowledge he considered himself in the way of his duty to unite the parties in marriage.

The council, in view of the evidence adduced in the case, are unanimous in the opinion that Br. Gregory has not violated the principles of morality, nor any divine law revealed.

REV. MARSHAL BRITTON.

We have received a communication from a gentleman in Stanbridge, L. C., informing us that the Rev. Mr. Britton, a Baptist Minister, has been dismissed from the pastoral care of the Baptist Church in that place for abuse offered a Mrs.——.

The falsehoods, and prevarications offered by Mr. Britton at his trial sunk him lower in the estimation of his brethren than did the story of the lady referred to above. Our correspondent wishes this matter made public through the papers, especially in the northeastern part of N. Y., as he believes this man unfit for a preacher, and thinks he has gone to St. Lawrence county, and probably will endeavor to impose himself on the people in that vicinity as a minister of the Gospel.

A QUERY.

Thomas Dick after speaking of the malignity of Mustapha, the Turkish governor, makes the following striking remark. "Could an infernal fiend have devised more excruciating tortures, or have acted with greater baseness and malignity than this treacherous and cruel monster."

Query. Which acts the most like an "infernal fiend," Mustapha, who tortures his fellow beings here a few days, or that God who inflicts the exquisite and endless tortures of hell torments upon a portion of his own offspring? If the cruelty of the former justifies entitles him to be branded with the odious name of an "infernal fiend," surely we may look in vain for an appellation to express the malignity of the latter.

LIFE AND HAPPINESS.

We're told, by some, that human life,
Is but a feverish dream—
A storm of ceaseless, angry strife—
Of enmity and sin.
That hope ne'er casts one sunny ray,
To light surrounding gloom;
And every cloud that darks the day,
Reveals a woful doom.

Life is no vision here; we see
Beyond what fancy dressed,
Life is a stern reality—
This thing by man possessed.
And if he would this boon enjoy,
And realize its worth,
Sad thoughts of darker days, should ne'er
O'ershadow present mirth.

This world is thought unfriendly, too—
A cold and distant sphere,
Where friendship ne'er extends her hand,
To wipe the starting tear.
And thus man droops and hangs his head,
Like some weak fragile flower,
That droops upon its lowly bed,
Nor seeks reviving power.

This earth our home—its fields how green!
How lovely and how fair!
E'en here are many glories seen,
And beauty every where.
Then why should we forget to joy—
To drink of pleasure's cup,
When nature's face with beauty smiles
To bear our spirits up?

SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF ST. PATRICK.

St. Patrick, the apostle and patron of Ireland, was born at Tours, in Gaul, about 373. His uncle was the great St. Martin, Bishop of Tours. His father was Calpornius—his mother's name Conchessa. In 339 being 16 years old, he was taken captive in Bretagne, and was brought to Ireland, where he was sold to Milcho Huanan, a petty prince of Dalaradia (in Antrim). Patrick fed Milcho's hogs, in which employment he had a hard time of it, rising early in frost, rain and snow, and was not slothful. In this way he learned the Irish language, manners and dispositions; and thus prepared himself for his subsequent successful labors.

In 395 he was released from his servitude and returned to his relations, with whom he remained two years.

Patrick, for 35 years, studied under his uncle, St. Martin, by whom he was made deacon. About 402 he went to Rome, where he studied the Scriptures for six years. In 429 he accompanied St. German to expel Pelagianism from Britain; and in 432 was appointed by Pope Celestin to preach to the Irish. He proceeded to Dalaradia, where his old master Milcho lived. He next went Southward, Westward, and Northward, until he arrived at Tarah. Here he converted Connall, prince, grandfather to St. Columbkil. In 434 he travelled to Connaught, where he converted the daughter of King Leoghair. Patrick again proceeded Northward, towards the West, to Tyr-Analgaid (now a deanery in Thom.) and converted many thousands. Colgan says he founded about 47 churches. He appointed bishops, ordained priests, and founded nunneries on his course to Louth. In 445 he built a cathedral, enlarged and beautified Armagh, and fixed his archiepiscopal see in it. In 448 he held a synod, and enacted many valuable canons in Armagh. He now passed through Leinster to Dublin, baptised the king and people. According to the Black Book quoted by Usher, St. Patrick celebrated Mass in one of the subterranean vaults, over which Christ's Church was subsequently built in 1035. In 454 he founded the Church of Ardagh, and consecrated Moel its bishop. For six years he made circuits round Ulster, Leinster, and other parts of Ireland. In 461 he made a journey to the Pope, to whom he gave an authentic account of the fruits of his mission. The pope received him with joy, confirmed him in his apostolate of Ireland and armed him with legative powers. On his return he passed through Britain, where he destroyed Paganism, excommunicated the wicked prince, Corotick, and established numerous monasteries and churches. He now for 30 years reviewed his labors, animated his flock, built churches, ordained priests, consecrated bishops, founded monasteries and nunneries, held councils, wrote his confessions, rules and canons, removed abuse, and after due retirement and contemplation, died in the Abbey of Paul, which gave rise to that verse—

"In Down three saints one grave doth fill—Patrick, Bridget, and Columbkil."

SUDDEN DEATH.—It is a remark of the thoughtless, that they would like to pass suddenly from the full enjoyment of life, to death—and we find also a clergyman using the same idea. It appears to us there is a lack of true philosophy in the thought.—Whatever may be our state of preparation, we feel that the associations of life, its business and its intercourse, tend to soil our garments, to distract our mind, and lead it off from the great object of human consideration; the lengthened death sickness enables us to remedy the evil, and set our household in order, to look on what we are leaving with that proper estimate of its uses, which enables us rightly to dispose of it, and to consider the relations and tendency of those whom we leave, so that we may properly direct their steps.

To rest on the "Mountains of Benlah," and to look beyond the flood, was the privilege of those who had sojourned long and carefully in the right road, according to Bunyan, and the rash foot that splashed aside the water of the divided stream, was not firm when the current set strong.

He who had contemplated long and profitably the slow approach of death, said, imploringly;

"Gently, most gently, on thy victim's head, Consumption, lay thy hand."

And life itself is little else than a consumption, by which we slide downward from the cradle to the grave. Yet a deeper slope and a greater angle in the descending grade, admonish us we approach the close of our journey, and give intimation for special preparation. He who is conscious (but who is?) of no imperfection, may wish to start upwards, like the perfect prophet, with "the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof." But in these latter day times, betwixt the flush of life and quenching of its brightness, moments, at least to say "receive my spirit," were cheaply purchased by a martyr's pangs.

A THRILLING STORY.—A thrilling story is going the rounds of the papers, taken from the "Naval and Military Magazine," which, stripped of all its embellishments is to the following purport:

On the day of the ever-memorable battle of Waterloo, Captain Walter Leslie's young bride, Helen, with feelings more easily imagined than described, took her seat at a window overlooking the field of that dreadful conflict; but being within reach of random shot, she, with the other inmates, retired to a barn as a place of more safety, and there remained in anxious suspense during the whole day. Some time in the night, Capt. Bryan was brought to the barn, badly wounded. Helen, with the necessities which her forebodings had suggested, tenderly dressed young Bryan's wounds, and after his revival, ventured to enquire after her Walter. Bryan's evasive answer, but too fully portended the worst. She begged him to tell her the circumstances, for she knew that her husband was dead. Bryan then stated that just before going into action, Capt. Leslie thrust a small Bible into his bosom, charging him that if he fell in action, faithfully to deliver the sacred relic to his beloved Helen. But a few moments elapsed before he did fall. After learning from Bryan the spot at which Walter fell, she went alone in the night, lantern in hand, into the field of the dead and dying, amidst the plunging of wounded horses and other frightful sights, in search of the remains of her beloved. On the point of returning in despair of finding the object of her anxious search among such a mass of carnage, her attention was drawn to an outstreched hand, on which was found the well-known ring of her husband, who was partly buried beneath a pile of other bodies. Whilst alone engaged in the release of the object of her affections, two soldiers, sent by Capt. Bryan, came to her assistance and bore "Ancestor's dear remains" to the same room with the wounded Captain. The Surgeon applying a glass to the lips of Leslie, declared that he yet lived. The shock of joy was too great for the delicate system of Helen; one vacant stare, and she fell lifeless on the floor, several hours being spent in restoring her to sensibility, and the embrace of her fond Walter.

The small Bible was presented to Leslie, by Helen, on their wedding-day; neither of them dreaming that the Holy Book was to be the salvation of the Captain's temporal life. The ball aimed at his bosom spent its force in the folds of the Bible, which is now religiously preserved in the family, as a perpetual memorial of that extraordinary Providence.—Rulegh Register.

EXERCISE. A MORAL DUTY.

The faculties with which our Creator has endowed us, both physical and intellectual, are so dependent upon exercise for their proper development, that action and industry must be regarded as among the primary duties of accountable man. "In all our conceptions," says an ingenious writer, "exertion is connected with success and renown." A triumph without an enemy combatted, and a victory won; a prize, where no course is marked out and no competitor starts with us in the race, are notions which do not find a ready admission into our minds. Such is our constitution, that, according to our usual train of thinking, where there is no exertion, there can be neither honor nor reward. Progress in moral and intellectual excellence is our duty our honor, and our interest. To be stationary, or to retrograde, is disgraceful. We came into the world feeble in body and in mind, but with seeds of improvement in both; and these seeds grow, according to the cultivation they receive from exercise. The body grows in stature and in strength, and the mind gradually expands. But exercise is requisite to the development both of our corporeal and mental capacities. In the course of years, indeed, the body grows; but without exercise, it is lumpy, feeble, and inactive; and the mind, wholly undisciplined, remains in a weak and infantile state. The exercise which is requisite in order to bodily health and vigor, and the evolution of our intellectual and moral powers is not only the chief means of our improvement, but also the main source of happiness. Without exercise of body and of mind, there can be no happiness.

MORE SPECULATION.—We yesterday heard of a case of speculation of a more grievous nature than that complained of by the Transcript of Tuesday. Two watchmen met in the street in the morning. "I caught an incendiary last night, Jack," said one of them. "I shall have him up this morning, and pocket the cool thousand." "Psha!" replied the other "don't be in a hurry, man. Rewards is goin' to rise. Hold on to your man till July, and he'll fetch you fifteen hundred."

The following incident gives a pretty good idea of the manner in which the London daily newspapers are supplied with certain portions of their crowded and various contents:

We remember to have laughed heartily at the reply said to have been given by a little boy in London, to the following question asked him by a gentleman: "What occupation does your father pursue for a living?" He answered with great simplicity.—He is a DREADFUL ACCIDENT MAKER, sir, for the Newspapers.

They who deride the name of God are the most unhappy of men, except those who make a trade of honoring Him. And how many of the self-styled, world applauding holy are mere traffickers in the temple, setting so much self-denial against so much future enjoyment. [Blackwood.]

A country editor says his paper has succeeded beyond his most sanguinary expectations. What a thundering bloody disposition the fellow must have!

A SERMON.

THE FOUR LEPERS.

BY R. THORNTON, 2d.

"We do not well; this day is a day of glad tidings, and we hold our peace!" 2 Kings vii: 9.

Our context informs us that the Syrian king and his armies had gone up and besieged Samaria, till the citizens were reduced to wretchedness and starvation. In this dismal state of things, four leperous men, who, on account of their disease, were required by the Jewish law to remain without the city, and being near perishing from hunger, formed the resolution to go over unto their enemies. "Why sit we here till we die," said one to another; "if we say we will enter into the city, then the famine is in the city, and we shall die there; and if we sit still here, we die also. Now therefore come, and let us fall unto the host of the Syrians; if they save us alive, we shall live; if they kill us, we shall but die." So they arose and went; and in the mean time, the Lord caused the host of the Syrians to hear a noise of chariots, and a noise of horses, even the noise of a great host; and imagining that the king of Israel had hired all the surrounding nations to come upon them; they arose and fled in the twilight, leaving their tents, and their horses, and the camp as it was. Then came these leperous men to the Syrian camp; and finding no man there, "they went into one tent and did eat and drink, and carried thence silver and gold and raiment, and went and hid it;" and came again and entered into another tent and did likewise; till reflecting on the abundant supply of rich provisions, which God in his providence had given them, and the perishing condition of their fellow-citizens, they formed the resolution and uttered the words recorded in our text: "We do not well; this day is a day of glad tidings, and we hold our peace." They accordingly went and gave information to the porters of the city, and the king's household within.

I. I have called your attention to this subject not in consequence of any hidden or mysterious meaning, which I have spiritually discerned, but from the moral lesson it contains and inculcates. If I mistake not, it is illustrative of the wretchedness of transgressors, the rich provisions of Gospel grace, and our obligations to make this Gospel known to our fellow creatures. I only ask you to receive it as a history, conveying useful precepts for correction, instruction, and reproof. To these points then permit me to invite your attention.

1. The wretched and perishing condition of the Samaritans may represent the state of sinners. Were the Samaritans perishing with famine? So is the sinner. He has wandered from the home of his soul into the desert regions of sin and iniquity. Like the prodigal in the parable, he has spent his substance in riotous living and is now in want. Oh, what are the consequences of his iniquitous course? Is it peace, and rest, and happiness? No, no; there is no pleasure in transgression—there is no enjoyment in iniquity. The ways of sin are gall and wormwood, and all her fruit bitterness of soul. Surely, the sinner famishes for the bread of life.

2. The day of glad tidings may represent the Gospel day. Gospel, signifies good news—glad tidings. The Samaritans were engulfed in wretchedness and perishing with famine: God provided an abundant supply for their wants, and sent the tidings by the lepers. So God first announced the Gospel of our salvation to the shepherds of Judea: "Fear not; for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people." The tidings of the lepers was, that they had found provisions and treasures in the Syrian camp; but the fishermen and publicans of Judea had greater, better, and more glorious news to proclaim: "We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write; Jesus of Nazareth the son of Joseph." Nathaniel said to Philip, "Can any thing good come out of Nazareth?" In like manner the Samaritans, on receiving the tidings of the leperous men, were intent to inquire if good could come from the enemy's camp. The king even arises, and says to his servants, "I will now show you what the Syrians have done to us. They know that we be hungry, therefore are they gone out of the camp to hide themselves in the field, saying, when they come out of the city, we shall catch them alive, and get into the city." But there was one who advised him to "send and see." Does a doubting Nathaniel ask, "Can any thing good come out of Nazareth?" Philip saith unto him, "Come and see."

The Samaritans would not have doubted had the tidings been that God had made windows in heaven, and rained bread unto them. The Jews would have believed in Christ had he been born in pompous splendor, and in some great city; but out of Nazareth! it can not be. So the news of God's great salvation is doubted by many in the present day. Do we say that all mankind will be saved from spiritual starvation and eternal death? The answer is: That can not be; it is too good news to be true. It is a device of the enemy of souls, to lead us on to eternal ruin. He knows that we be hungry, therefore has he hid himself in the pleasing doctrine, that he may catch us alive and get into the city. Samaritans, oh, "send and see." "Out of Galilee there ariseth no prophet!" Children of Jacob, "Come and see." Friends, do you doubt the universal goodness and tender mercies of our God? Taste, oh, taste and see.

The sinner is in bondage, disease and death. The Gospel is liberty to the captives, health to the sick, and life to the dead. It is bread unto the hungry, and drink to the thirsty.

"Ho, ye that pant for living streams,
And pine away and die;
Here you may quench your raging thirst,
With springs that never dry."

The lepers found an abundance for all the citizens of Samaria, but here is an abundance for the whole world. Jesus said, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever; and the bread which I will give is my flesh; which I will give for the life of the world."

Do you doubt the quantity? Are you afraid there is not enough for all? So did his disciples. When five thousand had followed him into the desert country, and climbed the mountain's rugged side, to hear his doctrine, and see his miracles; and had been all day without food, he directed his disciples to feed them. But whence should they procure food to feast so great a multitude? One saith, two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one may take a LITTLE! Another saith, There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes, but what are they among so many! Jesus said, "Make the men sit down." They did so; and the bread was divided among them. What think ye? Could the tenth part of them obtain a crumb? There was only five barley loaves, and two small fishes; yet every one of the five thousand hungry souls ate as much as he would. What? Was there bread enough for them all? Was none obliged to do without? Astonishing!! All ate to the full, and see the FRAGMENTS!! Now, think you, will the bread of eternal life fail? "Oh, thou of little faith; wherefore didst thou doubt?"

"We have, indeed, heard," says one, "there is bread enough in Joseph's store house; but it is a great way off, and of great price; how can we go and buy?" Not so, either: it is the free gift of a benevolent parent, who wishes us to eat, drink, and be merry. This bread—the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ—"is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart, that is the word of faith, which we preach. That if thou wilt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus Christ, and shalt believe in thy heart that God has raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved;—for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Dost thou hunger and thirst for righteousness? Come to Jesus and thou shalt be filled. "The spirit and the bride say, come; and let him that heareth say, come; and whosoever will, let him come, and take of the water of life freely." It costs nothing. "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come buy wine and milk, without money and without price." "In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." "Whosoever shall drink of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water, springing up into eternal life." This is the "river, the streams whereof make glad the city of our God." It was opened by love, and is supplied by love—the boundless and eternal love of God. Can you exhaust this fountain? Will the waters of life fail? Can you quaff dry this swelling river? Never entertain such a thought! no, never. For see, it is more boundless than the briny ocean—it has neither bottom nor shore!

"But I am afraid this bread will not answer the purposes of life. Is it possible it can satisfy my appetite? Is it possible it can prevent the gnawings of hunger?" Yes, oh yes; God hath said, "I will abundantly bless her provision; I will satisfy her poor with bread: I will also clothe her priests with salvation, and her saints shall shout aloud with joy." "Oh, thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?"

"But if I eat it will only answer my purpose for a little time, and I shall hunger again." What, hath not Jesus said, "He that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst." Again, "Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life: For my flesh is meat indeed and my blood is drink indeed." Not his literal flesh, friends; it is not his literal flesh that he would have us eat: that would be no better than the flesh of any other man: it is his doctrine which he would have us receive into our hearts, and practice in our lives. "The flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you are spirit, and they are life."

"Eternal Wisdom has prepared
A soul-reviving feast;
And bids our longing appetites
The rich provision taste."

Such is our glorious Gospel feast; in quality

it can not be bettered; in quantity, enough for every soul. Oh, how much better is our table furnished than that of any other denomination. Ours is free: every one may partake without money and without price. Theirs is procured by the hardest. It costs them much writhing and agonizing to placate infinite complacency, change infinite immutability, and render infinite benevolence more propitious. It costs them many deep groans and bitter sighs to reconcile an incensed God to his creatures. They endure much in traveling the thorny road of virtue—in penitence—and in the throes and agonies of the new birth: and after all, how hardly are they saved! Nine chances to ten, they miss of heaven at last.

Our table is inexhaustible. All may partake, yet the bread will not waste nor the waters fail. Not only is there enough for one city, but for the whole intelligent creation. Our opposers have scanty picking. Not only are they obliged to leave no inconsiderable part of their fellow creatures to perish from want—to die that most awful and inconceivable of all deaths, eternal anguish and woe; but here are friends and relatives, parents and children, with whom they must part, must part to meet no more! How great must be their fears that the bread of life will fail even them—that at last the mercy of God will be too limited, and his hand too short, to rescue them from everlasting burnings. So our opposers live. Oh, that they would be wise, and hear, and no longer eat such bitter herbs, and live on such scanty fare. Let them come to our camp and bless their souls with its rich provisions. We have an unlimited supply; we have more than enough for us and them. How much better is our living than our opposers! Surely, “we do not well: this day is a day of glad tidings and we hold our peace.”

3. Our glorious feast satisfieth us. We can neither ask, nor desire, nor think of any thing more or better than we have. It satisfieth every wish of our heart, though that wish be as extensive as the universe, and as lasting as eternity. But what is the food on which our limitarian neighbors live? Does it satisfy them? Ask the benevolent mind if there is any satisfaction in the contemplation that multitudes must spend an endless eternity in pain and wailing, in shrieking and writhing, and know that this will be unmitigated and endless! Ask the mother, while she presses her infant to her bosom, to reflect that her child may grow up in impenitence, and at the great tribunal be sentenced to depart with the cursed into everlasting fire, to endure excruciating tortures through an endless eternity—that she will behold it writhing in agony, and gnawing its tongue for anguish, and hear it imprecating her as an instrument in giving it a being—in cursing it with an existence which is an INFINITE EVIL! Does it satisfy her? Oh, can such partial and limited creeds satisfy a benevolent mind? Can such leanness delight our souls? “Wherefore then, spend money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not? Harken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness.”

II. Our subject conveys a useful precept for correction and reproof. It shows that if we have found Christ precious, and his grace free and universal, we should mutually spread the glad tidings, and enlighten and happily our fellow creatures. We are bound to be benevolent as we are social beings. If we can benefit mankind without injuring ourselves—if we can relieve multitudes from famine and distress—dry up their tears and cause their hearts to beat with joy and gladness—we ought, by all means, to do it. Let evil be unto him who is so cruel, ungenerous, and hard-hearted, as to leave his fellows to perish when he knows of a free and inexhaustible store, and tells them not. And is not the bread of life as valuable to sinners as temporal bread to the famishing? Surely we do not well, if we hold our peace—if we make no mention of the loving kindness of our Lord. We have found the bread of heaven, and shall we secrete it? The true light hath shined into our hearts, and shall we put it under a bushel? Why may not others also eat and live? Why may not others see and glorify our Father in heaven?

We have been asked what is the use of preaching if our doctrine be true? Just as if the abundance of bread would make it useless to tell suffering sinners of it. Why did the lepers carry the tidings to their famishing citizens? Was there not some use in it? If you were suffering hunger and the miseries of a grievous famine in consequence of a protracted siege, and I should go to your enemies camp, find them gone, leaving abundant supplies, would there be no use in giving the news, and should I do well to hold my peace, and enjoy alone the bountiful store?

The Gospel is preached that men might eat of the bread of heaven and live forever—that they might turn from their iniquities and become pure and holy. Until they do so, they must inevitably be wretched and miserable; for faith, holiness and happiness are inseparably connected. While men remain unbelievers, they will remain sinners, and while they are unholy they must be unhappy. All desire happiness: and when they are convinced that this can be found only in Christ, they will come unto him. The Samaritans that believed the tidings, hastened to the camp and found relief: those that believed not, still continued in the city and suffered the famine. We have glad tidings for every creature. “He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved; he that believeth not, shall be damned”—that is, while he continues an unbeliever, he must suffer the misery of his condition, and lose the enjoyment there would be in believing. Yet his belief or unbelief alters not the fact. Believing the lepers, made their tidings no more true, nor disbelieving them any more false. God’s universal grace is a fact, whether believed or not. But on believing and becoming holy, we enter into rest; in unbelief and sin, we are “like the troubled sea, whose waters can not rest, but cast up mire and dirt.”

Ask not, then, what advantage hath the believer, or what is the use of preaching? Did we know there was no use in it, we would gladly hold our peace. Could we believe a preached Gospel was useless—that mankind would be as well off without the Scriptures, without religion, we would burn our Bibles, join in demolishing every vestige of Christianity. But we can not believe thus. What are mankind without the light of the Gospel? Barbarians and heathens. What are we indebted to for our present prosperous state and happy condition as a people? What cause shall we assign for the morality, virtue, and good order of our citizens? Is it not religion that hath done this! that hath carried happiness inexpressible to many a bosom, dried up their tears and caused their hearts to beat with joy and gratitude?

Let me particularly address myself to those who profess this joyous faith—who are believers in the boundless grace and salvation of our God. Brethren and sisters: Our tidings are certainly better than that of the lepers. Theirs was bread that perisheth—ours that which endureth unto eternal life: theirs was to feed the body—ours to satisfy the immortal mind. We believe its quality is able to fill and satisfy, and its quantity “enough for each, enough for all, enough forever more.” Why then hold our peace? If its quality was poor, or its quantity small, our obligations would be less; but now is ours superior to all other sects. One believes its quality is able to restore perfectly its partakers, but its quantity too small for the great body of mankind. Another believes its quantity vast and unbounded, but its quality deficient. The first contends that Christ died only for the salvation of an elect part, but for this number his death is sure and efficacious; the second contends that he died for all, but has made the salvation of none certain, as it depends on conditions which they must perform, and therefore is of works. Such is Calvinism and Arminianism. One denies God’s goodness—the other his power. One makes the covering narrower than a man can wrap himself in it—the other, so thin that he is exposed through it. We discard the bad and unite the good of both systems. Hence our covering is large enough and thick enough for all our race. Our feast of fat things is as extensive as creation, rich as heart can desire, and lasting as eternity. This superior excellency of our system increases our obligations. We contend that our faith is better calculated to enlighten and happily mankind, than that which limits the Holy One of Israel, and the salvation of our God. Then certainly our duty is greater to serve God and spread this glorious Gospel. But is our practice greater? Will they not rise up in judgment and condemn us for our indifference and apathy? “For one poor grain, they labor, and toil, and strive; for a religion of gloom and desolation, their exertions are untiring and incessant; while we, who are blest with the richest boon in the universe of God, will hardly lift a finger for the emancipation of a world!” “Oh, tell it not in Gath—publish it not in Askelon, lest the daughters of the” infidels “rejoice—lest the daughters of our” opposers “be glad.” “We do not well; this day is a day of glad tidings and we hold our peace.”

This indifference and apathy may be owing in part, to the misguided zeal and indiscretion of the Orthodox. They have run to excess, and engulphed religion in superstition. Seeing the folly of their course, we have gone to the opposite extreme of coldness and apathy. They have done too much; must we therefore, determine on doing nothing? Is this right? Because they have driven religion into superstition, ought we to renounce all religion? Because they have made piety ridiculous, ought we to ridicule all piety? Do we discard the use of food and drink because some people have used them to excess, and thereby brought pain and misery upon themselves? Is this reasonable?

I have often thought of our faith—of our cause, and surely it is, of all others, the most glorious and heavenly. I have thought upon our condition and prospects as a denomination—upon what we are, and what we ought to be—upon what we profess to believe, and ought to practice, as members of a religious sect. Let me tell you the result of my meditations, and if you find any thing inconsistent—if you find any thing as it ought not to be, I trust you will rectify, and thus set things at right. I can not be mistaken in this supposition, for your good sense and candid judgment assure me of it.

1. Brethren; our opposers have delighted in slandering us. They have represented all Universalists as drunkards, gamblers, profane swearers, and the like. We know that such reports are false. We know that our character and moral worth will compare with other religious denominations. We feel confident we are no worse than they are; their word to the contrary, notwithstanding. But brethren, we ought to be better—better men, better citizens, better Christians. To say we are no worse than they are, does not answer the purpose; for certainly we are under superior obligations. We must be better. To say we have a better system, and yet do not practice better, would be saying they exceed us. They are justified by their faith in cursing and damning their fellow creatures, for they believe their God will, and it would only be acting on the principle of godliness. In us, profanity would be inconsistent: it would be a virtual renunciation of our faith. They are justified in hating and persecuting their enemies: they believe their God hates them, and should they not be like him? They believe the wicked are comparatively more happy in this life than the righteous, and they believe the wicked can repent and escape all punishment in the future. What then should prevent them from going on in sin and rebellion; and thus secure the happiness of the present life, while they trust to a death-bed repentance for that of the next. Not so with Universalists. We believe sin never yielded the least particle of real happiness, but is followed with certain and inevitable punishment. In committing a sin, we manifest the folly that a child would in running into the fire. Oh! what fools men are when they sin! Followed any way it is poor business. Its wages is DEATH; and that is a poor trade which a man can not live by. Oh! let us be wise unto salvation, and it shall be well for us.

Compare our faith with our opposers': how much more exalted, sublime, and glorious! Compare our zeal with our opposers': why so cold, so indifferent! Can it be that we are the most strangely inconsistent people on earth? Can we believe such sublime sentiments and yet remain inactive? Can we believe that heaven and eternal glory will be ours, when a few more fleeting days shall be told, and yet be so sparing and illiberal in our benefactions—so avaricious to hoard up the treasures of earth! Can we believe that we are born to an inheritance, incorruptible and immortal, reserved for us on the other side of Jordan, and yet set all our hearts on the fleeting things of time and sense? Have neither the rewards of virtue, the punishments of vice, the love and goodness of God, nor the hope of immortality and salvation, power to produce zeal and good works? Have we duly considered these things? I have said that if you found any thing wrong—if you found any thing as it ought not to be—you would doubtless rectify and set things right. I think so still; therefore excuse me for pressing the subject upon your consideration. I am confident that you are able and willing to do something towards building up the cause of Zion, and spreading the glad tidings of salvation to the needy children of men. I am confident you prize religion and morality too highly to be indifferent about its cultivation and growth. I can not be deceived in these things. You love to hear the sound of the Gospel, the psalms of Zion, and the praises of your heavenly Father too well to neglect meeting together for this purpose. Surely if you have good tidings, you will not hold your peace. Our feast is too rich and too great to enjoy it alone: we will call in our friends, our kinsmen and neighbors that they may rejoice with us. Our heavenly Father rejoices when his prodigal children return to him, and he feasts them on the dainties of his house, and shall not we be glad and rejoice in our king! Here we may eat and never hunger—drink and thirst no more. We can neither ask, nor desire, nor think, of any thing more or better than we have. It satisfieth every wish of our heart though that wish be as extensive as the universe, and as lasting as eternity. It is free: it is inexhaustible, all may partake of the mercy of God and yet there is mercy in store. Surely ours is a "feast of fat things; of wines on the lees: of fat things full of marrow; and wines on the lees well refined."

Is it possible we can believe such sublime sentiments and yet remain indifferent and inactive? Can we profess a doctrine every way calculated to happily the human mind—a doctrine not inconsistent with our best desires and feelings, and believe it to be a truth, and yet be so strangely remiss as to make no exertion to spread the tidings and advance the cause? Can we rest satisfied and let error abound? Do we well to hold our peace? Do not other sects show their sincerity by their zeal and exertions? And how can we manifest ours, if not by our works? "Shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works."

2. The character of our heavenly Father has been misrepresented. Total depravity and endless misery are a libel on his wisdom, goodness, and love. They represent him as infinitely worse than the most remorseless savage, or the blackest character that ever disgraced the page of history. Is all this nothing to us? Should we not vindicate the character of the Most High from the vile imputation? Should we not justify the ways of God to men? Were the characters of our patriotic fore-fathers calumniated, should we maintain such a criminal indifference? How much more should we endeavor to convince all that the Author of the Universe is not that changeable, capricious, cruel, and vindictive monster, these doctrines represent him, but is possessed of every adorable perfection, and is altogether good, just, and lovely?

3. The doctrine of endless misery has spread desolation and distress through our land, consuming the social affections, and withering in its career, the fairest flowers of innocence and the richest blossoms of happiness. It has driven hundreds to distraction and suicide, and wrung the hearts of thousands with unspeakable anguish. Again, I ask, is all this nothing to us? Can we sit as idle spectators to hear and see scenes like these? As well might we calmly look on and see the highway robber reach his plunder through the blood of the traveller, and not utter a word, nor lift a finger to stay his murderous aim.

Professors of the Abrahamic faith: let us arouse from our lethargy—let us awake from our slumbers. If we have one drop of faith, piety or benevolence, make it manifest by works. If we have any regard for the cause, do something towards advancing it: especially do not disgrace it by our acts—do not wound it in the house of its friends. Oh! do, for the sake of all that is good, lovely, or divine, either deny the name of Universalist, and faith in a world's salvation, or adorn the doctrine we profess, with "well ordered lives and a godly conversation." We are told by the inspired penman, that "faith without works is dead." Is our faith then dead? Let us bury it out of our sight and no longer permit its putridity to infect the moral atmosphere.

Unless our faith leads to good works, it is useless and worse than useless. Religion is a thing we can live and practice. The utility of any faith consists in making its believers holy and happy. Of all other systems, ours is indeed, the most perfect, glorious, and celestial. Others are the creeds of men—ours the work of Deity. But it is good for nothing if we do not live and practice it; and besides, other sects will never believe its truth, till they see its utility. Unless we let our light so shine before men that they see our good works, they would not be persuaded that the doctrine of a world's salvation was the truth, though one should arise from the dead, or an angel from heaven should preach it. On our daily walk our prosperity depends. Let us be Christians in word and deed. Let us so live as to be an ornament to Christianity, and glorify God, in our bodies and spirits which are his, while here below, and ultimately in his blessed kingdom forever. Amen.

PROFANITY.

Perhaps there is no one evil to be found among those who believe, or rather profess to believe, in our most holy faith, that is so prominent, and upon which our opposers have founded a worse, and I might say a more consistent charge than that of profanity. I have been and am still acquainted with quite too many among our denomination who would be men of irreproachable moral character, were it not for this base and soul corrupting practice. Surely there is nothing that appears so disgusting in the eye of the gentleman and the Christian, as that man who indifferently, and I had almost said unconsciously, takes the name of his God and Father in vain. There is no commandment in the Scriptures of divine truth that is more emphatically binding upon mankind, than that which prohibits this foul and wicked practice; and yet there is none which is oftener violated. "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain," is the language of Him who inhabiteth eternity, to the children of men. Dear reader, art thou an Universalist? and dost thou roll this unholy sin as a sweet morsel under thy tongue? Dost thou thus wilfully violate the laws of God and man? If so, I pray thee, as a friend and brother, "go and sin no more," no longer sin against our Father in heaven, and thus bring a foul stain upon His holy cause. But in all things endeavor to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, that others seeing your good works may be led to glorify your Father in heaven. I. GEORGE.

BR. GROSH—In looking over your paper of the 9th instant, I perceive a piece concerning me, signed T. C. Eaton, which he authorized me to suppress. As my authority for so doing did not reach you in season to stop the communication of Br. Eaton, a few words in reply from me will be expected.

In the first place, I never knew till after Br. Eaton had written the communication alluded to, that it was believed by every person that more than one instance was pleaded of my having been guilty of any want of sobriety or decency; and that one was sufficiently explained in my last, to which Br. Eaton alludes.

Again—my judgment with regard to the meaning of the advice of the Genesee Association is not changed by what Br. Eaton has said of their language. It left such an impression on my mind when I read it; and I believe, on the minds of the generality of the readers of the Advocate.

Once more—the Genesee Association never notified me that there was any complaint against me, nor did any body of believers in our faith. And I had supposed that only one instance was seriously charged against me, until after Br. Eaton had written his communication: which I sufficiently explained in a former communication.

Br. Eaton tells the public that they who signed the paper which was printed a short time since in the Magazine and Advocate, did it with a view to have the Genesee Association recommend me to the brethren in Herkimer county. How that could be, I know not, since the Genesee Association would not meet again until about one year from the time of signing that paper. So that Brs. Skinner and Grosh did not, perhaps act as unwisely as Br. E. has imagined.

I think, nor am I alone in the thought, that Br. E. has acted an unwise and uncharitable part in publishing his last communication; and that the time may come when he will regret its publication.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—I occasionally find time to peruse a new book, and when I have read one which is not only calculated to amuse, but to improve and elevate the moral feelings I feel a desire that many others should be induced to read it. Such is the character of a new work of the above title by Mary Howitt, and I would recommend all parents who wish to cultivate a spirit of perseverance in integrity and virtue in their children to add this book to their library. It is an excellent book for Sunday School Libraries.

DAY OF SMALL THINGS—A DREAM.

BY EV. A. C. THOMAS.

I spent the greater part of last evening in conversation with several steadfast disciples of the universal Saviour; and our communion was sweet, for we spake of the triumphs of redeeming grace, and the glories of the heavenly kingdom. Our hearts burned within us as we contemplated the victory over sin and death; and the prospective blessedness of all naturally led to a consideration of the means best adapted to bring mankind into the present enjoyments of the chosen people of God.

Righteousness of life, and its tendency to nullify the oft repeated charge of licentious influence; devout attention to the public ministrations of the word of truth; conference meetings; Sabbath schools; Bible classes; circulation of books and tracts; adequate support of periodical publications—these, and other means, were largely spoken of, and an ardent desire was manifested that we might give diligent heed thereto.

At a late hour I retired to rest; and scarcely had I fallen asleep, when I was visited by the angel of dreams, and was immediately subject to his influence.

"I will shave myself," said I, "for I shall presently have company—and personal neatness must be attended to."

The usual preparations being made, I took a paper from a large number that were piled on my table, and was in the act of tearing it, when a voice cried "Stop!" Instantly I dropped it, and said, "Who is it that thus addresses me in my own premises?"

"It is I," responded the paper; "and if thou wilt hearken a few moments, I will tell thee why I desired thee to stop."

Being disposed to lend a willing ear whenever assured that a reason is forthcoming, I sat down, and requested the speaker to proceed. Whereupon he proceeded as follows:

"Evangelist! thou hast been engaged for several years in the dissemination of Gospel truth; and thou hast been disposed, not merely to feed the multitude, but to gather up the fragments that nothing may be lost. Nevertheless, I have some what against thee. Art thou not one of the number of those who have despised the day of small things?"

"In what respect?" said I.

"In several respects," responded the speaker. "For example: wert thou not in the act of tearing me up for shaving paper when I commanded thee to stop?"

Not precisely apprehending the meaning of this question, I desired an explanation, which was immediately furnished.

"Thou seest before thee a messenger of good tidings. Examine me carefully, and thou wilt find me competent rightly to explain several passages of Holy Writ which have been greatly perverted by the wisdom of the world. And thou wilt see that I am able to answer several objections which that same earthly wisdom has often urged against the faith once delivered to the saints. And thou wilt also discover that I can so speak to the righteous as to encourage their hearts; so converse with the sinner as to turn him from the error of his ways; and so address the mourner as to dry the tear of sorrow and hush the sigh of grief. Nevertheless, thou wert about to destroy me!"

"Thou hast not overrated thy ability," said I; "but thou hast accomplished the work allotted thee. Thou hast told me all thou canst tell; and since I must needs have shaving paper, why shouldst thou object to being used in that way?"

"Because in destroying me, thou art despising the day of small things. For a single penny thou canst supply thyself with white (and therefore tongueless) paper many weeks; and by sending me on a missionary tour, I may be the means of saving at least one soul from death—and thou shouldst be welcome to the reward."

"But whither should I send thee?" said I.

"Send me whithersoever thou wilt—but only send—for thou canst not send amiss. Thousands of thy brethren in the human family are grooming in darkness and wo. There are thousands to whom I might prove indeed a light, to guide their feet into the way of peace—thousands to whom I might convey the Comforter, even the spirit of truth. Small thing am I—but despise me not. Rivers are composed of drops—globes may consist of grains of sand."

"But I fear," said I, "that in sending thee forth, thou mayst fall into the hands of one who will condemn thy message unheard, and trample thee under foot. What then wouldst thou say?"

"From an enemy I could bear it, yea, even submit to being used in the most ignoble way—but from one who professes to regard me as a herald of good tidings, I can not bear it without a murmur and a protest. I ask thee but to send me forth, and I will cheerfully labor and suffer reproach, so that I may peradventure be the means of doing good. Preach thou, and praise, and pray—but destroy me not."

"I will send thee forth to-morrow," said I, and my prayer and blessing shall be with thee."

So soon as I uttered this promise, the speaker returned most hearty thanks; and from the pile of papers from which I had taken him up, there came the sound of many imploring voices, "Send me, also! Send me, also!"

"I will send ye all," said I; and immediately they united in a thrilling chorus of joy.

Away, on the errand of mercy away,
We all shall be sent at the dawning of day:
And each to the people will utter a voice
In which the redeemed and the angels rejoice.

Salvation to man shall be ever our theme,
And glory and might to the only Supreme!
And Babylon's bulwarks shall totter and fall
When Jesus is known as the Saviour of all!

As streams in the desert to travellers are,
Who wander from home and from kindred afar,
The tidings we bear of redemption above
Shall come on the wings of the mystical Dove.

The weak shall be strong, and the fainting shall rise,
To welcome the tidings we bring from the skies.
For tidings of comfort and joy we'll impart
To the weakly confiding and lowly of heart.

The sinner from trespass and villainy shall turn,
When he in our message the truth shall discern,
And cleaving to virtue, his soul shall increase
In the knowledge and joy of the kingdom of peace.

And light from Mount Zion shall scatter all gloom,
And roses in Sharon shall flourish and bloom,
And mountains shall shout, and the valleys shall sing,
When men shall receive the salvation we bring.

The chorus ceased; the angel of dreams departed; and I awoke. The papers were lying undisturbed on my table—but ere mid-day they were out on an errand of truth and mercy.

Blessed are all they who in like manner shall be profited by the day-dream of A. C. T.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XLI.

THESSALONIANS. The epistle to the Thessalonians was written by the apostle Paul, to the church in Thessalonica. It was written at Corinth, A. D., 52, and is therefore the oldest writing of any Christian. We shall consider these epistles in the order of time in which they were written.

Thessalonians ii: 18. "But satan hindered us."

We observe once again, that the term satan signifies an adversary, an opposer, or an obstruction of any kind. And here we see the apostle applies it to the persecuting Jews. When Paul was at Berea, preaching the Gospel, he intended to have gone thence to Thessalonica, but a company of Jews came from Thessalonica and stirred up the people against him, so that he was obliged to flee to Athens, and therefore Satan or the adversary, hindered him from going to Thessalonica.

Thess. iii: 5. "Next by some means the tempter have tempted you," etc.

The Thessalonian Christians were tempted in various ways. 1st, By the persecutions which they endured from the Jews, they were tempted to renounce their religion. 2d, By the reproach which was heaped upon them, and the contempt with which they were treated by their own countrymen, they were tempted to renounce Christianity. And 3d, By the untiring zeal of the Jews to convert them to their religion, they were tempted to discard the religion of Jesus Christ.

Thess. v: 23. "Your whole spirit and soul and body."

Here the apostle alludes to the doctrine of the three-fold division of man by the Greek philosophers, but does not imply the truth of that system, much less that these three parts, the body, the soul, or the spirit were each capable of a separate subsistence. By the soul Pythagoras, Plato, and the stoics, understood the sensitive faculties of man, such as are necessary to animal life. By the spirit they understood the mental powers or the higher principles of a rational nature, and by the body they meant the animal part of man or the physical powers.

Now what the apostle meant was that whatever man be, or of whatever he consists, all his powers and faculties should be consecrated to God. This language of the apostle will no more authorize us to suppose that the soul or the spirit can subsist without the body, than that what is here called soul, can subsist without the spirit, or the spirit without the soul. Dr. James Macknight, a firm believer in the immortality of the soul, gives the same view of the passage and says, the meaning of the apostle is, "May your whole person, your understanding, your affections and your actions, be preserved by God," etc.

2 Thessalonians was written by Paul, while at Corinth, not many months after the former, viz. A. D. 52.

2 Thess. i: 5. "Which is a manifest token of the righteous judgment of God." That is, the Thessalonians by the patience with which they endured afflictions and persecutions, had proved themselves worthy of the kingdom of God, and also God's righteous judgment, in calling them to his kingdom. See Macknight.

THE JUSTICE OF GOD.

By those who oppose the doctrine of a world's salvation, it is often affirmed that "the Almighty is a being of inflexible justice." Now there is not a professing Christian of any denomination who will deny that the position here laid down is good; although it may, perhaps, be made to appear, that those professing Christians, who have the most to say in reference to the justice of God, are the last to admit that that very justice, for whose claims they suppose themselves to be so tenacious, will ever have its due.

From the fact that God is just, our opposers imagine that they have a powerful argument against the doctrine of universal grace and happiness. But how so, inquires the reader? I answer, and I will give it in their own words—"Man has violated the law of God; the penalty of which law is endless death. By repentance and a conformity to the conditions of the Gospel, while here in his probationary state of existence, he has the promise of forgiveness and life everlasting. But a neglect on the part of the creature to comply with the proffered mercy will forever seal his fate, and his portion will be with the hypocrite."

From this it must appear evident to the reader, that the ground taken by the opposer is simply this—that it would be injustice in the Almighty to confer the blessing of life and immortality upon the sinner as well as upon the professed Christian, and that it follows, as a matter, of course, that a just God will not save all mankind.

But by what rule of law or logic does the objector draw his inference? I answer, that it is by taking for granted the very thing to be proved and upon which rests the whole of his theory.—It has by him been taken for granted that the law of God requires the endless wretchedness of the transgressor; and if it is to be taken at all, it might as well be taken for granted, because, if those who contend for this doctrine should go to the Bible for proof, they would be unable to find ought to substantiate such a position.

But even taking this view of the subject, and, for the sake of the argument admitting, that the justice of God requires the endless condemnation of the transgressor, it must be plainly evident to every one that those who thus contend, rob God of his justice, and virtually admit that the claims of justice will never be satisfied, when they say, that the sinner, by "repentance," can escape the penalty of the law.

But let us look for a moment, and ascertain if possible, whether the admitted position that God is just, is an argument for or against the doctrine of a world's salvation. In the first place then, let me ask, what does the justice of God require? The answer of all will be, that the law of God be kept, and that too, to the very letter. Well, what does the law of God require? The answer must be, the perfect obedience of every creature, for whom that law was intended. The terms to be complied with in the law, are love to God and love to man. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Matt. xxii: 37—40.

Then, is it not perfectly plain to the reader, that the justice of Almighty God can never have its due, or be satisfied until every child of Adam, is brought into a perfect state of love and obedience? Instead, then, of the justice of God, affording aught for an objection against the doctrine of universal grace and holiness, it affords one of the strongest arguments in favor of it. Reader, search the Scriptures to see whether these things are so.

"AWAKE THOU THAT SLEEPEST."

When we look out upon the religious world, and behold the zeal with which the different denominations labor to advance the cause they have embraced, we can not but be struck with surprise at the marked difference. Some labor with unceasing efforts to spread the truth, as they believe it, and to make proselytes to help carry on the work; others are more lax, striving but little to advance their cause, while another class are almost wholly inactive, or they act only as opportunity may chance to present. Now, I say this difference of zeal strikes us with surprise, and I, for one, am hardly able to account for it.

I have often noticed that men when they were laboring for a valuable prize, would apply themselves with more zeal, than when they expected to obtain a prize of but little value. For instance, I have seen several individuals engaged in the same field, each receiving different wages, and as a general thing, those who expected the highest pay were the most ready to perform their tasks. And it seems to me we should expect to see the same spirit in religious matters! but alas! what is the fact? The very reverse of this. We see some, who expect for their labor and service rendered to God, to reap continual pain and disappointment here, and it may be everlasting misery hereafter, but they manifest the most zeal in their cause; others who expect, by well doing, to receive happiness here, and an uncertain reward after death, are less zealous though their reward is greater than the first; but a third class, who believe that by serving the Lord, loving his character, and obeying his precious Gospel, they shall be happy, and free from trouble and misery brought upon them by sin in this world, and that God in his goodness will bestow the gift of immortal life upon all mankind, are but passively engaged in spreading heaven's truth among men, notwithstanding their reward is the greatest of them all.

The reader, doubtless, begins to see the object of this article, and to divine who are meant by the third class referred to. I mean none other than the denomination to which we belong, viz., Universalists. It is a fact, of which I feel not at all proud, that in many places we lack sufficient zeal. We do not feel the need of engaging with our whole souls, in the cause of the blessed Gospel as we ought, or in trying to support the preached word in our midst, that others may see the goodness of God, and be led to praise him. We do not feel the benefit to be derived from the Gospel sufficiently, or in listening to the preached word from Sabbath to Sabbath. We do not see virtue languish in our midst from neglect, or our children growing up to spend the Sabbath in idleness, to forget their Bibles, and to take the name of God in vain. With how much propriety then, may the words which head this article be applied to us. Awake thou that sleepest, for already have our slumberings upon this important subject been too long. Let us come forth to a newness of life, for this is a duty we owe ourselves and our God.

We profess to believe in a God who is all goodness, love and mercy, and who will by no means clear the guilty, though he keepeth mercy for thousands; we profess to believe that our faith is the truth of Heaven, and is fitly calculated to satisfy every want of man in whatever situation he may be placed; we believe that God is the Friend of man, and will finally bring him home to his own right hand, to enjoy his presence forever more; "that every knee shall bow and every tongue confess, that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father;" and in view of these truths, how can we justify ourselves in neglecting to spread this glorious Gospel in our midst. How can we thus rest inactive, and see error spreading around us without a check. O, brethren, if we have a faith let us manifest it by our works; let us unite our efforts, renew our zeal, and strive to propagate the Gospel, and spread it abroad as much as lays in our power. Let us have the word dispensed in our midst, whenever there is an opportunity. Though the year is far spent, let us occupy what there is, for by entering the vineyard even at a late hour, we shall not lose our reward.

But perhaps an objection may arise after this manner. Our numbers are small, and we can do but little, besides we have much opposition to meet. Well, if we can do but little, let that little be done, for it is an old and true proverb that every little helps a little, and a continual dropping will wear a stone. So a little effort, if it be constant and well directed, will wear away prejudice, and strengthen truth, till its efforts shall in time, be mighty. If opposition beset us, be not disheartened for the truth will prevail. Christ and his followers had much and bitter opposition to meet, but they faltered not in their course. Neither should we, but let our opposers know that we love the truth, and are determined to have it propagated, in our midst as much as we are able, if it be but once or twice in a year, for it is better to have wholesome food once in a week than to feed upon husks all the time.

But another objection arises thus. We have many good and willing friends, but no convenient place to hold a meeting. This is truly an unhappy circumstance, but have we not some school house that could be obtained, or some hall, if so, there is the place to meet and worship God, and let us, as his servants, as a people that love God because he first loved us, occupy such a place as this. We learn that Christ entered into houses, and there preached, or preached under the broad canopy of heaven, or entered into the splendid synagogue as opportunity or occasion required. Let us then, his followers, not be particular about the place, but let us feel for ourselves and the promotion of Heaven's truth. Let us unite our efforts, and engage some worthy brother to meet with us, as may be convenient, and deliver the words of truth and life to us, and I trust, as the year rolls around, we should see our cause more loved, and our number more numerous.

But if no brother can be obtained, or no place to hold public meetings, let us meet among ourselves on each returning Sabbath, at some private house, and converse among ourselves, read and talk about the Bible, and the truth therein contained, and great good will be brought to our possession. Thus met the early Christians, not for purposes of sin, but to bind themselves with an oath to God, not to be guilty of any sin whatever, but to walk in wisdom's ways, serving the Lord. We are informed that by such meetings, our cause has been greatly advanced at the East, and why may it not be among us by the same means? I trust it can. Let us then, who profess to love the Lord, be up and doing. As I have before said, let us if possible have the preached word among us, if not let us meet among ourselves, that the truth may be loved and spread abroad. Let all who believe in the salvation of all men, awake to newness of life in these matters, strive to have the truth spread more widely, that all men may have reason to rejoice in the Lord, and be made partakers of the heavenly banquet on earth.

Finally, whatever means are employed to spread the truth, and pull down the middle wall of partition among men, may the Lord bless.—May the blessing of Heaven attend the faithful minister in his labors, and may he be the means of extending the truth over the earth, and may all people be made glad in the salvation of the Lord.

UNCERTAINTY.

I do not know that man can endure any agony more severe than that which may be produced by uncertainty. Even in relation to the common affairs of life, in which we feel an interest, the agony of uncertainty will be in proportion to the importance attached to the subject. I have seen a parent nearly thrown into spasms, by the absence of a child, and the uncertainty of its condition. The simple question, "Where is my child?" was sufficient to give liberty to the anxious love which she had struggled to control. And as she sought for it in the usual resorts of childhood, each vain effort only added to the keenness of the suspense which she endured. The child may have gone into the highway and been killed, or it may have fallen into the water and drowned; or it may have gone into the woods and lost its way; all these, and a thousand other accidents rush confusedly into the fond mother's thoughts. She beholds the probability, as she fancies it, that her child is now bleeding, or suffering, perhaps dying, and might be saved if she could but reach forth the arm of maternal protection; and her only support is a mere possibility of the safety of her absent charge. It is useless with the pen to undertake to describe the agony which that mother suffers. The great question now to be decided, and which the reader will decide without further comment is, would that mother be thus miserable, if her uncertainty could be removed, by assuring her that the child is safely within the protection of its father?

If such is the distress of the parent under the influence of uncertainty, with reference to the temporal wel being of a loved subject, what must be the agony caused by the uncertainty of its future condition; especially when, in the midst of that uncertainty, the probability of the worst possible emergency is before her. Nor will this observation necessarily be limited to the parent. All feel it. The friend, the brother, the sister, the father, the mother, are parted by the hand of death, while the survivors only know that the departed have entered upon the realities of eternity. Then comes the question, My friend, my kindred, where are you? What is your condition? O, that I could penetrate the dark silence of the tomb, and find an echo from eternity, to my question! And while the heart has thus yearned for that consolation which the Scriptures alone furnish, but which they have rejected, the priest has come, and pointed them to a gehenna, through which their sons and daughters are or may be compelled to pass. O, the agony of that moment! Hope once kindled up the joy of free salvation, but this they are told may fail, and certainly will fail with some; who those will be God only knows! Hope, even now, tells them not to sink in despair, for the lost may yet be saved; but alas! where one gleam of hope points them to an illumined sky, ten thousand dark clouds threaten to shut out the sun forever! Where hope struggles to catch one ray of peace for the departed friend, or child, the chill and cruel dogmas of men tell them their hopes are impious, and they turn again in despair at the uncertainty which shrouds the future destiny of mankind. Now tell me, is there any necessity for this uncertainty? Is there any necessity for this agony? Would the afflicted feel thus, if they realized that those objects whom they have yielded to the destroyer, had risen triumphant over death and hell, and followed in the footsteps of the Saviour, until they were presented pure and spotless to a Being as much more merciful than themselves, as the infinite is above the capacity of the finite?

The dread of this uncertainty pervades every heart. All acknowledge its horrors. As if to convince man of its untruth, God has made it awfully fatal to human peace. As if to impel man to search the record of truth, where this uncertainty will be removed, it has been made unnatural to the human heart, and unsatisfying to its desires. The dead—where are they?—What is their condition? The living, what are they? Will their expectations of joy in the resurrection state be answered and gratified, or will endless wailing, and ceaseless despair, and unconsuming agony be their ultimate portion? Is there, can there be any uncertainty about this matter, when we reflect that it is in the hands of a God who is love?

There are uncertainties enough to be encountered every day of our earthly pilgrimage, without casting the shadows of doubt upon the dead, or darkening the blessed light which a Saviour has shed upon the world of spiritual intelligences. If man wishes to dwell upon uncertainty, he can do it here, for he knows not what to-morrow may bring forth. He can, and too often does, shut his eyes against truth, and his heart against knowledge, and fancy himself in a world of darkness, and solitude, and doubt. The sun rises upon him to-day in brightness and splendor, and he is joyful—but he neglects to prepare for the storm; to-morrow comes, and its mysteries become to him the realities of cloud, and tempest, and temporary destruction. Prosperity smiles upon him now, and swells his heart, and fills his granary, and over-burthens his coffers. But he knows not how long these will last. Ere another week, perhaps another day, passes, he moves in the sphere of the afflicted, and tastes the bitter waters of adversity. But is this all? Are there no lessons here which more than repay him for his suffering? Does he not learn the secret of happiness, all imprisoned as it is, in the deep cherishings of the pure in heart? Does he not learn by every day's events, that the understanding which now sees as through a glass darkly, is capable of a more accurate and powerful vision, and that what was enveloped in darkness yesterday may be brought to light to-day? Does he not more clearly perceive the character of earth's mutations, notwithstanding all its mysteries, and learn, and rejoice in the necessity of relying upon a stronger arm than the mortal, for salvation in time of trouble? Yes, each day's uncertainty is but the preface to some other day's divulgings, and there are deposited the richest blessings of experience. And what is the substance of his experience? It is to receive the mysterious, as messengers from Him with whom there are no mysteries, and to trust for peace to him who is so exalted as to be the light of the Gentiles, and the way of life.

Do not all acknowledge this truth? Does not the grey haired father in Israel exhort the young disciple not to trust to the uncertainties of life for an approving conscience? Do not philanthropists caution men against laying up those uncertain treasures which moth and rust corrupt, or which may tempt the cupidity of envious men? Does not the parting friend recommend you to the care of Heaven, rather than to the guardianship of earth? Does not the dying mother leave her loved ones happily, when it is with the consciousness that she is hastening into the presence of One who is their changeless Friend? Does not the philosopher leave his speculations, and his fancy theories; and the theologian his creeds of men, and rejoice more intensely in the truth of Heaven? There is beauty and instruction in the answer to the question, why these things are so. They are so, because heaven is the resting place of the immortal, and God the benefactor of the mortal. We can therefore turn to these, when the heart is sick of the uncertainties of earth. For when we shall have done with time, the treasures of heaven, and the smiles of God will constitute our eternal salvation. Is this salvation uncertain? Perish the thought forever! Must we toil upon the uncertainties of life, and hope and distrust, and laugh and weep, laying our plans now only to see them fail of the object designed—must we realize how little we have upon earth, and how feeble is our hold upon that little; and, after the load of wo has accumulated upon us, until we can bear up under it no longer, turn to the ever-faithful invitations of him who is the way and the life, and find nothing but the same dark uncertainty there? We may exchange the painful uncertainties of vain pursuits, for that peace and spiritual enjoyment here, which accompanies well doing, but must it be only to make another and a last exchange of these joys for a greater state of uncertainty in the "spirit land," that we ever encountered and fled in the mortal? It were better that our eyes were closed in the sleep that knows no waking, of which mistaken men have dreamed.

Yet we are told that this life is but the dim shadow of the next—that the occasional gleams of sunshine which fall athwart our pathway now, will be hid behind the dark clouds of eternal despair, and that the tendency of all, to rush into them, will mark even salvation with doubt and uncertainty! Such a prospect has frozen many a heart with horror, even just as it was about to lean upon the strong word of promise. Such a prospect has startled many a philanthropic soul, and led it to utter the agonizing prayer, "who shall deliver me from the body of this death!" And it has prompted the deep, and the earnest, and the soul absorbing exhortation—"Beware, O, beware, my brother! Trust not your eternal salvation to uncertainties!" And who does? If any, we too, join in the exhortation, "Trust not your eternal salvation to uncertainties!"

I have heard this exhortation used by one who was trusting to a scheme of salvation which would damn nine-tenths of the human race, and to provisions of salvation, which might not be sufficient for one single soul. Is not this an extremely uncertain salvation? And does not he whose hope is the narrow trust to uncertainties for his own safety? Let the groans of thousands answer. Preachers have toiled and labored to show the poor sinner his condition; they have wept for him; they have almost felt that they would be willing to sacrifice their lives for his sake; they have invited, and plead, and threatened; they have told him that if justice had had its due, he would have been in hell long ago, and that even now; for aught he knew, before another morning, he might open his eyes in the regions of irremediable despair! And when we repeat to the preacher, what he will repeat in agony to the sinner, "your hope of salvation may fail you—leave it—trust not to uncertainty," the only reply we get is that the eternal salvation of all is extremely uncertain.

It is false! Men have trusted in uncertainty for an uncertain salvation. This we admit. They have wept, and groaned, and struggled for it. And we say to them, trust not in it, for there is a better. But we repeat, he who says that man's eternal salvation is in fact uncertain, states that which is false. The feast of salvation is not prepared for a few, but for all people. The tears are not to be dried up merely with reference to a few, but they are to be wiped from off all faces.—Righteousness is not to be confined to an isolated portion, but it is to overflow the moral world like a river, until the isles of the sea, and the solitary place shall be made glad, and the desert shall blossom as the rose.—"I have sworn by myself," says Jehovah, "the word has gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return; that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." This is neither a limited nor an uncertain salvation. It is as ample as universal homage, and universal acknowledgment. It is as certain as the eternal pledge of the Most High can make it. We say then, what has so often been said—but we say it to the believer in a partial and uncertain salvation—trust not to uncertainty. Turn from the creeds of men; turn from the unsatisfying elements human wisdom, view that salvation which is as extensive as God's intelligent creation, as sure as his word, receive it in your faith, trust to Him who is the Author and rejoice with us. #### BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION....NO. XIX.

In Isaiah lxxv: 4, 5, there are some allusions to the idolatry of the Jews, which require explanation. "A people that provoked me to anger continually to my face; that sacrificeth in gardens, and burneth incense upon altars of brick; which remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments; which eat swine's flesh, and broth of abominable things is in their vessels; which say, stand by thyself; come not near to me; for I am holier than thou." An explanation of these allusions, will set forth some of the abominations attached to idolatry.

1. "That sacrificeth in gardens, and burneth incense upon altars of brick." The pagans practiced their idolatrous worship in gardens and groves of trees, and offered incense to their idol gods on altars made of brick. The Jews when they entered Palestine, in order to save them from idolatry, were commanded thus—"ye shall destroy their altars, break their images, and cut down their groves." Ex. xxxiv: 13. And they were also commanded, when they reared an altar to the Lord, to build it of stone, but not of brick, because the idolaters make their's of brick. But notwithstanding these commands, the Jews had gardens and groves, and altars of brick, to do their idolatrous practices.

2. "Which remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments." Many of the Jews buried their dead in graves; but many of them had monuments or caves. Thus we are told, that Abraham bought of Ephron the "cave of Machpelah" to bury his dead; and in the end his wife Sarah, and himself were buried in it. Among the ancient Egyptians, it was customary to make numerous ranges of vaults, sometimes elegantly decorated, in which to deposite their dead. And in the ancient city of Edom, there are vaults above vaults dug into the face of perpendicular cliffs, as places for the dead. Now it was a custom for ancient pagans or for their priests, to go among the graves, and the monuments or caves, where the dead were deposited, to call upon the spirits of departed men, whom they pretended held communication with them. The Highlanders of Scotland had some such notions, and "had various superstitious modes of inquiring into futurity." Sir Walter Scott says, "A person was wrapped up in the skin of a newly slain bullock, and deposited beside a water-fall, or at the bottom of a precipice, or in some other strange, wild, and unusual situation, where the scenery around him suggested nothing but objects of horror. In this situation he revolved in his mind the question proposed, and whatever was impressed upon him by his exalted imagination, passed for the inspiration of the disembodied spirits, who haunt these desolate recesses."—Note in Lady of the Lake. Into some such practices of idolatry and invoking the spirits of dead persons, the Jews fell.

3. "Which eat swine's flesh, and broth of abominable things is in their vessels." The Jews were forbidden to eat the flesh of swine, because it was used by the pagans in the sacrifices and feasts, and because its use in Eastern countries, produces scorbutic complaints, especially leprosy. By the "broth of abominable things," reference is had to the practice of magicians in all ages of the world, of making a compound by mixing together the flesh of various kinds of animals and vegetables, and boiling them in a vessel, at the same time saying some of their charms over it. This compound was used in their incantations. So far had the Jews departed from the worship of God, that they not only fell into idolatry, but they adopted all the abominable practices connected therewith. While they became so puffed up in their own estimation, that they said to the few who still adhered to the worship of the only living and true God, "stand by thyself; come not near to me, for I am holier than thou." A pride of heart and a Pharaonic haughtiness, which are not without their followers, even in this age of the world, advanced and Christianized as it is.

It is worthy of consideration, that Christianity destroys all the horrors of idolatry. These horrors are fearful. In all ages, its blinded votaries, to placate the supposed wrath of their gods, have offered up human sacrifices. When the Jews, previous to the Babylonian captivity, turned away from the God of their fathers, they reared the brazen god Moloch in the valley of the son of Hinnom, and there they burned their infants in its red hot, outstretched arms. The Druid priests of Britain sacrificed so many human beings in some of their groves, that the very trees around, partially assumed the color of blood. On one occasion, when the Carthaginians failed in battle, they sacrificed two hundred children from the best families in Carthage, to appease the wrath of the gods. As late as the time of Nero, or Vespasian, in Rome, during the first century, a Greek, a Grecian lady, and some of the enemies of Rome, were buried alive, in order to propitiate the gods. Most of the African tribes now sacrifice multitudes over the graves of their deceased rulers, and on other occasions. And who does not know that in India, children are thrown into the Ganges, and helpless parents forsaken on the banks of the river? While, to delineate some of the vicious practices with which the worship of idolatry has been carried on in many instances, would shock every heart.

From all these evils we are free. And we are taught that God requires no other sacrifice than a pure life, upright conversation, "to love mercy, to deal justly, and to walk humbly." But why is this difference? Why are we free from all the evils of idolatry? It is because the sun of Christianity has arisen upon us with its divine light, exalting our minds above debased paganism, revealing to us, the one great immutable, and dominant Intelligence who reigns in the universe; who is not like man: but great in goodness and good in greatness, he guides and governs all things with consummate skill and wisdom, requiring the intelligent and moral worship of his children. We have no reason to suppose that we should have been otherwise than idolaters, if we had not received Christianity. We are no more gifted by nature, than multitudes of naturally talented men who have been born in pagan countries, and yet have bowed to pagan idols. It is only because the "Saviour of the World," has led us from the worship of created things to the homage of the Creator, "our Father who art in heaven." Should not our hearts glow with gratitude and our prayers be fervent to the God of all grace, for the inestimable treasure of light divine, and Christian truth most holy? Ough we not, as rational and intelligent beings, ever to manifest our praise to our unchanging Friend for thus raising us from the vice and degradation of idolatry, by obeying his precepts, by loving our fellow-beings, by doing good as we have opportunity? It is only in this manner that we can be grateful; for as we can not add either to God's glory or his happiness, so we can only discharge our duty to him, by softening the woes and adding to the joys of our fellow-beings. #### IMPROPRIETIES IN THE PULPIT.

[The following hints from the Presbyterian deserve serious notice; and in regard to prayers, some beside ministers would do well to remember.]

It is an impropriety in a clergyman to forewarn his audience that he has a very few remarks to offer, and then to prolong his address an hour or more. He should either avoid all preliminary announcements of the kind, or else afterwards strictly adhere to his promise.

It is an impropriety in a clergyman to preface his sermon with an apology of short notice to preach, or want of time to prepare, and when he has excited the fears of his audience as to the possibility of his proceeding, produces and reads a manuscript which every one perceives was not written in a day.

It is an impropriety in a clergyman to conclude a prayer which has tired every hearer by its indiscreet length, by saying, "but we are not heard for our much speaking," intimating that he had not already been guilty of much speaking!

It is an impropriety in a clergyman to take advantage of his praying to God, to tell the congregation some news which they had not before heard, or to praise some fellow worm sitting in the pulpit with him.

It is an impropriety in a clergyman ever to announce from the pulpit his own works, or to sound his own praises.

REMARKS.—Most cordially can we recommend the foregoing to the serious attention of all preachers of every denomination.

To the first item, we would add the impropriety of promising to an audience already kept listening for some time, "a few more words and I will conclude," and following it, after some time, with "one word more," and then, after some thousand words, saying, "in conclusion," and still not "winding up"! Nothing tends more to make a sermon seem long, than this perpetual promising to end it, and yet ending not.

On the second item, I would remark, that if you have nothing to say, the audience will find it out soon enough—if you are hoarse, they can hear it—if very unwell they will see it—and in each case, they will make all allowances necessary. Apologies should never be made, except where the audience can not know the reason of the mental or bodily weakness; and should then be brief, and true. When I hear a preacher preface a good and well prepared sermon with an apology, that he had not time, or is sorry he could not do better justice to the subject, or wishes some abler brother had been selected, I feel as if the preacher was trying to make the people believe that he is "a much smarter man than the sermon shows him to be"—or think of Dean Swift's reply to the lady who apologized for "the poor and humble fare," of a luxurious banquet to which she had invited him and which she had been preparing in his honor, with great expense of time, labor and money. "Why, plague take it," said the testy Dean, "you have spent money and time enough on it to make it good, if you had had a mind to do so! But seeing it is so bad, I have a crust of bread and a dried herring at home, I'll go and eat that for my dinner"—and off he went to the great mortification of the fine, but not veracious, lady.

The praying part of the advice certainly needs attention in congregations that stand or kneel. But where they sit, a prayer of a quarter, or even half an hour long, does not so much "crucify the flesh" of any except the one who prays.

The last item I am particularly rejoiced to see in our Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist papers. It is merely a repetition of the apostle's declaration—"For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake." 2 Cor. iv: 5. This example has been all unheeded too long by our Partialist brethren in the ministry. For years they have been praising themselves to the people—telling of their great desire to save souls—of their inextinguishable love of sinners—of what they would do, what they would give, and what they would sacrifice, (were it in their power,) to save a single soul from endless sin and woe. And then, to enhance their benevolence, love and goodness even above God's and Christ's, they have told their hearers of the multitudes of sinners that were going to ruin, whom Christ would sentence to endless damnation in hell at the day of judgment, and whom the all mighty God would press down with the weight of both his hands in irremedial sin and agony! This is one great reason why there is so much love of "the dear, good preacher," and so much dread and terror of God and of Christ, among our Partialist brethren. Let but their preachers declare God in as merciful and loving a light as they have preached themselves, and the people will love God as fervently and as deeply as they now love the preacher. I do hope the admonition will be regarded, and that this great, glaring, almost blasphemous, and most pernicious "impropriety" will soon be utterly done away in our Partialist pulpits. Indeed, I am persuaded that very few of them would ever have fallen into it, had they seen it in its proper light. But blinded by their creed—their believing God to be the stern, vindictive and unlovely being to sinners that they say he is, it followed as a necessary consequence of their own love and piety for these poor, God-abhorred beings, that they should thus preach themselves, and not Jesus, nor the Father of mercies, to the people. But may we not hope that some of them will see the "impropriety" of their course, (to give it no severer name,) and endeavor as earnestly henceforth, to induce the people to love God and Jesus, as they hitherto have led their people to love the preacher? Then, and then only, will they be enabled to say with Paul and his fellow apostles, "For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves, yourselves, your servants, for Jesus' sake"—"for the servant is not above his Master." ## POETRY.

From the Evening Post.

M A N .

The human mind—that lofty thing !
 The palace and the throne,
 Where reason sits a sceptered king,
 And breathes his judgment tone.
 Oh ! who with silent step shall trace
 The borders of that haunted place,
 Nor in his weakness own,
 That mystery and marvel bind
 That lofty thing—the human mind !

The human heart—that restless thing !
 The tempter and the tried ;
 The joyous, yet the suffering—
 The source of pain and pride ;
 The gorgeous thronged—the desolate,
 The seat of love, the lair of hate—
 Self-strong, self-defied !
 Yet do we bless thee as thou art,
 Thou restless thing—the human heart !

The human soul—that startling thing !
 Mysterious and sublime !
 The angel sleeping on the wing
 Worn by the scoffs of time—
 The beautiful, the veiled, the bound,
 The earth enslaved, the glory crown'd,
 The stricken in its prime !
 From heaven in tears to earth it stole,
 That startling thing—the human soul !

And is this man—Oh ! ask of him,
 The gifted and forgiven—
 When o'er his vision, drear and dim,
 The wrecks of time are driven—
 If pride or passion in their power,
 Can chain the tide, or charm the hour,
 Or stand in place of heaven !
 He bends the brow ; he bows the knee—
 " Creator, Father ! to none but thee ! "

A DISPUTE BETWEEN MEN OF HONOR.

The pleasant satirical 'Pickwick papers' furnish the following amusing description of a dispute between two young gentlemen of honor, which seems to have been conducted with much spirit on both sides.

"The belligerents vented their feelings of mutual contempt for some time in a variety of frownings and snortings, until at last the scorbatic youth felt it necessary to come to a more explicit understanding on the matter, when the following clear understanding took place.

"Sawyer," said the scorbatic youth, in a loud voice.
 "Well, Noddy," replied Mr. Bob Sawyer.

"I should be very sorry, Sawyer," said Mr. Noddy, "to create any unpleasantness at my friend's table, and much less at yours, Sawyer—very ; but I take this opportunity of informing Mr. Gunter that he is no gentleman."

"And I should be very sorry, Sawyer, to create any disturbance in the street in which you reside," said Mr. Gunter, "but I'm afraid I shall be under the necessity of alarming the neighbors by throwing the person who has just spoken out of the window."

"What do you mean by that sir?" inquired Mr. Noddy.

"What I say," replied Mr. Gunter.

"I should like to see you do it, sir," said Mr. Noddy.

"You shall feel me do it in half a minute, sir," replied Mr. Gunter.

"I request that you'll favor me with your card, sir," said Mr. Noddy.

"I'll do nothing of the kind, sir," replied Mr. Gunter.

"Why not, sir," inquired Mr. Noddy.

"Because you'll stick it up over your chimney piece, and delude your visitors into the false belief that a gentleman has been to see you, sir," replied Mr. Gunter.

"Sir, a friend of mine shall wait on you in the morning," said Mr. Noddy.

"Sir, I'm very much obliged to you for the cantion, and I'll leave particular direction with the servant to lock up the spoons," replied Mr. Gunter.

At this point the remainder of the guests interposed, and remonstrated with both parties on the impropriety of their conduct, on which Mr. Noddy begged to state that his father was quite as respectable as Mr. Gunter's father, and Mr. Gunter intimated that his father's son was as good a man as Mr. Noddy, any day of the week.

As this announcement seemed the prelude to a recommencement of the dispute, there was another interference on the part of the company ; and a vast quantity of talking and clamoring ensued, in the course of which Mr. Noddy gradually allowed his feelings to overpower him, and professed that he had ever entertained a devoted personal attachment towards Mr. Gunter. To this Mr. Gunter replied that, upon the whole he rather preferred Mr. Noddy to his own brother. On hearing which admission, Mr. Noddy magnanimously rose from his seat, and proffered his hand to Mr. Gunter. Mr. Gunter grasped it with affecting fervor ; and every body said the dispute had been concluded in a manner which was highly honorable to both parties concerned."

THE RESTING PLACE.—"So man lieth down, and riseth not till the heavens be no more ; they shall not wake, nor be raised out of their sleep."

However dark and disconsolate the path of life may seem to any man, there is an hour of deep and quiet repose at hand, when the body may sink into dreamless slumber. Let not the imagination be startled, if this resting place, instead of the bed of down, shall be the bed of gravel or the rocky pavement of the tomb : No matter where the remains of wearied man may lie, the repose is deep and undisturbed—the sorrowful bosom heaves no more ; the tears are dried up in their fountains ; the aching head is at rest, and the stormy waves of earthly tribulation roll unheeded over the very bosom of the pale nation of the dead—not one of the sleepers heed the spirit-stirring trump, or respond to the air-rending shouts of victory.

How quiet the countless millions slumber in the arms of their mother earth ! The voice of thunder shall not awaken them ; the loud cry of the elements—the winds—the waves, nor even the giant tread of the earthquake, shall be able to cause an inquietude in the chambers of death.—They shall rest and pass away ! and then a silver voice, at first just heard, shall rise to the tempest tone, and penetrate the voiceless grave. For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall hear his voice.

SLEEPING IN CHURCH.—It is a matter of record that about one hundred years ago an Indian was conducted by a discreet burgess to witness the service of the sanctuary on the Lord's day. When these services were ended, the citizen, on their way homewards, in order to impress upon his tawny friend the superiority of Christianity over heathenism, entered into a detail of the money appropriated by the congregation of which he was a member, for the support of public worship, the erection of the house, the salary of the minister, etc. To all this the son of the forest, who had observed the drowsy disposition which pervaded the assembly, replied, "Ugh ! Indian sleep just as sound under a tree, and not pay any money !"

DEATHS.

In Woonsocket, R. I., September 7, 1840, widow CYNTHIA BALLOU, aged 69 years. In speaking of the life and death of this mother in Israel, it is unnecessary to multiply words. It is perhaps sufficient to say that she lived and died in a manner becoming the Christian. Her husband, Thomas Ballou, died in Kirkland, Oneida county, just 14 years prior to her death. Three daughters live in that neighborhood, and they will doubtless rejoice, that their mother was permitted to die in peace. For more than forty years she had believed and loved the doctrine of the "restitution of all things," and as she honored it in life, she shared its richest hopes in death.

An affectionate daughter standing by the bed side, near the close of her life inquired, "What shall I say to the children in New York, when you are gone?" "Tell them," said the dying mother, "that I have a treasure in the skies, and have gone to receive it." Without one doubt or fear, she yielded her spirit to that God, whom she worshipped as the Saviour of all men. May the God of all comfort bless the children with the same measure of faith, hope and charity.

J. BOYDEN, Jr.

In Watervale, Onondaga county, N. Y., May 28th, Mrs. BETSEY WRIGHT, aged 63 years.—Mrs. W. had been a joyful believer in the glorious gospel of the restitution for many years ; she lived the religion of practical Universalism, and died in the triumph of faith. Even many of her neighbors of a more limited faith were constrained to acknowledge that Mrs. W. died a Christian indeed. Her funeral was attended on the 30th, and a discourse preached on the occasion by Br. E. M. WOOLEY.

At the same place, (Watervale,) August 21st, Mrs. LUNA WRIGHT, in the 35th year of her age.—Mrs. W. also lived and died a Universalist in every sense of the word. Her funeral was attended on the 24th, and a discourse preached by the writer to a large concourse of sympathizing friends.—May God administer consolation to the hearts of the mourners.

In Truxton, Cortland county, August 26, Mrs. JULIA A. SAMPSON, daughter of Abel and Elizabeth Perry, aged 31 years.

The deceased was a devoted, practical Universalist. Her faith was an unfailing support to the end ; through its cheering and upbuilding influences, she was enabled to triumph in the dying hour. When asked by a Methodist friend in her last moments, if she had no doubts relative to the future, she replied that her confidence in her Father and God was strong. And she died as she had lived, firm in the faith of a world's salvation. A husband and two children, by this dispensation of God's providence, have been deprived of an affectionate wife, and a kind mother ; and the aged parents of a dutiful and beloved child. Her funeral was attended on the 28th, in the Presbyterian Church, where a sermon was delivered by the writer, assisted in the services by Elder Burdick, Seven-day Baptist. "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

In Homer, Cortland county, October 6, Mr. JAMES WRIGHT, aged 68 years. This man for many years had been a consistent believer in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. He died rejoicing in hope of the glory of God, and was gathered to his father's in peace. Sermon on the occasion by the undersigned, assisted in the services by Br. T. J. Whitcomb.

A. C. BARNAY.

In Hanover, on the fourth of October, after a short and painful illness, AMANDA Z. LITTLE, only daughter of James Little, aged 6 years, 11 months and 22 days. The funeral was attended on the 6th in the Baptist meeting-house, at Angel Settlement, where the mourners received the comfort and consolation drawn from 2 Corinthians 1 : 3, 4, by the writer.

D. VANALSTINE.

In Marshall, September 20th, after a long illness, which a firm faith in the promises of God enabled him to support with exemplary patience, Dr. CONSIDER H. STACY, aged 46. This Christian brother, so led his life, as to gain the universal respect and esteem of every community in which he resided. Firmly attached to the principles of the Universalist faith, he showed the effect of those principles, in a well ordered life and conversation. He was a much esteemed member of the Medical profession. In bidding adieu to this life, Dr. Stacy was enabled to resign his wife and seven children into the hands of that God, who has said "Leave thy fatherless children to me, I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in me." May the God of all consolation bind up the broken hearts and wipe away the tears of these afflicted mourners, and may they through grace be prepared for a reunion with him who has gone before them into the world of spirits. The funeral services of Dr. S. were attended on the 22d, at the Universalist Church in Marshall, and a consolatory discourse was delivered by Dr. Joseph Sargent, of Cusawago Pennsylvania. The remains of the deceased were taken to Earlville for interment.

T. G.

In Marshall, September 20th, of dropsy on the brain, CORNELIA, daughter of Asa and Nancy Dick, aged 3 years. These bereaved parents are enabled to recognise in this sad event, the hand of a Father, and in the language of one, who was similarly visited, to say "it is well with the child." 2 Kings iv : 26. The consolation of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners, and a deeply sympathising audience, by Br. Sargent, on Monday, the 21st ult., at Br. Dick's school-house.

ABSALOM'S INGRATITUDE.

BY S. JENKINS.

The privilege of the present and succeeding generations, to learn wisdom from the experience of past ages, will be denied by none, but those, who repudiate every rule of government, except the special direction of Providence. That there are some in the present age of the world professing to be guided wholly by that, no one can deny; but where such a one is found, knowing so little of himself, and of the manner in which the world is governed by its great Author, the grossest ignorance, bigotry, superstition, narrow-mindedness, and all that degrades the "image of God," and paralyzes human effort, with cloaked wickedness and corruption, will be his constant and most cherished companions. His steps will be guided by them, and his head pillowed upon them.

Ingratitude stands high in the catalogue of crimes. While it deadens the moral powers, and renders the mind callous to the reception of good, nothing is so hard to be forgiven. When we have labored unceasingly and untiringly for the benefit of another, then, in return, to be repaid with ingratitude, especially where our labors were gratuitous, is too much for human nature to bear. The mind shrinks under it—the most cherished expectations are blasted in their spring, and the dream-like visions of hope fade away, and hide themselves in the never-changing night of oblivion.

Absalom was the son of David, king of Israel. Nourished by the care of an indulgent parent, he grew up to manhood. Favored with every advantage of a king's son, his obligations were neither few nor limited. Instructed in the precepts of his Maker, while his heart should have been warmed with love to Him, it should not have forgotten the aged and anxious father who taught them to him.

In the midst of all this, Absalom, after using all the arts of deception, cloaked under the simplicity of apparent innocence, to decoy him from the bosom of his father, commanded his servants, at a signal, to be given by himself, to kill his brother!

Upon this, Absalom fled into a foreign country. After he had been absent three years, Joab, the king's chief captain, perceiving the king's heart to be moved toward Absalom, formed the design of bringing him back to Jerusalem. Here again, Absalom, breaking through all the ties of affection binding his father to him, by fair speeches and courtesies, stole the hearts of his father's subjects; and in process of time he rose in rebellion—usurped the government—seized the sceptre, and sat down on the throne of his father; and at last, while his armies were employed for the destruction of his father, he was slain by the hand of Joab, as he hung between the heavens and the earth upon the limb of a "great oak."

Can any one read the history of this man, without being struck with his ingratitude? Followed as he was, by kindnesses, literally showered down upon him, and every means employed to secure his happiness, then, to imbrue his hands in the blood of a brother, and drive an aged father from his home, indicates that base ingratitude was connected with the blackest crime. What were the feelings of David under these circumstances? Mark him as he "went up the ascent of mount Olivet," with the tears trickling down his careworn cheeks, and the answer is easy.

The account given of Absalom, is a mirror in which many, at the present day, may behold their form, and if they would learn wisdom from it, the object for which it has been kept from "age to age," would be gained, and they made better. Let us try a case.

It is a common thing for some to say, that if they believed that God would save all mankind, they would roll sin as a sweet morsel under their tongue—they would indulge in every species and form of wickedness, till it pleased Heaven, by a providential stroke, to terminate their existence, and, as they say, "sweep us all to heaven." It is not my design to point out the errors, and expose the ignorance of those who make this assertion, but to hold up the ingratitude of Absalom, as a mirror for them, in which to behold their likeness.

Absalom was blessed with every favor, that a father who loved him, could bestow. Even in his barbarities and crimes, the soul of his father David, "longed to go forth unto Absalom," in his exile. What return does he make for all this? He adds still deeper stains to his guilt, and more convincing proofs of his ingratitude. He seeks to reek his hands in the blood of that father, and usurp his throne. Who does not detest the ingratitude of Absalom? Who is so degraded, as not to bestow on his conduct the merited rebuke? How would parents in this age of the world look upon the conduct of a son, who, after they had dealt by him as David did by his, should repay them as did his? They would love the son, but despise his conduct. Filial ingratitude! how dark the picture! If there is any thing that will "bring down the gray hairs with sorrow to the grave," this is it.

Now let us, for a moment, hold up the individual making this assertion, before the mirror of Absalom. His Creator has placed him in a world of beauty. Every where he turns his eye, it is met by objects calculated alike "to profit and to please." The flowers of Spring happily him, the showers of Summer refresh, and the fruits of Autumn bless him. The seasons afford a change, and variety delights the senses. He is constituted with a mind capable of, and furnished with the means for improvement, so that he may go onward and upward in the scale of existence, till the sphere of angels shall be but his, and still know no limit. The use of his faculties afford him pleasure, and pain is benevolently provided, to warn him of their abuse. What is unspeakably more, he can look beyond the mouldering grave to a life of peace and joy, in which, purified, and washed white in the blood of the Lamb, he can chant the paean of redemption, while endless ages roll. The funeral knell is but a prelude to the song of triumph, when God "will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces," and we shall say, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad, and rejoice in his salvation."

This individual, surrounded with these blessings, and blessed with this hope, would murder, lie, rob, steal, etc., all because he believed his Creator was as good to others, as he wished him to be, and believed that he was to himself!! He believes that the Maker of all things loves him, and has provided for him "every blessing richly to enjoy;" and yet, because he is as good to others, he will break his law, which is just and good. If heaven has tears, it would shed them over such phariseism, and ingratitude as this. Who would disobey an earthly parent, because he was good? Yet, our heavenly Father, who is infinitely better, must be disobeyed for his goodness! Absalom's ingratitude weighs light, when weighed in the balance with this.

Let us follow Absalom to his death, and see what effect it had on his father, even while he fled before him. "And the king was much moved, and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept; and as he went, thus he said, O my son Absalom! Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" If David could forget the crimes and ingratitude of his son, and pour out over him such a lamentation as this, will not our Father in heaven, who is infinite love, and as high above David as infinite exceeds finite, manifest equal love towards his erring children? David's first inquiry of the messengers was, "Is the young man Absalom, safe?" Mark the tender care! Is our heavenly Father less mindful of his creatures? "The Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy." Indeed, every thing which has come from his creating hand, speaks his benevolence. From the lowest reptile that creeps upon the earth, to the highest seraph in the celestial court, it is dispensed with the same unsparring hand.

David was separated from his son, in appearance forever. When the night of death came hovering on, and Absalom sunk into his grave, what bitterness was in the parent's soul? His furrowed cheeks were wet with his tears. He wept for his son with child-like affection, saying, "O my son Absalom, O Absalom, my son, my son!" Now, if one soul should finally be shut out of heaven, it would become a place of mourning. If one soul should be shut from its reach, benevolence would shrink back disappointed, and mourn its weakness. The cries of misery would mar the joys of the "blessed above." Will any one say that heaven-assimilated minds will not feel for sorrow and suffering? Look at Jesus, as he wept at the grave of Lazarus; look at him as he went about healing the sick, comforting the afflicted, and wiping the tear from the eye of sorrow; look at him, as he wept over Jerusalem, that devoted city, in view of its calamities, saying, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem," etc. and then tell me, if compassion is a stranger to heavenly minds.

Since our Creator is thus good, what ingratitude must it be for man to do wickedly, on that account. But I will press the subject no farther.

Finally, David directed Joab, and those with him, saying, "deal gently for my sake, with the young man, even with Absalom." Now as the tender mercies of God are infinitely greater than David's could be, will those who look forward to an endless eternity of pain and suffering—who represent God as changing into a revengeful judge, to sink his miserable creatures in deeper damnation, ponder upon this, and tell the reason, why He will not "deal gently," even with poor sinners?

"O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness"—that they would labor to assimilate their characters to that of their "Father in heaven." Then would they become better and wiser. They would be preparing to live, and that is preparing to die. Then, when they came to the close of their earthly cares—when the limbs were palsy-ing with death, and its darkness was gathering around about them, the angel of mercy from the bosom of the Father, would make still brighter their hope of salvation beyond the grave, "and smile their soul away to endless rest."

HAVE YOU EXPERIENCED RELIGION?

The above question is one of very common occurrence and is used for a multiplicity of objects; sometimes doubtless from a good motive, for the purpose of testing the moral worth of an individual; but more frequently, perhaps, from inordinate selfishness on the part of the interrogator, in order to manifest the superior claims to virtue and religion, which his vanity prompts him to believe he possesses over the person to whom he directs the inquiry.

Those who act from the former consideration, mistake the true import and nature of the question, and can become no wiser from any answer which they may obtain from it; those from the latter, may be equally deceived in regard to the meaning of the question, yet the pride and arrogance which they manifest seldom fail of conveying the impression to the attentive mind that their intended object is satisfactorily realized. Hence the language of their heart, as clearly expressed in actions, if not in words, is, "stand by, come not near, for I am holier than thou." With this class we wish to have but little to do in this place, and will therefore content ourselves by simply observing, that, inasmuch as their predominant faculty, self-esteem, is gratified, "verily they have their reward."

Those who act not from speculative motives, but from pure conscientiousness, though less reprehensible, are nevertheless guilty of committing that most palpable of all errors, of supposing the pretensions of a man a suitable rule to estimate the real value of his moral qualities—about as correct as it would be to estimate his property by the apparel which he wore; for while it is true in the latter case, that the most indigent and detestable fop might pass for the most wealthy; it is equally true in the former, that the most degraded, hypocritical, self-righteous bigot might pass for the greatest philanthropist, and most profound and upright Christian. Indeed it would be more likely to be so than otherwise; for while there is a sort of delicacy which ever forbids real merit to manifest itself in a boasting manner, those actions known to be virtuous only by self-esteem, find a ready and an open advocate in those from whom they originated to render them that tribute of applause, to which the most virtuous are alone entitled. Those who act from the former principle, knowing that "he that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted," necessarily suppress even the least appearance of applauding their own acts; those from the latter, are continually rendering themselves obnoxious to the very charge which the wise and prudent shun, and are thereby continually debasing themselves, in the eyes of every discreet observer, with their own plaudits. Should such characters as these be asked the question, if they had experienced religion, the answer would doubtless be—yea, verily; "I thank God that I am not as other men, extortioners, unjust, or even as publicans. I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess." Thus, in the light of divine truth, would be manifest the vanity of their pretensions; "for," says James, "if any man among you seem to be religious, and bridlenth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain."

There is another reason which renders the question under consideration, useless in obtaining any information in regard to the moral worth of an individual. I allude to the universal application of the term "religion." It is not restricted in its use to any particular creed or profession, but has a general application to denote any system of faith, whether that system be Jewish, Christian, Pagan, or Mahometan. Hence Paul in a subsequent period of his life, when alluding to the time of persecuting the church of Christ with a relentless spirit, by breathing out threatenings and slaughters, and consenting unto the death of the best of men, says, "that after the straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee." Had he at this time, been asked the question if he had experienced religion, he could with propriety, from the view which he had of the nature of the question, have answered in the affirmative, although he was the "chief of sinners." Hence the impropriety of asking the question with a view to obtain any evidence in regard to the character of a person, is very apparent. A physician might as well on all occasions, approach his patients with the question "have you experienced a pain," and from the simple answer derived from that question, operate upon them as judiciously as those who consider themselves moral physicians could operate upon their patients from the mere answer obtained from the question, "have you experienced religion." For in the former case it might be very naturally supposed, in the absence of other evidence, that the pain originated from the teeth, to which the infallible remedy of extraction might be applied; when, upon a more minute investigation, the imprudent physician might learn to his shame and mortification, that the pain which his patient experienced was not caused by the teeth, but perhaps by the gout or some other disease. Thus instead of removing the difficulty, would be added pain to pain and sorrow to sorrow. Equally imprudent would it be in the latter case for the moral physician to operate upon his patient from the simple answer derived from his impertinent question. For if he had not other and higher evidence of the character of the man, he knew but very little about him; and to operate under such circumstances, with a view of bettering his moral condition, would be but a palpable manifestation of sheer ignorance on his own part, and could serve only to strengthen the cords of prejudice, by binding his patient still stronger to his favorite views, however erroneous they might be. Thus we discover in this case as in the other, that not only no good is done, but an actual injury, by rendering an evil still more difficult to be removed by those who might be competent, in every respect, to effect so desirable an object.

But perhaps it will be asked, what rule are we to observe in judging of the moral qualities of an individual? We answer, the infallible one of judging them by their works. "Every tree is known by its fruit; a good tree can not bring forth evil fruit; neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." "Men do not gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles." Here, then, we have it, plain and consistent, not subject to the imperfections attendant on vain and impertinent questions. By this rule we can discriminate between intrinsic value and empty vanity; between real merit and boasting quackery; between pure and genuine religion, and that which is impure and corrupt. For "pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction and to keep himself unspotted from the world." Do we see an individual striving to meliorate the condition of humanity, by feeding the hungry and clothing the naked—by administering comfort to the disconsolate and hope to the desponding—by sympathizing with the distressed under every vicissitude of fortune—do we see such an individual, I repeat, we need not ask if he has experienced religion. ## RELIGION AND POLITICS.

The friends of equality have always expressed a fear of the consequences which would result from a union of Church and State, and would date the downfall of our political existence from such a union. At the suggestion of the possibility of such an event, their ears are saluted with the fierce and angry howl of the Beast, as he tears in pieces his prey, the victim of pious persecution. Suggest the idea to the champion of civil and political liberty, and he shrinks back in horror, as the Inquisition, with its untold torture, passes in visible review before him. Suggest the idea to the friend of religious freedom, and the stifled groans of a Servetus come riding on the winds over the lapse of centuries, as he expires at the stake, surrounded by green oak wood, live from the forest, enkindled into a flame by the hot and fiery indignation of his relentless persecutor, the founder of one of our most popular religious creeds. Or he remembers with horror the early history of our own happy country, and the fate of the persecuted Quaker, calls up all his fear, and he cries aloud against the union.

But I would ask what is there in religion, opposed to equality in its most unlimited significance? What is there in the precepts and example of the despised Nazarene at war with equality—was he an aristocrat, surrounded by rich and powerful friends? No! On the contrary, he came from the despised city of Nazareth, a by word and reproach. Did he seek the society of the rich and opulent? No, he commenced his career in the lowest walks of life, surrounded by poverty, and subject to all the wants and privations consequent on the most utter and abject poverty. Did he aspire to elevate himself above his fellow men? Did he push his conquests, or lay the foundation of his doctrine on the ruins of another, overthrown by physical force? No! Put up thy sword, was his emphatic language. He who could have ordered a legion of angels to his rescue, and destroyed his murderers, we behold submissively led to the rugged summit of Calvary, where he breathes his last expiring breath in a prayer to his God for their forgiveness. Here we behold the crowning grace of his matchless merits. If the doctrine of Christ is founded on truth, why, I would ask, need we fear a union between it and any other system founded alike on truth? There is no disagreement between two principles of established truth? Then why fear the union? Why does the thought fill the mind of every true patriot with fear? Where lies the trouble?

I answer, in the corruption of Religion. Christians have advocated, and do still advocate, a principle of exclusive privilege. Christians have pushed their conquests at the point of the sword, or by the halter, fire, and faggot. Even our own beloved country has its foundations laid in the blood of martyred freethinkers. I do not wonder that the union of this principle with state affairs causes alarm in the bosom of every lover of his country. It is a principle which says in faith and practice—stand by thyself, I am holier than thou—I thank God I am not as you, an advocate of pernicious doctrines, for I pay tithes of all I possess to support preaching, and attend one day in seven upon the services of the sanctuary; you are not a fit subject for God's kingdom, nor are you a fit subject to rule over your fellow men. This principle enters the kingdom of heaven, and with bars and bolts, secures the entrance against a large portion of mankind. But there is a principle abroad which recognizes in the most degraded and miserable outcast, the embryo germ which is destined to be stripped of all its noxious qualities, and transplanted into a more congenial soil, even the sunny clime of heaven, where, fanned by the constant breezes of God's love, and nourished by his paternal care, it will forever bloom and flourish a flower of perennial birth, and undying beauty. It advocates no exclusiveness but admits into the realms of bliss every son and daughter of Adam's race—it is equality, democracy, in its fullest sense—the principle is Universalism. EARL GUILFORD.

MY OWN EXPERIENCE.

Messrs. Editors—Having been a member of the Presbyterian church in this town a short time, and becoming convinced of the fallacy of its doctrines, I submit the following article, as a brief sketch of my experience, hoping the young, (in whose welfare I feel deeply interested, being myself but a youth of twenty-two,) may learn not to be led astray by the excitement of the passions.

During my earliest childhood I was instructed in the doctrine of God's partiality by my pious mother, (whom I shall ever love and respect, for I believe her intentions were good,) and made to believe that He had created a part of the human race to be endlessly miserable, notwithstanding the many exhibitions of power and goodness in His works, all of which were continually at variance with the doctrine under consideration. I say, I was made to believe it. I was, at times; but in moments of sober reflection, when a thought of the future flashed across my mind, it never failed to draw the tear of sorrow from my eye, even when a child. Oft have I imagined myself looking into the dark abyss of woe, and beholding the victims of God's wrath rolling in the liquid lava of a burning hell. Oft have I awaked, and found my pillow bedewed with tears, at my own frightful dreams. The thought of a final separation, and that I might be among the superior number of disappointed candidates, harassed me day and night. My mind was "like the troubled sea which could not rest." But I durst not allow myself to doubt the credibility of such sentiments. At length, when a little older, so that I could reason for myself in some degree, I began to examine the subject, and call into question the reasonableness of such doctrines. Presbyterian ministers frequently visited my father's family, and I often asked them to explain the philosophy of their sentiments; and was as often told that the whole was a mystery and could not be understood by mortals. After studying upon the subject some time, I found myself between two opinions, undecided which to embrace; namely, the Bible as not written by inspiration, or the cold and heart chilling doctrine of endless misery. Oft did I exclaim in the language of another, "O if I am not permitted to cluster around me in regions of the blessed above, those dear images to which on earth I have so fondly clung—if there is to be a separation amongst the family of the most High, then let me sleep that dreamless slumber that knows no waking; welcome a green grave and an everlasting forgetfulness."

After several years of doubt and despondency, and fearing that I might, (as I was often told,) "sin away the day of grace," I resolved to take the "safe side" and make my "calling and election sure." I thought I would go forward in what are called "Christian duties." I asked "Christian" people to pray for me; and thus I was "converted." I was very zealous in attending class and conference meetings, where I took an active part in trying to "warn sinners to flee from the wrath of an offended God." I joined the Presbyterian church; walked with them some time. Had I been in prison I could not have felt worse; I felt that in spite of all I could do, many were going down to ruin. How all this could be I could not see. I then resolved to "search the Scriptures" and see if in reality they taught so unreasonable a doctrine. I have searched them, and thanks to God, the fetters are unloosed. The result of my perusal is, I now believe in the doctrine of impartial grace. But I assure you, I have not abandoned the cause of truth and religion; for I have just embraced it. And I ask those who may read this article, to examine my reasons for so doing without prejudice: weigh them well in the balance of scriptural truth before they condemn me.

My first reason is, there is no reason in it. Man is a finite being, and as an effect can not be greater than its cause, his actions must be finite. Now does a finite offence require an infinite penalty? Presbyterianism tells us, that for every offence we commit, we deserve to suffer endless torment. And as all have sinned, ("for no man liveth and sinneth not;") all deserve this endless penalty; consequently all will suffer it, for "God will in no wise clear the guilty." Such a doctrine is not taught in the Bible. The Bible tells us in a multitude of instances, that man shall be "punished according to his deeds," but in no place does it intimate, that this will be endless. It tells us, that, "the wages of sin is death." Presbyterianism makes a little addition and says, "eternal death." "The soul that sinneth shall die"—"shall suffer endless hell torture," says the popular doctrine. The Bible tells us that death shall be destroyed—that the time is coming when there shall be no more death; consequently no "eternal death." It also tells us, that God will "make an end of sin and finish transgression." When sin ceases, will not misery, the effect of sin, cease also? What then will become of the favorite doctrine of endless misery?

Second. Common sense, reason and revelation says, there is no truth in it. It had its origin in the dark ages, and still clings to many in civilized nations, and even in this land of light and knowledge it has full sway, and stamps an everlasting stigma upon the good sense of the American people. But thanks to Almighty God, the glorious star of Universalism has arisen, and sheds a ray of hope over our benighted world. It is continually increasing in effulgence, dispelling the dark clouds of ignorance and superstition, in which the world have so long been enveloped, banishing from the breast of man the gloomy doubts and fears which the shortness of time casts around his pathway, and points him with an undeviating aim towards the haven of eternal rest.

Third. It gives no comfort. Even if we think ourselves secure, we have friends near to us which we love as ourselves. To think that they must be cast off, gives continual sorrow. It gives no consolation to those who mourn; for we know not who are God's favorites. It throws a sigh upon the past and a dreary gloom upon the future. It causes man to abhor his existence. While I was bound down under its cruel chains, I could not desire to live. I knew I was adding sin to sin, and it would eventually be worse for me, unless I happened to be one of the favored few. And thus I had no real enjoyment. I thought of death with horror. But the Gospel brings "glad tidings." But does the doctrine of endless misery bring glad tidings? Is it then a part of the Gospel?

Fourth. It defames the character of God, and makes him worse than the most infamous monster. For he is infinite in all his attributes, consequently knows all things. Now can it be, that a being whose attributes are love, justice, goodness and mercy, will create millions on millions of creatures with the certain knowledge that they will be miserable? Yet thousands of our fellow men profess to believe it. Is this consistent with the character of God, who is "good unto all and his tender mercies over all his works?"

Fifth. It will not bear investigation. No man after a careful investigation of the subject can believe it; but it is either instilled into the minds of youth, or adopted in times of excitement, when reason becomes dethroned, (and both was the case with me.) In times of "revival" as they are called, nothing is to be heard but one continued stream of the deepest, darkest damnation. Instead of preaching repentance, as Christ preached it, "repent for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," the revivalist organ tells his hearers to repent, in order to shield themselves from the flaming sword of justice—to escape the liquid lava of a burning hell. Thus wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement, they take an imaginary tour to the regions of the damned, and roam through the dark caverns of hell, where they behold their nearest and dearest friends, and relatives writhing in the hottest furnace of the Almighty's wrath, and sentenced to remain there forever. This is, in fact, the only way to proselyte. For they are aware themselves, that they can not convince men by reasonable means.

What I have stated above, are a few of the many reasons I might give for the change, or rather enlargement of my religious views. I have embraced Universalism because I sincerely believe it is true. It is what the Scriptures teach. It is consistent with reason, and revelation, and holds up the character of God in its true light. It represents him as a universal Father and Friend, pouring out his blessings upon all, even upon the unrighteous and unthankful. In my next I will add some Scripture proofs in favor of my present views.

THE PROGRESS OF TRUTH.

BR. GROSH—Let me say a few words to you respecting the doctrine you advocate. It is about six years since I was led to embrace this glorious doctrine of a world's salvation. It was in sitting under the preaching of Br. Charles Spear, that I was led to examine my Bible closely and then, to my satisfaction, I found proof which gives me joy, and peace. Br. Spear found me in a degree cold and indifferent in the plan of salvation, but kindly took me by the hand and led me into green pastures of brotherly love.—He inculcated in my mind tender ideas, and taught me that there is religion in the observance of those holy precepts, inculcated in our Saviour's golden rule, also, to imitate him in all conduct, being benevolent, friendly and affectionate to all. Oh, if all who profess to have religion, would practice such, I think it would wake up the spirit of love in their hearts, and warm their souls with kindness to all. Such religion hushes the sigh of the mourner, and dries up the tears of the disconsolate; it makes light the afflictions of life, and sweetens the bitterness of disappointment. I can recommend this doctrine to the due consideration of all, not only on account of its consistency, and agreement with the instructions of nature and revelation, but on account of the good and salutary effects which it is calculated to produce on the minds, feelings, and conduct of men. It flees the mind from tormenting fear, and likewise awakens in the soul pure and holy principles. Oh! let all who profess the name of Universalist, walk as children of the light, and adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, in all things, and by so doing, we shall thus cause our light so to shine, that others seeing our good works shall be constrained to glorify our Father in heaven.

I think the time is fast rolling onward, when this noble truth will be generally believed, and practiced. The work was commenced on the morning of the reformation, when the waters of investigation burst the barriers of state policy. Ever since that period, creeds have been shaking, and they will finally flee like mists before the morning sun. As knowledge, and good feeling have increased, opinion after opinion has been struck from partial belief, as contrary to the character of God, and instead of beholding on the throne of the universe, a being of like passions with themselves, they will fall down and worship Him, who is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works.

CELESTIAL BODIES.

BY REV. RICHARD THORNTON, 2D.

"And with what body do they come?" ST. PAUL.

It may perhaps be thought that we have now broached a subject which our perception can not penetrate, or our finite faculties comprehend; and therefore one which should not exercise our minds, or engage our thoughts; but since our heavenly Father has seen fit to enlighten somewhat the darkness of our minds by revelation on this subject, it surely can not be considered improper for us, to understand what can be known concerning those celestial mansions, which our minds will be permitted to inhabit in the resurrection state. We confess that little is known by man, when compared to the vast unknown. Our knowledge is very limited, even concerning our "earthly house of this tabernacle." Man knows not the purposes of half the machinery within him. He can not tell how sensation is conveyed or remembered, or

"How know the nerves to hear the will, the obedient limbs to wield,
The tongue ten thousand tastes discern, ten thousand accents yield."

He can not tell how food serves the purpose of nutrition, or how vegetable substances are converted into animal—how the muscles by their contractibility are enabled to exert such astonishing powers, or how the heart and lungs are sustained in motion. And though so little is known of our present earthly bodies, yet, by the united lights of reason and revelation, some things may be known concerning our celestial tabernacles. An inspired apostle has been pleased briefly to inform us with what body man shall come forth at the resurrection into the eternal world. He tells us plainly that the body we at present possess is "not that body that shall be" ours then, (1 Cor. xv: 37,) and that when the present is dissolved, we shall be clothed upon with a "building of God," (2 Cor. v: 1,) incorruptible, powerful, glorious and eternal. When our divine Lord and Master was transfigured "his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light;" (Matt. xvii: 2,) and the Revelator, speaking of his glorified body, says, "his countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength;" (Rev. i: 16,) and Paul says it was "above the brightness of the sun." (Acts xxvi: 13.) Now our celestial bodies are to be "fashioned like unto his glorious body;" (Eph. iii: 21,) for it is to bear the "image of the heavenly"—of "the Lord from heaven." That heavenly body must be immaculate in holiness, for it must be one that shall please God, and because it is eternal, and eternity is a "high and holy place." (1 Cor. xv: 38; Isa. lvii: 15.) It will be a "building of God," for in the resurrection, the Creator will bestow upon every one "his own body." It will be a "spiritual body," for God is a spirit—without temptation, for "God can not be tempted with evil;" and without change, for whatever is eternal, must be the same, yesterday, to day, and for ever. And as "flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God"—as they can not compose our "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," it is evident our celestial body will be destitute of the "lusts of the flesh," and therefore without temptation and without sin, for "every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lusts and enticed." Being incorruptible and eternal it will be unchangeable, and indestructible. It will not be subject to decay, dissolution, or death. Weariness, disease, and old age will never be known to it. Having no decay it will need no renovation. It will possess an eternal vigor and be capable of exercising its faculties without weariness or fatigue. It will probably be able to wing its way from one part of creation to another with the velocity of lightning, visiting the outposts of immensity and learning the infinity of Jehovah's works. It will possess every sense and faculty in the utmost perfection.

It will be all sense, all intellect, all consciousness. It will be full of eyes and ears. All parts of it will be sensible of the impressions of light, and the vibrations of sound. It will be able to see every way to the greatest distance, and with the utmost clearness of perception. It will be able to hear all sounds, and understand all languages. It will recognize spiritual as well as material substances, and will always remember the facts and retain the impressions communicated to it. Oh how much knowledge then we shall be enabled to amass! If a man were all eye, how much he could see! if he were all ear, how much he could hear! if he were all intellect how much he could understand! If he could possess without confusion and retain without effort all knowledge—if he could intuitively solve the most difficult problems and trace the most distant causes to their effects, how vast would be his knowledge! how exalted his mind! And all these advantages will our celestial mansion possess, and innumerable more. It will be glorious beyond conception, and may even possess senses of which we can now form no conception, and powers of which we can now trace no terrestrial resemblance. It will be even brighter than the meridian sun, and whiter than the driven snow. It will be glorious in holiness, mighty in power, and immense in knowledge. "It will be all eye, all ear, all etherial and divine feeling." "Can man conceive beyond what God can do?"

Happy the man whose thoughts ascend
To mansions in the skies;
Where want and wo no more attend,
Nor tears bedew the eyes.

SOLITUDE.

BY MISS H. J. STONE.

Sacred solitude! How I love thy calm and holy retreats! 'Tis there that I learn my own weakness and folly—there, learn to compassionate the errors and sufferings of my fellow creatures, and in meekness ask forgiveness of my Father in Heaven, for all past offences. My soul there renews her vows of allegiance to prince Jesus, and gains fresh courage to press forward in the heavenly race—to pursue the straight and narrow path of rectitude and virtue. O, give me the sweet hour of solitude, or meditation, in each twenty-four—the hour to be alone, with my own spirit, to commune with the spirits of the departed—to elevate the thoughts above the atmosphere where sin casts its contaminating influence, to the Source of all purity, life and love, and I ask for nothing richer. 'Tis happiness complete—unmingled—pure! Let the shady grove beside some low, murmuring streamlet, be my temple—the bright green carpet of earth my seat—the sweet warblers of the grove my only songsters—the mild zephyrs of heaven whispering forth our heavenly Father's love and tenderness—and queen Victoria seated on her kingly throne shall not be envied by me! No, I shall be far, far richer! richer in that calm serenity of conscious virtue and rectitude of conduct, which none but those who retire from the jarring world can feel. Richer in the enjoyment which flows from a mind at peace with itself—at peace with the world, and in sweet communion with its eternal friend!

To all who are in the bright morn of life I would say, spend one hour of your happy ones in twenty-four, alone, if possible, that you may have time to think—yes, to think! In the giddy hours of youth we can not be said to think—all is bright and visionary before the mental eye—reflection can hardly find admittance into our thoughts. Pause, then, and retire within thine own breast; scrutinize its every intention and wish—its every hope and fear—see to it that all is right in thine own heart; then will you be better prepared to note the good or evil, of those around you. Think of the duties which are left undone—of sins which have been committed—of the influence which you have exerted on those with whom you have associated—of the pain you, by some careless word, have inflicted on the tender friend or the doating parent—yea, of the manifold mercies of God which have followed you every moment of time—think of all these and many more such like errors and blessings; and implore forgiveness for the past—seek wisdom to guide in the future; lift thy heartfelt devotions and thanksgivings to the King of all the earth; so shalt thou "grow wiser and better as life wears away."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. B. GUILD.

NUMBER XLII.

GALATIANS—This Epistle was also written by Paul while at Corinth, A. D. 53.

Gal. i: 9. "If any man preach any other Gospel, etc., let him be accursed." That is let him no longer be considered as a Christian, but be regarded in the same light as if he had abandoned the profession of Christianity.

Gal. ii: 18. "For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor."

That is, I undo all I have been laboring to do—I was in the way of justification, and now again subject myself to condemnation by making that necessary to salvation which I can not fulfil. By endeavoring to fulfil the law, which after all I am unable to do, I subject myself to condemnation and death. But though in this respect I may be considered as dead, it has pleased God, to give me life by the Gospel. See verse 20.

Gal. v: 12. "I would they were even cut off which trouble you." That is, expelled from Christian churches. He certainly did not wish them a greater evil, for this would be a direct violation of those principles which he himself enforced, with great force and eloquence in the command to love their enemies.

1 CORINTHIANS. This Epistle was written by Paul from Ephesus, A. D., 56. It was written in answer to several questions sent him by the church at Corinth, on which they were much divided in opinion, the principal of which was, relating to the doctrine of the resurrection.—Many of them had adopted the Gnostic opinions, which were, that the resurrection was not a literal or general resurrection, but either a change of life and conduct, or the release of the soul from its confinement in the body, at death. This opinion the apostle ably refutes and declares that if there be no resurrection, then their hope was vain, and their faith vain, and further that those who were dead had perished. See Corinthians, 15th chapter.

1 Cor. v: 5. To deliver such an one unto satan for the destruction of the flesh." By delivering to satan, is to be understood rejection from the Christian church, or communion with Christ, until the Christian brother should repent, or reform.

1 Cor. vi: 2. "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world." "Know ye not that we shall judge angels." These passages are acknowledged to be difficult by all the best commentators. Dr. Priestly, and the authors of the Improved version, say—"In ancient times the business of deciding causes always belonged to the supreme magistrate. Thus both David and Solomon presided in tribunals of justice. It is therefore taken for granted by the apostle, that whereas, in the prophecy of Daniel, it is said that "the kingdom shall be possessed by the people of the saints of the Most High," they shall act the part of judges. Our Saviour also said that when he should enter on his kingdom, his twelve apostles should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

The following from the Improved Version illustrates one fact which is very generally overlooked. "It is plain from this text, that whatever is meant by the phrase, judging the world, it is an office to which human beings may be made competent. To say that this expression means one thing when applied to Christ, and another when used of the saints, is gratuitous and unfounded. Perhaps the expression to "judge the world," may not imply any personal act, either on the part of Christ or of Christians in general. It may possibly signify nothing more than that the final state of mankind shall be determined agreeably to the declarations of the Gospel which was first promulgated by Christ. In the same manner the ancient prophets are said to have done that which they were only commissioned to foretell." See Jeremiah i: 10.

The above hints are certainly worthy of attention, and I think by comparing all the passages which speak of Christ's judging, ruling, or governing the world, it appears evident that all that is meant by it is that, God is now governing, or judging "the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained," (see Acts xvii: 31,) and that judging or ruling, (for so the word signifies,) is done by the Gospel, and commenced at the time our Saviour used the following remarkable words: "Now is the judgment of this world." See John xii: 31. Peter says, this "judgment must first begin at the house of God." See 1 Peter iv: 17.

Now as the apostles, and all who are engaged in promulgating this Gospel, are acting under Christ, they are said to govern the world. They govern the world by this Gospel which condemns or justifies, and in this sense the apostles are said to sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, because by them, was this Gospel first sent to the Jews. For an illustration of this, see Macknight's Commentary on 1 Cor. vi: 3.

THE GOSPEL—OUR DUTY.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

We believe the Gospel to be the truth of God. We believe it to be clothed with the energies of divine love, and therefore the power of our heavenly Father unto salvation to every one by whom it is embraced in its fulness. And thus believing, we are bound to exert ourselves in its behalf—we are to stand up for it—we are to contend earnestly for it—we are to be faithful in its cause.

"Holding fast," says an apostle, "the faithful word as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers." This language is found in Paul's charge to Titus. And in setting forth the duties of a Gospel minister, he also sets forth the importance of holding fast the faithful word—of remaining steadfast in the truth—of being firm in that faith which teaches that God is our Father—mankind our brethren, and heaven our home. In his epistle to the Philippian church he uses the following language: "Only let your conversation be as it becometh the Gospel of Christ; that whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the Gospel." Here spoke one who felt as every one should feel who professes to have embraced the Gospel of life and salvation. He knew that it was of the utmost consequence that the faith of which he spoke should prevail—that the Christian should be up and doing—that he should be a workingman in earnest, and contend earnestly for the truth, as one would contend for a prize in the Grecian games.

But how many there were then, and how many there have been since then, who of the true faith made, and have made, shipwreck. Urged on by some selfish motive, and blind to their own true interests, they turned away from God and his truth, and cast the weight of their influence into an opposite scale. And so it is with men now. Notwithstanding the many exhortations they have to hold fast the profession of their faith without wavering—notwithstanding the spirit of the living God is pleading with them in all the melting tenderness of heaven's boundless love, and urging them by every consideration dear and sacred to the heart, to remain faithful, they reject Christ—they reject the Gospel—they reject God and his mercy—they reject all, every thing holy and divine! and in the end reap the bitter harvest of rebellion and sin against a kind Father in heaven.

We should have a steady, inflexible regard for truth, because of its cost. It has cost the tears, and sufferings, and blood of an innocent Saviour. This is a price which can not be calculated in paltry dollars and cents. He knew the value of truth. He knew its power on the human soul. He knew the influences it possessed were sufficient to lead an alienated world back to God, and to fill the wide universe with rejoicing. And he descended from on high with the divine legacy. In the midst of perils and dangers he toiled to make it known. He faced the frowns of a world in its rebellion against God. He encountered shame and persecution. And his tears flowed, and his blood ran, and in agony he cried on the cross, and all to bear witness to the truth, and to give it an efficacy, and an influence, and a power, WHICH THE COMBINED FORCE OF EARTH AND HELL, SHOULD NOT BE ABLE TO RESIST!

CARD PLAYING.

It is said that cards were invented during the fourteenth century. When Charles VI., king of France, had fallen into a melancholy state of mind, his friends invented this game for his diversion. How long it was after the invention of cards, before the custom of playing upon wager, I know not. But this I do know, however, that the evils which have been entailed upon our race, through this medium, have been neither few nor small. How many now in the depth of poverty and crime, as they take a retrospection of their past history, are able to date the origin of their ruin to deleterious habits contracted around the social card table? I desire to ask the attention of all who indulge in this habit to the following incident.

"Mr. Locke having been introduced by lord Shaftsbury to the duke of Buckingham and lord Halifax, these three noblemen, instead of conversing with the philosopher, as might naturally have been expected, on literary subjects, in a very short time sat down to cards. Mr. Locke, after looking on for some time, pulled out his pocket book, and began to write with great attention. One of the company observing this, took the liberty of asking him what he was writing. "My lord," said Locke, "I am endeavoring as far as possible, to profit by my present situation; for having waited with impatience for the honor of being in the company with the greatest geniuses of the age, I thought I could do nothing better than to write down your conversation—and indeed I have set down the substance of what you have said for this hour or two." This well timed ridicule had its desired effect, and these noblemen, fully sensible of its force, immediately quitted their play, entered into a conversation more rational, and better suited to the dignity of their characters."

Reader, if you are guilty of this fascinating vicious habit, "go and do likewise." ALPHA.

VISITING THE GRAVEYARD.

It appears to me that the graveyard, instead of being considered, as it too often is, a place to call up in the mind unnatural thoughts, and gloomy associations, might be made one of frequent visitation, and the natural aversion which many have to visiting these "cities of silence," might, in a measure, be done away with. A well arranged, and adorned church yard might be made a spot for glorious contemplation. Let those graves which are covered with nothing but green grass, be strown with the choicest and the gayest flowers, as an emblem of a blissful immortality, and those tombs, now overgrown and surrounded with briars and weeds, be overshadowed with the foliage of lofty trees to represent the watchful care of our heavenly Father, and with what different feelings and emotions would we visit the place "appointed for all the living." Why this aversion to the place of our final home? Is it not the gloom and darkness which we are wont to associate with the grave, together with the loneliness of the surrounding scenery, that makes it so repulsive? To rid ourselves of the thoughts of death and the grave, which so naturally cling to us, intoxication in pleasure is often resorted to; but how often, when we would shut from our vision such unwelcome visitors, do they crowd in upon us and overwhelm us by the power of their influence. Neither the pleasures of intoxication, the stations of honor, nor the din and activity of business can shut out these thoughts, they are forever around, and within us.

We once had a dear friend in whom we could repose the choicest secret of our hearts, but who was carried to the grave in all the bloom and vigor of youth. To visit the grave of such an one, endeared to us by all the tender ties of youthful friendship, over whose early departure we mourned with all the bitterness of an agonized heart, to us seems to be one of the most natural emotions of the human heart. And how much might the pleasures of such a visit be enhanced by having him depicted in some lovely spot? Then, when the absorbing cares and perplexities of life thicken fast around us, would we wish to visit the place of the dead, and let memory, that faithful monitor of the past, run backward, calling up before us, the bright scenes of the past and the imagination forward, to the contemplation of that full and unrestrained enjoyment of seraphic immortality which awaits the infinite sphere of intelligences. The unbroken silence which pervades the lonely and solemn graveyard, inspires us with feelings of a highly devotional character—a serene and heavenly quiescence, and, pensive and thoughtful, with every stormy passion of the soul hushed, and the absorbing mazes of an alluring world, dissipated from our minds, we hold "sweet converse" with departed spirits, and imbibe those chastening feelings of religion, benevolence and gratitude which are the prerequisites to unalloyed happiness. With what pleasant and subdued feelings do we visit them in these calm and holy hours, when the gently departing sun, sheds his trembling rays faintly upon surrounding scenery, coloring it with a tint of his own glory, reminding us of the sunset of life, as it glimmers with languishing faintness and beauty in the socket of mortality, and of the sunrise, the resurrection morn, when we shall realise that happiness, the anticipation of which causes "joy unspeakable and full of glory" to flow over the soul, even in this imperfect state of existence.

Indeed, I am persuaded, that thus frequenting the scenes of the grave, would make us more acquainted with death—that a familiarity with these solemn scenes would tend to rob the grave of half its boasted terrors, and would excite our feelings and chasten our emotions, and exert a favorable influence upon our lives. Instead of looking up on the grave with feelings of horror and despair it would beautify the terrible vision of death. The contemplation of faculties expanded, of beatified souls going on in the full enjoyment of a rapid and painless immortality—the assembling together around us of those who are here endeared to us by many tender ties, the irrepressible aspiration with which our bosoms heaved while on earth fully satisfied, and our nature partaking of infinite love and boundless happiness. O, who would not wish to leave the low and imperfect pursuits and pleasures which cloy in our possession—who in this anxious contemplation would not be lifted from earth and his low desires, and feel the sweet influences of that burning hope throbbing in his breast, that he is destined to share in the enjoyments of this blissful existence? And what more appropriate spot on earth could we select for such thoughts than A LOVELY GRAVEYARD?

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1840.

AN EXCELLENT INVENTION.

"The Mnemosynum; Intended to aid, not only students and professional men, but every other class of citizens, in keeping a Record of incidents, facts, etc., in such a manner, that they may be recalled at pleasure; with an introduction, showing its benefits and its manner of being kept. By JOHN F. AMES. Utica, N. Y. Orren Hutchinson, 41 Genesee-street, 1840."

A character in Neale's Charcoal Sketches, dilates very feelingly on the advantages a man might derive from possessing a machine that would catch floating ideas—"an idea-catcher." No less useful is the plan and work of Mr. Ames. If the Cambridge, or Locke's Common Place Book was a very great and highly useful improvement on the Common Place Books then in use—and if the Rev. Mr. Todd's Index Rerum was a great improvement on that Common Place Book, and all other methods of keeping memoranda of things and facts learned in a course of reading—then surely THE MNEMOSYNUM is an improvement on both. It combines all the advantages of both systems—forming at once a blank book into which extracts from books and papers not easily to be referred to, may be copied at length, and regularly indexed, so that they may be turned to in a moment; and it can also be made an index of subjects, where the author, volume and page can be recorded, so that information can be had at any time, where to find the subject treated of at length. And it furnishes all this, at an expense far less than the Index Rerum, because the work, from its very plan, is more economical. Nor is it useful only to the student or professional man. Here the politician can enter extracts on record, or mark a reference to subjects in which he is interested, and to which he has frequent or occasional necessity to refer—as Sub Treasury, National Bank—Bullion, Specie, or Bank notes—Popular or Electoral votes—Tariff, etc., etc. Here also the mere business man, or the literary man, the teacher, the house wife even, may enter what they desire to remember, and be able to turn to it, (if a copied extract or recipe) or find the book containing the subject, in a moment of time.

How many precious moments has almost every man and woman lost in "cudgeling their brains" to remember some interesting or useful fact that has escaped their memory—or in hunting through volume after volume in which they suppose it may be recorded! They have read it somewhere—but where? That is the question—a question they can not answer, and no labor can help them to. Let them go to Br. Hutchinson, or some of the bookstores, where this work will be kept, (for few of the booksellers will be without it a great while,) and buy and use the Mnemosynum, (a word derived from the Greek, and signifying as I am informed, "Things to be remembered,") and they will hereafter not only save their precious moments, but avoid much perplexity, and be sure of finding what they want so much to use.

In conclusion, I most cheerfully and heartily recommend the Mnemosynum to every class of citizens, male and female, as the best form of a memorandum and Common Place Book—as fully comprising every advantage of the Common Place Book and an Index Rerum (an Index of Things or Subjects) combined; and as affording them at a much less price. Br. H. has them of various sizes—from one up to three quires—handsomely and strongly bound—and containing paper over which the pen glides with ease, and on which the ink rests without striking through. The paper is also neatly ruled, and the directions for using the book are so full and clear that no-one can misunderstand them. Let each of our preachers, in particular, procure one—it will save them much time and labor, in remembering and using what they study and learn from observation. It is one of the great labor saving improvements of the age. A. B. G.

TRACTS.

The Editor returns his thanks to some unknown friend who has sent him, through the medium of the Postoffice, two Baptist Tracts. The first, entitled "Conversion of a Universalist," is probably a falsehood from beginning to end; for Mr. A., of New-York, is still as firm in the belief of "the restitution of all things," as he ever was; as may be known by inquiring of his neighbors, members of the same church, Messrs. B., C., D., E., and F., all of whom, together with "Mr. A." were converts from the Baptists! The second tract, entitled "Dangerous tendency of the doctrine of Universal salvation," is as destitute of proofs from Scripture, reason, nature, or common sense, as is the former; and by its own showing, proves that its author was either ignorant of the doctrine he so summarily condemns, or that he wilfully misstated it and its tendency. In either case he is unfit to be a teacher of others.

Why, then it may be asked, do we thank the sender? 1. Because of the probable good intention manifested in sending them. 2. Because they confirm our faith in Universalism; for they are probably the best arguments the Baptists have against Universalism, and God knows they are but vanity, lies and weakness. 3. Because they will answer well for iron holders, or shaving paper, or lamp lighters! We would add a fourth reason, had the sender given us his or her name, that we might reciprocate the compliment by sending them another tract, which we received with these, composed of passages of Scripture, any one text of which has more weight on my mind than 20,000 such tracts as the first named. A. B. G.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION....NO. XX.

There is a passage in Hebrews, which, on account of the ambiguous manner in which it is expressed, is understood by but very few readers of the Bible.—Speaking of Melchisedec, Paul says, "without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually." Heb. vii: 3. In order to arrive at the truth exhibited in this passage, we must first ascertain about what subject the apostle was writing.

His subject was, the change of the priesthood from the tribe of Levi to Christ who was of the tribe of Judah. The Jews were very particular concerning their high priest—they had to know who his parents were—what was his genealogy—while the birth and death of their high priests were scrupulously recorded. Paul told the Jews that the new covenant or Christianity, had taken the place of the Jewish law; and as there had been a change of the law, there was also a change of the priesthood; for Christ was the great and continuous high priest of the new covenant. The Jews objected to this—they said that all the high priests must spring from the tribe of Levi; and that, as Christ was not of the tribe of Levi but of the tribe of Judah, so he could not be a high priest. How did Paul answer this? By producing an instance of a high priest, who never was of the Jews at all, and yet whom Abraham, the head of the whole Jewish priesthood acknowledged as a priest and paid to him tithes. This instance was that of Melchisedec. Who was Melchisedec? When the kings of certain towns fought with the kings of those towns which were established in the valley where the Dead Sea now rolls its dark waters, they captured Sodom and Gomorrah, took all their goods, and carried off Lot and all his possessions. When Abraham heard of this, he pursued the victorious kings, took from them all their spoils, and recaptured Lot and his goods.—

When Abraham was returning, it is said, "And Melchisedec, king of Salem, brought forth bread and wine; and he was the priest of the most high God. And he blessed him and said, blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth; and blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all."—Gen. xiv: 18, 19, 20. Observe here certain particulars. 1. Melchisedec was the priest of God. 2. Abraham, who was the head of all the Jews, acknowledged him to be the priest of God, by giving him "tithes of all," or a tenth part of the spoils which he had taken from the kings.

Now Paul showed the Jews that Melchisedec, an acknowledged priest of God, possessed none of the characteristics which the Jews considered necessary proofs of a high priest. They considered that the father and mother of the high priest should be known; that his descent should be traced from Aaron distinctly; and that the time of his birth and death should be recorded.—Melchisedec had none of these. He was "without father, without mother"—not literally so—that is, his father and mother were not known, for they are not recorded in the Old Testament. He was "without descent"—that is, there is no record of who his forefathers were. He was without "beginning of days" or "end of life"—that is, there is no record of the time when he was born, nor of the time when he died. It does not mean then, that he was literally without father, mother, descent, birth or death; but that these things are not known, because there is no record of them. Mac-knight's paraphrase of the verse under consideration, is well worthy of notice. "Was without father and without mother as a priest, so that he was not a priest by descent; and without genealogy in the Scripture, consequently there is no evidence of his being related to Abraham in any respect." Moreover, having neither beginning of days nor end of life as a priest, but being made a type of the Son of God, he remained a priest all his life."

This Melchisedec, Paul affirms, was "like unto the Son of God." How? Because he was both a king and a priest. He was called "Melchisedec," which means "righteousness"—he was king of "Salem," which means "peace." So that he was king to make laws, and a priest to settle difficulties to keep the peace. But the Jewish priests had no such power. Therefore they were unlike both Melchisedec and the Saviour. But Messiah was a priest to minister unto the wants of the people—to bind up the broken hearted, to give consolation to the mourning—and he was a king to make laws in the kingdom of Christian truth and to subdue every enemy to his government. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." G. W. M.

CONFERENCE AND DEDICATION.

A Universalist Conference was held at Ford's Bush, in Minden, Montgomery county, on Wednesday and Thursday, October 14th and 15th. One year ago a Conference was held in that place in a barn—the Lutheran meeting house having been refused to our friends at a late day, after having been promised to them—it was a cloudy, windy and cold day, and but three preachers were present. There, in cold and darkness they met—the elements and their fellow Christians of other denominations, frowning on them. But blessed be God, He did not frown on that meeting—He brought light out of that darkness and warmth from that cold. And now the Conference met again. The day was clear, bright and calm. The wrath of man had been made to praise God, and the barn was exchanged for a beautiful and neat frame temple, crowded to overflowing with pleased, and happy, and devout worshippers. Nine preachers were present—Brs. Potter, Whiston, Soule, Hicks, Hathaway, Kibbe, Belding, Pickering and the writer. On Wednesday morning the new meeting house was solemnly dedicated to the worship of "the living God who is the Saviour of all men," in the following order.

1. Voluntary, by the choir. 2. Invocation, by Br. Hathaway. 3. Reading the Scriptures, by Br. Grosh. 4. Hymn. 5. Dedictory prayer, by Br. Pickering. 6. Sermon, by Br. Potter, Ps. xcix: 5. 7. Address to the society, by Br. Whiston. 8. Hymn. 9. Benediction by Br. Potter. I may add here, that all the services were very appropriate, and the sermon in particular was in the preacher's very best style.

Sermons were also preached by the writer, Brs. Kibbe, Belding, Whiston, Hathaway, and Pickering; and it is believed from the joy and interest manifested by the hearers, that this Conference will be productive of much good to the cause in that section. A. B. G.

SANDERS' SCHOOL BOOKS.

Why can not children learn the form of words, so as to call them by name, as well (I do not say as easily nor as soon) as to learn the forms and unmeaning names of the letters, and then learn to guess the sounds of the word by the combined sounds and forms of which it is composed? Every one knows the anecdote and observations of Dr. Franklin, on the propriety of spelling the word "wife," with yf; and every one who has taught children to spell and read, must have noticed how far from the sounds of the letters, are the names given to them—and how frequently the sound of a word differs not only from the names but also the sounds of the letters of which it is composed. Thus, to recur to the instance alluded to, to spell "wife," which is performed to a nicety by "yf," we direct a child literally to spell double-you-I-fee, and then to pronounce it contrary to his every perception of sound.

These reflections are elicited by seeing two of a series of Schoolbooks, by Charles W. Sanders, in which it appears to me, an approach is made towards a better—a simpler and a more natural system of teaching orthography and reading. The reader of this need not fear that Mr. Sanders adopts the plan hinted at in my introductory remarks—but he approaches toward it:

"The Primary School Primer," gives a spelling lesson of two letters, somewhat in the ab form, but uses words that have "meaning in them." Then follows a reading lesson of the same words, but arranged so as to express some sentiment or meaning. From words of two letters, it proceeds to similar lessons of three, four and five letters, all arranged on the same plan. Thus the pupil is taught to read as fast as he learns to spell—to use his knowledge as rapidly as he acquires it.

"The School Reader—First Book," is arranged on the same plan—the principal words in each reading lesson, being first given in a spelling lesson—and each lesson being made a step to the succeeding ones.

I think this plan worthy of a fair trial—and the books entitled to patronage. They may be had wholesale and retail of O. Hutchinson, 41 Genesee street, in this city. Let all teachers who think learning should be made easy as possible, and the road shortened, examine these books.

Br. Geo. N. Cox inquires why I did not enter his name in the Register as one of our preachers. Answer—because neither he, nor any other preacher of our order in Ohio, answered my earnest request, publicly made and copied into all our papers, for statistics. I had to guess as well as I could, who continued to preach, and where they lived. The proof sheets which were returned to me corrected, from Ohio, had not his name among the corrections—consequently I could not enter him for Ohio.

And now may I inquire, why Br. Geo. N. Cox taxed us with the 25 cents postage on his letter, pertaining to his own interests, making inquiries for his own gratification, concerning an omission for which no one here was to blame, and requiring a favor in return? Surely it was not right nor fair to punish us thus? If it was, I should be for raising the price of the Register to 25 cents per copy, to enable me to pay the penalties of omissions which I could not avoid making! If it was an oversight, through mistake or forgetfulness, the error is forgiven.

"AFTER THE ELECTION."

This has been the term of all the promises made in this section for some months past. Did a wife ask to have the doors listed, the window frames tightened, or the stoves altered for winter—it was replied, "Yes, I will, after the election." Was a man asked to subscribe for a paper—to pay an old subscription—to buy books for his children, or for his own use—the answer still was, "after the election." And even in the extremity that assailed the two papers published by our denomination in this State—When Br. Price and ourselves, were (as we yet are) suffering untold agonies for the want of money long withheld and long needed—our solicitations for aid in collecting our dues, or in getting new subscribers, have still been met with "after the election." To us; therefore, the election has seemed "long-a-coming," while debt after debt fell due, and we had no funds to meet them. Thus day after day we tediously away under that hope which made the heart sick. But still, it kept on approaching, and now it is at hand! Oh, will our friends remember the mental, verbal and written promises, "after the election!"

Br. Price commences a new volume next month and wants some more advance paying subscribers—will our friends who are able to take two papers, please to remember him immediately "after the election?"

We begin a new volume with the next year, (1841,) and as we will have again to strike off a number of delaying subscribers, we will need, greatly need a number of prompt paying new subscribers to make good our loss. We have already lost, in this way, about 1500 subscribers, while our debt for the establishment is nearly as great as at the first. Must we sink, or shall we be supported? Will our friends answer the question so as to gladden our hearts, "after the election?"

But most of all, we (that is, Br. Price and ourselves,) want now—have long needed—several thousand dollars of the large amount owing to us. Will those who owe us, hear our call? Will our agents and friends take immediate measures to collect and remit what they can? Let one and all, answer "Yes" by their actions, "after the election."

The council of the first quarterly Conference of the Black River Association of Universalists, held at Washingtonville, in September last, being apprised that the Rev. Mr. Kilpatrick, of the Methodist denomination, repeatedly stated, that he would discuss the subject of the Endlessness of the punishment of the wicked with any minister of the Universalist denomination in good standing, appointed Brs. Waggoner, French and Forbes a committee to see Mr. K. upon the subject. The visit resulted in an agreement for a discussion, and as one of the committee, I would give notice, that an oral discussion of the question, "Does the Bible teach the doctrine of Endless misery?" will take place, at the Methodist church in Washingtonville, on Wednesday, the 18th of November next. Services to commence at 10 o'clock. A. M. Disputants, Rev. Mr. KILPATRICK, Rev. P. MORSE.

Br. W. H. Waggoner, of Watertown, has tendered his resignation as pastor of the Universalist Society in that place, and accepted an invitation to take the charge of the Society in Canton, St. Lawrence county. He will remove to, and commence his labors in the latter place, the first of January next. Letters and papers for him, after that time, should be directed accordingly.

REMOVALS.—Br. J. Whitney has removed from Ohio City, to Morganville, Genesee county, in this State. Br. F. J. Briggs has removed from Pierpont, to Heuvelton, both in St. Lawrence county.

Br. Tompkins.—Send Repository to Charles A. Kelsey, Clinton, commencing with the last half year. Also, current volume, to Miss R. Lombard, Utica.

THE PRO AND CON OF UNIVERSALISM— 4th EDITION.

The Pro and Con contains 356 closely printed pages, large duodecimo. It gives very numerous arguments for, and illustrations of our doctrines, as well as the most common and strongest of the objections usually urged against it, both a scriptural and common sense kind. It also, in a variety of forms, treats on the opponent doctrines of Universal salvation and endless misery in their practical influences, respective and comparative. It contains also an Essay on the Intermediate State and shows the diversity of views which have obtained, and which yet obtain amongst different orders of Universalists. To render the book entertaining as well as convincing, the style of its several parts has been variegated. It begins with a Tale, founded on facts, the scene of which, is laid in a beautiful vale on the Susquehanna. Then follow arguments from the Attributes of God—The Law of God—The Relations of God—The Scriptures direct, Miscellaneous Objections answered, five popular debates on important subjects, Divine punishment, its ends, and certainty, harmonized with the Scripture doctrine of forgiveness; Hell punishment examined. The argument on the words, Everlasting, Eternal, etc., Foreknowledge and Foreordination, etc., etc. The price of the Pro and Con has always been $1.25 in the western market; but as the expense of publication is somewhat less in Utica, its price will hereafter be $1.00. GEO. ROGERS.

If all the Universalist voters in this State, of both parties, would, on the average, do half as much for the support of their religious cause, in the giving of their time, money, influence and solicitude, as they do for the success of favorite candidates for office, there might, we verily believe, be twice as much preaching regularly and permanently sustained as there is at present. Why should people think so much more of political, than of moral and religious matters? Are not the latter of greater importance? How long would our political institutions remain, without religion and morality? "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Give a deserved support to the institutions of the Gospel, and then there will be but little difficulty in sustaining right principles of human government. As friends of civil liberty, Universalists should give their first solicitude for the advancement of the cause of Universalism, which contains all the original principles of genuine republicanism. Let this prevail, and all will be well.

There are, it is to be feared, not many men whose religion can withstand the blighting power of partizan politics on the mind. Alas! how many Universalists have we known, who were once active friends of our cause, but who as soon as they began to enter deeply into politics and to get into office, lost their first love and showed thereafter a very hesitating and indifferent regard for the honor and prosperity of the cause of truth. There is something in partizan politics that has little sympathy with those serious and virtuous principles which are necessary to beget and insure a permanent interest in religious matters.—Gospel Banner and Pilot.

POETRY.

There is an odd mixture of solemnity and mirthfulness in the following, that is somewhat unpleasing—and yet it has some fine touches to redeem it from that censure. It is probably what Br. Lee would call some of his "wild cat poetry," which he learned to write so well during his residence in Michigan. We hope soon to hear that he is settled down in New-York. We want more laborers in this section.

THE NIGHT STORM.*

BY REV. DAY K. LEE.

Lives there a soul that, in his heart, is doubting
The revelations God hath made to man?
O, bring him hither, where these winds are spouting;
And where these lightnings measure out their span:
And though, perhaps, like unbelieving Thomas,
He'll thrust his hand into the storm-king's side;
Ere these fierce clouds have winged their vapors from us,
That fool, confounded, will forget to hide;

Thanks to my stars that I am on the billows!
For when had storm sublimities ashore?
A thousand harps, just taken from the willows,
Would spend their wires to give the anthems o'er,
That have upon the Evening air been sweeping,
Since this grand elemental party met—
Where they've been wheeling, hazing, dancing, leaping,
As if performing a cotillion set!

Our gallant steamer walketh like a turtle.
Bearing a glowing ember on its back,
As o'er her decks the merry lightning hurtle,
And laughing white-caps waltz along her track.
The shakes and puffs upon the tiptoe surges,
Like some young comet, weary of its tour,
The while the storm-king, half unconscious, urges
His furious dancers still to keep the floor.

What prodigal, ye winds, hath been returning,
That thus your kindred all should dance and shout?
And why at midnight should your lamps be burning,
When man hath earlier put his taper out?
If thus ye keep your pranks, and galloping,
'Till evening's empire is upon the wane,
That prodigal, I fear, will soon be wading
The bramble-moors of penury again!

Hark! how the thunders merrily unbosom
The thrilling poems of upper air,—
Speak of the Being who hath power to noose 'em,
And keep them slumbering in their fiery lair!
See! how the lightning, with dislevelled ringlets,
Glances o'er the waters like a fairy throng;
Making the billows, and their ruffled winglets
All flash like faggots, as they dance along!

Old Erie might at times be well mistaken,
By dreaming mortals, for that sea of fire,
In which some hapless spirits might awaken,
When satan doth his complement require!
For when the lightnings spread their glistening pinions,
Her waters glow like Etna's kindling breast,
Nor all the gems of Araby's dominions,
Could add one beauty to her sparkling crest.

The winds, and waves, and thunders are careering,
Now seem in ecstasies that were confined;
They are so rude they almost set me fearing
They may capsize us if they do not mind!
But who should tremble in a scene so thrilling?
My spirits pinions gaily beat the time
These elemental gallopades are filling;
And, fluttering, add faint quavers to the chime!

With heavier swell the tempest songs are gushing,
With sprightling limbs the hissing waters leap,
With wilder fury, heavier gusts are rushing
To share the banquet, and the revel keep.
Now the dull figure that they all are dancing,
Labors and lags, as if the last to call,
Now gentle calm is quietly advancing,
Now all are parted from the banquet hall.

* Suggested during a violent thunder storm, on Lake Erie, on the night of July 22, 1840.

The elements have set themselves sleeping
By their own music, and the clouds are flown;
A beacon's hospitable ray comes leaping
Far o'er the waters where the lightnings shone!
O, it is ever thus in this existence!
The storms may hold their gambols o'er our head;
But ere their clouds are faded into distance,
From Eden shores a beacon's fire is shed.

LONDON EATING HOUSE.—Whilst upon the Jeremy Diddler subject, it may not be amiss to mention an amusing circumstance which took place in an eating-house in town. A poor Frenchman (it was in the winter) entered one merely for the purpose of warming himself at the fire; he was in too great distress to think of any indulgence in the good things there smoking in profusion, save such as might be inhaled by his olfactory nerves. While engaged in rubbing his half-starved bony hands before a good fire, the master of the house came up, and said—

"Wont you take something?"
"I thank you, sare," was the reply.
"What will you take?"
"What you please?"
"We have some very nice roast turkey and sausages; will you like that?"

"I thank you, I shall like them vere mooch."
"Sit down here, and I will bring it to you."
The Frenchman was accordingly ushered into a box, and the turkey and dressings placed before him. Of whatever he was asked to partake, he partook. He ate bountifully, and washed it down with some good wine. Poor fellow! he had not known such a meal before for many a long day. The proprietor thought he had a good customer; his mortification and disappointment were extreme, when on presenting his bill, the Frenchman said,

"I have no money, sare,"
"No money?"
"No."
"Then what the devil did you come into my house and order such a dinner for?"

"Pardon, you mistake; I came here to warm myself, you come to me and ask me if I take nothing, I say, 'I thank you,' you say, 'What will you take!' I respond 'What you please' you bring me de turkey, de sausage, de tart, de pudding, de cheese, and de wine; I no ask you for them, you ask me will I take, and I can no refuse."

The master of the house, who was something of a humorist and who was also struck with the Frenchman's gaunt and poverty stricken figure, suffered him to depart. But great was his astonishment at seeing, a short time afterwards, another Frenchman enter, who upon being asked what he would take, likewise replied, "What you please." "Oh, ho," exclaimed the landlord, "I forgive the other because he was an original, but you fellow, are a mere copyist, I shall kick you into the street," which he did accordingly? It appeared that the poor premier Frenchman had met an acquaintance and told him of his adventure at the eating-house, the poor starved acquaintance hastened to the spot alreay feasting in imagination on delicacies innumerable, and little dreaming of the unpleasant denouement which the cruel Fates had in reserve for him.

AN INGENIOUS TRICK.

An English paper relates the following ingenious mode of "raising the wind," practised by a musician, on the credulity of the inhabitants of a country town, not long since:—

A foreigner, named Vogel, a celebrated flute player advertised a concert for his benefit, and in order to attract those who had no music in their souls.

And were not mov'd by concord of sweet sounds," he announced that between the acts he would exhibit an extraordinary feat never before witnessed in Europe. He would hold in his left hand a glass of wine, and would allow six of the strongest men in the town to hold his arm, and notwithstanding all their efforts to prevent him, would drink the wine! So novel and so surprising a display of strength as it was naturally regarded, attracted a very crowded house, and expectation was on tiptoe when our hero appeared on the stage, glass in hand, and politely invited any half dozen of the audience to come forward to put his prowess to the test. Several gentlemen, among whom was the mayor of the place, immediately advanced to the stage, and grasping the left arm of Vogel, apparently rendered the performance of his promised feat quite out of the question. There was an awful pause for a moment when our arm-bound hero, eyeing the gentlemen who had pinioned him, said, in his broken English, "Jonteelmen, are you all ready? Are you quite sure you have go quite hold?" The answer having been given in the affirmative by a very confident nod from those to whom it was addressed, Vogel to the infinite amusement of the spectators, and the group around him, advancing his right hand which was free, very coolly took the wine glass from his left hand, and bowing very politely to the half dozen gentlemen, said "Jonteelmen, I have de honor to drink all you good health," at the same time quaffing off the wine, amidst a general roar of laughter and universal cries of "Bravo bravo, well done Vogel."

It cannot be denied that Vogel literally redeemed his pledge—the condition was, that his arm should be held, but not a word was said about his hand, he very ingeniously availed himself of the oversight, nor could he be fairly charged with resorting to a trick or subterfuge.

HABIT.—If you desire the success of your children in life, take great care of the habits they acquire during their minority. Many trace their prosperity or adversity to the habits and impressions engrafted upon them at an early period of their lives.

DEATHS.

In Nunda, October 2d, at 12 o'clock M. Mr. JOHN SARGENT, aged 36 years. In the death of this individual, the community where he resided, have lost one of their most worthy and valuable citizens. His affectionate, honest, honorable and uniformly consistent deportment, won the affections of all who had the happiness of being acquainted with him; and though his religious sentiments were such as some disrespect, and regard as pernicious, yet no one will presume to assert that his character and deportment were inconsistent with the pure and holy principles of the Gospel. His charity and mildness towards those who differed from him, were conspicuous and worthy of the imitation of all. He belonged to the Universalist denomination, and with becoming independence and dignity, defended its peculiar doctrines and retained his faith to the last. During the last two or three days of his sickness, he was deprived of his reasoning faculties, except at very brief and transient intervals. His death was remarkably quiet and peaceful: the messenger of dissolution approached by slow and imperceptible degrees, until the closing scene, which was unattended by a single struggle.

His funeral was attended on the day succeeding his death in the Baptist church, and a large concourse of people that assembled, by the sympathies they exhibited, gave plain indications that they felt the loss they had sustained in the death of their highly esteemed fellow citizen. Mr. Sargent has left besides other relatives, four orphan children to deplore their loss. May they be regarded in mercy by a kind and indulgent Providence. The funeral sermon was preached by Elder Spoor of the Baptist denomination (the relatives of Mr. Sargent residing in the vicinity, being in general of that faith).

May the relatives and friends of the deceased be sustained by the consolations of the Gospel of peace.

ORDINATION SERMON.

Delivered at the Ordination of REV. J. T. GOODRICH, in Oxford, N. Y., September 1st, 1840.

BY A. B. GROSH, OF UTICA.

[Published by Request.]

"Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."—2 TIM. ii: 15.

On occasions like the present, it is found highly profitable to dwell briefly on the station and duties of the Christian minister; the doctrines and precepts he is to inculcate, and how he may best perform his labors in the present circumstances of society.

Our text is the language of Paul, to his beloved convert, Timothy. It breathes an almost paternal anxiety for the welfare and usefulness of that spiritual son—and a fervent love for the progress of the Gospel, and the salvation of man, by the agency of that son's labors. The allusion at its close, we are told, refers to the President at a feast—handing to each one, the provisions of the board, that the wants of all may be satisfied. "Rightly dealing around to every one, the word of truth," perhaps best expresses the meaning of the apostle. In this sense we shall briefly consider it, in its proper place, after treating somewhat of the station of the Christian preacher.

I. There are two extremes on this subject. The first, generated in the moral and mental darkness of the church under the absolute supremacy of Papacy, holds that the minister of Jesus is a spiritual lord—authorized by him who "had compassion on the ignorant and those who were out of the way," to lord it over the minds, and consciences, and temporalities even, of his flock. The second extreme was generated at a later day, in the skeptical and revolutionary feelings created by the explosion and destruction of antiquated errors and time-honored superstitions. It teaches that the Christian teacher is to be an object of suspicion, and should be made an illy-paid drudge—a mere slave of the popular will, and of his people's interests. The former extreme it the most prevalent; but the latter is gaining ground—and both are as contrary to Scripture and sound reason, as they are unjust and injurious to the best interests of society at large.

The minister of Jesus is simply a teacher of religion—a teacher, by precept and by example, of a religion that, above all others, consists in love to God and to mankind—of reverence, humility, forbearance, gentleness, long suffering, patience, zeal, prudence, faith, hope, and unflinching charity. These were the virtues of the Master—these must be the virtues of his true minister—and these virtues must ever prevent their professor from lording it over God's heritage, as they should prevent any portion of his fellow-men from lording it over him.

The clergy are but men. They have all the passions and affections, the virtues and vices of humanity; yet, from the nature of their profession, they will derive an influence which will make them a powerful class, for good or for evil, in the world. Elevate them unduly—give them more power than properly falls to their share—and, like any other class of men similarly situated, they may, and probably they will abuse it. Or debase them, by depriving them of any of the rights and privileges justly and naturally belonging to them; and you deprive society of the good they might have rendered to it by the aid of those rights—and drive the vindictive among them to seek a solace for the deprivation, in the acquisition of other powers, more dangerous to the public welfare than those of which they have been unjustly deprived. Therefore would I solemnly warn mankind against making the clergy—indeed, against making any class of men—a privileged order—or of debasing any class—beyond what the very nature of their employment essentially requires. In our social compacts, and in the church, as in the moral government of God, I would have no special election of one individual, or of one class, save for the benefit and the welfare of the rest. And as you do not allow your physicians, or your legal advisers, to monopolise exclusively the knowledge of things pertaining to their professions—but only especially to devote themselves to your service in their professions—so should you not allow the minister to be your exclusive, but only your especial teacher in his profession. And by his worth and his usefulness, is he to be measured in your estimation of him—in your co-operation with, and your support of, him.

The minister of the Gospel is the servant of God, so far as he co-operates with God in enlightening mankind in spiritual knowledge, and in improving them by his influence and example. And for the sake of doing this—and for no other reason—he is to become the servant of all men. But in saying that he is to become a servant, do not suppose that I mean he is to become a slave. No—even God has not given him the spirit of bondage, again to fear; but the spirit of power, of love, and of a sound mind, that he may willingly, and as a free man, serve the Lord Jesus Christ—the spirit of adoption, by which he may claim and serve God as his Father. And by this spirit, he claims the people, of whom he is one, as brethren, and becomes their servant, as his "elder brother," our Saviour, became their servant—that he may minister unto them in love. Hence, in all things, their duties and obligations are reciprocal and equal—his, as a teacher; theirs, as the taught—his, as a servant; theirs, as employers—his, as a leader and exemplar; theirs, as followers, and imitators, so far as he sets before them the doctrine and example of Christ. And he is responsible to them; but only so far as they are to him—and he is responsible with them, and as one of them, to God, to his own conscience, to the laws of society and of the land. If he descends to become their servant, it is as an equal brother becoming their helper and minister; and if they descend in becoming his followers, it is as equal brethren agreeing to follow him into the more immediate presence of God, and in a more strict observance of their common Father's precepts. Hence, every degradation of his people, in the usurpation of undue power over them, will only disgrace himself—and every degradation of him, through the mean suspicions of his flock, is but a debasement of their own honor and dignity.

Elevate, then—elevate each other—not as the world elevates, to mere temporal dominion, and honors and wealth; but in moral worth, and mental improvement—in Christian dignity, and in increased love to God and man.

II. The labors of the ministry claim a portion of our attention.

Too many suppose the labors of the preacher to consist in preparing and preaching sermons, (or in preaching without preparing them!) and in attending funerals and weddings when called on. These are important duties, it is true; but they are far from being the only duties of the minister, however well he may perform them. And permit me to say, that few of us perform these duties as well as circumstances demand. We devote too little time to study—to thorough study and intimate acquaintance with the Scriptures and other books which call for our attention—and in addition to all this neglect, we narrow down most miserably our circle of studies, to mere treatises on morals, and theology, to the utter neglect of the ten thousand things and events around us, in the construction and providence of which God has spoken to us as clearly, as powerfully, and as instructively as he has done in his written revelation. And for this neglect of duty in the minister, hundreds are suffering the unsatisfied cravings for sound, correct knowledge on many subjects intimately connected with religious knowledge and emotions. Yes—and hundreds of others, unable to learn from their minister how to reconcile inferences drawn from new discoveries in science, with the opinions they have learned from their catechisms, are laboring under all the doubts and perplexities of secret skepticism—if they have not, indeed, become open and avowed infidels. But of this, more anon.

I have said that the labors of the study and the pulpit, are not all the labors devolving upon the faithful and devoted minister. But so long as our societies neglect to support their teachers sufficiently to enable them to devote their whole, undivided time to the duties of their calling, even these labors will be hastily and imperfectly performed—unless, indeed, the preacher can contrive to make his full count of bricks, and find his own straw! And until each society can procure a pastor to live among them, the duties I am about to name will be as imperfectly performed, however ably the preacher may be supported.—But what can be done, should be performed. The elementary schools for the instruction and continual improvement of the choir—and, where practicable, the Bible class, and the Sunday school, for the instruction of the youths and of the children of the society, should be provided. He need not direct them in person; indeed he should not—but he should see that the most suitable persons are engaged in it, and should devise the best means, and encourage the whole, by at least occasional visitations. The tender lambs of Christ's flock have been too much neglected—and when not neglected, have been overtaken.—The Sunday school should be a place of moral culture, combined with mental recreation; so as to constitute a rest from the labors of the week-day schools—for rest may consist in a change of action, as well as in absolute repose or torpid idleness.

The administration of what are commonly called "the ordinances," should engage the attention of the preacher. There are those who deem them necessary and whose consciences require them—and there are those who are opposed to them—and whatever may be the preacher's own views in their favor or against them, he has no right to require his whole congregation to be regulated by his opinions or his conscience on the subject. If in favor, he will administer them of course, to those who desire it. If opposed, he should, at least, provide for their administration by some brother who can conscientiously gratify the conscientious wishes of his brethren and sisters. Bigotry and intolerance, above all other things, should be avoided by the servant and disciple of Him who lost his life by a bigoted and cruel persecution. Let him whose conscience requires the administration of the ordinances, be careful, then, how he attempts to force them on those whose consciences require them not—and let him who is opposed to their administration, beware lest he set up his conscience or opinions, as the standard for those who differ from him. No man can dictate thus, without usurping the prerogative of God!

The last duty I have room to name, is that of pastoral visitation. Societies, however, should not require too much from their preacher, in this respect; unless they are willing to suffer in others, from the neglects their requirements may occasion.

At least twice a year, and as much oftener as possible, every member of the congregation, (not of the society, only,) should be visited at his or her own proper residence; and there conversed with familiarly, affectionately and religiously—doubts ascertained, hopes strengthened, and difficulties removed—faults should be delicately pointed out where they exist, encouragements offered, and a reciprocity of the like kindness solicited. By thus ascertaining the condition of the poor and destitute; and judiciously making it known to the affluent and benevolent; and by inducing a general acquaintance of the members of the congregation with each other as well as with himself, the minister may do more real good—more to increase and strengthen the ties that should bind a religious society together, than he can possibly effect by his mere preaching. And he will find the greatest aid in these benevolent labors, in frequent devotional and social meetings, where the thanksgiving of prayer and hymn shall be mingled with the friendly converse and the affectionate exhortation, in an orderly, decorous and Christian manner.

I may err on some of these subjects; for I never have been placed in a situation where I could test their practicability and usefulness for myself;—but I have stated, briefly, the outlines, as the result of much observation and thought on the subject, based on the acknowledged errors of some, and the happy experience of others—able brethren in the ministry of reconciliation. And such is my confidence in what I have recommended, that I shall not hesitate to submit it to a trial when opportunity offers.

III. I come now to speak of the most important doctrines and precepts which the minister should inculcate, and the best method of teaching, enforcing and illustrating them. In this, particularly, he is to "study to show himself before God, an approved and unashamed workman, rightly banding around to each, the word of truth."

The present is emphatically a period of restless, anxious inquiry—rendered more so by the increasing cheapness and numbers of books and periodicals devoted to every department of literature, science and art. The minds of the great mass of the people are awaking from old subjects and habits, and are reaching forth on every hand to grasp at knowledge—even much which a former generation considered vain and useless, if not forbidden to the common mind. Hence a confinement to the old topics of sacred oratory, no less than the old dogmatic modes of treating them, will no longer interest every age and class of society, if they ever did—and can not satisfy these grasping desires for instruction. We must therefore adopt the motto of Spurzheim for our practice—"True religion is central truth, and all other truths should be gathered and clustered around it."

In imitation of the Saviour, we must qualify ourselves to point to the works of God in nature, to illustrate his wisdom, goodness and power; and must prepare to seize on all the late scientific discoveries, to illustrate our positions drawn from revelation. But most of all should we dwell on the wonderfully wise and good adaptations of revealed truth, to man's nature, circumstances and wants; and demonstrate the nature and intents of God's moral government, as held by us, and as now increasingly demonstrated by the disclosures of history and science. Thus shall the people be fed with sound knowledge and understanding, not only in divine things, but also in all accordant truths in nature—and thus shall the affections and understandings of our hearers be doubly attached to the great central truth of all truths, the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

But the present is also an age of lurking, secret (as well as open and avowed) skepticism. There are hundreds of professors in the denominations around us, who are, in spite of their struggles to avoid it, and in despite of their hopes to the contrary, on the very verge of hopeless infidelity. Old errors and superstitious fancies long held up as solemn, awful, and important truths, have been exploded, one after the other, by the workings of the inquiring mind, until a secret fear and suspicion pervades many minds, that what yet remains in their creeds may also be broken up, and fade away in the increasing light of knowledge, or vanish from the grasp of improving science. And then, to confirm these fears, injudicious Christian teachers have attempted to drive the mind backward, and to chain it down to its former creeds, by decrying the improved doctrines of their churches as heresy, and denouncing all the late discoveries of science, as infidelity in disguise. In this manner, doubt and dismay have been fearfully increased among Christians, and the enemies of Christianity have been confirmed in their enmity, by seeing it arrayed against sound knowledge.

It becomes us, then, who hold that the God of revelation is the God of nature, to show that all correct knowledge and true science harmonize with and really support the Christian religion—that in each, the God we proclaim is the God of truth, and of truth only. To do this, we must fearlessly step forth and make ourselves acquainted, as far as possible, with the principal good scientific treatises, which embody the latest discoveries of modern philosophers. But we must be careful to discriminate between their facts and their theories—to notice what is proved, and what is merely supposed or inferred—and to select the well known and established, from the partially known, and the doubtful; for it will be found that, very often, the theory, the inference and the partially known, may be arrayed in seeming opposition to truth in nature and in revelation. And let no one fear the result—no two truths can oppose each other—all truths in nature and in religion must accord with, and support each other. And if there are any errors in science, or in what we hold to be revelation, the sooner they are discovered and exploded the better—the better for science—the better for religion—and the better for humanity. By this course, only, can we lead the wondering child of ignorance onward, from the secondary cause which it has just discovered, and is atheistically regarding as a deity, and upward, from cause to cause, until he is obliged to invest with infinity of power, goodness and wisdom, the Great First Cause, endlessly above, and in, and through all, forever and ever.

By thus acquainting himself with the manifestations of God's attributes in his works and providences; and bringing to bear on the minds of others, the reverential and devotional piety thus inspired in his own bosom—and by connecting all these with the Gospel, as interpreted by sound reason and pure affection, the preacher will aid onward the tireless flight of human inquiry; supply with instruction the ardent desires for knowledge, and ultimately overwhelm the spirit of doubting with overpowering conviction of well established truths, and lead his flock with wondering reverence and grateful affection to dwell in the court of the Lord our God. For then it will be seen that every advancement in sound knowledge, is but approaching nearer to pure Christianity in its fulness, and leading to a more fervent adoration of God as its Author—and men will no longer fear to travel onward, lest they travel out of religion; or to read the handwriting of God in the layers of our globe, or on the seals of his glory wherewith he hath spangled the cerulean, lest it should obliterate the words written in revelation. For then, the Scriptures and nature—pure religion and true philosophy—genuine piety and sound knowledge, will be indissolubly wedded together, and speak but one language, the truth of the Gospel—the goodness of God.

But, permit me to say, with due respect for our brethren who differ from us, that the popular system of Christianity—so termed Orthodoxy, or Partialism—can not meet, and do away with the skeptical spirit of the age. If, on the one hand, it attempts to check the onward progress of the intellect, and to roll back the flood of improvement into former darkness and torpor, it will find itself irresistibly overwhelmed by the mighty tide—and, Christianity being identified with Partialism, in public opinion, will be rejected with it.—If, on the other hand, Partialism attempts to lead the inquirer onward, guided by the clear light of reason, it will find at every step so many contradictions of its dogmas—such clear revelations of the moral nature and government of God, in opposition to the most important portions of its creeds—that the inquirer will become bewildered, confounded and skeptical, as is now the case with many.—In this predicament, he will either reject reason and nature, and shrink back into a bigoted, gloomy superstition; or he will reject the guidance of religion, and go onward, in an equally fatal indifference or skepticism.

But even if Partialism could perform the impossible task of evading or overcoming either of these difficulties, another, more formidable, awaits it in the increasing refinement and humanity of our race. This general benevolence, by coming in direct collision with the great dogma of Partialism, (endless sin and suffering,) has already powerfully, though innocently, aided the lurking skepticism of Christian professors. Universal benevolence is the fiat of Jehovah, recorded in the nature of improving man, against every system of partiality and cruelty under heaven. It can not be reversed. Its course is onward and upward, to the outgrowing of all limiting creeds and opposing practices; and it will prefer atheism and annihilation even, to the doctrine of ceaseless sin and unending woe.

Who does not perceive, then, that the last hope of making Christianity the religion of a freed, and enlightened, and refined people, rests, under God, on the labors of that reviled, and scorned, and detested band, who have so long waged a double conflict with the advocates of mere nature and reason, on the one hand—and with their opponents, the advocates of mere revelation, on the other?—Formerly, we united the best features of Calvinism and Arminianism—taking all that was true in each, and harmonizing them in certain and universal grace and salvation. It will yet fall to our lot to unite the teachings of nature and reason, separate from the baseless doubts and theories of so-termed philosophers, with the teachings of the Gospel, purged of the creeds and corruptions of men—and thus make of skeptics and Partialists, one new people—converting both into rational, liberal, consistent Christians. And this must be done—as Universalism only, does do—by “rightly dividing the word of truth,” the Gospel of universal salvation.

Nature discloses numerous first principles, but it is to the Gospel we must look, after all, for their great conclusion. Nature furnishes illustrations, and confirmations—but the Scriptures, only, furnish the argument, and point out the grand result of God’s creation of improvable man. Hence, while nature, and especially human nature, should be diligently studied and frequently appealed to, we should never forget—never neglect, the word of truth, the Gospel of a world’s salvation—which, only, fully discloses God’s character and purposes, and man’s duty and destination.

This word of truth, like its author, is immutable; that our faith in it may not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the wisdom and power of God. No human power can change it—it is true, whether believed or disbelieved; and being true, it is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth—to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile.

“But what if some do not believe?”—What, indeed! Shall their unbelief make the faithfulness of God of none effect? God forbid! for though by their disbelief, they virtually call God a liar, yet the end will prove that it is the unbeliever who is the liar, and that the word of truth is, indeed, the Gospel of his salvation. Such was the case with the once unbelieving Ephesians; (i: 3-14); yet the Gospel of their salvation proved to be the word of truth to them; for after they heard, they believed it; and after believing it, they were sealed with that holy spirit of promise, which is the earnest, the foretaste, of our inheritance of immortal bliss. Such was, and is yet, the case with the Heathen. But God, foreseeing that they would be justified (that is, made just) through faith in the Gospel, preached before due time that very Gospel of their salvation from sin, unto Abraham, declaring that in his seed, which is Christ, should all the families and all the nations of the earth be blessed—even as Paul says, Gal. iii: 7-9, and 14-24. “Know ye therefore, that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. And the scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, in thee shall all nations be blessed. So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham.... That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith. Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; though it be but a man’s covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth or addeth thereto. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ. And this I say, that the covenant that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, can not disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. Now, a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one. Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. But the scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe. But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. Wherefore the law was our school-master to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith.” And the Beloved Apostle testifies, also, to the certainty, the truth, of this good news, 1 John v: 9-11.—“This is the witness of God, which he hath testified of his Son. He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the Record that God gave of his Son. And this is the Record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son.”

This is the “word of truth,” “the Gospel of salvation” which is to be divided to all, because it is for all, and true to all. This is the golden chain of promise binding man to his Creator, which runs through all dispensations, and binds the Scriptures together, from the first recorded transgression of man, up to the prophecied final completion of God’s purpose in the creation of our race.

It is a remarkable fact, that the doctrine, the Gospel, the truth of God, etc., are never spoken of in the plural number, in the Scriptures; but as one, only. But though one, this Gospel is not a narrow, limited subject. It embraces the great teaching of the patriarchs, and of Moses and the prophets, and of Jesus and his apostles—that unto us there is but one God, who is in very nature, infinite Love—in very character, infinite wisdom, and goodness, and power—and in very truth, “our Father in heaven.” And what revelation thus plainly declares, sound reason approves, humanity desires, and all nature confirms.

If God is the spiritual parent of the whole human race, then all we are his offspring, and vast humanity is but one family of brethren and sisters. And this, too, revelation positively declares and plainly proves; while every research of geology, every teaching of physiology and phrenology, confirm this declaration, while sound reason approves, and every benevolent soul desires, its truth.

On the universal and endless paternity of God, and fraternity of man, so plainly taught in reason, nature and revelation, the Bible bases the whole duty of man to God and to his fellow-beings. Because God loves the sinner, and ever did and ever will love him, God requires that sinner’s endless and entire love in return—and because God is the Father of all spirits, he demands the filial affections and obedience of all his children. And if God could and would ever cease to love man, and to be our Father; he would not, as a just being, require love and filial obedience of us.—But God is unchangeable in his nature, in his relations to us, and in his requirements of us. He is our Father—love us as his offspring, and all we are brethren and sisters—and hence the unalterable requirement of his endless law—Love to God supremely, and to mankind universally. And the more extensively moral causes and effects are explored, and the fitness of our relations and duties are examined, the more does Philosophy wonder to find all its lore anticipated 1800 years ago, by a humble Jew; born, educated and living among an unrefined, and most bigoted and narrow minded people!

And, lastly, this Gospel embraces the conclusion of the premises and principles above named as embodied in it; for it teaches that God is infinitely and immutably good, wise, and powerful—that he is not only the Creator, but in very deed the all-affectionate Father of every son and daughter of Adam, and that all spirits are bound to obey and imitate him, as his offspring, now and endlessly. And if all we are brethren and sisters, and are bound to conduct toward each other as Christ conduct-

DELIVERY OF THE SCRIPTURES, AND CHARGE.

BY REV. O. WHISTON, OF COOPERSTOWN.

Br. Goodrich—By an arrangement of this ordaining council, the pleasing duty of presenting you with the Scriptures, devolves upon me.

The hardy mariner, when upon the mighty waters, traces with an anxious eye the chart which is to guide him in his otherwise pathless track. By it he is taught to shun those rocks and quicksands upon which the less favored have foundered. What the chart is to the mariner, this blessed volume is to you, in your ministerial life. It is a perfect directory by which you are to perform your whole duty, both public and private; and from which you are not to depart, unless you would make shipwreck of your faith and calling. It is a chart drawn by the finger of almighty God, and must be received as paramount to all the inventions of erring mortals. It is the chart by which you are to guide men into the paths of righteousness, and open to their view the haven of immortality and eternal life.

That dark and cruel period, when the faggot and the sword were the weapons of conversion; when the gibbet and the wheel were busy in their work of death, and "every man's hand was raised against his brother," stands forth as a beacon light to warn us of the folly of departing from this blessed volume, and erecting in its stead those creeds and formularies for which fighting Christians have crimsoned this fair earth with human blood.

The Bible contains the only creed which we, as a denomination, acknowledge. We believe it sufficient for all matters of faith and practice; and we be to him, who adds to, or takes from its treasured pages! In view of these truths and this warning, we present you with the sacred Scriptures: and "I charge thee, therefore, before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing, and his kingdom, Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season: reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine." This comprehensive exhortation of Paul to Timothy, may be said to embrace all the duty of a Christian minister. You are to preach the word; but in order to do this effectually, you must study the word—you must bring to bear in the investigation of this volume, all the ennobling faculties of your mind. It contains successive revelations of God to man, in all ages and conditions of the world; and nicely to adjust and apply them, will require your unremitting care and attention.—The minister of the Gospel, to be useful, must be a student—indolence is the bane of his calling.

When the truths of the Scriptures have become yours by patient and prayerful study, you are then in a situation to impart them faithfully and zealously to others. This you can do only as your judgment has been affected by the truths you promulgate. You can then not only preach the word, but you can preach it with moral courage, fearing no man, whether he be high or low, rich or poor, learned or unlearned.

O! beware of a temporizing ministry. Preach Jesus and the resurrection; preach Christ and salvation; though all the world forsake, reproach and condemn. Wait not till the crowd shall echo your sentiments, but preach the word—for though man be dumb, you are not alone; that word will find an echo in nature's handy work; every rugged oak in yonder forest, every spire of grass that garnishes nature's fair garden, respond to your teachings, and proclaims with you God's care and government. You can not be alone—for God is with you. Be faithful, then, my brother, to your high behest—glory in your office; for it associates you with God, with nature, and the redeemed of earth. Regard it as the highest and purest of human vocations—thrones and diadems are insignificant; their splendor dazzles earth alone, and concerns merely this present life; but your work is with the immortal mind, which is to live, and live on, when titled pageantry is remembered no more! He who incites a human being to the performance of one virtuous act, produces a work which will outlast all other works of time.

Take, then, my brother, this volume as the man of your counsel; study it by day and by night; may it be your chart through life, and your polar star in the hour of death!

THE RIGHT HAND OF FELLOWSHIP.*

BY REV. A. B. GROSH, OF UTICA.

Beloved Friend and Brother—I rejoice in being the organ of this Council to give you the Right hand of Fellowship, and by it to welcome you to all the labors and rewards, the joys and sorrows, the rights and privileges of the ministry of universal reconciliation. Receive it, my brother, as the token of my own esteem and affection for you; but especially as the pledge of the general confidence in, and brotherly love entertained for you, as a preacher and fellow-laborer in the Gospel, by the denomination I now represent.

Br. Goodrich—by this right hand of fellowship we welcome you to the labors and rewards of the ministry to which you have now been ordained. Those labors, how great, how arduous, how important! Your entire time, and powers of body and mind, are to be devoted to a life-long promulgation and exemplification of a truth, which is to the worldly wise, foolishness—to the mere professor of popular systems, a stumbling block—but to all who truly believe, the wisdom and the power of God unto salvation from error, with its fears and doubts, and from sin, with its anguish and despair. And your great care, in public and in private, must be to adorn this Gospel with a well-ordered life and a godly conversation, that those of the contrary part may be ashamed, having in truth no evil thing to say of you. These are your labors—how precious their reward! To see the multitude famishing, and be able to deal to them the bread of life and the waters of salvation—to mark the shades of doubt retire before the light of truth—to see the eye kindle as conviction enters the mind—to perceive a smile of holy joy mantle the gloomy countenance, as love and hope eternal banish tormenting fear from the bosom—to note the tears of penitence, and gratitude, roll down the cheek, as the goodness of an oft-trusted and disobeyed Father is demonstrated to an erring and deceived child—and to witness, day by day, the religious improvement of the young, the growing virtue of the middle aged, and the serenity of steadfast faith in the fathers and mothers of your congregation; and to feel your own mind and energies strengthened by these living testimonies of the power of truth divine—oh, my brother, what greater or better rewards could we ask for all our toils and labors!

Br. Goodrich, by this right hand of fellowship I also welcome you to all the joys and sorrows of the faithful minister of Jesus Christ. Our great High Priest could always feel for and be touched by human feelings and infirmities. To imitate him, you must have a soul to rejoice with those who rejoice, and to weep with those who weep. Mingle, then, cheerfully and prudently, in all the healthful and innocent gaieties and festivities of your flock. As a minister, never forget that you are also a man—as a man, always remember your sacred office. At the marriage altar, where the solemn, life-long vow is pronounced before you—in the social circle, where you are an invited guest—by every domestic fire-side, where pastoral visitation calls you, I welcome you to cheer and animate the aged, to interest the middle-aged, and to temper the buoyant hilarity of the young—to show all, that religion is not the morose, gloomy and forbidding thing which many have long supposed—to prove by your conduct, that "religion never was designed to make our pleasures less," but to increase them, by adding thereto the pure joys of moral and intellectual improvement; nor to destroy, but to prolong them, by regulating their flow; nor to alloy, but to purify them, by taking away that impropriety or excess which always leaves a sting behind.

But I welcome you, also, to sorrows—to the house of affliction, of mourning, of death. The minister of Christ must bear his flock continually on his breast, as the High Priest bore the children of Israel once a year, on his breast plate, before the Lord. I therefore welcome you to this—for it is not a hopeless burden. We go to the bed of "sickness unto death;" but while our tears flow for the weeping friends around, we have consolation for them. We tear over the dying; but while we feel for their dread of death, their regret for the past, or their anguish at bidding farewell, we have hope for them. No endless parting pours its more than mortal bitterness over the trim of the cup we hold to the lips of mourners—no scalding lava of endless sin, or dark waters of an undying death roll over the chalice with which we moisten the parched lips of the departing spirit—but the assurance of again meeting where all sinners will be made holy, where parting can never come, and where a redeemed universe shall be filled with the fulness of God, and rejoice in the salvation of the Lamb—these are the truths we preach in those dark and trying hours. And when we stand by the grave, where a once loved form is lowered into its darkness; and feel our hearts beat thick to the hollow sounds of the damp clay falling on the coffin lid; and hear the bursting wail of bereaved partners, and parents, and children, and brethren and sisters; oh, God! what would be our feelings compared to what they now are, if it were ours to proclaim to that mourning group the heart-withering and soul-crushing doctrine of probable endless sin and anguish for the departed, or some of the surviving, instead of the doctrine of life and immortality for all who die! Yes, brother, our sorrows are not unmingled with solace—for cheering is it to behold light breaking from beyond the gloom of that grave—to see it reflected in hope's eternal rainbow on those streaming eyes, now raised to heaven in resignation; and to hear its power gush from those bursting hearts in the words of faith—"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive—death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed, and God be all in all!" "Oh, death! where is thy sting? Oh, grave! where is thy victory? Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

Brother Goodrich, by this right hand of fellowship I also welcome you to the rights and privileges of the ministry of a crucified Redeemer. It can not be that they who live godly lives in Christ Jesus, shall escape persecution. Our Master suffered it unto death. His apostles endured it their lives long. The Reformers passed through its ordeal. Murray was stoned even in Boston; and all who have been faithful in testifying against the popular errors, since then, have had to endure it, more or less. But this grasp of fellowship is our solemn pledge to sustain you, to co-operate with you in your labors, and to share with you your perils and sufferings. We pledge to you, hereby, our counsel and advice when needed—our active defence when calumny assails your character, or prejudice impugns your motives. And it is to you a pledge of our impartial justice and mercy, in trying any charges which may be preferred against you. And should you, my brother, ever swerve from the path of rectitude and truth, (which may God in mercy prevent, for your sake and ours!) still it is a pledge that we will pray and hope, and labor for your reformation—that we will preach to you those powerful and all-efficacious truths you proclaimed to others, and by not heeding which, you became a cast-away. We hold to no final and utter impenitency

* The original was delivered truly extempore, under the influence of deep feeling. I have preserved the outline as well as an imperfect remembrance would allow; though I am sensible that the language is different, and that some ideas are introduced, which were not uttered at the time.

—we never despair of the salvation of sinful man—
—we are commanded to labor on, in hopes that God may yet be pleased to grant repentance unto life in this mortal being, and in the assurance that ultimately he will restore all to holiness and happiness. And if God's goodness faileth never to his erring children—oh, why should man's hopes and efforts ever cease in behalf of a sinful brother?

By these welcomes, by these encouragements, by these solemn assurances, then, we bid you God speed, Br. Goodrich, in your labors of love —in your toils, and trials, and sufferings for the improvement of man in morals and divine truths.
Go on! brother, while life and reason last—go on! while there is work to be performed and rewards to be earned—and when your earthly career is run, may your sun set in a cloudless sky, and your waning powers of hearing be cheered with the plaudit of the Master, "WELL DONE! good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joys of thy Lord!" Amen.

ADDRESS TO THE SOCIETY.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY, OF HOMER.

Beloved friends, and respected members of this Society: Having been selected to briefly address you on the present occasion of deep and solemn interest, I now arise for that purpose. Although I could have wished that this task might have been assigned to an elder in years and experience, and one by whom it would have been performed more to the satisfaction of all concerned, still unused to apologies, I crave your indulgence for a few moments, and proceed now directly to the work before me.

This, to you, my friends, is an occasion long to be remembered, and by us all will it be cherished in memory, as one, on which we saw a youthful champion in the cause of truth, coming forward, and in a public manner taking upon himself the mighty and solemn responsibilities of the ministerial office. To realize that, yourselves, in some good degree, have been instrumental, by your kindness, and care, and respect, and good will—by the mutual encouragement, assistance and support which you have rendered him—in raising our beloved brother to the rank he now enjoys, and making him a bright and shining light in our world, and rendering him useful, devoted, and zealous in the ministry of reconciliation. To realize all this, must, indeed, be pleasing and grateful to your hearts, and must awaken there emotions of joy.

He has now been solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry—he has bound himself by the most imposing and weighty of all obligations, that, God helping him, he will be a faithful watchman on the walls of our spiritual Zion. He has vowed before men, and in the sight of Heaven, that he will devote his time, his talents, his life, his all, to the cause of God, of truth, and humanity! From henceforth he is to be a true soldier of the cross—from this time forward he is bound to preach Christ and him crucified—to lift up his voice in the defence and proclamation of the Gospel of grace and salvation. Trials may be before him—persecutions, perils, deaths—and yet he is to go on. Faint he may be at times, and weary, and sick at heart, but he is not to turn back in the warfare in which he is engaged. Until God shall call him home, he is to continue fighting the good fight of faith.

To you as a society, he is still to be a teacher and pastor—he is still to feel ardent desires for your welfare—to break to you the bread of heaven—to speak peace to your mourning—to wipe away the tears from the eyes of your sorrowing—to bind up the broken heart—and to pour the glad light of salvation into every darkened and benig-hted soul. In the language of another—where the sinful commit evil, he must warn—where the scornful sneer, he must rebuke—where the repentant despair, he must breathe mercy, good for evil, love for hatred, kindness for injury, must he return. Brave and unshrinking must he be, for he is a soldier of the cross. No fear of the rack, the scaffold or the chain, must prevent him from pressing onward with the truth, and looking to Calvary and the cross, on he must go, through trials and mockings, planting the standard of truth amidst the ruins of error, and beating back the mailed legions of darkness.

And if these solemn duties are his, what are yours, my friends, as the people of his charge?
You are bound to stand by him, as you have done in times past—to aid and assist him by your generous support and counsel—to encourage onward in the good work in which he is engaged, by your hearty co-operation, and by manifesting yourselves his friends, in substantial tokens of charity and good will. If you do this, God will prosper you—he will increase your numbers and your strength—and make this a point from which light shall radiate, and shine in upon surrounding darkness, throwing a hallowed influence over the hearts of the alienated and the lost, and quenching the bitter spirit of opposing powers!

A few general remarks, and we have done. The labors of a preacher, are arduous and trying at the best—but labors that seem useless in producing good among the hearers, or in advancing truth among the opposers, are most trying to the spirit of the true minister of Christ. Oh, let not these discouragements be added to the many your pastor must meet with. Let the words of truth he shall speak, have their due effect on your hearts. Cherish his spirit then, until they burst forth in blossoming, and bear in fruitfulness. Let him see the effect of his labors in your increasing devotion to practical piety and goodness. Let him see it in your engagedness in the cause. Let him see it in your zeal, not only to live the doctrine you profess; but also to spread it abroad to others.
Here come on each returning Sabbath. Here bring your partners and little ones. Here induce your friends and neighbors to come, till they shall rejoice with you. Here bring the opposer of your most holy faith, till he shall be a friend in your midst. God bless you. Do thus, and God will bless you, and prosper your labors, and crown your efforts with success.

MY OWN EXPERIENCE—Continued.

The Bible tells us that, God wills the salvation of all mankind. "For there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time." 1 Tim. ii: 4, 5, 6. "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out:
for I come down from heaven, not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me; and this is the Father's will," etc. John vi: 36-41. If all are to come to Christ, and none are to be cast out, which I ask, is true, universal, or partial salvation?
St. Paul says, 1 Tim. iv: 10, that "God is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe."
Can he be the Saviour of all men, if he dooms nine tenths of the human family to endless wo?
Ps. xxii: 27, "All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him." Now
I ask, what creature in the universe is not a kindred to some other being; and if a kindred to any other being, he must worship God? Will those who people the regions of endless night, worship God? Isa. xlv: 22-25, "Look unto me all ye ends of the earth, and be ye saved; for I am God and there is none else; I have sworn by myself, the word has gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall [one] say in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Will the countless millions that are doomed to perpetual torment, bow the knee and declare, that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength? How palpably absurd!

I might write volumes in support of this doctrine; but I refer the reader to the Bible throughout. I feel to praise God for the comfort and consolation I have derived in belief of the doctrine of His impartial grace; language is insufficient to express the joy and comfort I feel. I am delivered from that slavish tormenting fear, which used to haunt my midnight hours. There is no sect or denomination of Christians in our country, against which the tide of prejudice runs so high as against the Universalist. I have not embraced the doctrine from any sinister motives, but from a firm conviction of its truth. The step I have taken, was not taken in a moment. I weighed well its consequences. My friends and relatives, with scarcely an exception, still cling to the dole-ful doctrine of endless sin and wo. I stand alone as to this. I am well aware that I shall not henceforth be wafted on the wings of popularity. I have reason to believe that I shall be assailed on every side—that the tie of friendship will in many instances be broken; I had almost said fraternal friendship, but I hope not. To those who must still oppose me, I must say, farewell. I wish I could by some means induce my friends to examine this subject—to give it a careful investigation, that they may behold the beauty and loveliness there is in the religion of Jesus Christ. It is like an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast. I pray Almighty God that the time may soon come when the darkness which has so long shrouded our world, shall give way to the glorious light of truth which "maketh free indeed." That the shackles of unbelief may soon fall from their feet, and the scales of ignorance from their eyes; that they may be brought into the bright and glorious liberty of the Gospel. But if the tie of friendship must be broken, I must bid you go;

for I am resolved not to sacrifice peace of mind for the sake of enjoying the favor of the multitude.
And I can dispense with the friendship which I can enjoy, only on the ground of my believing that a greater part of mankind will be doomed to endless wo.

POLITICAL EXCITEMENT.

Our cause has greatly suffered by the intense political excitement, just passed we hope; for every thing seemed swallowed up in that. Meetings were thinly attended in many places; while in all, we fear the sermon was less heeded than a train of political thought which had been running through the mind for weeks together.—
Many friends became so engrossed in politics that they forgot to support by word or means, the Gospel—the Universalist preacher and printer were suffered to live on hopes and promises. Can it be wondered at, then, that in some cases, both sermons and papers lost much life and spirit, and that their influence decreased?

But that time, we fervently trust, is now past and gone.
Let our friends every where, awake to a sense of their duty to the cause of morals and religion. Let every one take hold in earnest, to secure that victory, which will cause none to mourn for a defeat—and which will never become "an old story." Some, no doubt, will feel very poor, and much discouraged, in consequence of having expended so much money, strength and time on politics; but let them especially arouse to this cause, and expect themselves to sustain it, and in a short time they will feel richer in faith than they ever felt in money, and full of hope and joy.

Our cause must be advanced, and that immediately—and it can be done, very greatly, if only every friend to it will do his or her full share towards it. Let then, every one take hold, subscribe for preaching—get up social meetings, procure periodicals, pamphlets and books, and not only read them yourselves in your famies, but induce your neighbors to read them. Look around you, and see how many liberal men and women there are in your vicinity, and see that every one does something to aid in supporting the preacher—or to aid in circulating our periodicals and books—or in adding interest and instruction to the social meetings of the believers. Begin the work immediately, and persevere in it, and less than a year will see our cause arising from the dust in which it is now seated, and putting on its beautiful garments. Now is the time—now, immediately—for too long has it been neglected, and now the cause of that neglect, is over and gone.

I shall prepare and publish, early in the next volume, a series of articles on the causes of our slow progress in this state, and on the best measures of advancing it rapidly and permanently in future. I have devoted much attention to the subject, and collected much valuable information from a number of the brethren in various sections, and would begin the series now, but for two reasons.—1st. I could not finish it in the present volume, consistently with other engagements. 2d. I hope, by delaying, to have the articles read by more readers than our present volume has; for I can not but believe that our friends will increase our list for us this Fall. 3d. A sermon, which I have promised to publish soon, embraces a part of the subject, and I do not wish to repeat so soon the same ideas. But in the volume the articles shall appear, Providence permitting.

I hope, also, to be encouraged in my efforts to render the volume for 1841 far more useful to the cause in other respects. Pressed down, as I have been, by the dark prospects and weighty burdens of this present year, I felt sometimes more despondent, and less energy and courage to write, than I should, to do justice to the paper. Indeed, very often I could not think of any thing but debts.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

It is with much pleasure and some pride that we copy from our distant periodicals, the following testimonials of approbation in favor of this institution. We have noticed it from year to year, until we feared that our readers would suspect that we praised it merely as "a matter of course," and not because the institution was really deserving of all, and more than all we said in its favor. But the General Convention of Universalists holding its session in Auburn this year, drew many of our editors and preachers into this section, some of whom visited and examined the Institute for themselves. In every case, I believe, the result was a highly favorable opinion of the schools and their teachers. Their opinions, published and spoken, have undoubtedly aided to make the Clinton Liberal Institute more favorably known abroad, than it yet has been; though we will venture to assert, not as well known as it deserves to be.

Br. Balch, of Providence, R. I., who, it will be remembered delivered the annual discourse before the Institute, thus wrote to the Christian Messenger concerning it. The censure at the close is just; but this year some preachers were prevented from attending by a misunderstanding as to the time—it having usually occurred the last week in August, instead of September, as this year. Their arrangements having been made, could not well be altered on discovering the mistake.

"CLINTON, Sept. 3, 1840.

"Br. Price—Thinking a letter from me would not be unacceptable, I have taken the liberty to address you from this place on the subject of the Liberal Institute, which has just terminated its summer term. I was not able to reach the place in season to attend all the services, but I have seen enough to convince me that it is an excellent Institution, and very prosperous under its present management. The performances of the young ladies I did not attend. Those of the young gentlemen were of a high order. Some of them are rarely if ever surpassed by the graduates of our older Colleges and Universities. They showed depth of thought, clearness of conception, and simplicity and force in delivery, which are not often excelled. I noticed one thing I could not fail to admire, a variety of subject and manner. Most of our higher seminaries are governed by particular forms and methods in their habits of thinking and speaking, as though they were drilled into them by the instructors. It is not so here, if a correct judgment can be formed from the performances I attended; every thing breathed a free and liberal spirit, and proved that the human mind can be trained without fetters, or whips and traces. Minds which are educated here are saved from these prejudices and biases which preclude the prospect of their future growth. The object of the teachers seems to be to advance their pupils as far as possible, and prepare them to go on themselves when graduated from the Institution. They do not fix bounds which they are never to pass; but leave them free and qualified to progress.

This Institution deserves the most implicit confidence and liberal support of the public. Some may be afraid to send their children here because it is professedly a liberal school. Certainly Universalists should not object to it on that ground, but should give it their most cheerful and hearty support.

I saw one thing of which I may in justice complain, the negligence of the professed friends of liberality in not attending the annual services of the Institution. Such backwardness as has been shown this year, repeated for a few years to come, will chill the warmest hearts and relax the mightiest efforts. Only two or three of our preachers were present, although I am told several were in the neighborhood. And many lay friends from the region did not come up to this "feast of reason."

The friends of liberal principles should awaken to the merits of the Clinton Liberal Institute, and give it their countenance and support, in a manner to encourage its present managers. Its benefits will then be known, and streams of knowledge, and virtue, and liberality will issue out from it, dispensing blessings all around.

"Yours truly, WM. S. BALCH."

Br. Moore, of Hartford, Ct., thus writes in the Connecticut Universalist, of which he is an Editor.

"This Institution is unquestionably one of the highest order of its class, in all important respects; and we recommend it to the Universalist public as highly worthy of its patronage; the course of study pursued here is specially directed for the benefit of that class of students who intend to become teachers. The next term will commence on the 21st inst.

If Universalists wish to see those Institutions flourish, which are founded on the broad and liberal principle of equal rights, free from the contaminating influence of Partialism, they must be consistent enough to patronise them. J. M."

Br. Eli Ballou, Editor of the Watchman, says—

"We have not seen the Catalogue of the officers and students. We take this description from the Trumpet. This institution was founded in 1831. It is under the control and supervision of Universalists, but is designed to be free from Sectarian influence. The character and reputation of the institution is highly creditable to its founders. It is worthy of the attention and patronage of every parent who desires his son or daughter to obtain a thorough, practical and accomplished education."

Br. Whittemore, Editor of the Trumpet, thus notices the Institution.

"We received, a few days since, the Catalogue of the officers and students of this Institution. It is located at Clinton, Oneida Co. N. Y. Rev. T. Clowes, L. L. D.—Principal and Professor of languages—B. Birdsall, professor of Mathematics—J. M. Elwood teacher in French and assistant in the Classics. Miss Louisa M. Barker, Principal of the Female Department, and Miss E. Lamb, Professor of Music. Whole number of students this year, 228, viz. 75 ladies and 153 gentlemen. This Institution was founded in 1831; and although under the supervision and control of Universalists, is designed to be perfectly free from sectarian influence. The building is 96 by 52 feet, 4 stories high, exclusive of the basement; library 1200 volumes. Tuition from $4 to $8 per term according to the studies pursued. This statement of facts will show, that the Institution is worthy of public patronage."

And Sister Sarah C. Edgerton, who made a considerable visit at Clinton, and sends back to her Co-Editor Br. Bacon, some of the streaming rays of sunshine that have shone across her path, (Quere—Will she send him a letter-full of the winds, clouds, mists, rain, hail, snow, frost, mud, and rough roads that since have crossed her path?) thus writes of the Lady Department in particular. We copy from the Universalist and Ladies Repository for October, and thus close the list of Clerical and Editorial recommendations. If any after this, can doubt the merits of these schools, let them give them a fair trial.

A. B. G.

"I entered the pretty village of Clinton about sunset of yesterday. I was thankful to find myself so fortunate as to be in season to attend the exhibition of the Female Liberal Institute. This school is under the charge of Miss L. M. Barker, and I knew I had every reason to expect high gratification. The church was crowded at an early hour, and I learned that there were as many people who went away unable to get admittance as were contained in the house. I attended a theatre once, I have been present at many school exhibitions, but I never witnessed any scenic representation which for beauty and interest would compare with the evening exercises in the Free Church at Clinton. They commenced with prayer and music; after which original compositions were read by the authors. These were unexceptionably fine. The Last Indian, by Miss Gillespie, was written with much graphic power, and gracefully read. Flora No. 3, by Miss Hutchins, was very beautifully expressed both in manner and language. The South Sea was full of sweet, romantic description, by Miss Mary Bruce; indeed, it is wrong to particularize, where all were so truly excellent.

The recitations were equally correct. The Address, written, I believe, by the Principal, was very appropriate, and delivered with much effect by little Martha Fake, in her white hat and long drooping pink feather. "Birds and Flowers" from Mary Howitt, was represented by eight little girls, and was altogether the prettiest scene introduced. The plan must have originated with our friend, the Principal. I know no one who has more inspiration for the pure and beautiful. The scene was introduced by a little sprightly chat between the girls, which gradually led them to the recitation of poetry. Each one knew a little thing from Mary Howitt, and in turn recited it to the audience. One young creature brought in a bouquet of flowers, and in repeating the sweet poem called "Flower Comparisons," distributed them with inimitable grace among her companions. The noise which was created in the house by some rude persons, quite destroyed the effect of several of the finest pieces. "The Adopted Child," by Mrs. Hemans, was very touchingly spoken by Miss Gillespie, and Miss Fake; the "Love of Distinction," an original composition, was also enacted with great spirit and truth of manner. Its influence must have been salutary.

The music by the young ladies was very fine, and did credit to their instructress. The song by Miss Jane Barker was a beautiful thing. To those who were present we need not commend the performance. "The lords of creation" told some truths which made the gentlemen who were present look rather serious and apprehensive. It was a spirited execution.

In conclusion let me observe, that the Clinton Female Institute is one of the best seminaries in our country. Its worth should be better appreciated by our denomination, and a more liberal patronage bestowed on it by those who have daughters to educate. Do they know that their children would lose nothing of a mother's tenderness, nothing of a mother's watchful anxiety under the charge of the excellent and talented lady who stands at the head of this seminary? Do they know that there the mind will not claim the exclusive care of the teacher, but that the affections, the warm young heart will be nurtured, and guarded, and refined? Do they know that love is the only governing principle by which they are directed, and that the lady of whom we speak, possesses an almost magic power of winning trustful and ardent attachment? I speak not for praise, but for truth, and I beg the consideration of all parents who feel any interest in the intellectual and moral education of their daughters. Let them make a trial—I know the result."

THE SERMON.

I seize the opportunity of a comparative dearth of communications, to comply with a request made by a number of friends, for the publication of the sermon and excellent addresses delivered at the ordination of Br. Goodrich, in September last. It is not often that I transgress in this manner on the columns of our paper and the patience of our readers. Another sermon, originally delivered at the dedication of the meeting-house in Litchfield, last Winter, and the publication of which has also been requested by some friends who heard it redelivered elsewhere, will probably appear in the present volume, as promised. If I may judge of my own productions, both contain some ideas worthy of attention, not for their originality or the style in which they are clothed, but for their importance.

Br. Hutchinson has resolved to have a few copies of each of these sermons, published in neat pamphlet form, for sale to those who may deem them worthy of circulation or preservation in that form. I hope he will find a sale for them soon, as they are not matters which sell the better for being old! I will forward the 100 copies of the Ordination Sermon, ordered by Br. Goodrich, as soon as the pamphlet is ready. And I confess that it would be gratifying to my vanity, to learn that others who had urged me to publish these sermons, had ordered the whole pamphlet edition from Br. Hutchinson!

"EFFECTS OF BIGOTRY,

As exhibited in certain circumstances connected with the sickness, death and funeral of Mr. JOHN SERGEANT, who died in Nunda, Allegany county, N. Y., October 2, 1840"—By Rev. W. E. Manley.

This is a pamphlet of 14 pages, calmly and plainly written, and narrating circumstances enough to make man blush for the conduct of his kindred. I knew and highly esteemed Br. Sergeant while he resided in this county; and was deeply pained to think that one so mild and obliging should be denied in his last illness the choice of his own physician—and after his decease, the choice of preacher to deliver his funeral sermon! And still more that these refusals should come from his own relatives—from those whom he had greatly benefitted while living. But such is the intolerant and cruel spirit of bigotry—of that sanctimonious religious zeal which animates some of the opposers of Universalism. May God forgive them; for surely they know not what they do!

A few copies are left with Br. Hutchinson, in hopes that Br. Sergeant's relatives, friends and acquaintances in this country, may wish to purchase them.

BILLS—BILLS!

We are making out bills, and sending them to our agents and subscribers, as rapidly as we can. Will all agents to whom they are sent, collect and make returns immediately—and all subscribers see that we have not to ask for our hard earned dues a second time? It is very disagreeable to dun.

N. B. If any errors are found in the bills, (as is probable in some cases,) we will cheerfully make the correction on being informed of the facts. Agents who have received pay, and have not reported to us, will see the necessity of doing so forthwith.

REMEMBER!!!

That at the close of the present volume, we shall strike from our subscription list the names of all persons who are indebted to us for more than the present volume; except in cases where we are assured of the willingness of the subscriber so owing.

N. B. Agents, Postmasters, and others are respectfully requested to aid us with information respecting the present responsibility of those on our list. And all delinquent subscribers are respectfully reminded that the strongest proof we can have of a man's honesty and ability, is his payment of what is due to us.

ed toward us; blessing, and cursing not; returning good for evil, and doing good to all as we have opportunity;—then will not our infinite Father do even better toward us, than he requires of us to do toward each other? CERTAINLY. And so revelation teaches—that all souls are God's—that his goodness is to be the rule of our goodness, inasmuch as it is greater than any he requires from us—and that all we are from God, and will be to him again, when he becomes "all in all." One destiny—a glorious and ever blessed immortality in the enjoyment of our lot forever and ever, is thus revealed in the Scriptures as the one faith, the one hope, the final home of all our race. Every deduction furnished by nature, powerfully confirms this great and glorious truth—the Gospel of universal salvation from sin and death;—every process of correct reasoning on the subject, based on sound premises, reaches this glorious conclusion;—and every holy and benevolent feeling of the human soul, rises up to ardently desire and pray for its accomplishment. And, glory be to God! the Universalist believes it—and the Universalist ministry can rightfully hand around to all this "word of truth," until all hearts shall be purified by its faith and love, all minds rejoice in its light, and all souls exult in its universal blessedness.

I have thus read off to you but a few title pages of the exhaustless volumes of subjects contained in the Gospel. Ten thousand times ten thousand lives would not suffice to explore them all in connection with the teachings of nature, and the deductions of cultivated reason. But "study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

It thus appears that the proper light in which the Christian ministry should be viewed, is that medium between the extremes erected by the imprudent friends and the injudicious enemies of Christianity. Ministers are neither more nor less than men. Their office, however important and sacred, can not render them more than the brethren of their race. Their past lust of domination, generated by the imprudence that thrust undue power into their hands, should not render them less than others the objects of present confidence and affection.

Their office is that of ministers to the flock—not lords spiritual—nor yet slaves—but "servants for Jesus' sake." But by that office they are not exclusively, but only especially set apart to study a particular branch of knowledge. The fields of nature, reason and revelation are open to others as well as to them; but they are specially to devote their time and talents to bringing from the mines of God's truth the sacred ore, and to elaborating it into such forms and portions as are best calculated to exhibit it in its purity and loveliness. And in doing this, they should avail themselves of all the studies, the improvements, and the collected wisdom of the age in which they live, as valuable auxiliaries. Lastly—as God has clearly revealed his will, and bequeathed in it a boundless and immortal legacy to each of his children, and made us the ministers of that will, it is our duty clearly to expound, and faithfully to administer that Testament of God's impartial grace, and to see that all, as far as possible, enter now into the enjoyment of "the earnest of that purchased possession." And wo—wo—wo to the base hireling who shall flee when the wolf cometh! WO to the knavish wretch who shall endeavor to rob any of the children of any portion of their Father's legacy, or tamely allow others to do it, unrebuked and unresisted!

My labor is finished. Such a ministry the Gospel requires and the world needs.—Such a ministry Universalists must yet have, wherever there are believers in the land. Such a ministry it is the duty of our lay brethren to support and co-operate with. Such a ministry must we become, if we would see Christianity in its purity, topple down the high places of error and wickedness, and fill up forever the yawning abyss of skepticism—if we would have man elevated to the full dignity of his entire nature, and God rule over reconciled humanity in the kingdom of his Son below. And such a ministry will be needed, until the period comes, when our only teacher will be our Father in heaven, and all shall know the Lord from the least unto the greatest. AMEN.

HOME.

"To die is to go home,"—W. C. HASNCOM.

Where is that bright and happy home
Of sweet and holy rest,
Where love, joy, peace, and purity,
Make every spirit blest?
Is it where bright and lovely flowers
Bloom only to decay?
Where beauty dwells on earth's bright bowers,
Then quickly fades away?
Or is't the land of poesy,
Of beauty and of love?
Or is this bright and lovely home
Of happiness above?
Ay, 'tis above in heaven so fair
Beyond the deep blue sky:
A God of love is ever there—
Oh! fear not then to die!
How blest to dwell with God on high,
Where all in freedom roam!
Oh! then we'll never fear to die—
"To die is to go home!"

A SYRIAN SKETCH.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "VIVIAN GREY."

The sun was quivering above the horizon, when I strolled forth from Jaffa to enjoy the coming breeze amid the beautiful gardens that environ that agreeable town. Riding along the previous day, my attention had been attracted by a marble gate, the fragment of some old temple, that now served as the entrance into one of these enclosures, their secure boundary otherwise formed by a picturesque and impenetrable hedge of Indian fig.

It is not a hundred yards from the town: behind it stretches the plain of Ramle—the ancient Arimathea—broad and fertile, and, at this moment, green; for it was just after the latter rains, when Syria is most charming. The caravan track winding through it, led to Jerusalem.

The air was exquisitely soft and warm, and sweet with the perfume of the orange bowers. I passed through the marble portal, adorned with some florid yet skillful sculptures, and found myself in a verdant wilderness of fruit-trees, rising in rich confusion from the turf, through which not a single path seemed to wander. There were vast groups of orange and lemon-trees, varied occasionally with the huge offspring of the citron-tree, and the glowing produce of the pomegranate; while, ever and anon, the tall banana raised its head aloft with its green or golden clusters, and sometimes the graceful and languid crest of the date-bearing palm.

While I was in doubt as to the direction I should bend my steps, my ear was caught by the wild notes of Turkish music; and, following the sounds, I emerged upon a plot of turf, clear from trees, in the middle of which was a fountain, and, by its margin seated on a delicate Persian carpet, a venerable Turk. Some slaves were near him; one of whom at a little distance, was playing on a rude lyre; in his left hand was a volume of Arabian poetry, and he held in his right the serpentine tube of his Nargilly or Syrian pipe. When he beheld me, he saluted me with all the dignity of the Orient, pressing his hand to his heart, but not rising. I apologised for my intrusion; but he welcomed me with serene cordiality, and invited me to share his carpet and touch his pipe.

Some time elapsed in answering those questions respecting the European horses and European arms, wherein the European delight. At length the solemn and sonorous voice of the muezzin, from the minarets of Jaffa, came floating on the air. The sun had set; and, immediately, my host and his companions performed their ablutions in the fountain; and, kneeling towards Mecca, repeated their accustomed prayers. Then rising, the Turkish aga, for such was his rank, invited me to enjoy the evening breeze, and accompany him in a walk round his garden.

As we proceeded my companion plucked an orange, and taking a knife from his girdle, and cutting the fruit in half, offered me one moiety, and threw the other away. More than once he repeated this ceremony, which somewhat excited my surprise. At length he inquired my opinion of his fruit. I enlarged, and with sincerity, on its admirable quality, the racy sweetness of its flavor, which I esteemed unequalled; but I could not refrain from expressing my surprise, that of fruit so exquisite he should so studiously waste so considerable a portion.

"Eftendi," said the Turk, with a grave though gracious smile, "to friends we give only the sunny side."

A REVOLUTIONARY HERO.

A FACT.

The 4th of July, 18—, was celebrated in the usual manner, with civic and military rejoicings, in one of the most considerable towns in Eastern Pennsylvania. In the evening of the day a public festival was held within a beautiful grove at the suburbs of the town. The Committee of Arrangement, by request of the orator, appointed for the occasion, Mr. B—, collected all the revolutionary veterans they could find within the compass of several miles, and arranged them with fine effect on either side of the chair of the President. Every thing went off charmingly—the dinner was excellent—the wine was delicious—the music was soul-stirring, and the toasts patriotic. After the Declaration of Independence was read, Mr. B. arose and addressed the meeting, in a strain of eloquence which called forth heartfelt and rapturous bursts of applause. He dwelt pathetically on the hardships and privations of that little band of heroes who fought by the side of our beloved Washington, through all that memorable struggle, which ended in the glorious achievement of our liberties. In the midst of his discourse, he turned round to the old veterans, whose moistened eyes showed how well the chord that awoke in their recollections the thrilling deeds of by-gone days, had been touched, he suddenly questioned a silver-haired septuagenarian—

"What battles, my old friend, have you fought in?—won't you tell us?"

"I crossed the Brandywine with Washington—fought at Yorktown—and saw the surrender of Lord Cornwallis."

"And you," continued the orator.

"I was at Saratoga; and, I tell you, it done our hearts good to see the red-coats march by us with furled banners and reversed arms—fine looking fellows they were, too."

"And you?"

"I was with General Green, through all his southern campaign, and I fought with him in every battle."

"And you, where were your laurels won?"

"On the sea," answered a weather-beaten old tar. "I was with Barry, when he taught the proud Britons that we were as invincible on the ocean as on the land."

The cheering was tremendous.

The orator went on. "And you, tell us where your honored garlands were earned!—speak, old father; upon what field of blood did you behold victory perched upon our flag?"

"Vy, by Jo, I vash at Trenton."

"Under Washington, gallant soldier, under Washington."

"O, ya; I vash oonder Vashingtons, als ven ve soorrendered!"

"Surrendered!—what do you mean, my old hero? Surrendered!"

"Vy, ya, mein herr! be sure ve soorrendered oonder Shenerals Vashingtons—I vash von of de Hessians!"

Imagine, reader, the surprise of the audience, the momentary suspense, and the deafening roar of laughter and plaudits that followed.

THE RULING PASSION.

It is related that Taylor, stockjobber, who died a number of years ago in London, worth one hundred thousand pounds sterling, invested in government stocks, was so penurious that he hardly allowed himself the common necessaries of life. A few days before his decease, when it became evident that he could not live but a few days longer, he sent for the officers of the parish in which he lived, who found the old man on a wretched bed in a garret with nought to eat but a rash of bacon and a potatoe, of which he asked them to partake. One of them accepted the offer, upon which he desired an old crone, who served him in various capacities, to broil another—but on finding that there was nothing more in the house, he severely reprimanded her for not having his larder supplied with at least a quarter of a pound of bacon, to cut into rashers whenever it was wanted for company. He then informed the parish officers that he had bequeathed in his will one thousand pounds for the relief of the poor—and eagerly inquired if they would not allow him a discount for prompt payment. This being agreed to, he, with much apparent satisfaction, immediately gave them a check on his banker for nine hundred and fifty pounds! And after declaring that he had made an excellent bargain, breathed his last.

Dr. Rush was perhaps one of the most utiring students that ever lived. Two young physicians were conversing in his presence once, and one of them said "When I finished my studies"—"When you finished your studies!" said the Doctor, abruptly. Why you must be a happy man to have finished so young. I do not expect to finish mine while I live."

DEATHS.

In Henderson, October 9th, Mrs. MARY SIAS, consort of Jeremiah Sias. This is the third time our brother has been called to consign to the clods of the valley, a bosom companion, and left to struggle on surrounded by motherless, and helpless infants.

May the Lord sustain them, and wipe all sorrow from his eyes, and comfort all who mourn with him in this bereavement. W. S.

At Evans' Mills, October 13th, 1840, Miss SARAH S. MORRIS, daughter of Mr. J. Morris, aged 17 years. Her disease was the dropsy on the brain, which terminated her existence in about two weeks from the commencement of her illness.

Never has it been our lot, to present the cup of Gospel consolation, to more bereaved and sorrowing friends. And yet, they sorrowed not as do those who are without hope; for they knew in whom they have believed, and put their trust and confidence in that God, whose love is stronger than death. Until now, these parents knew not the full strength of that cord which connects the hearts of parents and children. Nor had they ever fully realized, the painful struggle which is felt in a parents bosom where resistless Death tears from their fond embrace, a dearly beloved and affectionate child. But they are sustained by the glorious and soul cheering hope, that the time will eventually arrive, when they shall meet their beloved daughter in the bright realms of bliss and glory, to go no more out for ever. Mild gentle, kind, affectionate and lovely; Miss Morris had seemed the affectionate good will of all who knew her—and the overflowing congregation which assembled at her funeral, irrespective of their religious tenets, showed the high estimation in which she was held by the community around her. Truly "it is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting."

The funeral was attended on the 14th, in the Presbyterian meeting house, and a discourse delivered from 2 Cor. v: 1, by HENRY L. HAYWARD.

REFLECTIONS

CONCERNING THE PATRIARCH ABRAHAM.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

Previously to the departure of Abraham from the land of his nativity, he received that ever memorable promise, called by Paul, the Gospel; and after he removed to the land of Canaan, the Lord appeared to him, for the purpose of impressing his mind with the certainty of the fulfilment of the promise; that the land wherein he dwelt, should be a possession for his seed after him. And the circumstances were such that Abraham needed encouragement of this kind. By a reference to the history of those times, we shall find that Abraham lived in his native land, till he was seventy and five years old; and, after his removal, twenty and five years, previously to the birth of Isaac.

All this time, Abraham had no legitimate heir. Whence, then, was to come that numerous posterity, which God had told him should be as the stars of heaven, for numbers? But notwithstanding circumstances were unfavorable, and the prospect dark, Abraham doubted not the fulfilment of the promise—"he believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness." In process of time, he received his long-wished for son, who was to be the inheritor of the promise and the possessions of his father.

Here then, was an evidence of the truth and veracity of that God, who had so often appeared to him, and covenanted with him. Abraham probably was now strengthened in faith, if strengthened he could be. The prospect brightened; and he could look forward to the time when his posterity should be as the sands upon the sea shore—when, agreeably to the declaration of Jehovah, they should possess the land from the river of Egypt, even unto the great river—the river Euphrates.

This was a very interesting period of the Patriarch's life. His sun of existence was fast sinking towards the western horizon, and the time was not far distant, when he must sleep with his fathers: but, the prospect before him was as bright as man, at his advanced age, could have. He had lived to what might well be termed, a good old age, honored, respected, and esteemed by all that knew him. God had blessed him highly, in a worldly point of view. His flocks and herds had increased to that degree, and his power was so great, that he was accounted a "mighty prince" by those among whom he dwelt. And, to render his condition still more pleasant, he had now a son on whom he doated—on whom he looked as the future representative of his name—one who he fondly hoped, would be heir, not only to his name, and estate, but also to his virtues—one that should do as he had done—rear altars to the most high God, and worship under the smiles of an approving Heaven. And doubtless the Patriarch sought to "train up his child in the way he should go," endeavoring by every means in his power, to fit him for the important and responsible station he was soon to occupy.

We have now arrived to the commencement of a very important era in the Patriarch's life. By looking at his history we find the following relation. Commencing at the twenty-second chapter of Genesis we read thus: "And it came to pass, after these things, that God did tempt Abraham, and he said unto him, Abraham—and he said, Behold, here I am. And he said take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering, upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of."

Here, it will be seen, that a requisition was made that must have put the faith of Abraham to the severest test. By it, he is required to take his only son—to carry him afar off to the top of a mountain, and there slay him in the manner that beasts were slain for sacrifices, and there, to offer him up as a burnt offering.

Now, admit that Abraham possessed the feelings natural to parents in general—that tender tie that links parent to child, and creates such a deep solicitude for his welfare: and we may well see that the requisition here made upon him, was calculated to create in him the strongest sensations. "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac whom thou lovest." How very trying must this have been to the feelings of the old man! Call to mind the circumstance, that Isaac was the son of his old age—born to him at an advanced period in life, when parental affection operates with its greatest force. Consider also that this was his only son—the only being that could, of right, stand as the successor, and representative of Abraham, and, leaving out of the account, the repugnance that the Patriarch must have felt, at the thought of being the executioner of his own son—the bare idea of losing his darling boy, must have been truly sorrowful. In that event, after Abraham had gone down to the grave, who would remain to remember him, and transmit his name to posterity, and perpetuate the memory of his faithfulness?

Abraham must have been well aware at that time, that his stay on earth must be short. His growing infirmities admonished him that the warm current of his existence was passing rapidly away—the day of his dissolution was near at hand. To view of the requisition before him, he asks, must it be so—must I perform that duty, and in so doing take the life of my son, mine only son, my beloved Isaac? And, in the day of my death, shall there be no one, on whom I can pronounce a father's blessing, and breathe out my dying benediction? That beloved child, whom I had long desired; and whom I had vainly thought would stand by at that trying period, and close mine eyes in peace—must he now, in his early youth, be taken from the land of the living, by a violent death; and must this right hand be raised to do the fatal deed? Must I be the instrument of his destruction? O, righteous Heaven! and was I born for this? Must mine own hand put an end to my posterity, and blot out my name from the earth forever? If Isaac be taken from me, how shall those promises be fulfilled that the Lord hath made me? The land of Haran, the place of my nativity, and the land of Canaan, in which I now dwell, bear faithful witness that God hath declared that my posterity shall be as the sands upon the sea shore, and that "in me, and in my seed, shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Then be it as God hath commanded. Yes, I will go; and in obedience to thy command, I will offer up my son, mine only son, my beloved Isaac.

Preparations being made, we are informed that "Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his beast, and took two of his young men, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering." They are now ready to depart, and we may well suppose, that the affectionate mother comes forth to give her child the last fond embrace. She imprints upon his cheek the maternal kiss, and says, "farewell, my son, mine only son, farewell!" And soon the company are on their way toward mount Moriah. The mother's anxious eye follows them, as they journey on, till at last they pass beyond her view, enveloped in yonder cloud. She could not expect again to see her beloved Isaac. She knew too well the firmness of her husband, to allow herself the faintest hope; and the event showed that the firmness and constancy of Abraham held out till the very last. Mount Moriah, where God commanded him to offer up his son, was some distance from the place where he resided. Two days he travels on, and as the history informs us, on the third day "Abraham lifted up his eyes and saw the place afar off."

We might now stop for a moment, and imagine what were probably the reflections of Abraham, as he journeyed by day, or laid him down to rest by night. The region over which he trod, was, according to the promise of God, one day to be in possession of his posterity. It was now peopled mostly by wandering tribes, with here and there a rude city. The shepherd, and the herdman roamed over the plain, and pitched their tents wherever convenience or inclination dictated. There, as yet, no towers, no temples rose, the wonder of the passing traveller.

But the time was coming when the seed of Abraham should be as the stars of heaven, and as the sand upon the sea shore. Then should the wandering shepherd become the citizen, and the herdman leave the uncultivated field for the bustling town. Cities then should rise where now was seen but here and there a solitary tent.

Where then was mighty Jerusalem—her proud walls—her high towers—her lofty battlements, and her splendid temple! They were not—they awaited the march of time. Abraham might have had a view of all that should succeed. He might, in imagination, have seen the millions of his posterity possessing all the land of promise. He might have had a prospective view of Israel as it was at its proudest era—its kings—its conquests—its magnificence—its glory!

While he reflected upon these things, he might well forget the errand on which he was going. But alas! when he turned his eye upon his beloved son, he remembered that the accomplishment of all that he had imagined, seemingly, depended upon him. Should Isaac be taken from the land of the living, thus early, the future would appear an utter blank; and when a few more brief years were gone by, the name and the kindred of Abraham would have perished from the earth.

But while he thought upon these things, the promises of God come up in fresh remembrance before him. He calls to mind the many times that God had solemnly declared, he should not be left without a name and a posterity; and from this, gathering fresh confidence, he is well prepared for the trying scene that awaits him. They were now within full view of the destined spot where Abraham was commanded to offer up his son Isaac. It was a mountain, whose proud top rose majestically toward heaven! He now stops and says to the young men, "abide you here with the beast, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship. And Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it upon Isaac his son; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife; and they went both of them together." In imagination, I see them toiling up the steep ascent. The dark and towering clouds surround the mountain's brow—the sun is veiled—the winds are stayed—the zephyrs hushed, and all nature seems to weep. Up, up they go, without a word, till at length the lad the dread si-ence breaks; with an inquiring tone he says, "my rather;" and the father answers, "here am I, my son." Then the son replies, "behold the fire, and the wood; but where is the lamb for the burnt offering?"

The trial on the part of Abraham had already been great; and this innocent inquiry on the part of the lad, must have increased the intensity of his feelings; had he not been one of the firmest of men—had not his faith in God been as unshaken as the pillars of heaven itself, his confidence might have forsaken him; and instead of completing his duty, he would have retraced his steps, gone back to his home, and thus have dried up the tears of the anxious mother. But no; Abraham was not to be stayed in his undertaking. Duty with him was the first rule of action. It was enough for him to know that God had said, "offer up thy son" Isaac: and now, not all the affection for the wife of his youth, nor the love he bore the son of his old age, could deter him from obeying the divine mandate.

They are now, upon the top of a solitary mountain. Save that of Omniscience, no eye was there to observe their doings. Isaac was stretched as a victim upon the altar, and the instrument of death was already in the hand of his father. At this eventful hour, does the lad cast a wishful eye upon the face of his sire; and does he there behold the lines of pity deeply drawn? There, also, he reads the determined purpose, the firm resolve! Abraham raises his hand, grasping still the fatal knife—his eye fixed—his soul stayed—his arm nerved—he lays bare the breast of his weeping boy! One act more, and the tragedy is complete! But stay! O, Abraham, stay that instrument of death! It is enough. A voice from heaven is heard saying, "Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from me."

We shall not trespass upon the reader, by accompanying them home; nor shall we relate the remaining incidents that occurred during the life of this truly wonderful man. We will however make an application of our subject. We have seen the Patriarch's unchanging faith in the God of his fathers—a faith tried to the uttermost, yet immovable. Who among us could have remained thus firm, under such a trial! Thank heaven, such a requisition will never be made of us. But, though we shall never meet a trial like his, let us not think to be wholly exempt. But when heavy gloom, like night hangs over your heads—when trials thick around you press—when confidence is shaken and faith no longer stays your souls—when hope, the anchor hope, relaxes fast its grasp; then remember Abraham's Friend—that almighty, all-sustaining Friend, who gave him fortitude to act his part on mount Moriah's lonely top. And remember that Abraham's Friend is the God and Father of us all.

Son of sorrow—daughter of affliction—read the history of this truly worthy man; and may your faith be his, and his confidence yours. May it calm your troubled soul—lead you in duty's pleasing path—sustain you as you journey on through life, till your Father calls you hence to dwell with him in realms of light, where bliss, unending bliss, shall be the boon of all mankind.

CONFERENCE IN McLEAN.

The Conference, appointed for McLean, was held on the 21st and 22d of October. And though the congregations were small, yet we enjoyed an excellent season of worship and praise. Sermons were preached by Bis. Green, Lee, Warren, Brown, Whitcomb, Montgomery and Barray. Brs. Clark and Van Campen, who were present, also took part in the services. Praise meetings were held on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, and the Eucharist was administered on Thursday afternoon. This Conference, if I mistake not its results, had a most happy influence on every person engaged in it, and tended to raise the tone of religious feeling of all who joined in it.

A council was formed, which appointed a committee to consider the propriety of appointing subjects for consideration and preachers to discuss them, at the next session of the Association. The Committee reported in favor of three subjects; viz, 1. The best means of advancing the Restitution—2. The origin, duration and use of the Eucharist—3. The nature of Salvation. The report was accepted and adopted. The council then chose Br. A. C. Barray for the first subject, to preach on Wednesday morning of the next session of the Association—Br. W. Montgomery for the second subject, to preach on Wednesday afternoon—Br. N. Brown for the third subject, to preach on Wednesday evening. The council then adjourned. T. J. WHITCOMB, Modtr.

KINDNESS.

BY MISS H. J. STONE.

What a happy world this might be, if every breast nourished the spirit of kindness toward all! How peaceful, how tranquil would the moments flow! Love would unite heart to heart, and cement them together in the bonds of peace. Look at that family circle where the spirit of kindness prevails—where the happiness of one is enjoyed equally by all, and where it enhances his or her enjoyment by contributing to that of the others. A cheerful countenance, a pleasant word—yea, an approving look—will cause the heart to leap with joy, and it costs us nothing. Why, then, should we not, when it can be done with scarcely an effort, make those happy around our path? It is our duty, as well as our highest privilege to do thus. We are creatures of strong, sympathetic feelings, which do, and will flow forth to every suffering creature of humanity; and if our hearts are not poisoned by the bitter spirit of envy, we shall rejoice equally in the prosperity of our neighbor and ourselves. What social and happy communities should we see—what a heaven would begin on earth, if those five words of our Saviour were lived out in the very spirit of them among us—"Love your neighbor as yourself." We should no more behold the side long glance of that green eyed monster—jealousy—we should no more hear the names of the truly virtuous and good treated with a sneer of contempt, because, perchance, they had, by perseverance, arisen to some degree of eminence and fame in the literary and scientific world. Envy—O, that despicable, fiendish spirit that seeks to trample under foot all those who are, or seem to be, more favored by nature than self! Lord, deliver me from its blighting influence! Let me never debase my powers by cherishing that cruel, peace-destroying spirit! This world with its cares and sorrows, is at best bleak and drear enough; why then, seek to render it still more so, by giving place to those evil spirits?

HUME'S ARGUMENT AGAINST MIRACLES.

"Experience is our only guide in our reasonings concerning matters of fact. Variable experience amounts only to probability; invariable experience to certainty. A miracle is a violation of the laws of nature, and as a firm and unalterable experience has established those laws, the proof against a miracle can not from the very nature of the fact, be surmounted by any proof whatever from testimony, because that is variable. There is therefore, and there always must be, a balance of evidence against miracles."

Thus runs the far-famed argument of Mr. Hume against miracles, and though the writer of this article is aware that it has received the attention of wiser heads than he can boast, yet he ventures upon an examination, hoping to show what some, at least, have failed of showing, that the argument is fallacious in all its material points. Let it be noticed then, in the outset, that Mr. Hume does not contend that there is no real evidence in favor of miracles. He concedes, on the contrary, that the evidence in their favor may amount to a probability, but contends that against this probability there is an absolute certainty derived from an invariable experience; and as a certainty must outweigh a probability, therefore there is a balance of evidence against miracles. Now the only question that really needs to be settled is this—"Is there a certainty of evidence against miracles?" If not, then the conceded probability of their truth remains. We ask, then, is it certain that no miracles have ever been wrought? Mr. Hume says, "the evidence against miracles can not, from the very nature of the fact," etc.

The force of the argument then, lies in the "nature of the fact." Well, what is the "nature of the fact?" Mr. Hume says, it is "a violation of the laws of nature." But are we certain that a miracle, is a violation of the laws of nature? We think it would be hard to prove this. We are not sure that we are acquainted with all the laws of nature, and therefore can not be certain that miracles are not wrought by laws unknown to us, or even by an uncommon operation of those that are known. We can not therefore be quite certain that a miracle is a violation of the laws of nature until we are also certain that we are acquainted with all these laws, and every possible variety of their combinations and operations. And yet this very violation of nature's laws, is the "nature of the fact," out of which proceeds Mr. Hume's famous certainty of evidence against miracles. It turns out however that there is no certainty of the alleged fact itself, and if the fact is not certain, much less so are our author's deductions from that fact.

But suppose we admit the fact asserted, will it thence certainly follow that there is a certainty of evidence against miracles? By no means, for it is not certain that no law of nature has ever been violated. The very idea of a law presupposes a law-giver, and unless the effect can rise superior to its cause, there never has been, and there never can be a certainty that the law maker may not interpose, and repeal or suspend or even cause a violation of that law at his pleasure. Where then is the certainty, that none of nature's laws have ever been violated? It is manifest, that no such certainty either does or can exist.

But let us see how Mr. Hume arrives at his certainty in this case. It is from experience. "Experience (says he) is our only guide in our reasonings concerning matters of fact." I beg pardon; but experience is not our only guide. Human testimony must be received or we must shut out every fact, present and past that we have not ourselves experienced. History according to this, can bring us no facts, for it all depends upon testimony. But let this pass.

Mr. Hume says, "variable experience amounts to probability, invariable experience to certainty." It is manifest, then, that if he has a certainty against miracles, it is derived from invariable experience.

But what is an invariable experience? It is either each man's individual experience, or it is the aggregate of the experience of all men. If the experience of each man for himself, and that alone, is to be his only guide, then I venture to say that it falls far short of a certainty. Mr. Hume may never have found, in his own experience, a violation of the laws of nature; but is it therefore certain that no other man has had such experience? By no means. The invariable experience of ten thousand men on earth has taught them that water is always fluid. Is it therefore certain that it never becomes solid from cold? Surely not. It is not true then, that an invariable experience in this sense amounts to certainty.

But suppose we say the phrase "invariable experience," is to be understood as meaning the aggregate experience of all men. Still less will this amount to a certainty. Because, First. If we admit the experience of others, we must receive it upon their testimony, and thus at once we introduce all the uncertainty of such testimony. And secondly. Because this experience is variable in itself, if we believe the testimony. All we know of the experience of others we must learn from their testimony, and this Mr. Hume himself says is variable, and can never amount to more than a probability. But if Mr. Hume's friends, contrary to his own rule, insist on introducing this testimony of human experience; then we must remind them, that it is far from an invariable experience, the only thing that can amount to a certainty by their own confession. True, many will affirm, that in all their experience they have never known the laws of nature to be violated; but on the other hand we point to a whole nation who affirm, that for ages on ages, God did frequently interpose, and suspend, or if you please, violate those laws, by signs and miracles, which were cognizable by their own experience. So far, therefore, from the inviolability of nature's laws being established by an invariable experience, it is only sustained by a portion of the history of that experience, and the experience of the world upon that subject turns out to be "variable experience," the very thing which Mr. Hume himself says can never amount to more than probability! And this is the boasted certainty which must always leave a balance of evidence against miracles! It is a certainty derived from the experience of men, reared upon their own testimony and proved to be variable. For one I say, give me the probability that the argument concedes against miracles, for it is better than a multitude of such certainties. Reader, what say you? W.

NEW-YORK ASSOCIATION.

The New-York Association of Universalists met according to adjournment in Newark, N. J., on the morning of October 7th, 1840, and having been called to order by the Standing Clerk, proceeded to appoint H. H. Brown, Moderator, and T. J. Sawyer, Clerk. United in devout thanksgiving and prayer with Br. M. Rayner.

The Fourth Universalist Society in the city of New-York preferred a request to be received into the fellowship of this Association.

Voted that said request be granted.

The Committee of Discipline reported that while no cause of complaint had been preferred before them, they were called upon to state that the Rev. Wm. Whittaker, heretofore belonging to this Association, has during the past year renounced the doctrine of Universalism, and they therefore recommended the following resolution.

Resolved, That the fellowship of this Association be withdrawn from the said William Whittaker.

The report and the accompanying resolution were unanimously adopted.

The committee on Fellowship and Ordination reported that Br. Samuel B. Brittan requested the fellowship of this Association at its last session, and having then been satisfactorily recommended, and having been reported of all as far as they have been able to learn, they now move that the fellowship of this Association be granted.

The motion was unanimously carried.

Appointed Br. S. J. Hillyer, T. J. Sawyer and B. Ellis, Esq., a Committee of discipline for the ensuing year; Brs. M. Rayner, T. J. Sawyer, and S. J. Hillyer, a Committee on Fellowship and Ordination; Brs. T. J. Sawyer, and I. D. Williamson, clerical, and H. H. Brown, and Peter P. Hayes, lay delegates to attend the next annual session of the New-York State Convention to be holden at Watertown on the last Wednesday and following Thursday in May, 1841; T. J. Sawyer to deliver the next annual sermon before this body at its next session.

On motion, it was voted that when this Association adjourn, it adjourn to meet at such place and time as the Standing Clerk may designate.

REVIEW OF THE GUIDE.

A long review of the "PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM" appears in the Boston Recorder, an Orthodox paper. Of course, it breathes out threatnings and slaughter, but it most evidently shows that the believers of endless misery are greatly alarmed at its influence. They tremble for the fate of their darling scheme of undying pain. Still, the editor of the Recorder urges all his brethren to buy the work. He says:—

"And shall a work like this have free circulation among the members of our congregations, and our pastors be ignorant of its contents?—Shall the Bohon Upas be planted in the very courts of the Lord's house, and not be noticed by those whose office it is to pluck up every plant which their heavenly Father hath not planted? Shall the streams of death flow down our streets, and bear away our children and youth on their dark current, without riveting the attention of those who are placed at the fountain head of the waters of life? It ought not to be. Every minister ought to possess the book and study it; for otherwise he can know little of the length and breadth of that scheme of mischief and ruin, which Satan has devised in these last days for the filling up of his kingdom."

We thank him for this piece of advice to his ministering brethren, and our regret is, that no more of the laymen of his church will read it. We have sold one copy of the Guide to a Presbyterian preacher, and perhaps more. We can supply the whole multitude of them in the Western Valley with it, if they desire. Read brethren, for yourselves: prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. We read your books, why should you not read ours.—Stay in the West.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....SUPPLEMENT TO No. X.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"God is not the God of the dead."

The writer of these articles finds that No. 10 of the series, which appeared in No. 21 of this paper, has been sadly misunderstood. The present article is thrown in by way of explanation.

In No. 10, to which this is a supplement, I was arguing against, not the sleep of the soul or spirit, but its literal death. See the first paragraph, and indeed the whole article, which the reader is hereby requested to re-peruse. That the spirit sleeps, and that the spirit dies, are, to me, two, propositions.

I did not intend to confound this doctrine with that of the Sadducees. The two doctrines disagree very materially, except in one point. This point however, happens to be the very one against which alone I was arguing, namely, the literal death of the mind, soul, or spirit. And I conceive that Jesus' argument was directed as well against this, as against the notion that there is no resurrection. For he shows that Jehovah was the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, after their deaths; which could not have been the case unless they were alive, since "God is not the God of the dead." And I did believe, and do still believe, that this argument is conclusive against the literal death of the soul, whether the doctrine be held by Sadducees, or by Christians.

I find, also, that some are not aware that such a belief obtains among us, and are disposed to deny that any hold it. This is, truly surprising to me, as I know that certain works are considerably read, in which the doctrine of total death, as I have called it, is taught as clearly as words can express it. I know, also, that the doctrine has been advanced in our periodicals. But as I wish, in these numbers, to avoid even the semblance of personal attack, I forbear mentioning names, or making quotations.

Penn's Woods, 1840.

REMARKS.

The above supplement should have appeared some time ago; but was laid away with another article addressed to myself, (being on the same page,) and thus was neglected.

The Rural Evangelist says, "that the spirit sleeps and that the spirit dies, are, to me, two propositions." So I now perceive—but to me, and I think to those holding the opinions of Mr. Balfour, they are the same propositions. And as he was commenting on those opinions, I wrote the correction, not knowing that they were to him two propositions. I supposed, also, that he overlooked the clause of the text, "for all live to him," implying that God has in prospect the restoration of those dead beings to life again, therefore, though dead to men, they are, in the purpose of God, alive to him, who is Lord of the dead and the living. By literal death of the mind, soul or spirit, the Rural Evangelist understands, evidently, not only a cessation of life, or consciousness, but a cessation of existence or of being itself. A thing may cease to live, and yet have a being, an existence—by which I mean that there is a difference between "life," and "existence," (or simple being.) By not understanding me to make a distinction between the words "life" and "existence"—between "death of the soul" and its "ceasing to exist"—he has also misunderstood my meaning, as much as I did his. If he will accept these explanations, and in their light review what has been written, I will publish whatever he may deem just and proper on the subject, in reply to my correction.

I had designed writing at length, in private review of his remarks specially directed to me in the letter accompanying the above Supplement; but my health, though good, does not allow much confinement to the desk, and having much more writing to do than I dare attend to, I have been compelled to postpone my letter to him from time to time, and at last to omit it altogether. Will my brother accept this apology for my apparent neglect?

A word more—one meant for all correspondence—in writing on business on the same sheet containing a communication, be careful to arrange it so that the one can be torn off without injuring the other—and in furnishing corrections, interline them at once, or re-write on a slip, pasted over the mis-written, instead of requesting them to be made in a separate place. A. B. G.

CAUTION.

Some persons seem to suppose that a written sheet may be sent in an enclosure the same as a newspaper, with no more postage. This is not so. It subjects the sender to a fine of five dollars even to write a word on a newspaper, or the receiver to letter postage. And in the first named case, the enclosure being added to the sheet, makes the postage heavier than if it were sent as a mere letter. Will our correspondents remember this, and save us from extra cost, or themselves from a fine? A. B. G.

A GOOD NAME.

BY MISS H. J. STONE.

It has been truly said by the wise man, "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches—and loving favor rather than silver and gold." Who does not feel the truth of this! Even the most abandoned, desires to possess it, and respects and venerates the character which bears "a good name." It is the poor man's high and precious treasure, yet there are those who would filch it from him! It is for this we face the ills and crosses of life undaunted. Who, that is possessed of common sense and humanity, would wish to tear from a fellow mortal, his all—his last hope—even his "good name?" Sooner let a dagger pierce this heart of mine than rob me of that which is of more real value than silver or gold—"a good name!" Less to be dreaded is the midnight assassin than the smooth tongued flatterer, who, under the holy guise of friendship, seeks to gain thy confidence, only to expose thy weakness to the world; heaping upon it "slanders vile," and cruel as the grave. Such a one, if found, should have a mark set upon him, not like Cain, to prevent people from destroying him, but to warn them to flee from his unworthy presence. Who would wish to inhabit this bleak world, if the good and the virtuous were forever shut from his path?

Who would travel this howling wilderness of sin, bereft of the friendship of the good and great, without one to whisper the words of hope and blissful anticipation in his ear, or to point him to the immortal fame that awaits his latter days, and which will live in the hearts of generations yet unborn. Who, when the clouds of the valley shall cover him, would not live still in the affections of his fellow-men—while the tear of gratitude and love falls gently on his sleeping couch? Beware, O, fellow mortal, how you trifle with the character of those around you! Dearer than life; more precious than gold—yea, than much fine gold, is "a good name," to a virtuous, upright citizen. Guard well your every word and every look, when speaking of the absent. A breath will sometimes waft the poison of slander. Better that we think too highly of ten vicious persons, than too lowly of one innocent, virtuous one. Convince a man that you believe him worthy of trust and respect, and he will endeavor to merit it; he will blush to think of past errors, and strive to regain his lost treasure—"a good name."

MENTAL INFLUENCE OF GLOOMY PREACHING.

I am not sufficiently acquainted with the thoughts of others, to describe what their emotions and feelings are on entering a temple of worship where the most revolting and soul-congealing sentiments are proclaimed; but I never enter one, and more especially in the evening—which time is peculiarly adapted for an appeal to the passions of man, rather than to his reason and judgment—without expecting to hear something dreadfully sublime, and see some of the brightest features of Christianity exhibited in striking contrast with the most unlovely and shocking pictures of human invention, which expectations are rarely unaccompanied with the real scene. Often, as I have entered these temples of—I had almost said thanksgiving, but they are, in fact, those of wailing and lamentation—has a gloomy cloud over-spread my mind and veiled my thoughts in darkness and contemplative sorrow. And I confess with much humiliation that I have, even while there, attempted to imagine a scene, which it is thought will transpire in the unknown world; but I have always found that it proved but a weak attempt. I have thought of those painful separations which will never take place as long as the character of Deity partakes of that measure of love and mercy, which is even awarded to him by those who believe in endless misery—of the fond and doating mother as she takes her last, long, farewell look of her children—of tender brothers parting with lovely sisters, and all those horrid "farewells," and "adieux," of which the agonizing ones on earth are but the shadows? But I have turned away from the appalling sight with feelings which language would be inadequate to describe. Nor have these gloomy pictures faded from my imagination, until the services have concluded, and I once more have been permitted to breathe the free air of heaven, as free, unlimited, and untainted, as the grace of him who is felt in its breathings. Then as I have looked abroad upon the smiles of creation, and thought of the unbounded wisdom and goodness of God, have I forgotten those unwonted derelictions from implicit confidence in the sustaining love of God?

Gloomy and depressive as these thoughts are to me, how different, how very different must be the forebodings of those who consider them as a final representation of something more dreadful and heart-sickening yet to come. An expression of internal commotion is conveyed to the mind by their hollow countenances, denoting the extreme repulsiveness of their thoughts, and betraying emotions far from being pleasurable. It is true, that an affected and distorted smile will occasionally suffuse their countenances; but then it is as often overshadowed—like the sunshine of early spring—with clouds of disappointment, and the spectator is reminded of the awful solemnity of the occasion. Is it to be wondered at that these temples are nearly, if not quite deserted by the youth—those who should take a lively interest in the services of the sanctuary, and to whom the instructions of wisdom are better adapted than the furrowed brow of age? Is it strange that the fair ones of earth, should turn a deaf ear, to the proclamation of bad tidings of endless despair, when religion is held up to their view as a gloomy system, in embracing which all those innocent amusements that render the morning of life one of sunshine and delight, must be abandoned?

But perhaps I have gone too far, and spoken only of the gloom which the system imparts to its votaries, while I have left untouched those faint streaks of light and beauty, like the rosy tints on the pale cheek of death, that give to it such an extremely inviting and fascinating appearance. There are pleasant sounds sometimes heard echoing through those halls; but they are as often succeeded by those of wailing and anguish. I have often heard the opening hymn read with pleasure,

"Sinners, will you scorn the message,
Sent in mercy from above?
Every sentence, O! how tender!
Every line is full of love!
Listen to it,
Every line is full of love!"

And after such a beautiful hymn has been sung, I have listened with admiration to the preacher as he spoke of the compassion of our Saviour—I have listened with soul-felt satisfaction to his deeply pathetic manner as he appealed to his hearers to walk in the path of virtue, and secure that happiness which invariably attends her rosy way, and to abstain from vice, and avoid that misery with which it is inseparably connected. This elegant language (for truth is elegant) I have heard continued until he has nearly finished his discourse, when he has suddenly destroyed its symmetry, distorted its proportions, and exchanged its majestic simplicity for the spicy embellishment of endless wrath and the fantastic novelties of eternal misery, and a night of unmitigated horror!

INCONSISTENCY.

The editor of the Baptist Register announces apparently with considerable satisfaction, that the Rev. Mr. Whitaker, who recently renounced Universalism in New York, has united with the Presbyterian church in that city, under the charge of the Rev. Mr. Hatfield. We say with apparent satisfaction, for we know that in reality Br. Bee bee does not think one whit better of Presbyterians than he does of Universalists. And we think that we have the best of reasons for saying we know that such is the case. The Rev. Mr. Bliss has recently written and published in the Register, a series of articles on the subject of Baptism in which the most opprobrious epithets are applied to Pedobaptists, or those who believe in sprinkling instead of immersion. They are represented as usurpers, hypocrites, wolves in sheep's clothing, and even as sheep stealers! These articles Br. Beebee has frequently extolled to the skies. And more recently still, our brother, in an article concerning the persecutions which it is said the Baptists in Germany have recently undergone, gave it as his solemn opinion that if Pedobaptists in this country, (meaning Presbyterians; Methodists, etc.) had the power they would again, as they did in days of yore, cause the blood of Baptists to flow—in other words, Pedobaptists are in their hearts cold blooded murderers! Now when did Br. Beebee ever announce to the world that Universalists were sheep stealers and murderers? Never! No, no, notwithstanding our brother has so frequently represented Universalists to be such terrible, naughty creatures, he has never preferred such a charge against them—has never said they would steal sheep and murder. Now we do think that as long as our brother considered us a little better than Presbyterians, and Presbyterians to be a little worse than Universalists, he might just as well have said right out, in reference to Mr. Whitaker, "Sir, in leaving the Universalists, and uniting with the Presbyterians, you have not made a bad matter any better—you have only jumped out of the frying pan into the fire." We do think, all the circumstances considered, that we had a right to expect that such would have been the case. However we will forgive our brother this time, in hopes of better things from him hereafter.

THE RULING PRINCIPLE.

Is it true that Jesus will reign and rule until he has put all opposing power under his feet? If so: by what power or principle will he so conquer? Ans. "Love—for love is of God." But will he not, in some particular cases, make use of another principle? Ans. "With whom is no variableness neither shadow of turning." But will he not finally, in his government, consign some to endless pain? Ans. "Love worketh no ill to its neighbor." But does not his law operate differently with different individuals, whose conduct is in one case good, and in the other bad? Ans. "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust." Why is there a difference in the happiness of the good and the bad man? Ans. Each brings it upon himself—thus, if a man violates a natural law, if he thrusts his hand into the fire, he brings upon himself pain; and it is even so if he violates a moral law. The pain we receive in consequence of wrong action, is the punishment or corrective principle, which we realize the moment we become guilty, and it is an evidence of the Scripture truth, which declares, "in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." This is wisely and benevolently ordained of God, that we might be kept in the path of right action and obedience, for our own consequent happiness.

JUDGING BY APPEARANCES.

I think there is a great error in the practical tendency of the teachings of our Partialist clergy. They misapply things. They take the outward appearances of Christianity for the substance. Am I correct in this? Do they not, in general, make joining the church the whole point and force of their labors? I know that if you personnally call upon them, their point will be changed. But in their meetings of excitement, do they not say that the moral, upright man, is the most dangerous? Yes, even if he should deal justly in every respect with his neighbor, and be merciful to the necessitous, if he has not in a public manner, in words, professed to do so, and attached his name to their church, and subscribed to their creed, they will declare unto you that he is a sinner—a dangerous man, and out of the ark of safety!

Our Saviour has laid down an entirely different rule. He says, "by their fruits shall ye know them"—that is, not what they in a public manner say they will do; but the man who in his every day word and action does those things which administer to the comfort and happiness of his fellow beings, he thus practically professes in a language which high Heaven approves, his piety before God and man. ### UNDISGUISED UNIVERSALISM.

And what, kind reader, do you think is the meaning of that? What new wonder is the writer about to bring to view? Is the world about to be turned over, or are the inhabitants thereof to be confirmed in that perverted vision which beholds men as trees walking?

No, friendly inquirer, not exactly this. But I will tell you how it is. The world have so long claimed the right to be wrong side up, that they are determined to view that which should be uppermost, by the rule of contraries. Men raise themselves up in the dignity of self-made prophets, and strenuously contend, against all evidence except their own prejudices, that the should-be-zenith of this poor world, which has so long groaned under the weight which foul hands have heaped upon it in order to keep it out of sight, is the nadir, and ought to be at the bottom. I mean the religious world now. To speak plainly; self appointed judges have astonished the world with the grave position that what Universalists teach, and believe, and practice, if they are sincere and not home made, is not in reality Universalism; but that this is something so detestable that they either will not own it, or else that they do not know half as much about it as their wilfully blinded judges do.—These judges have therefore accommodated themselves to a very convenient phraseology, whereby to deliver themselves of their very inconvenient theological wrath, and conceal their own theological entanglement.

I should not write thus if there were not, on the part of our enemies, incipient evidences that a serious crisis is approaching upon them. I say they have accommodated themselves to a very convenient phraseology for certain purposes; and to accomplish those purposes with fancied facility, they speak of "Undisguised Universalism" in such a way as to imply that there is such a thing as disguised Universalism! "Undisguised Universalism!" Only think of it. Did you ever know the sun to blush that its own unborrowed rays were the gazing stock of mortal eyes? Yes, once, and only.—But those eyes were profane ones. It blushed and hid its face in clouds, when men sought to extinguish that brighter light, which arose in the glory of prophetic fulfilment, and when these blasphemed, by their deeds of darkness, Him who set the natural sun in the firmament. It blushed that men should seek to extinguish the spiritual light of salvation, because it was not confined to a few. It hid itself in frowns, because men had the hardihood, under the light of its beams, to strive against a moral light, which was as universal as its own natural rays. And if Universalism was ever disguised, it was, when, as the eternal truth of Heaven, its opposers have belied its testimonies, and perverted its impartial favor, and in defiance of its light, and under the influence of a partial and bitter spirit, endeavor to hide it from mortal view, by deformities of their own manufacture. The natural clouds which are at times hung like a curtain over the sun, are an obscurity to those only who murmur at what they will not understand; to others they are but the promise—the assurance—that it is doing its share of the work which was designed for it by the Maker of all things.

I say, Universalism is no friend of deception. Of itself it is incapable of disguise. If there is ever any obscurity thrown around it, it is done by its enemies, and those who would dishonor it. But still its language is plain and unreserved. Heap upon it all the prejudices of popular fury; breathe upon it all the effervescence of pious wrath; weigh it down with the prevailing anathemas of pretended sanctity; hide its form beneath false imputations and misnomers as much as you please, still there is no disguise upon the thing itself—you can not drown its voice—tones of thunder will come up from beneath the mass of corruption which the enemy's consciousness of shame and weakness, has heaped upon it. But it will come up free from its scathing touch—even as the tried ones of old stood in the presence of impiety and persecution free from the smell of fire—declaring, "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you. God that made the world, and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands as though he needed any thing; seeing he giveth to all life and breath and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth."

But why do men speak of disguised and undisguised Universalism? It is difficult to point out motives which even our opposers conceal from themselves. With those men, facts go to show that a thousand instances of individual experience on both sides would not be admitted as testimony against the base assertions of our self-appointed judges. I must therefore refer my interrogator to what it would seem is seldom referred to on this subject—the consciences of those who make use of these terms.

But supposing the application of these terms to be unjust, are there no examples of similar conduct by which we can gain some knowledge of its nature? Yes, and these are precisely what I designed to introduce you to. Be not surprised, dear reader, that I should make an admission which will appear to be against myself. Any thing which is really against myself shall be admitted just as readily. Being an advocate of Universalism which is never in disguise, I cheerfully admit that the Bible contains examples which are very similar to the opposition against Universalism which we are now considering. Let us look at them.

Once upon a time of great emergency, when men were yet in their sins, in due time the great high priest of our profession came to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. He bore witness to the truth of God, which was in the highest degree benevolent and impartial, by being benevolent and impartial himself. The truth which he afterwards sealed with his own blood, was his own principles of action. Were these principles opposed? By whom and how? There was a set of people who thought that certain conditions with which they had complied, were the only considerations which should secure to men the favor of God. The extension, therefore, of these favors to all, aroused their hatred against the principles of Christ as taught by him and his apostles. Were they called by Paul, the truth of God? His self-appointed judges called them heresy—and that, too, by mere assumption, and false accusation. "Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me. But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets." Acts xxiv: 13, 14. Here, then, Paul declares his sentiments, as he believed preached and practiced them; and in opposition to all this proof of sincerity, his self-appointed judges asserted, without proof, that he was a "pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition among the Jews throughout the world, and a ring-leader of the sect of the Nazarenes, who also hath gone about to profane the temple." A charge involving greater licentiousness could not well have been conceived by a Jew. But recollect all this was a false coloring of the apostles principles and conduct. The Jews were aware that they could not condemn the apostles real position before the world, and so they manufactured some things which they could oppose, and charged these upon Paul.

Take another example. When, in the exercise of the true spirit of impartial benevolence, Jesus caused the blind and dumb man to speak and see, by healing him, as he will do in the fulness of times to all the morally diseased, the Jews showed their dexterity at perversion—even the perversion of one of the highest evidences which could be given of the Saviour's goodness. Against the real motives, and object, and result of the Saviour's act, they could not contend. They therefore falsely charged him with some thing which they could find fault with. "He casteth out devils through Beelzebub the chief of devils." Here was the issue between them. Jesus maintained that he opposed evil by a different and supreme power, and that he could not oppose evil with evil principles. "If satan also be divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand." "When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace. But when a stronger than he shall come upon him, and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armor wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils." This was the position which Jesus occupied before the world, under the direction of that stronger power. And what was the evidence against him? Why, that he opposed evil through the assistance of an infernal agency; and this was the unsupported assertion of his self-appointed judges. Had they lived in our day, they might have applied the same terms, and with the same reasons, that are applied to Universalism. They might have sought to deceive the people by calling the real principles of Christ—those which he taught, and practiced, and loved—disguised Christianity; and gluttony, and drunkenness, and sinful fellowship, and Sabbath breaking, and blasphemy, and licentiousness, (all of which they charged upon him—the secret reason for which was, because he came to save sinners,) undisguised Christianity.

Do you see the authority, now, reader, for calling that "disguised Universalism," which all faithful Universalists openly believe, and teach, and love, and practice, and which all good men love and practice whether it be a part of their creed or not? Do you see the authority, now, for calling the bitter spawnings of green eyed prejudice, or the wilful perversions of black eyed bigotry, "undisguised Universalism?"

As Universalists, we say we believe in One only living God, "who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." Is there any disguise here? Yet Partialists tell the world that this is disguised Universalism, and that true Universalism is but another name for infidelity. Who are to be believed? We believe that the mission of Christ was to save mankind from their sins, by reconciling them to God, "not imputing their trespasses unto them, and" that he "hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation."—Is there any disguise? Partialists say that this is "disguised Universalism," and that "undisguised Universalism" would people heaven with sinners of the blackest die! Who are to be believed? We believe that every transgressor will receive according to the fruits done in the body; and we defy any Partialist brother to find an opposite sentiment advocated by any who are entitled to the name of Universalist. Is there any disgrace here? Yet this is called "disguised Universalism," and the people have had a sentiment preached from Partialist pulpits and papers, which professed to offer peace and joy, however corrupt he may be, and salvation from punishment, however corrupt he may continue to be, to the sinner. And this they have called "undisguised Universalism." If any person in the world believes in such a notion, (and many do,) he may ascribe all the honor to Partialist preaching, where it was coined, for I am sure he never inhibited it from a Universalist.

But I must not dwell upon this point longer. If any reader is in doubt, or is deceived by these pharisaic charges upon us, and would know what is Universalism that knows no disguise, and will not, can not tolerate it, let him lay aside the teachings, and fables, and prejudices of men who might be called cunning if they had not long since overshot the mark, and then let them read the Bible; we will risk—nay, crave the result. If he would know what the self-appointed judges over us call "undisguised Universalism," when they fancy themselves tolerably infused with the spirit of holy wrath, ponder them well when their craft is in danger. Hear their denunciations and anathemas; listen to their sermons; read their papers, and their Sabbath school volumes, which wise men have in solemn mockery recommended to the perusal of youth, and their tracts, and a host of kindred schemes for deceiving the world, and he will have all the information he needs to convince him that Partialists, for want of ability to combat true Universalism, have manufactured a false one in their desperation. We can assure our Partialist brethren, that the doctrine which they so often describe and charge over to us, is none of our kindred. It is an offspring of their own. Perhaps we might accommodate them if we would adopt it; but this we can not do. So let them flit away—we have no sympathy with it.

NOTHING TO DO.

And what is the meaning of this? Is it meant as an excuse? Then it is a positive crimination. Is it designed as a complaint? Then it is an evidence of weakness. Will it palliate the crime of indolence which we are ashamed of? Only by supposing that industry might possibly be a greater crime. Nothing to do? The English language contains such a phrase, but facts never introduced it there. Strange that the tongue does not refuse to utter it! A wise man, if he ever found the sentiment imposing itself upon his mind, might save himself the trouble of maturing it, by sitting down, and with pen in hand, writing his thoughts and troubles and complainings, for the benefit of other men, and thus prove the falsity of its application, at least to himself for the time being. But still we expect it will be used, and its meaning is forthcoming.

Look at that poor unfortunate hypochondriac! Every thing is disordered around him. He can not move unless his aching bones compel him to move, because he might do so to no purpose. So he moves without trying to accomplishing any thing, and always to wish himself back again. Even the skies scowl upon him—or rather he says they do, for he seldom goes out to tempt them, lest they should falsify his word. What is the matter with him? Nothing to do, says he. Poor man! The heavens invite him to gaze and wonder and become wiser by their silent instructions, but he will not. Appeals to mercy and benevolence in behalf of the unfortunate are sounded in his presence, and he has to close his ears to get rid of their importunities. Still they sound—yet he will not hear. God's word invites him to prayer and praise, and spiritual communing; yet it lies neglected and despised upon the shelf. He says he has nothing to do, and he complains of his condition. He has every thing yet to do! That is the meaning of it—If he will do nothing else, let him become a philanthropist; and if he ever mourns, it will be because he finds so much to do, and so few to do it.

There is an ambitious mechanic—ambitious to stand at the head of his craft, but more so to amass wealth, by its lucrativeness. Hour after hour and day after day does he labor at his calling when his services are in demand. He gains comfort and a reasonable competence but not the wealth which he desires. And when the hurry of his business is over, or a cessation of employment comes for a short time, he is discontented? What is the matter? Why his savings are diminishing and he has nothing to do—so he says. And what do his words mean? To obtain the name and competence which he desires, he must qualify himself for greater usefulness. There are many little departments of his art, which if he understood, would furnish him with business when his regular occupation fails him. Besides mental and moral improvement, calculated to make him wiser and better, should occupy a portion of his time. Of all this he is fully aware, and many a time, when he has been drove with business, has he resolved to commence these acquirements, the next leisure which he might be favored with. Does he do this now? No; He says he has nothing to do. Nothing done, would be truer until he attends to his acknowledged deficiencies, and then he will always have enough to do.

When I hear a Universalist say he has nothing to do, as an excuse for his idleness in the church of Christ, I feel disposed to pity him. For a man to be in this condition, with so great a work before him as we have, is truly a misfortune. Yet every time he offers an excuse for the neglect of duties which he never has tried, or which he has ceased to perform, and which would evidently advance the cause of truth, he virtually says, I have nothing to do. Wherein is the consistency of this plea? In this only. When he can say that no mistaken brother will be saved by his activity and zeal; That no opposer can be convinced by his exhortations and examples; that no distress can be alleviated by his kindness; that no herald of the truth, no toiling scribe who wastes his strength by the midnight lamp, in devotion to his master's cause, can be encouraged by the liberality which he can afford; that no voice can be effectually lifted in vindication of Heaven's despised, perverted, and abused truth, then he may say that he has nothing to do but fold his arms and die. But he who neglects these has every thing to do, and nothing done. Brother is this the way you have nothing to do

A. R. B.

REVS. M. H. SMITH, E. N. HARRIS, AND W. WHITTAKER.—These are the three "great Renouncers." We have not noticed them for some time past, though some changes have occurred. The truth is, we thought we might as well wait awhile, and see if they would not "settle down," so that we might make a final report concerning their movements. Of the two last named, we perhaps can, but of the first, we despair ever getting to the end of his changes. M. H. Smith, after renouncing his renunciation of Universalism for the second or third time, went to preaching Universalism on his own hook. Tiring of this, he went to Hartford, Conn., to visit Dr. Hawes, and there renounced Universalism again. By the last accounts he was preaching Partialism in that vicinity; though probably by this time he may have renounced back and forward several times. E. N. Harris, by our last accounts was preaching with the sect calling themselves "Christians." I believe in Portsmouth, N. H. W. Whittaker has finally concluded to join the Presbyterians, and rumor says he is to be Pastor to one of the societies in New York, at $1,200 per annum. Since that conclusion, the Methodists and Baptists begin to think that, after all, his conversion is nothing particularly in his favor! "Sour grapes." The poor fellow boasted of the great many calls he had received from Baltimore, Hartford, Boston, Salem, etc., until Br. Sawyer felt compelled to come out and prove that they were mere invitations to preach on trial, which, after a trial had been made, never ripened into an invitation to settle as a pastor with any one of them! The full bladder when pressed proves to be filled only with wind.

Such we believe to be the late (not present) state of these changeful renouncers of Universalism. Their conversion has not resulted in procuring a single follower in any of their congregations; and, in Mr. Whittaker's case, has proved to be of more benefit to his late society than any thing he ever performed while their pastor.

THE ROSE OF SHARON.

The second volume (for 1841) of this cheap and excellent annual seems to be gaining in popular favor on its predecessor. Literary journals, conducted by those in general who are opposed to Universalism, have the magnanimity to rise above sectarian prejudices, and to speak out boldly their opinions of the work. We are pleased to see this free and generous spirit at work in the literary world, and therefore copy a few of such notices, that our readers may rejoice with us at the increasing freedom and liberality of the literary press.

THE ROSE OF SHARON, FOR 1841: Edited by Miss S. C. Edgerton; Published by A. Tompkins and B. B. Mussey, Boston. Amongst the flowers of Literature, which the approaching Annual season has presented to our notice, we have perused none with more gratification than the beautiful volume before us—beautiful, not for its costly embellishments and gaudy garniture, but intrinsically so, for the rich fragrance of its contents. It is truly, as its name designates, the rose of Sharon, and the pure aroma that has been distilled over its three hundred leaves is redolent with

"bright imaginings and thoughts that can not die."

It is emphatically a rose that will "smell to Heaven"—a collection of glorious intellectual blossoms, the moral and religious influence of which must in their appointed time, yield Hesperian fruits; finally, it is a bright embodying of the buds of Christian hope, which, in their gradual unfolding, develop the precious promises of immortal bloom. The editress has not only been indefatigable in her own exertions to impart vigor and strength to her "Rose," but peculiarly happy in those writers who have given their aid to add a character to its literary efflorescence. As a simply moral production, "The Rustic Wife," by Miss Edgerton, is admirable; and, for vital truth and purity, so are "The Thoughts on the Deity," by the same writer, the whole scope of which, is to elevate the intellect to the true perceptions of God. "Ten Years Change," by J. G. Adams, is "a brief chapter, yet full of changes"—changes which well portray the "ups and downs" of life, from the morals of which, we learn, to use the words of the author, that "sunny skies in the morning of life do not always indicate fair days, and, that the sneers of the multitude do not always prove the object of them—a fool." This seems like "an over true tale," and the experience of those, who possess what is technically termed knowledge of the world, may serve as a running commentary upon it.

"Christianity and the Human Affections," by O. A. Skinner; "The Seven Sisters, or the Beautiful and the Religions," by T. B. Thayer, are life like blossoms in this literary bouquet, the flowers of which, all possess so many essential properties, and exhale such pure and aromatic sweetness, that we know not where to stay our admiration—whether at the modest violets of the editor's poesy, (of which we have yet said nothing, worthy as it is) or whether to confine our approbation to the prose articles only. Our notice is already somewhat elaborate, and, remembering that we have other publications that demand our attention, we approach our finale by a hearty commendation of this pretty looking and intrinsic little volume, to all donors of mementos and keepsakes. A Souvenir to breathe "forget me not," it will be received as an evidence of good taste in the giver, and as a perennial flower, being odorous not only with that which is beautiful in creation, but sending forth "a savor of life unto life," as it ministers to the moral and religious aspirations of human nature.—Boston Transcript.

"The first of the annuals for 1841, we are not sure that this will not prove the best. Its literary contents are in a high degree creditable to the fair editor, and the pictorial embellishments are all in good taste. The view of the Narrows at Lake George is very beautiful, and the accompanying romance illustrative of the engraving is quite ingenious. Miss Edgerton is herself the principal contributor, and all her pieces evince a fine poetic fancy, combined with no inconsiderable literary tact.

"Peregrine, a Tale of the West Indies," by Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, is worthy of that lady's reputation as a writ-

ter. Her little translations from the German, are also excellent. Mr. Greeley, who occasionally forsakes the stumps, log cabins and cider barrels of politics for the primrose path of poesy, has contributed an interesting essay on the genius and writings of Mrs. Hemans. "Walter Mervyn," is a very clever sketch, and we may say the same of "the Alpine Pastor." The contributors to this little work belong mostly to the Universalist denomination of Christians, but we see nothing of a sectarian character in its contents.—New World.

By-the-by, do our yet unsupplied readers know that the Rose for 1841 is going off very rapidly, and that if they delay buying it too long, they may not be able to procure copies? It is even so. Br. Hutchinson has a few yet on hand—send soon—"first come, first served," you know. A. B. G.

"THE CHRISTIAN COMFORTER;"

"A Gift for the afflicted and bereaved. By Rev. H. Bacon. Boston: Abel Tompkins, 38 Cornhill. 1840."—216pp. 18mo.

I wish to invite particular attention and custom to this new work. Br. Bacon has made it all it should be—the style, pure, clear, and smooth—very few can equal him in the harmony of his prose;—and the subjects discussed are the most important and heart thrilling an author can touch upon—the joy of trust, the unchangeableness of God, the uses of pain and suffering, death, faith, hope, resurrection, the re-union and recognition of friends in eternity, persuasives against excessive grief, etc., etc.;—and the manner and spirit with which these subjects are treated—so gentle, tender and sympathizing that it seems as if a stricken heart were sharing its balm with some one as deeply riven and dearly beloved.

The mourner—and we are all mourners—should keep this work under his pillow, to be read at night, when the darkness around seems but a lighter and relieving shade to that night which envelopes the soul—and in the morning, when the light of day recalls the loss to the wounded heart, and suggest the hope of consolation in ennobling to the mind the Sun of Righteousness. The clergyman of every sect and denomination, who is indeed desirous of finding suggestions to enable him to comfort those that mourn, will find much in this volume to please his heart, and aid him in his truly Christian labors. But especially do we commend it to the preacher of glad tidings—its every teaching is in unison with his faith—its consolations all are derived from the spirit of his hope and charity.

The work is neatly "got up," beautifully printed on good paper, and may be had of Br. Hutchinson at the Publisher's prices. Let it be widely circulated, and carefully read. A. B. G.

REV. T. D. COOK.—The society in this city are about to lose the services of their present Pastor—his health rendering it imperitively necessary for him to change his field of labor. During the twenty-two months that Br. Cook has been settled here, his labors have been quite successful; and he will leave here with the good will and affection of his flock—many of whom deeply and feelingly regret the necessity which deprives them of one so able in the pulpit, so efficient in his pastoral labors, and so generally pleasing and estimable in his private character. Whom they will procure to fill his place, if any one, is not yet known. May God soon bless them again with a faithful and excellent pastor. A. B. G.

The following resolutions were offered by Rev. Dolphus Skinner, and unanimously adopted at a meeting of the society held Nov. 1st, after the afternoon service.

Resolved, That, influenced alone by the necessity, while we most sincerely lament its existence, which renders it prudent for Br. Cook to seek a situation more congenial to his state of health, we are constrained, reluctantly and with feelings of deep regret at the separation, to give our consent to his early departure.

Resolved, That we tender to Br. Cook our warmest and most hearty thanks for the becoming, efficient and successful manner in which he has discharged his various duties as Pastor of this Society."

L. W. TAYLOR, Clk.

ERRATA.—Br. D. K. Lee, very pleasantly notices the following misprints in the "Night Storm" published two weeks ago.—Third Stanza, 5th line, 1st word, read "She" instead of "The"—and read 5th Stanza 2d line, "The thrilling pairs of the upper air." He justly remarks that omitting "the," makes the "wild-cat"-ism, rather catalectical! He complains also that "Satan," in the 6th Stanzas, "like old Narcissus, has pined away—not into a daffodil, but—into so small a person, that he takes unto himself a small "s" to begin with." This was sheer modesty in the D—l of our establishment, who put the article in type, and has a habit, therefore, of always spelling his own titles with small letter. We do not honor his satanic majesty quite as much as many others do, and differ from them in always beginning the "Gospel," "Christian," and "Christianity," with Capitals. Eighth Stanza, 2d line, "sprightling" should read "sprightlier."

Br Lee, must excuse me—I did not read the proof, being from home, and the handwriting being a strange one, these errors were overlooked by those who did We will try to do better in future, and hope he will patiently trust in Jacob Faithful's motto—"Better luck next time," and write on. A. B. G.

A METHODIST FALSEHOOD CONTRADICTED.

The following explains itself. It was sent in a letter on business, and overlooked, at the proper time. Since then it has been found, and believing that Mr. Dewey may repeat his falsehood, we, even at this late day, give the contradiction—not that the story is probable or plausible, and therefore needs contradiction; but because there are some who will believe any uncontradicted story, however absurd, against Universalism; and others who will believe a clergyman—however great a liar he may be, merely be—cause he is a professed minister of the Gospel. A. B. G.

BR. GROSH.—In the Glad Tidings of May 13, 1840, published at Akron, Ohio, Br. C. L. Chipman states that a Methodist minister by the name of Dewey, publicly asserted that a Universalist minister by the name of Morse, with whom, he (Dewey) was acquainted in the state of New-York, told a sick person it was of no use to read the Bible, etc., and also requested a member of his (M.'s) society who had renounced his faith, not to state that Universalism would not do to die by, lest he (Morse) should lose all his congregation, etc. If those assertions relate to me, as they probably do, (for I am the only person by the name of Morse preaching Universalism in the state of New-York,) they are entirely destitute of any foundation in truth; we be to the minister who will lie either to promote truth, or strengthen party!

We are making out bills, and sending them to our agents and subscribers, as rapidly as we can. Will all agents to whom they are sent, collect and make returns immediately—and all subscribers see that we have not to ask for our hard earned dues a second time? It is very disagreeable to dun.

N. B. If any errors are found in the bills, (as is probable in some cases,) we will cheerfully make the correction on being informed of the facts. Agents who have received pay, and have not reported to us, will see the necessity of doing so forthwith.

That at the close of the present volume, we shall strike from our subscription list the names of all persons who are indebted to us for more than the present volume; except in cases where we are assured of the willingness of the subscriber so owing.

N. B. Agents, Postmasters, and others are respectfully requested to aid us with information respecting the present responsibility of those on our list. And all delinquent subscribers are respectfully reminded that the strongest proof we can have of a man's honesty and ability, is his payment of what is due to us.

SONGS OF ZION.

Just published, and for sale at the "Trumpet Office," No. 37 Cornhill, (opposite old stand), the NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY, entitled "SONGS OF ZION": OR THE CAMBRIDGE COLLECTION OF SACRED MUSIC, designed for the Church, for the Social Meetings of Christians, and for Family Worship: comprising a rich variety of the most popular tunes, anthems, etc., with many pieces from various authors, never before published, written expressly for this work arranged with a figured bass for Organ and Piano Forte. To which is prefixed a Familiar Introduction to the Art of Singing, designed for the aid of those who are entirely unacquainted with the science of music: the instructions being reduced to great plainness and simplicity By THOMAS WHITTENORE. Sixth Edition, enlarged and revised, containing additional Anthems for Temperance celebrations without any increase of price. The last edition with the Pestalozzian system of instruction. Persons acquainted with the science of harmony are requested to call and examine this work.

This Book contains upwards of 300 tunes, of a great variety of Metres. In addition to these, there are upwards of 100 pages of Anthems.

It has upwards of 350 pages of the size of the 'Boston Academy's Collection'; and will be sold at the same price. The author pledges himself to the public, that neither pains, nor expense have been spared to render this work correct, in its scientific, and elegant in its mechanical execution.

This work is very particularly recommended in cases where different denominations of Christians unite in 'Union Singing Schools.' On the great theme of praise all Christians agree; we can all unite our hearts, and voices in celebrating the praises of God and the Redeemer, and the glories of eternity. In a great number of cases, the whole Hymn is put upon the same page with the tune, which will be very convenient in singing these tunes as voluntaries. There are many most excellent hymns inserted entire, which appear in no hymn book in common use. For sale wholesale and retail, by

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

NATURE'S LANGUAGE.

Why do flowers of every die
Our mazy pathway throng—
Why do birds their voices ply,
To notes of sweetest song,
If God is not our Father true,
Though reigning far above?
If we are not, in Mercy's view,
The children of His love?

Why is Winter's snowy fleece Withdrawn from blighted earth—
Why does gentle Spring release
The bird to nobler birth,
If, soon as death with sullen will
Shall bear us to the tomb,
Our God intends to blight us still
In scenes of deathless gloom?

When the sunbeams pass away,
And darkness dwells below,
Why should morn, with clearest ray,
On all delighted glow—
O, why, if when the golden bowl
Of life is crushed for time,
No mercy-ray shall light the soul,
In Joy's immortal clime?

Bud, and flower, and bird, and song;
Each radiant beam above—
All, in language clear and strong;
Say, "God alone is love."
Then why! O, why should man forget
That he on earth is blest?
Or doubt that God hath purposed yet
To give His children rest?

MANNERS.

The value of an easy manner and courteous address is not by any means sufficiently estimated among us. Proud of his political independence and his republican rights, the citizen is very apt to carry his notions of personal privileges to an improper extent; especially in the smaller matters of the social circle, as well as in the details of business. Matthews, the comedian, who was one of the most nervous of mortals, used as illustrative of this trait of surliness, to detail his losing his way in New York, and upon stopping a peripatetic Yorker with "I want to go to Leonard street"—being blown off his feet with the rough rejoinder, "Well, why don't you go?"

Two young men shall commence life together, equal in circumstances—both being destitute of means—but the one full of talent, abundant in resource, and apt in business; but conceited of his own "reserved rights," and not easy in his manner, or happy in placing others at ease. The other not above, if even up to mediocrity, not especially gifted with business talent, but still ready in adapting himself to those he meets, and felicitous in his address. Now let us see how they get on. We will call one Manners, and the other Independence.

Manners is a clever, civil and obliging fellow, disposed to gratify. He steps up to you with a bow and a smile, and wishes to know how he can serve you. He is ready to give up his seat to a lady; even to stand behind her bonnet at a concert, if necessity requires.

Independence is a stiff, upright, angular gentleman, who waits to be spoken to, and then answers or not, as the humor takes him; he yields with a bad grace to a solicitation, and robs a kind act of its merit, by the manner of doing it. His independence is always rubbing against somebody's self independence, and society seems as if mankind had been made square instead of round, and in a crowd were perpetually chaffing their sharp corners! He returns your salute with a gruff air, and walks about with his hands under his tail coat, and always stands with his back to the fire and his legs straddled.

Manners is a neat, dapper, brisk body, that has a joke for one, a song for another, and a "how are you?" for every body—he looks about as he walks, notices his acquaintances, returns their bows, and occasionally calls to see them. He won't endorse, but declines by a polite excuse; and can't afford to lend, but makes the borrower feel his regret by his kindness of reply. Occasionally he beaus a lady, and is not very much afraid of old maids, or young children. He will, too, carry a parcel for you, and has been known to ride with a band box on his knee.

Independence is a surly, honest, rough, loud voiced chap, that laughs at no jokes but his own, and don't care whether he speaks or is spoken to; he owes nobody anything, and depends on himself for amusement. Let any body ask him to endorse! He never borrows and won't lend; and considers the request for a loan as a species of pickpocketing. Yet he has been known to give handsomely to the distressed, and even to forgive a debt. He won't play porter or post-office for any body, and hates a band box as he does Satan. He considers children as small nuisances requisite for supplying the world with population; and if he ever does get married, intends to insure himself against paternity.

Such are the twain, and so they go through the world, both often successful, and both respected—the one liked and popular, while the other is feared and avoided. Great philosophy was there in the scissor-grinder's proverb, as applied to success in life, "sweet oil and perseverance conquer every thing."—Phil. North Am.

A VISION.

When I was a wanderer, I was once in Surat, where I made the acquaintance of a Brahmin, so liberal, that he had much converse with me, though, according to his creed, I was of impure caste, and it was in Brahminical strictness, a pollution for him to permit me to approach within ninety-six feet. He was a director in the Banyan hospital, where sick and wounded animals are attended to with as much kindness as is sometimes thrown away in more enlightened countries, upon ungrateful men. "Young man," said the Hindoo philosopher, for such he was, "what motive has led you, at these years, so far from your home, and what compensation do you expect for such a sacrifice of the affections?"

"I have but one motive," said I, "that is, curiosity; which, if strictly analyzed, may be found composed of a desire to escape from scenes where I had ceased to be happy, and to find, in distant lands, a substitute for happiness, in change of scene and emotions of novelty."

"It is a vain pursuit," said the Brahmin, "and," continued he, "I have been better instructed in a vision. I saw," said he, "in a dream, an ancient sage-like man; his brow was not smooth, neither was his eye at rest. It seemed that he was familiar to me, though I could not remember where I had seen him before. He looked intently upon me; and said: 'Mortal, I am as thy shadow. I have been near thee from thy birth. I shall be nearer through life, and I shall not quit thee till death. Death only can divide us; but thou wilt endeavor to fly from me, and wilt sometimes think, that thou hast escaped. Yet I am not thy enemy, though I have little that thou wilt love. Thou art bound to a country where I can not go; but thou wilt be better received there, for what thou wilt learn of me in the journey. If, for a season, thou avoid me, thou wilt find nothing, that will not so remind thee of me, that thou wilt, though disappointed, again return to me, as thy companion through life.'"

"I was soon attracted to a being of far more enticing aspect. He was flushed with youth and crowned with a chaplet of flowers. 'Follow me, said he, radiant with smiles. 'I am Pleasure, and,' I know him from whom thou wouldst escape. He is Care, but he can not breathe where every odor is a perfume, and every sound is music.' For a while I followed Pleasure; but the society soon became so tasteless, that I felt that I could prefer even that of Care.

"Disappointed and sorrowful, yet with a mind attuned to the softest emotions, I approached a damsel who was sitting by a fountain, pleased with the reflection of her own beauty, even while her tears were falling into the stream. 'Maiden,' said I, with our oriental abruptness, 'Why dost thou weep, and what is thy name?' 'I weep,' replied she, in a voice broken and murmuring like that of the fountain, 'because I am the most happy while I weep; and my name is Love.' 'I will follow thee,' said I, 'through every path; and should the thorns lacerate my feet, I will not leave thee, with whom it is better to weep than to smile with Pleasure; and in following thee I may the further remove from Care.' 'Alas!' said Love, 'thou little knowest. Listen! for though I am not wise, I am at least sincere. I have learned from my uncles, Wisdom and Experience, that neither Love nor Pleasure, can escape the pursuit of Care. I can only promise, that in my society you will the less regard him.'"

Here the Brahmin addressed me, saying, "stranger, return, therefore, to thy country, follow the footsteps of Love: for the affections confer more happiness than intellect. Happiness is not the offspring of Knowledge; but to be good is to be happy."

DEATHS.

In Oswego, August 29th., 1839, EVILURO, son of Hyman Carpenter, aged 4 years and 1 month. By this providence, brother and sister Carpenter are called to give to the tomb an only child. But they are sustained by the joyous faith that soon they will join it, to praise God "Where pleasures, never bloom to die."

The funeral was attended at the Baptist Church in Oswego, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners by the writer. WM. SIAS.

At the residence of his brother, in Clinton, October 14th, Mr. ALONZO J. EVERETT, aged 30 years. All that parental and kindred affection could do, combined with earnest and assiduous effort, was done to restore him to the society which he loved; but the hand of the destroyer, Consumption, was upon him, and the angel of immortality called him home to heaven. And bright and glorious was his departure. Had the disciple of superstition stood by his bedside, and witnessed the holy composure with which he conversed of death and the future, and the bright glow of confiding assurance, which rested upon his countenance, like a beam of light from heaven, setting its seal to that faith before which mountains of error would have vanished like mist before the morning sun—I say, had the opposer seen this with the cherished thought in his bosom that Universalism would not do to die by, the unjust imputation would have frozen in his heart, and his lips would have refused to utter the unworthy sentiment, which the exhortation and triumph of the dying man, even after the death-chill was touching his limbs with its power, so fully repelled.

Calm and resigned in his own feelings, the deceased sought to soothe the sorrow and anguish of his beloved parents, and brothers and sisters, with assurances that they should meet again where parting would be no more forever. There was no enthusiasm in his manner: yet as he took each of his friends by the hand to bid them farewell—not eternally—he assured them that he had no fears of that dark doom which imagination had garnered up in the future. He was sure that no wrath, no abandonment, no despairing awaited him, or any of the human family, in the spirit land. "My path," said he, "is bright before me." On one occasion, he aroused from a quiet sleep, and exclaimed—"I have seen bright and beautiful beings; perhaps they were God and his angels—why did you not let me go?"

Thus died an excellent man. Though for years deprived by declining health, of that usefulness for which his mind and disposition fitted him, yet his cheerfulness and mental vigor forsook him not. His moral worth was testified to by the universal respect and even attachment which was awarded him. To his relatives his departure is a severe affliction. His aged parents have been spared to behold a large family gathered around them, and going forth amidst the responsibilities and duties of active life. The chain which has bound them together as kindred spirits, is now, for the first time broken. But the severed link is brighter from the trial, and yet serves to connect the survivors closer with Heaven. They mourn not as those who have no hope. The remains of Br. E. were removed on the 15th, to the residence of his parents in Litchfield, and from thence, on the 16th, to the Presbyterian meeting house, on Jerusalem Hill, (which was kindly and voluntarily offered for the occasion,) where a sermon was delivered by the writer.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. XV.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"We have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not."

The 15th chapter of the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians, contains more upon the subject of the resurrection than is found in any other portion of the sacred writings. And it is from this chapter that the strongest proof-texts are selected in support of the doctrine of a simultaneous, universal resurrection. Yet strange as it may appear, I deem that there is that in the chapter, which goes directly to establish the conclusion that the resurrection is progressing! The particular attention of the reader is here invited to a consideration of the apostle's argument as presented in verses 12-28 inclusive.

After announcing his subject, he adverts to the facts of Christ's death, burial, and resurrection, and mentions some of the evidences of His rising, namely, his being seen after that event by more than 500 witnesses, most of whom were living at the time Paul wrote. He then proceeds to prove the truth of the resurrection, from the fact that Christ rose. And it is worthy of observation, that he does not profess in this part of the chapter, to be giving his brethren a direct revelation, but merely to be proving to them a certain point by dint of fair reasoning from an established and, in their case, an acknowledged fact.* Says he, "Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen." Verses 12, 13. Now upon this language, it is possible to quibble, and to say that the meaning is, merely, that if Christ rose from the dead, there is evidently a resurrection in one instance; but if there be no resurrection in any instance at all, then certainly Christ is not risen. This would be to represent his rising as a perfectly isolated event, not connected with our destiny in any manner or degree whatever. Yet this is not the doctrine of the apostle, as will be conceded on all hands; and it is also true, that such an interpretation conflicts with the evident import of the apostle's language. The expression "the dead" is plural, hence it can not refer to Christ alone. And we may add that the corresponding expression in Greek, is plural not only in signification, but also in form.†

Before proceeding further, it may be well to observe that the expression "the dead," is not only plural, but that it denotes persons. Thus when it is said "the dead rise," the affirmation is, that those rise who have died. A similar remark applies to the phrase "the resurrection of the dead." Thus much is generally understood. But the proper, specific import in many passages at least, of the phrase "from the dead," as used by the New Testament writers in speaking of the resurrection, seems scarcely to have entered the minds of either the learned or the unlearned. Thus, except in three passages, (in which passages there is, as will be shown in the next paragraph, a manifest reference to a certain locality) wherever in the New Testament the phrase "from the dead" occurs in connection with the doctrine of the resurrection, the Greek word rendered "from" is the same as is in some other passages rightly rendered "from among;" as, "Every high priest taken from among men;" "Every soul which will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed from among the people." "Put away from among yourselves that wicked person." Heb. v: 1; Acts iii: 23; 1 Cor. v: 13. It is not said that he rose from a place, or from a state; but that he rose from the dead, that is to say, from among those that had died.

In Matt. xxvii: 64, we are informed that the chief priests and Pharisees, remembering that Jesus had said he would rise again, requested of Pilate that the sepulchre in which our Lord lay entombed, should be securely fastened, and vigilantly watched, until the third day, "lest [say they] his disciples come by night and steal him away, and say among the people, 'He is risen from the dead.'" In chapter xxviii: 6, 7, an angel says respecting him, to some of the women who were at the sepulchre on the third day morning, "He is not here; for he is risen, as he said. Come see the place where the Lord lay. And go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead." In both these passages reference is had to the place of his interment; and the phrase "from the dead," obviously means from the place of the dead, that is to say, from the sepulchre. Accordingly, in these texts a preposition is used in Greek (apo) which primarily means from.

In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Luke xvi, Hades, or the grave, rendered hell in our version, (but which primarily signifies the state of being dead, as to the body, as to enjoyment while in the body) is parabolically represented as being to the rich man a "place of torment;" and he desires Abraham, whom he addresses by the title of father, to send Lazarus to his five brethren among the living, for their instruction and admonition. Abraham replies, "They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." The rich man rejoins, "Nay father Abraham; but if one went unto them from the dead they will repent." Here also, "from the dead" signifies from the region or the place of the dead, and the same preposition is used in Greek as in the two other passages. But in all other instances in the New Testament, if I mistake not, where the phrase "from the dead" occurs in our version, the word from is a rendering of a preposition (ex or ek) which primarily signifies out of, the opposite of into—or out from among, or from among, the opposite of among. It means out of, when relating to things separately taken, from among, when it has relation to individuals in an associated capacity—the former, for the most part, when followed by a word in the singular number; the latter, generally, when the word following it is plural. But it should be observed that this latter meaning can, in some instances, be tolerably well expressed by the word from, as when John says of some that had left the Christians, "They went out from us," (1 John ii: 19) which we suppose every body understands to be equivalent to saying, "They went out from among us;" especially as he adds, "but they were not of us." And I think it possible that the translators of the common version made use of the phrase "from the dead" for the sake of brevity, and expected it would be understood to mean "from among the dead," the correctness of which meaning in a considerable number of passages, it is presumed few will dispute.

We must now return to the argumentation of the apostle. For some reason or other, perhaps to prevent a quibble upon his language, he, in verses 15-18, repeats his argument in somewhat different phraseology: "We have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised. And if Christ be not raised.....then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Here one can not avoid seeing that he links together, in his argument, the rising of Jesus and the rising of the dead—Christ's resurrection and the resurrection of those who had fallen asleep—that is to say, of those who had died.

The apostle has placed these together in his argument—but it is proper to inquire, whether they are necessarily connected, and if so, what connects them. What is it, if any thing, which of necessity connects the resurrection of Christ and the resurrection of mankind? Answer, the fact so often presented in the Scripture, that He was of the human race—was in very deed, a man. See verse 21 of this chapter, which will be noticed hereafter. See also particularly, John i: 30; viii: 40; Acts ii: 22; 1 Tim. ii: 5; Heb. ii: 16, 17. That he and mankind possessed one common nature, forms a necessary connection between his resurrection and their's; as may be more clearly shown in our remarks upon verse 21, which reads, "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead."

It is evident, also, that Paul considers Christ's resurrection and ours to be connected very closely, since he teaches that the dead rise just as certainly as He rose. Indeed, the apostle tells his brethren, in substance, not less than three times, that if the dead do not rise, then Christ did not. This is emphatically using strong language; and now, how is it that the rising of the Saviour to immortality so clearly and so certainly shows the resurrection of the dead? How is it that his resurrection being once established and acknowledged, the resurrection of mankind thence becomes a matter not of extraordinary revelation, but of plain logical deduction? An event not merely possible, but in the highest degree probable? How is it?

If we take the ground required by the doctrine of a simultaneous, universal resurrection, that the rising of the Saviour to immortality, is the only resurrection that has ever yet happened, or that will happen while the present state of things exists, we place his resurrection and that of mankind at the farthest distance from each other that the nature of the case admits. There may be a connection between them, but it must be extremely remote. The problem is, to bring the resurrection of our Lord to bear as evidence upon the resurrection of mankind. The case stands thus: "The man Christ Jesus" was raised from the dead. Millions on millions of human beings had died before him—scarcely a less number have departed since his time—how many more will follow no one knows, perhaps many hundred times as many—not one of these all has yet been raised.

* That Paul here places the resurrection of the dead upon the ground of argument, and not of direct revelation through himself, is apparent from the whole tenor of his remarks, but especially from the circumstance that he faults his brethren, or some among them, for their inconsistency in denying the resurrection of the dead when they held the resurrection of Christ. I am far from even suggesting the idea that immortality is not a doctrine of revelation—what I say, is, that in this part of the chapter, the apostle argues the resurrection of mankind solely from the fact that Christ was raised. By his rising, the resurrection of the dead was revealed.

† That the expression "the dead," as used in the Scriptures, has a plural signification, or denotes more than one, may be rendered obvious to other than grammarians, by the simple remark that both Jesus and Paul in speaking of the dead, use the word "they." Thus our Lord observes, "As touching the dead that THEY rise;" and the apostle introduces some one as asking, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do THEY come?"

ed, and none will hereafter be, until the present state of things is no more. But it is fair to observe here, that it is believed by some, that a few individuals have been immortalized by a miracle. This, however, does not so change the premises as materially to affect the argument. Now with this view of the case, who would think of placing the resurrection of Christ in the front ground of the evidence for the resurrection of mankind? Yet with some view of the case, Paul has done this; hence I can not think that the doctrine in question was held by him. And I see not, in all honesty, if I believed that the resurrection is exclusively future, how I could consistently adopt the confident language of the apostle, with even the necessary additions required by this doctrine, and argue that "If the dead rise not, [some time or other] then is not Christ raised"—"If there [shall] be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen." The most I could honestly say, would be, One man has been raised—it is hence shown to be possible for a human being to rise, in certain circumstances—it may be possible for mankind to rise in other circumstances—it may be that all will rise.

I do not say that if I believed the doctrine in question, I should doubt the certainty of a coming resurrection—I only say, that in such a case I could not consider the resurrection of Christ to be a very strong proof of the resurrection of mankind. For if he only, of all our race, has been raised from the dead, his rising must have been a miracle, separate from the peculiar circumstances attending it; and would have been a miracle under any circumstances whatever. The argument of Paul then is, If a certain miracle was wrought, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead? For if the dead rise not, that miracle was not performed. God did not work that miracle, if so be that the dead rise not. A method of argumentation this, which to me is rather unsatisfactory.

I know it may be replied that the resurrection of the dead was first revealed in word, and afterwards proved by the resurrection of Christ as a promised miracle in confirmation of its truth; and that the promise having been fulfilled, the doctrine is thereby proved true; hence that it is proper to argue that if the doctrine is really untrue, the miracle can not have been performed, and vice versa. My first objection against this view of the subject, is, that it places the resurrection on other than Scriptural grounds. Thus the apostle certainly gives no such representation in this chapter—on the contrary, he says that in preaching "the Gospel" to the Corinthian brethren, (and the Gospel certainly includes the doctrine of immortality,) he "first of all" brought them acquainted with the facts of Christ's death, burial, and resurrection. See verses 1-4. The Gospel, then, which was preached by Paul, and he certainly preached the true one, commenced with the resurrection of Christ, prefaced of course by certain preliminary facts. This being known, we can easily comprehend his meaning where he tells us that Jesus Christ "brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." 2 Tim. i: 10. He did it by rising from the dead.

We argue, then, that not the fact of Christ's resurrection was miraculous, but only the adjuncts of the fact, as his rising in the same body, his being seen after his resurrection, etc. For as the fact of Lazarus' being raised by a miracle to mortal life, did not prove that any one else would be raised to such a state, with or without a miracle; so admitting the resurrection of the Saviour to have been in itself miraculous, I see not how it could really be proof of immortality for mankind, to be conferred upon them either miraculously or otherwise. But that his rising was not miraculous in itself, we shall attempt to shew further, from a passage already quoted, "For since by man [rather by a human being] came death, by man [that is, a human being] came also the resurrection of the dead." Verse 21. Our comments follow:

When Adam was informed that he was to suffer dissolution, he was given to understand that the event was a result of his bodily constitution. "Dust thou art," said the Creator, "and unto dust thou shalt return." Yet it is doubtless true, that when some human being came to die, the solemn fact of man's mortality was much more deeply impressed upon the minds of the beholders than it ever had been before. The sight of a human being dead, showed as in a glass, that death was the destiny of the race; and this first one that died might not improperly be said to have brought death and dissolution to light. By him came death, that is to say, the knowledge of it; for as now, so then, man died because he was mortal, because it was his nature to die. So the resurrection of the dead might have been believed had not Jesus been known to have arisen; yet those who saw him after he rose from the dead, must certainly have had a stronger faith, a livelier hope, than they could have had before that event. See 1 Pet. i: 3. The known fact that a human being had arisen to immortal life, must have been viewed to be, what indeed it was, evidence approaching the clearest demonstration, that immortality is the appointed destiny of all. Accordingly I understand from the text under consideration, that as death came by a human being, the first one that was known to have died, and yet it is obviously true that we die, as indeed did he, because it is man's nature to die; so although by a human being, "the man Christ Jesus," came the resurrection of the dead, it is nevertheless a truth that the rising of the dead, both in his case and in ours, is as much a result of the constitution given us by the Creator, as dying is. Of course, I consider this passage to be proof in point that Jesus would have arisen without a miracle, as also that the resurrection of mankind is progressing; for if it is as natural for human beings to rise from the dead as it is for such beings to die, no miracle was needed so far as mere rising is concerned; and in that case also, it must be much more probable that we shall rise pretty soon after death, than it is that we shall lie dormant for perhaps thousands of years.

From the foregoing considerations, I am convinced that when the apostle was arguing the resurrection of the dead from the resurrection of the Saviour, the following view of subject was substantially the one which he had in his mind: The resurrection of the dead, though altogether unperceived by mortals, has been going on ever since death entered the world, so that there actually exists a continuous series of resurrections into the immortal state. Connected with this series was the resurrection of Jesus Christ, as an important link in the great chain. Had he not been the Messiah, he would have been raised invisibly, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, had been, and his resurrection and theirs would have been equally unrecognized by mankind. But it was designed by the Creator, that the fact so long uncredited, or but faintly believed—that "the dead rise"—should at length, through him, be clearly and satisfactorily revealed. It was accordingly arranged in the wisdom of God, that the Christ should be put to death publicly, and entombed openly; that the fact of his being dead should be placed beyond all controversy, by his receiving, after his death, a wound which would undeniably have proved mortal; that the sepulchre in which he lay should be fastened up by his enemies, and guarded by a band of disciplined soldiers, professing to prevent the removal of his body; and that his friends should be known to have had no idea of his returning to life. On the third day morning he appeared in an immortal organization, superinvested with his former body, which had disappeared from the tomb in an extraordinary manner, attended with various remarkable events; and subsequently by his being seen, heard, handled, etc. "He showed himself alive....by many infallible proofs." And his being known to have arisen from among the dead, he being one of them, and in all respects, as to nature, like them, evinces that they rise also, notwithstanding, from the circumstances most probably that they possess only spiritual bodies, the fact of their rising is, no doubt for wise and benevolent reasons, unrecognizable by our senses. His resurrection being one particular in a series, one link in a chain, to learn its existence is to learn the existence of the events connected with it. The chain or series is, indeed, naturally invisible and intangible; but it has pleased God to render one of the links perceptible through the senses, by its being invested with corporeality; and the perception of this in this manner, renders the whole series perceptible by the intellect. With such a view of the subject, how pertinent was Paul's argument—If Christ rose from the dead, then the dead rise also—If the dead do not rise, then Christ did not—If he rose not, then those have perished who since his time have died in the confident hope of immortality. With such a view of the subject, how easily may we perceive the propriety and conclusiveness of his reasoning!

We must now consider certain passages of Scripture supposed to teach contrary to these views:

In the 20th verse of this chapter, it is declared of Christ, in connection with his being raised from the dead, that he hath "become the first-fruits of them that slept," that is to say, of those who had died; which has been thought equivalent to saying he rose before any one else, whether any have arisen since his time or not. (He is called "the first fruits" also in verse 23.) I reply that the phrase "the first fruits," is an allusion to a certain Jewish offering; and that although the offering of the first fruits received its name probably from the circumstance that it was in general composed of specimens of the earliest ripened grains, fruits, etc., this priority of ripening seems, after all, to have been but a minor consideration; so that when the expression "first fruits" came to be used metaphorically, this idea was rarely if ever, transferred. The first fruits also were to be "of the best" of each kind; yet it is not probable that the phrase in question, as applied to him, was designed to express that idea, though Christ was incomparably the best and most excellent of all the sons of men.

The Jewish agriculturalists, when about to harvest any of the productions of their lands, were directed to set apart, devote, or consecrate, a small quantity of the crop, to be in due time carried to the national sanctuary, and publicly offered to the service of God. They were also, among other things, to offer "the first fruits of their dough," that is to say, a small cake, or so, out of the first "three measures of meal," or flour, which were baked from that year's harvest. The offering of the first fruits was thus a sample or specimen of whatever it was selected from. And as the law requiring the offering, contained in both general and special terms, a promise of the divine blessing upon their labors, as a reward for the performance of the duty, the setting apart of the first fruits was hence considered as equivalent to the procurement of a sort of pledge from the Supreme Ruler, that the harvest should be gathered in peace and safety, and should prove a blessing to the owner. Hence it is that Paul says, in allusion probably to the dough, as mentioned above, "If the first fruit be holy, the lump is also holy." Note. The primary meaning of holy, is, set apart to the service of God, ceremonially, and physically, as well as morally; hence the sense of the passage is probably this: If the first fruit be set apart to the service of God as an offering to the temple, the lump is also set apart to the service of God, in that it shall conduce to the happiness of man.

I understand, then, that by Christ's becoming, through his resurrection, the first fruits of those who have died, is meant that he is, so to speak, a pledge-specimen of mankind, in respect to their living after death in a state of immortality.

The circumstance that Christ is called the first fruits of the dead, ought to be adduced for, rather er than against, the doctrine that the resurrection had been going on prior to his time. For though it is probable that the first fruits of any particular crop were to be set apart before the harvest was gathered, it certainly was not necessary for the pious Jew to take the first fruit sheaf, and go to Jerusalem, and there publicly offer it to God, before he could lawfully harvest his wheat! Nor when it was harvested, the sheaf of first fruits offered, and some of the grain ground, was he under any obligation to let his children cry for bread until the first fruit of the dough could be offered up in like manner. So Jesus was publicly offered as the first fruits of the dead, only about 1800 years ago; yet it by no means follows that there had been no resurrection of the dead prior to that time, much less that there has been no resurrection since—indeed the contrary is clearly indicated—for it is manifest from the Scriptures, that he must have been set apart for that offering before death entered the world. The husbandman laid aside the first fruits of his crop a long time ago; and shall we conclude that he has not yet commenced harvesting?

In John's Gospel, and in his general Epistle, our Lord is, in a number of instances, styled "the only-begotten" Son of God. In Rom. i: 4, we are informed that "according to the spirit of holiness," that is to say, the Holy Spirit, Jesus Christ was "declared to be the Son of God...by the resurrection from the dead." And in Luke xx: 26, the Saviour himself says that mankind when raised from the dead, "are the children of God," (literally "are sons of God,") in consequence of such rising. Now by putting these texts together, it is easy to deduce the apparently fair conclusion, that therefore Christ is the "only" individual who has yet been raised to immortality. I am not aware, however, that this argument has ever been employed in support of the doctrine in question; but sure I am, that it is equally fair and equally strong with some other arguments, drawn from similar passages, and much relied upon. Thus in Coll. i: 18, we are told that God's "dear Son," is "the first-born from the dead;" and in Rev. i: 5, that he is "the first-begotten of the dead;" and it is thought that in these passages the apostle intended to set forth, unequivocally, that our Lord's resurrection was actually, in point of time, the "first" instance in which a human being was ever immortalized. But these texts do not teach this any more certainly, or apparently, than the others teach that his resurrection is the only instance. And that the phrase "only begotten," in the Scriptures, is not to be taken in the sense most naturally conveyed by it in English, is apparent from the use of the expression in Heb. xi: 17, "By faith, Abraham, when he was tried, offered up his son Isaac: and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son." It must have been perfectly well known to the writer of this Epistle, and it is scarcely conceivable that the fact could have been out of his mind, much less that he could have imagined "the Hebrews" to have been uninformed respecting it, that Abraham had other sons, and that one, namely Ishmael, was even older than Isaac. Yet Isaac was to be his father's heir; and we are told in the Scripture, that God "hath appointed" his son Jesus Christ "heir of all things." Heb. i: 2. We arrive then, at the very manifest conclusion, that the phrase in question did not convey to a Jew the idea that the father of him to whom it was applied had no other son. Note. Some understand the original word to mean "well beloved"—I should think its sense, if not that, is at least similar to it, as "highly favored," or the like.

To be "born of God," and to be "begotten of God," convey in Scripture, the same idea, as may be seen from 1 John v: 18, or by a comparison of other passages. So "first born" and "first begotten," when used in a secondary sense, are the same in meaning, as will be shown hereafter. And as "only begotten" is expressive of favor, so I think, and shall presently give my reasons for thus thinking, that "first born" and "first begotten," in Coll. i: 18, and Rev. i: 5, are expressive of eminence instead of primogeniture. Thus in Ps. lxxxix: 27, it is said of David, though some understand that Christ is the personage intended: "Also I will make him my first born, higher than the kings of the earth." Here, according to the genius of Hebrew poetry, the latter half of the verse explains and fixes the meaning of the former. And as it is not said, "older," or "more eminent than the kings of the earth," but simply "higher," it follows, as a very natural conclusion, that "first born," in this passage, signifies "most eminent." And that this is its meaning in Coll. i: 18, is rendered almost certain from the connection: "Who is the beginning [or chief,] the first-born from the dead, that in all things he might have the pre-eminence." And it is worthy of note that in Rev. i: 5, where Christ is called "the first begotten of the dead," the very next words are, "and the Prince of the kings of the earth," which is almost precisely the same in import, and very nearly the same in language, as the latter half of the passage just quoted from the Psalms.

I understand these passages, then, to mean that the Son of God is highly and superlatively eminent—much more eminent than any other of our race.

Another text which must be considered in this number, is Acts xxvi: 23, in which the apostle states, according to the common version, that Moses and the prophets had predicted of Christ, "that he should be the first that should rise from the dead." I can not but consider this text as parallel with those just commented upon, from Colossians and Revelation. For, in the first place, many other scriptures testify, to me, that his resurrection was not the first in respect to time; second, in a number of instances in the Scripture, as well as in other writings,* to be "first" has relation to superiority instead of priority; third, a more literal rendering of the passage than the one in common use, is, "that he would be the first riser from the dead:" from all which I conclude that the sense intended by Paul, is, that it had been prophesied that the Christ would be the chief or most eminent of immortalized human beings.

In proof of the assertion that to be "first," in Scripture, sometimes has relation to superiority, I observe that John the Baptist, at a certain time, seeing Jesus approaching him, exclaimed, "This was he of whom I said, 'After me cometh a man which is preferred before me, for he was before me,'" literally, "was my first;" the proper import of which I take to be, "He is my superior;" as this would be giving the very best reason that could be given, why the Saviour should be preferred before him. John i: 15. And we may add that Matthew, Mark, and Luke, all mention the Baptist's uttering the sentiment which he says he did, upon my view of the passage; and they make him to have employed a figure in so doing, in which the idea of superiority on the part of Christ, or which amounts to the same, of inferiority as attached to himself, is expressed in the strongest terms: "There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose." Mark i: 7.

In our next number we shall consider 1 Cor. xv: 51, 52, compared with 1 Thess. iv: 13-17. Penn's Woods, 1840.

* The excellent and illustrious Washington has been described by some one as "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

"IT WON'T DO TO DIE BY."

What "won't do to die by"? Long has this been falsely said of Universalism, by its opposers; and statement after statement has been manufactured to prove it true. But the evidence has been like the assertion, destitute of reason or fact. We now return the charge to those with whom it originated, but asserting it of partialism—the doctrine of endless sin and woe. A few years ago we published a list of several names, those of persons who, in their dying moments, renounced the doctrine of endless sin and misery, and embraced that of endless and universal holiness and happiness as the destiny of our race. Such cases occur from time to time—more frequently than even Universalists are apt to suppose—but we do not think it so very wonderful a matter, or such strong proof that our opinions are correct, as to blazon forth every such conversion. Our faith is based on something stronger than the sayings of man and woman on the death bed—we rest on the promise and the oath of God for the evidence of what we believe and teach. However, as our opposers seem to rely so very much on what people say in their last moments, we give the following veritable case, which occurred in Cincinnati, Ohio, quite lately. We copy from The Star in the West, published in that city, and the Editor of which, (Rev. J. A. Gurley,) is the author of the statement itself. The deceased was a Miss L. Lebold, who died in Cincinnati, October 4th, aged 19 years. A. B. G.

There are some circumstances connected with the death of this young lady which deserve serious consideration. Last winter she gave in her name for membership to the Methodist Episcopal Church in this city, in the excitement got up by Mr. Maffit, but subsequently, in common with multitudes of others, became so disgusted with the fanatical scenes of the mis-named revival that she withdrew from the Methodists. Having been deceived in what she was promised—not finding that peace in her new religion which she had a right to expect, she naturally became skeptical. From knowing that Methodism was not what its friends had declared to her it was, she concluded that religion was all a farce—taking it for granted that the Bible taught what they preached.

But she was suddenly taken with bleeding at the lungs, which terminated in the consumption. In the day which tries men's souls she sent for the Methodist preachers to visit her. They came, talked and prayed with her several times, and although she seemed satisfied that the Bible taught endless misery, and that it was her duty to receive it, she found them "physicians of no value." Instead of giving her comfort, they made her miserable and wretched in the extreme; and I verily believe that had they continued their visits she would have been a maniac. What a comment on their profession as preachers of that gospel which breathes "peace and good will!" Unlike Jesus, who always made the sick and dying happy, they made her almost distracted.

Under these circumstances she sent for the writer. We visited her every day save once, from the Wednesday before, to the day of her death, the next Monday. We found her in a dreadful state of mind; but we pointed her to the word of God—to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and the result was, that just before her death, she fully embraced Universalism, and died without a fear—happy and peaceful. She declared that she firmly believed the doctrine, and she found that it took from death all its terror. We were with her about fifteen minutes before her death, and the first words she uttered when entering the room were, "O how happy I feel! She was then evidently dying. She could not find words to express her gratitude that she had been led to thus believe before her death, and she thanked us over and over again for directing her to the truth of the Bible on this subject. I have never seen a fuller example of the power of the Gospel to sustain the soul in death.

Miss L. was an amiable and intelligent young lady, and possessing a strong mind, she weighed well the arguments in reference to our faith, and embraced it understandingly. She fully tested the Methodist doctrine, and found it not good to die by. She received the grace that bringeth salvation to all men, and died rejoicing. Let no unbeliever who reads this notice say it is not correct—that she could not have embraced Universalism on her death-bed, for all we have here written is strictly true, and can be proved to the satisfaction of the most skeptical if they desire. May the blessing of the Most High rest upon all the mourning relatives and friends.

UNIVERSALISM IN FRANCE.

It has long been known that there exists considerable Universalism in France. Several works in favor of this doctrine have appeared at different times in the French language both from Catholics and Protestants. Some four or five years ago we met with an extract from the Confession of the Protestant Church of Nautes, in which was the following, on the subject of

"FUTURE RETRIBUTION.—God is the punisher of sin and the rewarder of virtue.

"But God is not, as is pretended a jealous, angry, violent being, thirsting for vengeance.

"He is a Father, whose benevolence is unlimited; he desireth not the death of the sinner; he will render to every one according to his works, proportioning the punishment to the offence; and he knows all the frailty, ignorance and wretchedness of our nature.

"While we admit and assert a great difference of condition among souls after death, according to their moral conduct in this life, we are persuaded that they will all have the power of being restored at some future day, by successive trials; and that in process of time the happiness of every creature will be the final result of God's plans, since we regard him as a father, and never as a tyrant; a Being who, in creating us, has pledged himself to make us all happy."

Such language can not be misunderstood. It is a full and unequivocal avowal of ultimate universal holiness and happiness.

By a letter from a correspondent of the New York Observer, now in France, which appeared in that paper last week, it seems that Universalism is boldly acknowledged and defended by many pastors in the Protestant churches of France. Alluding to a controversy which has existed there on articles of discipline, the writer says:

"It would be difficult to relate to you all the heterodox and infidel opinions which have been exposed in some of these pamphlets. Never have Socinians professed so openly their Universalism. One of them has written jests rather than arguments against the state of corruption and misery of human nature; he attacks all the fundamental doctrines of the gospel. Another avows frankly his belief that man can be saved without Christ, without faith in Christ, without the aid of Christ, by his own efforts, and he adds that he who is in error, in infidelity, in whatever condition, will find means to be saved after death.

"This avowal of gross Universalism has produced a good effect. Several pastors, who had been hesitating and irresolute, because they did not suppose that the latitudinarians held such anti-evangelical opinions now join the orthodox. They are convinced that the latitudinarians deny all that is essential in Christianity, and descend step by step to downright rationalism. Many laymen also, have derived benefit from this controversy. They have asked why those who do not believe in the gospel are still pastors in our churches, and this question has led them to study more attentively the word of God.

"At the same time we have been gratified to see devoted Christians publishing forcible replies to these Universalist pamphlets. The truth has been defended with energy and with love. Count Agenor de Gasparin, member of the Council of State, in Paris, and the Rev. Mr. Frossard, pastor of Nismes, have triumphantly refuted the objections of our adversaries. Their writings have been extensively circulated in our churches, and have produced a deep impression. Blessed be the God of our fathers, the God of love and mercy, for raising up among French Protestants such faithful exponents of his gospel! Our cause will never perish; it is the cause of Jesus Christ, the cause of truth, the cause which has triumphed over all the sophism of human philosophy, and all the tortures of persecution. Better prospects are plainly before us; the light grows brighter in France; it chases before it the darkness of skepticism, and the attempts of its adversaries will only add a new proof that Christianity is stronger than the opposition of man."

Our readers will bear in mind that this representation is made by an opposer, and that, in all probability, large deductions must be made from his statements relative to the opinions of those whom he calls Socinians and Universalists. We shall endeavor to obtain all the tracts which have appeared on both sides of the question, and will then let our readers know the truth more definitely.

The writer then goes on to give an account of a conference just held at Toulouse, at which twenty Protestant pastors and four Professors of Theology were present. He says:

"During the conferences the church was twice opened for the celebration of divine worship. One of the preachers delivered a discourse against Universalism. His object was to prove the three following points: 1st, that Christians alone are saved; 2dly, that it is necessary to admit the fundamental truths of the gospel to be a Christian; 3dly, that the punishment of the impenitent is eternal, and that those who believe in the existence of a philosophical purgatory rely on a vain fancy directly contradicted by the word of God. This refutation of Universalism was seasonable. It is important to fortify the members of our flocks against fatal errors, and to show to the Roman Catholics that Protestants are not infidels.

"Universalism is wholly incapable of defence on Bible ground; but it readily finds advocates in the world, because it flatters the passions of the corrupt heart, and relieves the vicious from troublesome fears. Nothing more convenient than this doctrine: 'Do what you please; believe what you will, you shall be saved.' The wicked and dissolute flock to this standard, which promises to open to them the gates of heaven. It is necessary then to lift up against it the glorious and eternal standard of the gospel. This was done at Toulouse, and we may hope that the sermon has not been without fruit, both for the doubting and for believers; the former need to be convinced, and the latter consoled."

The writer above shows that he knows how to abuse Universalists as well as our opposers on this side of the Atlantic. His notions of Universalism, and his confidence in the ability of its enemies to refute it on Scriptural grounds will probably undergo some changes in the course of a few years. The avowal that it is important "to show the Roman Catholics that Protestants are not infidels," tends to throw light on the motives, which no doubt operate much upon many Protestants in Europe. The nearer they can get to Catholicism without acknowledging the Pope the better. They love the praise of men.

The writer concludes his letter in the following words:

"The Reformed Church of France is evidently in a critical state, which should excite all Christians to serious reflection and fervent prayers. Our controversy is now clearly a doctrinal one. The question is, whether Socinianism and Universalism shall triumph, or whether orthodoxy shall prevail over her adversaries. Thanks to God, we are not left to our own strength in this great contest. The Lord himself, he who has promised to be with his disciples even to the end of the world, will show his strength in our weakness. We have for our security all that he has done for us already, and we have confidence in his love that he will grant us still greater blessings in time to come."

It is confessed, then, that the question now is whether Socinianism and Universalism shall triumph, or whether orthodoxy shall prevail over her adversaries. The writer thanks God that the latter are not left to their own strength. We are rejoiced that it is so, and that the only strength they can receive from above must come from the Father of lights who is the Saviour of all men, and who will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth.—Christian Messenger.

WONDERFUL CHANGE IN THE MINDS OF THE APOSTLES AFTER THE RESURRECTION AND ASCENSION.

Are we speaking of the same men who in Gethsemane's garden forsook their Lord and fled—who in the Temple-court denied him to his face—who, when he was led to the cross, abandoned him in terror, and when he died there, laid their heads in the dust, because their poor ambition was fallen to the earth? Are they the same men, who in the Gospels are narrow-minded, ambitious and false—that in the Acts of the Apostles come forth bold, resolute, spiritual witnesses for Jesus, and dauntless martyrs to his truth? We can scarcely believe that we are reading of the same men, when we turn from the page of the Evangelists to the record of their deeds, after the death and the ascension of Christ annihilated their errors, and the spirit of truth and of God had fallen upon them. Contrast the prayer,—"Lord grant us to sit on thy right hand and on thy left in thy kingdom," or, "Lord wilt thou at this time restore thy kingdom to Israel?"—with this, "Lord, thou, thou art God, which has made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is; who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said, why did the Heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things? The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ. For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together for to do whatever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done. And now, Lord, behold thy threatenings, and grant unto thy servants that with all boldness they may speak thy word; by stretching forth thine hand to heal, and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy child Jesus!" How came this difference? What passed over them and changed them into new men? The spirit of truth had come unto them that great comforter, the spirit of the understanding and of God; they saw it all, and they were worldly and weak no more, but strong in the Lord and in the power of his might! And this comforter never again left them; the truth broke upon them and became their stay forever—it was the spirit of God dwelling in them and abiding forever, his imperishable light in the soul, once given never to be withdrawn. It was just the difference between spiritual light and spiritual darkness, in their effect upon character. It was just the difference between the spirit that is of the world, and the spirit that is of God. It was just the difference between our nature when it is right and when it is wrong with God; when it is stumbling in darkness, the dupe of illusions, when it is furnished with everlasting principles, and walking in the light of life. In the Gospels they are men palsied by the feebleness of error—in the acts of the Apostles they are men omnipotent in the power of truth. Is this change in their characters capable of being accounted for? Yes, if you grant the facts of Christ's history;—but not otherwise. How otherwise are you to get across the chasm between the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles, I know not. Take those facts as causes, and the bridge is easy. What a step is it from the fishermen of Galilee to the apostles of Christ—from the ignorance of Jewish peasants, to the communicators of the mightiest impulse that society has ever felt, the agents of the mightiest influence that ever Providence put forth upon the soul of man—the creators of new institutions, new forms of character, new civil relationships—before whose preaching religions and empires fell—at whose word liberty first started into life, not as a spirit of opposition, but as a gentle child of brotherhood and love—and who still are in the monuments they have left behind them, the heralds of human progress and the revolutionizers of the world! Who will deny that the spirit of God was here? Not we: we are ready to maintain it against the world.—

Who denies that the spirit of God still accompanies his Gospel? Not we: we believe it in the depths of our hearts. How wonderful the impulse, these men gave, and still give to the heart of the world! What difficulties had they to conquer! their own characters, and violent prepossessions—and they conquered these. The curse of the priest, the arm of the ruler, the scoff of the people—and they conquered these. The attractions of Heathenism; the licentiousness of its morality; the gracefulness of its idolatry; its religion for the senses; its philosophy for the sceptre; its indifference to speculative truth; its equal regard for all gods, and all forms of worship that would only be content to dwell together in peace, and they conquered these. Think of this wonderful history, and say whether you can explain it except as the New Testament explains it. What would account for the fortunes of the apostles, if Christianity is not from God? The world of causes and effects is but a game of chance, if such things can be, and their origin an accidental imagination, their foundation a falsehood or a dream. Who will account for such men being enlightened against their own wills, and forced into the front ranks of humanity contrary to their own desires—if the history is not true? But rob not the history of its true power—take not the spirit of life out of the Gospel—by telling us of a third person in the Trinity whom Jesus sent to supplant the free minds of the apostles. No, it was the free spirit of God acting upon the free spirit of men, that opened their eyes to see the things that were hidden from them before; and they walked forth in the light of these wondrous events, and looked now upon their Christ as those from whose spiritual sight the bandage of the world had been taken away.—J. H. Thom.

METHODIST HIERARCHY.

The following, on the arrogant pretensions of the Methodist hierarchy, from the Charleston (S. C.) Banner, should be read by the friends of civil and religious liberty:—

"We really thought that we were sufficiently acquainted with the arrogance of the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, not to be astonished at any claim they might set up for themselves, however extravagant these claims might be; but we confess that we were not a little surprised on reading in the Southern Christian Advocate, an article by Dr. Bangs, headed, 'Motives to Union,' copied from the Christian Advocate and Journal, the design of which is to show that the Methodist Episcopal church is the grand conservative principle that binds together these United States; and that if a division to any considerable extent, should take place in that church it would inevitably be followed by a disruption in the Confederacy!! And how think you reader, is this great work of preserving the Union effected? Hear what the learned doctor says—"By the preaching of her ministers, the power of her moral discipline, the union of her councils, and the influence of her example in the mutual love and forbearance of her ministers and people, one toward another," she "arrests those abominations which are always the fearful precursors of a nation's downfall!" But, although she now exerts a controlling influence, so hallowed in its nature, there is still danger of disunion, and how is this to be prevented? Hear him again: "Let those cords by which she binds herself together in one common brotherhood be drawn around the American Confederacy, and she will exert a binding influence upon the several States which are revolving around the common centre of union, the general government, that may counteract the natural tendency of those bodies, to fly off from their orbital paths, and keep them in their destined spheres of action."

If this is not a bare-faced attempt to unite church and state, then words have lost their meaning. When we said a short time ago that we believed the natural tendency of the government of that church was, to subvert the civil, as well as the religious rights of the people, we did not expect to see the evidence so clearly manifest, and the design so boldly avowed in so short a time, to establish a spiritual despotism as appears in this article. Surely it is high time for the American people to open their eyes to the dangerous tendency of the principles here expressed. "The power of her moral discipline" ferrosooth! And how is that power to be exerted? By "drawing her cords around the American confederacy!" Bold effrontery.

Some years ago, an attempt was insidiously made to legalize the discipline of the M. E. Church in New York, and to make it, in effect, part and parcel of the statute law of that State, and if we mistake not, the memorial to the Legislature was drawn up by this same Dr. Bangs; but thanks to the wisdom of her Legislators, the insidious attempt was defeated. In 1833, a similar attempt was made in Pennsylvania, but fortunately with the like success. The Committee to whom the memorial was referred say, (a copy now lies before us) "The General Conference of the M. E. Church of the United States, is not a religious society as recognized by the Act of Assembly of 1730—31; and to incorporate the Conference, composed entirely of the clergy, a great portion of whom do not reside in the State, and to confer on it the whole control of all the churches and grounds in possession of the different congregations, would be injudicious if not unconstitutional. The framers of our system seem to have deprecated all interference on the part of the government, in the religious opinions of the people, and to have intended to guard against all attempts to give a preference to one sect over another." Here were attempts made in two different States, virtually to engraft the M. E. Church, or rather the Conference, composed exclusively of the itinerant clergy, on the Constitution and Laws, and thus completely to unite the civil and ecclesiastical polity. And now Dr. Bangs is for drawing a cord around the Confederacy, by "the power of her moral discipline." And how is this power now exercised? By depriving the laity of all right to a share in the making of laws by which they are to be governed; by placing in the hands of the clergy irresponsible power to construe, and to execute those laws, as their caprice might dictate; to give to them unlimited control over church property, to the amount of millions of dollars; and to excise, at pleasure, all who dare to question their right of supremacy. By the exercise of such powers as these, are they to "arrest those abominations which are always the fearful precursors of a nation's downfall."

While we feel perfectly indignant at these bare-faced attempts to unite church and state, and to bring the free citizens of America under a spiritual despotism, equal to that of the dark ages, we can not but smile to hear a minister of the M. E. Church talk about the "mutual love and forbearance of her ministers and people one toward another." Mutual love and forbearance indeed! When the elements of discord are rife in that church, and when the avowed object of the article under review is to prevent a disruption, by dazzling the eyes of the members with holding out to their view the hope of exerting the power of their discipline, so as to "draw a cord around the Confederacy," and thus make the Methodist Episcopal Church, par excellence, the church of America; and when at this very moment, the people are demanding, and the ministers refusing, the exercise of the inalienable rights which nature, and nature's God has given them. When every effort is made to restrain the spirit of free inquiry—when the bishops are asking the General Conference to "strengthen the Episcopacy," and the people are complaining of being trampled on by bishops and their minions, with the "iron hoof of despotism," (the language is theirs, not ours,) and demanding a "modification of the powers of the Episcopacy." Great love and forbearance, truly, of ministers and people.

THAT OLD MAN.

Age is entitled to veneration. And I sometimes think that he who does not look with respect upon the relict of antiquity, the remembrance of "long time ago," has but little in common with the stirring events and changes of time; and, if he has not already, will lose his self respect, when the slow pace of age, with him, begins to creep along as though reluctant to part with the scenes of olden time which he had painted on the history of to-day. But when I see him with watchful eye and careful step, bearing up and onward under the weight of the decrepid form who has leaned upon him as upon a friendly staff for support; or with kindness and joy listening to the tremulous accents of that voice which will soon be silent in death; or trusting to his long tried experience with a knowledge of the hopes and desires which swell the youthful heart, I am sure that the sere and yellow leaf of Autumn, will come upon his earthly existence, if he should be spared thus long, cheered by brightness, and beauty, and quiet peace.

I love the aged man, who has stepped over the appointed boundary of human life, and who is living upon borrowed time, as an aged friend of mine used to say of herself—God bless her in her lengthened journey.—I say I love the aged man. He is to me a living record of times and events which I never saw. That memory, almost defaced of the fainter impressions which flowed from the successive realities of pleasant and common place experience, and which served, for a long time, as a connecting link in the train of recollections; now presents the bold and forcible sketches of life only, detached from the vanities which were intermingled, but none the less true and valuable for that. It seems like one from the dead, revived that he might tell us a few more facts, and give us a few more hints, which had been forgotten when the cares of life are around him. The anecdote, the narrative of temptation and escape, the friendly warning, the peril and accident of an adventurer, the delineation of quaint old customs, the remembrance of scenes that "tried men's souls," the opportunities for improvement which were suffered to roll away forever, all told in the tremulous accents of the good old man, with an interest which transports him back to the hours that were, almost to the exclusion of those that are, make the themes which charm and instruct the mind. Who can help but love him? Suppose he has his faults; can we not excuse the frailties of age, when God has spared him to us for our good?—Suppose he has faults which he carried with him down the steep of time, and which he indulged in his younger days. Who of us are free from censure? We will forgive him, and follow him a short distance in his pilgrimage.

He stands before me, a man of a century, with his locks whitened like driven snow, and his features marked with the deep furrows which time has worn there. His step is quick, yet there is a tremor there, and he stoops upon the shaken staff which has been his walking companion for fifty years. The body part of his coat is without seam, and his hat—the days of its beauty are beyond my memory; for his pride of dress has gone with the follies of his youth. Yet I would not have that hat displaced from the brow that has acknowledged its shelter so long. Any other would become him less, and I should lose a part of himself. Though his sight has become partially dim, yet his ears are open to the voice of music and the salutations of friendship; and he loves to visit the haunts of his merrier days, and chat with the very few companions of his middle age who survive their own boyhood friends. And it is a good trait in him. Those of his own young days have long since left him; he might have been like a lone tree in the forest, but he chose from among a later generation another circle of companions, and now the oldest of these—only a few who have not fallen—listen to legends from his lips, whose dates are beyond their starting points in the career of life. The young gather around him too, to shake him by the hand, or give him the old arm chair, or place his hat carefully upon the floor by his side, or laugh with merry glee at the oft repeated riddle or rude stanza, perhaps of his own composing, which come up amid the cherishings of memory. Yea, the old man, with all his losses and solitude, is a social man, and always will be, for soon he will receive the message, for which he is waiting, to enter the society in heaven.

The old man is sitting in a circle of old and young, where he is often seen, when pleasant weather will allow him to venture from his own roof. He has dwelt upon many a favorite theme, which might interest his doctored companions in years. But he has not been unheard by the younger. He has marked the suppressed laugh, and the cautious step—all tokens of an anxiety to catch every word, and pleased with the attention, he has turned to give them a pleasing hint of the duty of cultivating respect for the aged—for the old man has not always been treated as kind as he should be. This story will furnish a hint of the consequences of disrespect of parents, too. Let us listen to it.

"I am a very old man now, and shall not trespass long upon the sympathies of my young friends. Yet I would not abuse the eagerness with which you have listened to my feeble words. I know not why it is, yet when I see you crowd around me, and look solemn as though the youthful spirit must be hushed when the shadow of ancient days is in your midst; and when I compare your respect, with the sneers and taunts of many street idlers who seem envious that God has spared me to pause upon the brink of my grave, and look into many a one, which was opened for their boon companions, who, like themselves have laughed at me, and called me, 'an old stand by,' and 'a walking spectre,' I have an anxiety that you and they may escape the snare and the disgrace which I saw visited upon many unfortunate young men years ago.

"I remember the time well. I was on a visit to my native town, where I unexpectedly tarried two years, during which, I often called on my friend Harvey Beverly. I was then eighty years of age, and Beverly eighty-five; but though five years my senior, he had been my mate the little while which we enjoyed at the adjoining village school, and in many a youthful prank and forest chase afterward. How much were these two years destined to record among my own sorrowful cherishings!

"Beverly was the possessor of extensive wealth. This enabled him to afford his family every thing of earthly enjoyment which heart could desire. Nor had the mental and moral condition of a large family of children been neglected. How they estimated his kindness to them, will soon be seen. He did all that money and example could do to bring them up in wisdom's ways, and to secure that filial affection which should smooth the pillow of declining age, and stand by him in the death struggle. Wealth, he knew could not save him from decrepitude and helplessness, but he expected that saving his children from the cares of poverty, it might enable them to bestow their love upon him.—But alas! wealth gave him no relief in either case. The trembling footstep came upon him, and with his body bowed beneath the weight of years, he slowly sought, from time to time, the sympathy of other hearts, and the willing hospitality of other roofs—for he found them not at home. That sympathy he found, for there were kind hearts around him; but he often braved the insults of a few reckless beings in the streets, as I have done, that he might enjoy the relief that followed.

"Let him go among strangers, even, and plenty is before him. But at home—alas! his children and their companions in vice, ('for wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together,') had usurped the rights, and perverted the honors of the home which had sheltered him as its master till now! But now his bowl is scanty, and his fare coarse, and the place that himself and his lamented bosom companion, had occupied at the frugal board, is filled by haughty and insolent stranger forms. I am glad you will not do even as these strangers did, insult one who has no claims upon you, only that his work of earth was almost done before you saw the light of yonder sun. And this I know is a precious pledge to your own dear father, who follows but a short distance behind me.

"Beverly was not the man to yield without a cause; yet he was prostrated upon a bed from which he never was to rise, till carried thence to the tomb. From that time I left him not, for his days were numbered. Coldness was around his habitation, but a deeper and unnatural coldness was in the hearts of those whom he had cherished and nurtured with a parent's love. They served not his wishes, or served them unwillingly. They seldom sat by his bed-side, and then impatiently. They smiled not upon him, but clothed their countenances in frowns. For hours have I sat by him when the big tears rolled down his furrowed cheeks, to think he should be indebted to other hands than his children, to smooth his dying pillow, and to other words for comfort which his children denied him. Yet his fondness never waned. 'My children,' said he, 'seem to feel that I am trespassing upon time, which the ordinary course of generation has allotted to them, and that I tarry when I should take my departure. But I forgive them, for I am but a broken, worthless reed. But O, I would to God that they would not tolerate the insults of strangers, upon their poor old father! Why will they not confine their shame to their own bosoms?'

"But I must not dwell upon these scenes of human frailty and human suffering. The good old man died in these arms. I alone was by to close his eyes. His children and the strangers were absent scheming to gain possession of his property and even his few comforts, when a few days of honesty and patience would have given it to the rightful claimants, with his blessing. The old man died—but the authors of his anguish died while living, a more miserable death than he. The thousands which were left to the children were squandered in strife, and intemperance, and vanity, until they stood before the world the miserable subjects of poverty, and rags, and vice. The strangers ended their career, as the contemptible and hardened inmates of the penitentiary."

The narrator prepared to depart. Yet he paused at the door, for he had not given his benediction—and it was an impressive one. "My young friends," said he, "you have heard a tale of crime, and the solemn result. I am not certain that God visited these impious men with any special judgment or indignation; but in his laws he has provided for the punishment of offenders. In the case which you have listened to, that disrespect, and ingratitude, and want of veneration which was cherished, led to an aversion to the advice of experience, and abandonment of wholesome restraint, the selection of vicious companions and vicious pursuits, spendthrift habits, corrupt and unnatural desires, dishonest hopes and fraudulent practices, until the scorn of fate and fortune, and an incensed community, lowered upon them in darkness. God save you from the fate of the scorner."

And that old man spake right; and I love him with all his faults, for his sense of justice, and for those lessons which the experience of a century has furnished the young. I have intimated that he had faults; and perhaps many who have unwisely followed his footsteps with scorn, have fancied that they had cause for so doing. But they have not viewed him as I have. They have seen him, in his dotage, hugging closer and still closer to his bosom, the fatal idol, gold—for he has hoarded up his thousands, and seems to think not that these will give no sweetness to the dying struggles.—The laborer has been pinching paid by him for services rendered; distress has called at the door for charity and gone away empty; some have even hinted that he has denied himself the comforts of life. But I have seen further than this, and would not add one tear to the bitter ones which he wrings from his own breast. His love of money has impaired his confidence in God and men. Thoughts of abandonment have come over his feelings at times, like a sweeping deluge. Eager grasping after things that perish, has made his frame tremble like an aspen leaf. At times the innate longings to benevolence, in spite of all the stiflings which parsimony has thrown around them, have visited him with the agony of disappointment, and he has hoped for purer days. But then, dreams of tempest and fire, of thieves and robbers, of poverty and want, have haunted his mind, until the reality would not half equal the desolateness of the fancied.

It is enough! God will not permit his scorers to appoint themselves his judges, without judging them in turn. Already has that old man been permitted to survive the wreck and disgrace of many of them, and God only knows if he will not live to behold the infamy, and lay the sod upon the unwept grave of the last of them! As for me; whenever I see that old man I shall hear the solemn benediction, "God save thee from the fate of the scorner." A. R. B.

LETTER.

[The following letter partially explains itself. It is from the Rev. M. L. Wisner, a Universalist clergyman, of acknowledged piety and irreproachable morals, to his brother according to the flesh, the Editor of the Genesee Valley Recorder, at Nunda, Allegany county. It adds another name to the long list already made public, (to which many more might also be added did we deem it necessary,) of those who found the doctrine of endless sin and misery insufficient to give them peace and resignation in a dying hour; and who therefore renounced the cherished sentiment of a life, for Universalism. It is very singular, indeed, that the Editor of the Recorder should deny the existence of even a single case of such renunciation, when his own mother had actually renounced Calvinism on her death bed to die a Universalist! But we know too well the oblivion produced in some minds, by a heated zeal in opposing Universalism, to doubt his sincerity when he made the declaration. Man can not always remember every thing, and in such unfavorable circumstances he is particularly apt to be forgetful. We only hope, that, as he has called for an instance in disproof of his declaration, he will be candid enough to give the one furnished by the case of his own mother. If another is wanting, the case of Miss Lebold, published in this number, may be added to the one furnished by Br. M. L. W.]

A copy of this paper will be sent by mail to the Editor of the Recorder, as requested by the writer of the letter. A. B. G.

To the Editor of the Genesee Valley Recorder.

DEAR BROTHER—In consequence of an article from your pen, published in the Recorder, No. 8, and having a strong desire for your welfare, and being sensible that it is my duty, as a minister of the great Restitution, to do all in my power towards enlightening my brethren in regard to the final destiny of men, I pen these lines as an answer to a part of that article, which is as follows: "Never since the world began, has there been an instance of one who, in his life, has trusted and served the Lord till the hour of his death, who, has then and there renounced his faith, and fled for refuge to Universalism." This you countenance by the following language: "We say, in justice to those of our patrons who deny it, produce an instance to the contrary," etc.

You may have forgotten the instance which I now produce, but time can never obliterate it from the memory of your brother; the impression is indelible. Our mother was a member of the Calvinistic Baptist Church in Cayuga county. She undoubtedly served the Lord—was faithful to instruct her children, especially the writer of this, in the doctrines of the church; and to warn them night and day, with prayers and tears, to beware of heresy—and when your brother, who now pens this, became a believer in the great salvation, her agony was so great that she told me, she should have felt better to have heard of my death. She was brought low on the bed of sickness, which proved her death bed. She “there and then” renounced her faith, as she told me herself—or, rather, gave up her belief in the doctrine of endless sin and misery, and embraced the doctrine of universal salvation, declaring that her former faith would do better to live by than it would to die by—that she could never die in peace until she found a universal Saviour. I was not present at her exit, but some of those who stood by, told me since, that her last expiring breath was spent in this sentence—“tell my children and friends, when I am wrapt in a winding sheet and laid in the coffin, there lies a Universalist.” And thus she closed her eyes in peace.

As it respects the rest of said article, there is language in it which I am very sorry to read. For instance, the following, “the views held in common by those whom we consider properly entitled to the appellation of Christian denominations, may be found to coincide with those we publish,” etc. Now your readers will all understand you, that the Universalist denomination (since you had just mentioned them,) are not entitled to the appellation of Christian, because their views do not coincide with yours. If this is not your meaning, as your friend and brother I entreat you to retract your language, or qualify it. If it is, then I ask you to ponder well your footsteps, and ascertain what constitutes a person a Christian. “Does not faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and repentance towards God?” Most assuredly it does. And do you not know, brother, that we believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, (as a denomination;) also, that the goodness of God should lead us to repent of all our sins? This, brother, is my faith, and I trust the faith of all sincere Universalists. “I beseech you, therefore, by the mercies of God,” do not refuse me the Christian name because I prefer looking to God through the medium of Jesus Christ, to any other name under heaven. He is my hope, my all—my resurrection and my life beyond the grave.

Yours I trust in everlasting love,
To J. G. WISNER. M. L. WISNER.

WALDIE'S SELECT CIRCULATING LIBRARY.—The ill health of the Publisher, and the pecuniary embarrassments of his subscribers, caused this valuable and interesting periodical to be suspended a year ago, to the great regret of the reading public who had access to its pages. I rejoice to learn that it is to be renewed, on the advance payment plan. The publisher truly and justly says—

The regularity of its former publication, not a failure in seven years, will be taken as a guarantee for the future punctuality of the Library; but there is only one way to make that permanent, viz: by payment in advance. This is an indispensable pre-requisite from all at a distance. The losses by deviating from this rule formerly are too heavy to be forgotten soon, and a little reflection may satisfy any one of the reasonableness of the request. The reasons are too obvious, indeed, to require much discussion. Five dollars are all that a subscriber risks, but the publisher risks thousands by crediting. The publisher is in a city and can be reached without trouble. A subscriber lives perhaps a thousand miles off; and how is he to be reached? It might cost six times the amount to collect the trifle. Payment in advance, then, as all may perceive, is a reasonable request, and sad experience compels the proprietor to make it absolute. The few who paid in advance for 1840, will be supplied for 1841, unless otherwise ordered.

An early remittance of names is respectfully urged, so as to enable the proprietor to make proper calculations about the quantity to be printed, as he will print very few over the number absolutely subscribed for. To this he would call particular attention.

To his brethren of the press, throughout the country the proprietor returns grateful thanks for former favors, and hopes the work will be again so conducted as to warrant a renewal of their friendly assistance. A few copies of the Port Folio are still on hand, a year of which will be forwarded in payment for advertising as much of this announcement as they may think an equivalent; or two years will be sent for publishing the whole.

TERMS.—The Library will be published weekly, on a double royal sheet, sixteen pages quarto each, on new type, and printed in the best style of book work. Each number enveloped with a neat cover.

2. Price FIVE DOLLARS a year, if paid at or remitted to the office. SIX DOLLARS if collected by an agent.

3. A Monthly Journal of Polite Literature, consisting of original communications, and selections from foreign and domestic periodicals, printed uniformly with the Library. This will be a valuable addition to the original plan.

4. Subscriptions commence with January, and no subscriptions taken for less than a year.

A few complete sets of the Library, and odd years to perfect subscribers' sets, on hand and for sale. Phil. Oct. 1840. ADAM WALDIE.

The valuable and interesting works in Travels biography, romance, etc., which are published in this work render it peculiarly worthy of patronage by those living at a distance from the large cities. They get by mail, for a few cents, works that in the book form cost a dollar—and get them often, before the bookseller can get the book ready for sale. Having been a subscriber from its commencement, I feel it my duty to recommend it warmly to all who can afford to take it—I know no cheaper or better way for a family to furnish itself with a large amount of the foreign literature of the day—and to get it, week by week, just about as fast as they can well read it. I would not part with my set for double its cost. A. B. G.

THE STAR IN THE WEST AND GLAD TIDINGS.—These two papers we rejoice to announce, are now united in one, under the ownership and care of Br. J. A. Gutley, of Cincinnati, Ohio—Br. S. A. Davis, Editor at Akron, and Br. E. M. Pingree, of Montgomery, Associate Editor. The West can well support one paper—and that support will render it a good one—whereas, divided, both have long suffered much, and The Glad Tidings has involved Br. Davis in debt.—Success and long life to the Union—may it result in every good effect which its projectors can hope for. A. B. G.

THE MESSENGER AND UNION.

We rejoice to learn that Br. Price has again a fair prospect before him. His appeal for aid has not been unheeded—many new names have been added to his list, and if the present subscribers generally continue, there is a fair prospect that the tide will have turned, and the next year be one of comparative security and ease from fears of total failure. The New-York Evangelist has been trying to make sectarian capital out of the embarrassments and difficulties of that paper and this—and that, too, after the Evangelist itself has nearly ruined one or two former proprietors, by involving them in debt, and compelling one set to make an assignment! But we shall notice it more by itself. We now write only to say that the Messenger and Union begins a new volume this week, and to express our hope that its friends and agents will continue to it their efficient aid, until it is redeemed from debt, and its worthy proprietor rewarded, in part at least, for his past labors and sacrifices and sufferings. A. B. G.

ENDLESS MISERY.

What is it good for? It is good to vindicate the justice of God, says one. Well, this is a common notion, but a very singular one. Can there be justice where there is no mercy? No, for a just God has declared that he “will have mercy and not sacrifice.” To vindicate the character of a just God, therefore, it must be consistent with his mercy. Hence if endless misery will vindicate the justice of God, it is both good and merciful. If good and merciful, will not all be endlessly miserable? Yes, for God is “good unto all,” and his mercy endureth forever.”

Still what is it good for? It is good to vindicate the claims of a justice which knows no mercy, says a second, desirous to escape the above difficulty. Well this is more strange still. Can justice be satisfied with two opposite modes of treatment under the same circumstances as an end? No, not with God, for “he is in one mind, and who can turn him?” Well, all are sinners, and here are two opposite modes of treatment—salvation and damnation. Which will be the work of justice; eternal salvation from sin, or eternal damnation in sin? Take your choice, dear reader, for justice will be done.

Again we inquire, what is it good for? and a third replies, it is good to produce a restraining influence. Well, this is more singular than all the rest. Do the damned in hell feel any restraint from it? No, it is supposed not. We are told that all who are in this condition will sin more heinously, and hate more deeply, and blaspheme with a louder voice! Does this look like restraining the sinner. By what authority, then, are we told that the prospect of it will restrain the sinner on earth, whose heart it would harden and fill with curings and bitterness in the eternal world? In the name of common sense, and of truth, and of holiness we ask, what is Endless misery good for? A. R. B.

THANKSGIVING.

Governor Seward has issued his proclamation recommending the observance of Thursday, December 17th, as a day of Thanksgiving, prayer and praise, by the people of this commonwealth.

May those who observe these days, do it in sincerity and truth, and with a proper remembrance of God and their fellow men—and may those who observe them not, do something to make those around them thankful on that day, especially the poor and needy. ## MY SISTER'S GRAVE.

As falling shadows seek the ground,
And eve's low breathings whisper round,
When summer flowers blossom fair
In garden, field, and green parterre,
I love to sit where willows wave
Above my sister's quiet grave.

The distant wind-harp's tones which steal
Along the evening air—I feel
That in their low and falling strain,
I hear the sleeper's voice again.
I oft have watched yon glimm'ring star
That shoots its brightness from afar,
Till it was lost in vapors dim
On the horizon's dark'ning rim,
And sinking still in deeper gloom.
An emblem of her early doom.

It is a calm and holy hour,
And recollection keen hath pow'r
To waft me in remembrance, back
To life's first, bright, delightful track,
When with the one for whom we mourn,
I strayed beside yon murmur'ing bourn.
To gather flowers, wasting there
Their fragrance on the ambient air.
The gurgling brook which danced along,
The bird that sung its matin song,
As soaring to the cloudless sky,
Were not as blithesome then as I.
My heart beat wild with childhood's glow;
And dreams this world can ne'er bestow
The high fruition, swept my brain—
Dreams which will prove forever vain.
But thou, pure spirit! ne'er didst know
The hollowness of all below;
That friendship is a fleeting flame,
That happiness is but a name,
And deepest bliss which mortals sip,
Aye turns to ashes on the lip.—
Nay, and 'tis well, I fain would think,
The bitter cup thou didst not drink.
Thy spirits texture was too frail
For earth—a dark and dreary vale.—
And, as a flower, early bright,
So thou art, faded from our sight—
The joy, the pride of coming years—
We're left to unavailing tears.

But hope shall bid her pinions soar,
And, glancing death's black valley o'er,
Open a vista through the gloom
Which points to life beyond the tomb—
Where, when earth's meteor dream is o'er,
Friends reunite to part no more.

HINTS ON EARLY EDUCATION.—1. Judicious mothers will always keep in mind that they are the first book read, and the last laid aside in every child's library. Every look, word, tone, and gesture, nay, even dress makes an impression.

2. Remember that children are men in miniature, and though they are childish, and should be allowed to act as children, still all our dealings with them should be manly, not morose.

3. Be always kind and cheerful in their presence—playful, but never light, communicative, but never extravagant in statements, nor vulgar in language nor gestures.

4. Before a year old, entire submission should be secured; this may be often won by kindness, but must sometimes be exacted by the rod, though one chastisement I consider enough to secure the object. If not, the parent must tax himself for the failure, and not the perverseness of the child. After one conquest, watchfulness, kindness and perseverance, will secure obedience.

5. Never trifle with a child, nor speak beseechingly to it when it is doing any improper thing, or when watching an opportunity to do so.

6. Always follow commands with a close and careful watch, until you see that the child does the thing commanded—allowing of no evasion nor modification, unless the child ask for it, and it is expressly granted.

7. Never break a promise made to a child, or if you do, give your reasons, and if in fault, own it and ask pardon if necessary.

8. Never trifle with a child's feelings, when under discipline.

9. Children ought never to be governed by the fear of the rod, or of private chastisements, or of dark rooms.

10. Correcting a child on suspicion, or without understanding the whole matter, is the way to make him hide his faults by equivocation or a lie—to justify himself—or to disregard you altogether, because he sees that you do not understand the case, and are in the wrong.

11. When a child wants that which it should not have, and begins to fret, a decided word spoken in kindness, but with authority, hushes and quiets the child at once, but a half yielding and half unyielding method only frets and teases the child, and if denied or made to obey, ends in a cry.

12. It is seldom well to let the child cry it out, as the saying is. If put into a corner, or tied to your chair, it should not be to cry or make a noise. Indeed, crying from anger or disappointment, should never be allowed. A child soon discovers that its noise is not pleasant, and learns to take revenge in this way. If allowed to "vent their feelings" when children, they will take the liberty to do so when they are men and women.

13. Never allow a child to cry or scream on every slight occasion, even if hurt, and much less, when by so doing, it gratifies a revengeful or angry spirit. This should be especially guarded against in infants of ten, twelve, or eighteen months old, who often feel grieved or provoked, when a thing is denied or taken from them.

14. Never reprove a child severely in company, nor make light of their feelings, nor hold them up to ridicule.

15. Never try to conceal any thing which the child knows you have, but by your conduct, teach him to be frank, manly, and open—never hiding things in his hand nor slyly concealing himself or his designs.

16. Kindness and tenderness of feeling towards insects, birds, and the young, even of such animals as should be killed, if old, (excepting poisonous ones) are to be carefully cherished.

17. I am pleased with such children as allow those roses and other flowers, that blossom on the Sabbath, to remain on the tree to praise their Maker in their own beauty and sweetness. "This is the incense of the heart, whose fragrance smells to heaven."—Abbott's Magazine.

TEN RULES TO BE OBSERVED IN PRACTICAL LIFE.—The following rules were given by the late Mr. Jefferson, in a letter of advice to his namesake, Thomas Jefferson Smith, in 1825.

1. Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day.
2. Never trouble others for what you can do yourself.
3. Never spend your money before you have it.
4. Never buy what you do not want because it is cheap.
5. Pride costs us more than hunger, thirst, and cold.
6. We never repent of having eaten too little.
7. Nothing is troublesome that we do willingly.
8. How much pains have those evils cost us which never happened.
9. Take things always by their smoothest handle.
10. When angry, count ten before you speak—if very angry, a hundred.

ANCIENT FARMS.—The farm of the celebrated Roman Cincinnatus, consisted of only four acres, the other three having been lost by becoming security for a friend. Carius who was celebrated for his frugality, who was three times chosen consul, and thrice honored with a triumph, on returning from a successful campaign, refused from the people a grant of fifty acres, declaring that he was a bad citizen who could not be contented with the old allowance of seven.

A limner taking the portrait of a lady, perceived, when he was endeavoring to give a resemblance to her mouth, that she was twisting her features to render it small, and put her lips in the most violent contraction. Impatient of this artifice, the painter said "Don't hurt yourself, madam, in trying to make your mouth smaller, because if you choose, I will put none at all."

DEATHS.

In Livonia, September 29th, Mrs. RHODA, wife of Jonathan Richardson. Mrs. R. lived to an advanced age, lived a useful and pious member of society—lived to experience the joys of Gospel hope, and died rejoicing in a deep, heartfelt confidence of going to a better home, and there meet her children all, and all the kindred throng of humanity, where no tear is shed around a dying couch. She adopted the sentiment and feeling of the apostle, and could declare, saying she was always confident, knowing that whilst she was at home in the body she was absent from the Lord;—confident and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord. How sweet it is to die with this assurance! O. R.

In Avon, near Lakeville, October 15th, Mrs. HANNAH BLISS, wife of Giles B. Bliss, in the 35th year of her age. Thus has passed away another of the good and beloved of earth. She was one of the most active, devoted and talented members of the Universalist Church in Lakeville, and her loss we deeply mourn. But a few weeks since she united with us in partaking the Lord's Supper. But death has come and taken her from our midst. She has gone to a better and a more celestial communion with the immortally blessed in heaven. With this view to sustain and animate her, she died rejoicing in the Lord, and prayed to go home. In her death was evinced the power and sustaining influence of the faith she embraced and adorned. Her last hours were marked with calmness, composure, and perfect confidence and she fell sweetly asleep in the arms of her risen Saviour. Peace and eternal blessedness be hers, and the grace of God bless the surviving husband and bereaved children. O. ROBERTS.

At Concord Centre, October 10th, Mrs. FREELOVE ASHMUN, wife of John H. Ashmun, after a short but distressing sickness of about 20 hours, aged 25 years, 8 months, 20 days. Br. Remington of Boston, delivered the funeral Sermon on the 12th, to a numerous concourse of friends and sympathizing neighbors.

O! tell me, dear Freeloove, Oh, where art thou gone?

O! tell this poor mortal where now is thy home?

Inform thy poor husband, is Jesus thy King?

How shall I be certain what tidings you'd bring?

Methinks you've ascended where Jesus does reign,

Methinks you're immortal and freed from all pain—

To the regions of glory your spirit has fled,

And left that frail body inactive and dead.

"Wouldst know, dearest husband, the place of my rest,
The record of Jesus you must not distrust.

Though doom'd to be laid in the cold silent grave,

Beyond the dark tomb a blest life we shall have;

For Jesus has risen, ascended on high,

Gain'd a victory for all who suffer and die.

No more doubt his goodness, his power, or his love,

We shall soon meet again in bright mansions above."

In Howard, Steuben county, October 14th, from the rupture of a blood vessel, Mr. RICHARD HIGGINS, aged 70 years. He had long been a believer in the restitution, and had sustained the reputation of an honest man and a Christian. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the numerous family and circle of friends and a respectable and attentive audience, by the writer, on the 16th, from Ps. xxvii: 5.

T. S. B.

At Victor, on the 25th ult., an infant child of D. E. Washburn, aged 5 months.

At Victor, October 30th, Mr. ELISHA TUBBS, aged 34 years. During a long and distressing period of complicated disease, he manifested the utmost patience, and confidence in the goodness and the power of God, he awaited the summons with resignation and calmness. He has left a bereaved companion with two children to mourn his loss. A discourse was delivered to a numerous congregation of sympathizing friends, at his funeral, from Hebrews ii: 12.

ORIGINAL SERMON. THE LAW OF LIBERTY.

BY REV. S. P. LANDERS.

"But whose looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed." JAMES 1: 25.

The instructions of this apostle were addressed to the believers in Christ generally, and not to any particular church or person, as were most of the epistles contained in the New Testament.

In his introduction, he dedicates it to the twelve tribes which were then much scattered, and we find that there is much contained in the letter that merits the consideration and practice of all Christians. And it would seem that it was not designed particularly to argue the truths of the Gospel, but to enforce those truths, which they acknowledge, and those virtues and Christian principles incumbent upon all, and particularly upon those whose minds had been enlightened and whose ears had listened to the joyful sound of salvation, by Jesus Christ. And it seems to your humble speaker, that a thorough acquaintance with the wholesome instructions of this short epistle, must produce a conviction in every mind, of the necessity of being doers of the word as well as hearers—of practicing pure and undefiled religion, which consists in visiting "the fatherless and widows in their afflictions, and keeping oneself unspotted from the world."

The apostle speaks of two kinds of professors, viz., the mere hearer and the doer of the word, or observer of the law of liberty.

The mere hearer of the word is like a man beholding his natural face in the glass—this is his reward. He has the satisfaction of seeing his own form and beauty; but he soon forgetteth what manner of man he was, and of course he is under the necessity of looking in the glass again. This is as much as to say, that there are some people who are like the seed of the sower that was scattered on stony ground—they spring up and flourish in a very conspicuous manner for a short time, but for want of depth, they die. They feed upon excitement while they live, and when that is over they perish. These are what the apostle calls the hearers of the word.

There is another class of men who are not only hearers, but doers of the word—the fear of an angry Maker is not necessary to keep them in the way of truth, nor is it necessary to excite their feelings or fears in order to keep them in the way of their duty. Such persons do not need a periodical excitement to teach them what the "law of liberty" is, or to induce them to observe it—they need not look in the glass all day for fear they shall forget what kind of men they are; for their way is plain, and they know that in following it, they are rewarded. I have often thought that people of this age took much more pains to be hearers of the word merely, than delight and satisfaction in being doers of it.

You probably recollect that it is said that Zedekiah, who was a wicked king in the time of Jeremiah, sent to the prophet, "Saying, pray now unto the Lord our God for us." It is said that neither the king, the people, nor his servants "did hearken unto the words of the Lord, which he spake by the prophet Jeremiah." They did not believe anything the prophet told them, neither did they care, for it was all the same to them. But they requested the prophet to pray for them notwithstanding—they wanted at least to be hearers of the word, for fashion's sake, although they believed it not, nor heeded its instruction. Now this appears like a very singular request for a king, his people, and servants to make, when they had no other object in making the request than to be hearers. But I have often thought that it was not much different now.

Take the mere hearers of the word in the congregations that worship in any city or town, and you will find that they are not much different in practice, as far as hearing is concerned, from the king and his subjects, just alluded to.—The salary paid to the clergy is great, and these hearers say to them, "Come pray for us, and preach to us, and we will compensate you for it, we will be your hearers, we will build you fine churches, and we will make all things right, and put them in order," etc.; but how many are there after all, that believe a word that is told them, or care what they do hear? It is a matter of no difference to them what they hear and support, they do not intend to believe it, much less put it in practice, their only object is to be hearers of the word. Such persons always find it more convenient, and they generally consider it more popular, to have a splendid church, a talented minister, and a great name, than they do to be followers of what they hear—to be doers of the word. This is one class of hearers and not doers of the word.

There is another class which hear and do for a short time. Some are captivated by the novelty of occasions; the prospect of forming a new society, building a new church, or something else out of the every day occurrences, captivates their minds; they with joy receive the word, make much noise about their religion for a time, but soon the novelty of the occasion passes off, and with it goes their zeal for truth—their interest for religion is gone—their piety waxes worse and worse, and in a short time they lose all love for things sacred; wonder that men of sense should attend church from Sabbath to Sabbath, and we see them like the swine that was washed, return to all that is degrading and vicious.

Thus they who are converted by new things, soon become cold and indifferent to religion, when novelty is gone; and thus they sleep in dormancy till something exciting awakes them to life again.

"But whose looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed."

Upon the first clause of this text, Dr. A. Clarke has this just remark, "The word (parakypsas) which we translate looketh into, is very emphatic, and signifies that deep and attentive consideration given to a thing or subject which a man can not bring up to his eyes, and therefore must bend his back and neck, stooping down, that he may see it to the greater advantage."

It is not enough that a person professes a mere superficial knowledge of the "perfect law of liberty" in order to be an enlightened Christian; for while a man acknowledges himself a believer in the Gospel, he may be far removed from a true knowledge of its requirements, and he may not be able to give a single reason why he believes it. It is therefore very important that we all look into the perfect law of liberty understandingly—in the sense which that word originally implied, that we may learn the principles and power of this law.

Another has well said that "the man of genuine decision, in judging what is true or what is right, knows how to use his own understanding.

With implicit deference to the word of God, as a perfect standard in religious inquiries, he searches and thinks for himself. He thinks independently, superior both to that pride of singularity, which is predisposed to reject received opinions, and to that servile acquiescence, which bows to their authority without examination. He thinks impartially, unbiased by passion or prejudice. He thinks clearly and systematically. His eye penetrates at a glance those mists which obscure the vision of common minds. Not satisfied with surveying the exterior of subjects, he examines principles, weighs opposing evidence, and pursues the investigation to a regular result. This gives strength and stability to his opinions. Why should he be timid and wavering, while there is a firm footing under him at every step? He neither believes nor acts without reasons; reasons which he sees distinctly; which he weighs deliberately; which he can exhibit and explain to others; therefore, he is above those fluctuations of character, to which feeble and indecisive men are liable." [Porter's Lectures on Homiletics, page 363.]

The understanding Christian will not only look into the evidences with an eye of reason, and act with a decision becoming the subject, but he will compare it with the works and providence of God. He looks at it in all the ways and lights necessary to understand it, and finding it to agree with experience, with nature, with reason, with admitted truths and his own feelings, he cherishes it to his bosom, obeys it and acts worthy of his high calling. The more pure are our conceptions of the perfect law, the greater will be the enjoyment arising from its observance, the more exalted and refined will be our joys; the same as in music, the better ear we have for it, the more we shall enjoy its melodies and harmonies.

The carrying out of this principle of the Gospel, or law of liberty, is attended with happy results, whether the person who practices upon it is acquainted with the theory of it or not. When we see the tear of gratitude beaming in the eye, and witness an overflowing and thankful heart, for the gift of some, to us, small favor that will satisfy hunger, the sight of such expressions of joy, causes pleasing emotions to reign in the bosom of the giver, and he feels that it is truly better to give than to receive.

And here an incident which I have read somewhere occurs to my mind, which very forcibly illustrates this subject.

In one of the Atlantic cities, a young man came into possession of a large estate, a great fortune, and as it is frequently the case with inconsiderate young men when they come into possession of wealth by the will of relatives, so it was with him. His great study and object was, how he could spend all his great possessions, so as to contribute to his happiness, and gain to himself a great name. The unfortunate man mistaking the way, gave himself up to dissipation, gambling, and the vices commonly connected with such a life. His company was sought by the artful and designing, that they might take advantage of his weakness and follies, and take from him, piece by piece, his great wealth. His vanity was flattered, and he supposed himself a great man. But in a short time his wealth was principally wasted—his supposed friends abandoned his company, he was despised by all that knew his course of conduct. His mind was changed—he looked back upon his foolish practices with unavailing regret—he learned a lesson which many young men have scorned to learn, till taught by experience and sober reality, that it is not so hard a matter to spend a fortune as is supposed, and that those who suppose that happiness is sipped from the intoxicating bowl, or is found in company with a rioting crew, are woefully deceived. He became a misanthrope—shut himself from the society of men and yielded himself up a victim to despair. In addition to his real misfortunes in the loss of all he had, he imagined ten thousand more, abject poverty, disgrace, and the just scorn and rebuke of the world stared him full in the face, and he sank under the load that oppressed him.

At last he became so misanthropic, so gloomy and sad, that he was tired and sick of life, sick of reviewing the scenes of folly and wickedness in which he had been engaged, and he determined to put an end to his miserable life, by drowning himself in the briny deep. Fully intent upon his mad purpose, he passed with a rapid step, from street to street, till his attention was arrested by a poorly clad girl, who appealed to him for charity with the eloquence of one who really suffered, and was really needy. She said that there were six of them, and that they were literally starving for a morsel of bread. The miserable appearance of the girl, together with the simple and honest-heartedness of her appeals for assistance, affected him—he was moved with compassion—she had touched a tender chord in his heart, and he thought to himself that since it would detain him but a few moments, he would follow the little girl, and far as his scanty means would allow, he would relieve the distressed family. He went, and a scene of more abject poverty and want perhaps human eyes never saw. He could not help but regret that he had not sought them when he had abundance, but he gave all he had. And when he saw their streaming eyes, their grateful hearts at receiving the last relic of his fortune, their true need of it, he was happy—a thrill of satisfaction pervaded his bosom, and he felt overjoyed in witnessing the happy change he had caused in that little circle. He said to himself that the thousands he had squandered and spent, had not caused such pure joy and entire satisfaction to reign in his bosom, as the few shillings which he had then contributed as his last act, caused him to feel. He felt thankful that such an opportunity had presented itself, for it caused him to forget his troubles and to know that he was again a happy man; and being satisfied that this was the reward of well doing, he abandoned his design to destroy himself—turned his mind from his troubles, engaged in active business, regained his wealth by slow and arduous toil, became a respectable citizen and a benefactor of poor, distressed, and suffering humanity, wherever and whenever he found an object of want.

What we wish to observe here, is this. This young man in relieving the destitute, acted on the principle of the Gospel, the perfect law mentioned in our text, and it made him happy; for you will observe by what immediately follows our text, that the person who relieves the destitute and performs works like this young man, is religious; and not he who makes loud professions and false pretences to a life of sanctity. He says, "If any man among you seem to be religious, and brideth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, that man's religion is vain."

Now this young man might never have read this text of Scripture—he might never have read the Bible at all, or listened to its gracious words from the lips of others, yet when he practiced upon the principle of this law he became a happy man—he became a new creature, and it would have been the same had he been an inhabitant of the Arabian desert, the Rocky mountains, or the remotest island in the ocean, entirely shut out from civilized life. The man who practices upon this principle is truly and fully blessed in his deed! not out of it, but in it. The person who has been set at liberty by Christ, enjoys freedom indeed; he is not free to do wrong, but at perfect liberty to do what he pleases, for all disposition to sin is destroyed. He is dead to sin, and alive unto righteousness.

We talk long and loud about slavery—we feel that humanity groans under an oppressive yoke, that the heel of despotism rests heavily upon the necks of a portion of the human family—we can not call the subject to mind without feeling to mourn the fate of the unhappy children of bondage, but while we expatiate and plead upon this subject, are we sure that we are freemen ourselves?

Do we not feel that there is an enemy in our own land, a monster that walks abroad at noon day, and slumbers not in the silent watches of the night, a foe that reigns in our own breasts? Do we not feel this tyrant, sin, fastening his chain upon us, drawing it tighter, and making it more sure, deceiving us with false appearances, and charming sounds, till we find ourselves his victims ere we suspect it? And where is there a slavery so oppressive, a bondage so ignoble, a tyranny so debasing as that which cramps and fetters the mind? Where is the despot whose ruthless hand bears so heavy and binds so strong as that which takes a man from our enlightened community, strips him of all that endeared him to humanity and sends him out in the world to pass a miserable existence, as gloomy and dark as the shades of Erebus? Where is the power whose very presence poisons and vitiates, like that which reaches its sceptre over the broad earth, and makes humanity feel its deep wounds, and then rejoices in the desolation it causes? Search the world over, and we find no evil like sin. We "look at the savage warrior, whose courage is ferocity; at the duellist, whose honor is ignominy and whose intrepidity is madness; at the military chieftain, whose boasted thirst for glory and contempt of death, push him on to the cannon's mouth, while 'he trembles at his own shadow, perhaps, in a church yard;'" at the profligate, whose liberty is licentiousness, and freedom, strife and debauchery; at the world; and ask to be shown a bondage more inveterate than that of sin? We find none. We follow these slaves through life, and we see their hard master ever grinding them in the dust—we follow them to the couch and chamber of death, and the picture is too dark to behold—we see them "when the voice of conscience is not drowned by the whirl of business, nor the clamor of mirth; when all is solitude in the chamber of dissolution, when the soul is left alone to its reflections, in the last struggles of mortality, on the very brink of the grave;" and we often hear them cry for the Gospel they have spurned from them—for that law of liberty which frees from the bondage of this foe of man and destroyer of happiness.

And, my friends, I can not leave this subject without asking your aid in the work of universal emancipation. Do we consider the extent of our obligations? Do we feel that our immortal minds are liable to be taken captive, and that too, without much resistance on our part? Do we realize that our fellow men—travellers with us to eternity—are writhing in pain and despair from the gnawing worm within their breasts, and the fires of passion? Do we know and see the perfect law of liberty? And do we understand what Gospel liberty is? Do we believe that this is the balm, the cure for the plagues of sin? If we understand and know all these things, our way is plain, and we conclude our discourse as we began—"But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed."

THIS RULE WORKS TWO WAYS.

The Editor of the Baptist Register copies from the N. Y. Evangelist an article concerning what he calls the "waning condition" of Universalism. The Editor of the Register concludes that because Br. Price, the publisher of the Christian Messenger, has not made his fortune by publishing his paper, Universalism must certainly be

"waning." Now, this is what some would call rather "small potatoes." If Universalism is in a waning condition because the publisher of the Messenger, or any other Universalist paper, has not made money, or has suffered a loss by publishing the same, then Partialism by this time must have run down, to use a homely phrase, to the "little end of nothing"—for it is a fact that within a few years past no less than one Methodist and six Presbyterian periodicals have gone down in this state, west of the city of New York, at a loss to the publishers of some eighteen or twenty thousand dollars; and that, too, at a time when business generally was in a high state of prosperity. About the time several of these papers failed, the Editor of the Baptist Register published a list of the Partialist papers that had "given up the ghost" in different parts of the country, and dolefully expressed his fears that the Register would eventually share the same fate. The fact is, the Register itself was, until within a few years, a "sinking concern," and was only kept from dying outright by money loaned, on the strength of the signatures of several responsible and respectable individuals, from one of the banks in this city. And now because Br. Price like a thousand other publishers of periodicals, has been unfortunate in business, and become embarrassed in his pecuniary circumstances, the Editor of the Register is in ecstasies, and can hardly contain himself for joy, and tauntingly and jeeringly talks of Br. Price's being in a starving condition, and not able to feed his family! And this is Partialist religion. God forbid that it should ever get possession of my heart. O how mean, how despicably mean, and wicked must that man be who will thus exult and rejoice at the misfortunes of a fellow creature, because he does not believe as he does, particularly so when that fellow creature has a family dependant upon his exertions for their daily support! Mean, mean indeed! And such an individual is A. M. Beebe, the pious Editor of the Baptist Register! Behold the man! Utica, Nov. 23, 1840. W. R.

PROSPECTS OF UNIVERSALISM IN OHIO.

Having travelled somewhat extensively over this State during the last two years, we feel able to give a tolerably correct statement of the condition of our cause within its borders. That Universalism has had very strong obstacles to contend against, our friends all well know. In addition to the constant opposition of our opposers, it has found enemies at home. A few years ago, several persons who occasionally preached the sentiment, joined the Disciples, so called, with a view no doubt, to unite our denomination with that. They professed no change of doctrinal opinions, as we can learn; but their object seemed to be to bring all our friends to the support of what is commonly called Campbellism. But they failed altogether; and they themselves have since shrunk into comparative insignificance, in the estimation of the Christian public. Those days were dark times for our brethren; but they generally stood firm. A few souls which were neither to be bought, sold, or intimidated, were "set for the defence of the Gospel," and the gloomy prospect only tended to rouse them to renewed energy and increased action.

Through their exertions, aided by the blessing of Heaven, Universalism has been steadily progressing from that time to the present moment. Societies have been formed in almost every section of the State; and there are very few towns of any note, in which the gospel of the grace of God has not been preached. Many Societies have regular preaching—some all the time, some half, and some every fourth Sabbath. Over forty Universalist preachers are now actively engaged in the glorious work of redeeming souls from the bondage of sin and error; and aided by the prompt co-operation of multitudes of living believers, they are succeeding generally beyond the most sanguine expectations of our friends who resided here five years ago. It is now the determined purpose of our brethren to "earnestly contend for the faith," till there is no opposition to contend against. There is an untiring zeal in this country—a zeal that knows no abatement; and under these circumstances, the cause must progress. It will do so; and the time is not far distant when a majority of the population will rejoice in free grace. The prospects are now fair and bright—were never better, and the fact is alarming our opposers and arousing them up to a severe struggle. Mark our prediction. Universalism is destined to take the State of Ohio! Not more surely will the same cause produce the same effect under the same circumstances, than will this be the final result.

But brethren, we must none of us expect this without constant activity. Numerous and formidable obstacles are yet in our way; we have long to contend against darkness, pride of opinion, bigotry, self-righteousness, and error, in all its forms. Stand fast, therefore, and do not falter for a moment. We are in the most important work that ever engaged the energies of immortal minds; and we are called upon by every consideration of duty, to be up and doing with all our might. Spare not, brethren—cry aloud! lift up your voices like a trumpet, and Zion will soon put on her most beautiful garments.—Star in the West.

"A REAL UNIVERSALIST."

BR. COBB—The following conversation between myself and a member of one of the Orthodox churches in Springfield, Mass., took place some four years ago, in the presence of several other individuals. This gentleman whom I shall call Mr. N. occupied a high station in the church to which he belonged. At the time referred to, we were driving together, and he took occasion to assault Universalism right valiantly. With some trepidation I took up the defence. His chief objections were, that it was pernicious in tendency and false in fact. He mocked the idea, that the wicked are justly punished in this world, and quoted several noted passages of Scripture in proof of endless misery. Finally, from some cause growing impatient, he flew off in a tangent and was pursued as follows.

Mr. N. "Well, well, you may talk, and quote Scripture. I know just how it is. I was a Universalist once myself."

S. "Ah! You a Universalist. Why; I never knew it. This is strange."

N. "Well, I was a real, right down, flaming Universalist."

S. "Then we can bring some part of our conversation to a test. Was you as wicked as you say all Universalists must be?"

N. "Yes! yes! There were few things evil which I hesitated to do. If some of the houses in Springfield could speak, they would tell strange stories."

Here he enumerated a number of sins which he habitually indulged in; but I think best not to specify them.

A friend. "Rather a hard case, Mr. S."

S. "Very true. Now Mr. N. will you tell me if you received no punishment while indulging in these sinful practices?"

N. "Not the least."

S. "Was you truly happy?"

N. "As happy as ever man could be. Every thing prospered in my hand. Nothing troubled me." (Here he gave a history of his life, which was in verity an uncommonly successful one.)

S. "Now I wish to know why you renounced Universalism, when you were so prosperous and happy in it?"

This question was asked because I had been so baffled by the foregoing answers, that I hardly knew what to do. It was just such a case as I never met with before, and I wished for more light.

N. "I will tell you. At that time I was selected to direct all the funeral services in that vi-city. But it was so painful for me to see a fellow mortal conveyed to his long home, that I was unable to witness it, and owing to these unpleasant feelings, I abandoned attending funerals. But when I renounced Universalism and got religion, all this wretchedness left me, and I could attend funerals with perfect composure of mind."

S. "Ah, and was that a portion of your Universalist happiness? But one question more. What was the cause of this wretchedness? Was it that the dead were laid in the ground? They are put in the ground now as much as they were before your conversion."

N. "Ah! yes, but that want it. It was the hereafter that troubled me."

S. "The hereafter!! What! And did it make you unhappy to think of a hereafter of perfect bliss for all? And does it now give you peace to think when you see a fellow mortal laid in the grave, that his spirit is to be miserable forever?"

N. "Ah! I didn't believe! I never believed it!! And you don't believe it!!"

S. "I doubt not you now speak the truth as to as to your own belief. As to mine, I must be allowed to know better than you. But I hope, sir, that you will never again evince your love of truth, by claiming to have been 'a real, right down, flaming Universalist,' when you never believed the doctrine. If you do, I may be led to think that some other doctrines beside Universalism are pernicious in tendency." J. G. S.

Reading, Mass.

THE LUTHERAN HERALD.

A friend has sent us a number of the paper of this name, printed at Fort Plain, with an article marked relating to the case of Rev. John Gregory, of Quincy, Mass., formerly of Salisbury, in this State. Our Lutheran brethren seem to be in a bad humor on account of the spread of Universalism in their vicinity, and manifest it in a fault-finding, querulous and angry spirit. We had concluded to let them pass without notice, hoping that, some time or other, they might learn to use language a little more courteous, dignified and sober than they now delight to deal in; and to give facts as they are, without suppression and perversion. But having been informed that the Baptist Register of this city, whose conductors or friends so generously connived at the escape of their "dear Brother Fishpoole" from justice, and allowed him to preach in one of their churches after they had found him guilty of sodomy (!!!)—understanding that they had alluded to the case of Mr. Gregory, and endeavored to make capital out of it, I have concluded to notice the article for the benefit of those friends who may not know the circumstances of the case.

The report of the Massachusetts Convention on the case of Br. Gregory, was published in the Magazine and Advocate, current volume, No. 27. We afterwards published the report of the mutual council, exonerating him from moral or legal censure, in current volume. To them we refer our readers for information. The Editors of the Lutheran Herald, do not give all the facts of the case, and thus leave it to be inferred that Br. Gregory is legally and morally guilty of bigamy, and could justly be sent to the State's prison. Indeed they ask, of the gentlemen of that council, "if the reverend gentleman, whom they have white-washed, has not been proved by the very terms of their white-washing, to be liable to an indictment for bigamy, and whether a man who is thus liable, at any time to have a call to other service, is a proper person to be employed in the ministry? In other words, does the Universalist ministry, and the state's prison, at the same time, claim the services of the same man?"

In reply, I answer, that the Judges of the Court refusing the divorce, decided that by the laws of Vermont he was entitled to one! And every lawyer consulted on the occasion, (and several of the ablest lawyers in that section were consulted,) decided that he could marry and no prosecution could be sustained against him for so doing. The father of the young lady, a member of the Vermont legislature, and the Magistrate officiating, all decided that the second marriage would be legal, and could not involve the charge of bigamy. Who knows best, then, these wise Lutheran Editors, or the judges, lawyers and magistrates consulted? True, as they say, Mr. Gregory may be liable to an indictment for bigamy—so may they be liable to an indictment for slander and libel; but the question is, whether the indictment would be made by a grand jury, and if made, whether it would be sustained by a criminal court.

In conclusion, we regret the occurrence of the whole affair from beginning to end; but deem it the duty of every one to consider a man innocent until he is proved guilty, and not to drag before the public, private cases, and torture facts to make a man appear guilty, whether he is so or not.

The Editors speak of "like cases of Universalist ministers." Will they name any? I am ignorant of them, if such exist. Did they know of any, when they penned that insinuation? If not, are they not guilty of a base intention to deceive their readers, to slander a sister denomination falsely, and of a wilful lie in the sight of God? Corrupt and wicked as they may pretend to believe Universalists, we scorn from our souls, such mean, deceptive arts—such wilful falsehood to bolster up our own party or put down another. We shelter no criminals in our ranks—we claim none whom the penitentiary claims—and neither our ministers or laymen are apt to be found confined in State's prisons, as repeated examinations have shown. But our opposers can not, in truth, clear themselves of the very charges they prefer against us. Strale, Avery, Fishpoole, and a host of other Partialist preachers rise up in evidence against them. Our neighbors of the Lutheran Herald and Baptist Register should remember the saying "Those who live in glass houses," etc. A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—C. C. M. is welcome. The articles were laid by for correction, and having not much room for poetry, were not attended to as they should have been in justice to their merits, nor as early as they would have been had we been in greater want of poetic articles. For a young and inexperienced writer they are very good.

We are still in great want of communications. We hope those who have begun to supply us, will not grow "weary in well doing;" and that those who have not begun, will remember that "it were well done to be done quickly." Short articles are preferred—we always disliked a long purse with but a half penny away down at the bottom of it! A. B. G.

THE LADY'S BOOK.

Mr. Godey, the enterprising Publisher of this valuable and fashionable Magazine, does not flag the least in his exertions to render it the foremost work of the kind in the country. The Editorial services of Mrs. Hale, Mrs. Sigourney and Miss Leslie, are backed by a host of brilliant lady and gentlemen contributors—and the printer, paper maker and engraver seem to do their very best to vie with the intellectual part of the work.

Now is a good time to subscribe for the work, as it begins a new half year (and a new volume) in January; and Mr. Godey promises some new attractions for the next volume. To those who wish such a work, we can recommend the Lady's Book as well deserving of their perusal, and a great bargain, to speak with regard to pecuniary profit. A. B. G.

LETTER FROM REV. T. C. EATON,

To the Universalists in Chautauque County, N. Y.

DEAR BRETHREN—Ill health has prevented an earlier communication from me, which undoubtedly, you have been looking for, for some time past. I have had two quinsy sores gather and break in my throat this Fall—one before I left Chautauque co., (as some of you know,) the other, since my arrival here. The last one left me in a low state of health for some time after I was able, in a feeble manner, to perform the duties of my profession. I have some times been fearful that these frequent attacks would so impair my health and voice, as to oblige me to give up entirely the arduous but delightful employment of the ministry. But I trust and hope not.

Our journey was somewhat fatiguing, but the good weather and good roads that attended our progress; and I may add, the good friends, in whose hospitality and kindness we were allowed to share, and to whom we feel very grateful, rendered it truly a pleasant one. And "after many days," we arrived safe at our destined home. And now, by the blessing of a kind Providence, I am allowed once more to enjoy the society of affectionate brothers and sisters, and an aged mother; all believers in universal salvation from sin and death, which is a source of great happiness to us all. Our beloved father, who taught us to trace the exceeding great and precious promises of God in the volume of inspiration, has gone to the "spirit land," to participate in the full fruition of those immortal joys which is the object of the Christian's hope in life. I remember with grateful emotions the first religious impressions, after I arrived to years of discretion, stamped on my soul by the voice of paternal love and wisdom. They excited my devotional feelings, led me to study the word of God, and probably laid the foundation of those solemn convictions, that it was my duty to preach the kingdom of God to the children of men. O, that all parents who believe in the doctrine of God's efficient grace and love, would early impress the minds of their children with it, by virtuous example as well as by precept; that their days may be marked by innocence and peace. And in after years, if not in the morning of life, as they turn in retrospect their thoughts, the warm current of filial affection will flow in the heart, and they will rise up and call those parents blessed. The relationship existing between parents and children, and the relative duties enjoined upon them, may be fitly employed to represent the care and anxiety, the kind regard and paternal affection, that exists between a faithful pastor and the people under his charge. True, in a pecuniary point, the case is reversed often times. And while they look up to him for instruction and example, he is dependent upon them for temporal means of support. It is with pleasure that I call to mind our happy union, and it gives me great satisfaction to know that no root of bitterness sprung up to destroy our mutual confidence and peace. If any thing was done, through my instrumentality, under the blessing of Heaven, with your aid, to advance the cause of truth, let the praise be to God, who directs our steps and crowns our humble labors with peace of mind, if not with success. Long, dear brethren, did I experience your Christian kindness and friendship. I was with you in seasons of prosperity, and when storms of adversity beat heavily upon you; your houses constituted a home for me; when I was in want your charity relieved my necessities.

And now that we are separated, may "brotherly love continue." And may the same pure friendship exist between you and your present pastor, that bound us together, which alone can secure your mutual happiness and advance the cause of truth. It will ever give me great pleasure to learn of your devotedness to the cause of our dear Redeemer. And I hope the Society to whom I forwarded a small library of Universalist books, will be active and engaged, not only in reading them themselves, but in circulating them among the "brethren of like precious faith," and among those who are of the "opposite part."

Brethren your duties are plain and practicable. May no discouraging events serve to check your zeal guided by knowledge and wisdom. A crown of living enjoyment will be your reward. I have to render you my gratitude for the numerous expressions of your brotherly love and deeds of charity, and especially in seasons of pecuniary embarrassment.

To my ministering brethren, whose society and friendship I have enjoyed, and with whom I have taken sweet counsel and labored in love, I tender my warmest thanks for the many tokens of fraternal esteem; and although we are now far from each other, allow me to express a hope that the spirit of a yet deeper zeal will mark our labors in the cause of our Saviour.

In conclusion, I have only room to say that I am very pleasantly situated in Hancock, surrounded with numerous relations, friends, and many warm believers in Universalism, with plenty of employment. By the blessing of a kind Providence we are enjoying good health.

Affectionately, your friend and Brother in Christ, T. C. EATON.

FASHION.

Fashion, the fickle goddess, whose sceptre sways over every portion of the civilized world—whose variable but imperious mandates, are obeyed with the most scrupulous exactness; who claims her votaries from every grade and color of mankind; from the titled aristocrat, to the poor, degraded and penniless sons and daughters of humanity. All seem to hug the fantastic chain which binds them to folly, and many, without a struggle to free themselves from her despotic dominion, surrender themselves slaves to the daggling tyrant; and swept along by the eddying current of fashion, irretrievably ruin their fortunes, and usefulness in society, by extravagance; and terminate their career in the lowest depths of vice and degradation. There are thousands who profess to love plainness and simplicity, whose sole study through life, is the uncertain code of fashion; who are as zealous in their devotion to the goddess, as the fanatical Hindoo to the faith for which he sacrifices himself under the wheels of the car of Juggernaut. Why?

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. J. GUILD.

NUMBER XLIII.

1 CORINTHIANS vi: 2, 3. We will now give, Macknight's exposition of verse 2. "Do you not know that the saints shall judge the world?"

"Here St. Paul told the Corinthians that agreeably to Christ's promise to the disciples, Matt. xix: 28, they were at that time actually judging or ruling the world by the laws of the Gospel, which they preached to the world. Hence Christ told his apostles, John xii: 31, "Now is the judgment of this world."

But Bengelius says the apostle had in his eye the state of the world under Constantine, when the Christians got possession of the civil power. This interpretation is mentioned by Whitby likewise. Nevertheless the subsequent clause, "If the world is judged by you," shows, I think, that the apostle spake of the time then present.

"Others, because the judgment of angels is spoken of in the next verse, interpret this of the last judgment—and by the saints judging the world they understand, the affording matter for condemning the wicked.

"But" (says the Dr.) "this sense has no relation to the apostle's argument, and to found a doctrine of this magnitude merely on two obscure passages of Scripture, which can easily admit of a different and better interpretation seems not a little rash."

With regard to the phrase judging angels, it is well known that the term angels is frequently applied to the messengers or preachers of the Gospel, and in this case we are to understand spiritual instructors, apostles, evangelists, or teachers. And here we see the apostle's argument. If they were thought worthy and competent to judge their teachers in things pertaining to spiritual things, approving or condemning them, how much more should they judge in things pertaining to this life, and not go to law before the civil magistrate with their brethren. See verses 3, 4.

Perhaps there may be an allusion here to the pre-eminence that Christ is said to possess over angels, principalities and powers, these all being made subject to him by God, who hath made him head over all things to the church.

1 Cor. vi: 18. "Every sin which a man doeth is without the body."

The meaning of the apostle here, evidently is, that every other sin except the one spoken of in this verse is committed without affecting the body, but he who committeth this sin, sinneth against his own body—he wastes its strength and introduceth into it deadly disease.

1 Cor. vi: 50. "For ye are bought with a price."

This language must be allowed to be figurative. In one sense we may be said to be bought with the blood of Jesus Christ: and that is, we are saved from sin and purified and made white, by the power and influence of that Gospel, and that truth which is confirmed by his death and sealed with his blood. But if the language of our text is to be understood literally, and if God did actually pay a price for mankind, the question arises from whom did he purchase them, and to whom did he pay the purchase money or price? To the devil, say some! But was God driven to the necessity of purchasing his own offspring from a being of his own creation? O the folly of human creeds!

It is curious to mark the progress of the common doctrine of atonement and see the different forms under which it has been held. When the doctrine was first started, it was imagined that mankind had all fallen into the hands of the devil, and that on condition of God's surrendering his Son Jesus Christ into his hands he consented to give them up; that is, God redeemed us from the devil, by abandoning to him the life of his Son. Strange as this idea now appears it prevailed in the Christian church for many centuries. And it was not till long after this that any person imagined that Christ was the purchaser, instead of God. In time, however, this change in the doctrine of atonement took place, and instead of God's purchasing mankind of the devil, it was supposed that Christ purchased them of God, by giving his life a ransom for us in a literal sense, giving his life to the justice of God, in order to redeem us from that death to which God had doomed all mankind.

This was a total change in the system of atonement—a satisfaction for sin—and was not completed till after the reformation, when Luther, in order to combat, with more advantage, the Popish doctrine of human merit, advanced the merits of Christ in opposition to it. Then, and not till then, it was conceived that God could not forgive sin till an adequate satisfaction had been made to his justice, and as sin was supposed to be infinite, it was supposed necessary that the sacrifice must be infinite and no less than God himself; so that as the doctrine now appears, God bought mankind and paid the price to himself.

But so far from the Scriptures teaching this doctrine, God is uniformly represented in them as forgiving sin freely on the repentance and reformation of the sinner, and we are required to forgive as we hope to be forgiven; we are not to demand or require satisfaction to our justice; but freely forgive our enemies that we may be like our Father in heaven.

1 Cor. x: 2. "And were all baptized unto Moses."

As the phrase "baptized unto Moses" does not imply that Moses was a god, so being baptized unto Christ or in the name of Christ, does not imply that he is God.

1 Cor. xv: 17. "And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins"—That is, subject to spiritual death which is the punishment of sin, and to natural death without the hope of a resurrection.

1 Cor. xv: 29. "Why are they then baptized for the dead?"

Why are they baptized unto the Christian church, and openly make profession of religion, and thereby expose themselves to persecution and death? If there be no resurrection, all these things are useless. Yea, more, those who have been slain, or have fallen asleep in or for Christ have perished, and will know no more forever. See verses 17, 32.

CHRIST, OUR SINLESS SAVIOUR.

BY REV. D. ACKLEY.

"In him is no sin."—BIBLE.

Universalists are "a sect every where spoken against." At one time our characters are assailed; at another, our doctrine; and again, the author and finisher of our most precious and holy faith. Our enemies have told the world that we consider Jesus Christ but a merc man. Nothing is more unkind and false. This is not with us a denominational opinion; and, indeed, so far as my knowledge extends, there is not an individual in our ranks who believes this sentiment. The simple fact that Jesus Christ, was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin, is proof conclusive that he is more than man; for we have all gone out of the way; there is none that doeth good, no, not one.

But the skeptic will ask, who has testified that "in him is no sin"? To this question I reply, 1. His friends have borne testimony to this fact. Indeed they have gloried in the avowal, that he did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth—that when he was reviled, he reviled not again, and when he suffered, he threatened not; but returned blessing for cursing, and overcame evil with good.

2. His enemies have confessed his sinlessness. The proud and vain-glorious Jews, after witnessing the signs, wonders and miracles which he performed, were compelled on one occasion to confess: "He hath done all things well; he maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak." At another time the Jewish rabbins, members of the Sanhedrim, said of Christ—"we know that thou art a teacher sent from God; for no man can do those miracles that thou doest except God be with him." Pilate, the Roman Governor, after a judicial examination, was constrained to acknowledge—"I find no fault in this man; I am pure from the blood of that just man."—When Judas had been with Christ for three years both in public and private, in peace and in adversity with friends and with foes, we hear him saying, "I have betrayed innocent blood." If we come down to later times and examine the works of Infidel writers, we shall hear Rousseau, the learned and popular philosopher of France, though an enemy to the cross of Christ, in his cool and deliberate moments, saying, "I confess that the majesty of the Scriptures strikes me with admiration, and the purity of the Gospel, has its influence on my heart. When Plato described his imaginary good man, with all the shame of guilt, yet meriting the highest rewards of virtue, he gave a description of the character of Jesus Christ. If the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus Christ were those of a God."

Seeing then, beloved readers, that we have such an High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. For we have not an High Priest which can not be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us, therefore, come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

UNIVERSALISM IN THE VICINITY OF BOSTON.

Within a circle of ten miles of Boston are included the following towns: Chelsea, Lynn, Malden, Saugus, So. Reading, Stoneham, Charlestown, Woburn, West Cambridge, Lexington, Medford, Cambridge, Waltham, Watertown, Newton, Brighton, Brookline, Roxbury, Milton, Dorchester, and Quincy.

Boston contains six Universalist Societies, under the charge of six pastors, viz. Revs. S. Streeter, H. Ballou, B. Whittemore, O. A. Skinner, S. P. Skinner, (Winchester Hall,) and J. D. Peirce, (East Boston.) These Societies probably expend not far from $8000 annually for the support of the gospel. Two of them are yet in the infant state.

In Chelsea there are several believers, in Universalism but no Society. In Lynn there are two flourishing Societies under the charge of Revs. L. Willis and H. Jewell. Both have meeting-houses, in fine locations. In Malden there is an excellent Society, possessed of the best meeting-house in the town, and also a large dwelling house and farm. Saugus has a body of believers, a good meeting-house, a small parsonage, and enjoys the ministry of Rev. B. F. Newhall, who was until recently a Methodist preacher. In South Reading there is a fine Society, new and beautiful house, and settled pastor, Rev. Henry Lyon. (In Reading there are two Societies and two pastors, Rev. Messrs. Griswold and Strickland, but this lies just out of the circle of ten miles from Boston.) In Stoneham the Universalists have just dedicated a new house, at an expense of about $4000. It is their intention we have no doubt, to obtain a settled pastor as soon as possible. In Charlestown the Society is large. They have invited Rev. E. H. Chapin, of Richmond, Va., to become their pastor, who is expected soon to remove to the scene of his future labors. Their house is now undergoing very extensive repairs, at an expense of about $6000. Rev. W. Balfour resides in this town. In Woburn there is a beautiful house, and a flourishing Society, under the care of Rev. J. C. Waldo. West Cambridge, originally a part of Cambridge, but now a distinct town. The cause has long been in a dull state here. But of late the gospel leaven has been powerfully at work in the hearts of the people. They have raised between 3 and $4000; and are engaged in the erection of a meeting-house, in the main village. There is now a fair prospect of an established ministry of our faith, in that place. Lexington has a young, but flourishing Society, which dedicated a fine house a few months since. Br. J. M. Usher is the pastor. In Medford there is a good Society, under the charge of Rev. H. Ballou, 2d, which has a fine meeting-house; and the Society is enjoying a degree of prosperity beyond what it has ever known before. Cambridge has two Universalist Societies—one at East Cambridge under the charge of Rev. Elbridge G. Brooks, and one at Cambridgeport, at present destitute of a settled pastor. The Society at East Cambridge holds its meetings at Berean Chapel, which was built for their use, and which is a very convenient place of public worship. The meeting-house at Cambridgeport is one of the most convenient we have ever seen. It has on the lower floor 1st, a committee room, 2d, a large hall, 30 by 55 feet, to which is attached, 3d, the sexton's private room; 4th, the vestry, 22 by 55 feet, filled with pews, and a mahogany pulpit; and to the vestry is attached, 5th, a small room for the library. The principal room is reached by two ample flights of stairs, of easy ascent, and contains 86 pews. This room will accommodate about 500 worshippers. Waltham has a very fine house of worship. The Society is in a flourishing state; and has invited Rev. E. A. Eaton to become its pastor. Rev. S. Cobb resides here, and publishes the "Christian Freeman," a weekly journal. Watertown has a good house of worship, and a growing Society, under the charge of Rev. E. Partridge. This Society has seen much adversity; but is at present succeeding well, under the mild and faithful ministrations of Br. P.

Newton, Brighton and Brookline. Neither of these towns has an established ministry of the Universalist faith. In Newton Upper Falls there is a body of believers, who have had preaching, but the suspension of business there has hindered their progress. From the eastern part of this town the Universalists attend the Watertown meeting. In Brighton there are a few believers, scattered and weak, and the same is true of Brookline.

Roxbury has a large Society, and an elegant house of worship. Since Br. Moore's removal to Philadelphia the Society has been destitute of a pastor. Rev. Joseph Grammer, who has had the charge pro tempore, has labored with much faithfulness, and to the advantage of the flock. Of Milton and Dorchester nothing favorable can be said. There are believers in both places, but no organization. In Quincy there is a large Society, under the charge of Rev. J. Gregory, possessed of a fine meeting-house.

If we have made a correct computation, there are in Boston, and in the towns within ten miles, 21 houses of public worship, 21 congregations which hold meetings every Sabbath, and 27 resident clergymen. Seven of these clergymen are not settled pastors, but labor in different places.

AN EARNEST APPEAL.

We most cordially entreat our friends to aid us in circulating our Proposals for the next volume, and obtaining good new subscribers. We purchased the establishment from Mr. Skinner, (i. e., G. and H. did, and we have assumed their bargain,) at a time when business was good—when people subscribed freely and paid promptly, and when the publication business was profitable. We engaged to pay the then value of the establishment. In one year afterward the currency began to be deranged, paying subscribers began to fall off, and continuing subscribers found it difficult to pay as easily and promptly as before. The debt remained the same, the expenses of publishing the same, the subscription price the same—but the receipts decreased, and many of the expenses of living increased. We had a heavy interest to pay, and the discount on what money we received often consumed all our profits. In addition to all this, we bought the Herald list, to save the cause from injury by its suspension, and thus made a sacrifice of several hundred dollars—for it was to us a losing bargain. And in addition to discontinuances, we were at last obliged to adopt our present rule, at the end of each year to strike off all whom we did not know to be responsible, and who were owing us for more than one year. This still further lessened our list of subscribers, and our means of support.

Thus have we toiled on, under accumulated burdens, and losses, and difficulties, for three years—often ready to faint and sink utterly under them, but encouraged by forbearing creditors and kind friends, to persevere, and labor on. The good of the cause, we were told, would suffer if we failed—our past labors must all be lost to us in the sacrifices a failure would cause—and our families demanded our utmost exertions for their support. We have persevered, however faintly—we have oiled on, however sick at heart with hopes deferred, and weary with arduous labors unrewarded. We have made sacrifices for the good of the cause, which thousands of dollars would not induce me to go through again. And now the long distant goal just in sight—with just strength enough to move slowly on—I ask, shall our perseverance, shall our toils, shall our sacrifices and sufferings be in vain? Friends and brethren—Universalists—answer us, we beseech you, in the negative!

Give us your effectual and immediate aid in increasing our now reduced list of subscribers, that the Magazine and Advocate may be made more extensively useful in the cause of God and humanity. Give us, we beseech you, the encouragements you can so well afford, of your own subscriptions—your own prompt payments—and your earnest efforts and solicitations to induce all whom you can persuade (and who are able to comply,) to do likewise. Let every one add his mite, and we shall yet retrieve our past failures to pay our debts—our past promises to make the paper all it should be—our past resolutions to advance the Good Cause within the limits of our circulation. Say, one and all, will you not give us encouragement—will you not send us on our way rejoicing? A. B. GROSH.

"DECAY OF UNIVERSALISM."

Imitating the policy of political electioneers, who frequently attempt to enlist votes by the mere consideration of the popularity of their cause, the opposers of Universalism have lately published certain statements with the above caption, to show that Universalism is losing in the number of its preachers and societies—as if divine truth was to be decided by the votes of a majority—or as if the changes of men affected the veracity of God's word, promise and oath? Even if the statements thus published contained facts, (and we shall show that they are full of falsehoods,) we might reply in the words of the prophet of God, (1 Kings xviii: 22,) "I, even I only, remain a prophet of the Lord; but Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men"—and were the difference in favor of preachers of endless wrath, as one to four hundred and fifty, "because the children of Israel had forsaken God's covenant and thrown down his altars," still we should confidently rely on the small and faithful band remaining, of "seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him," knowing that God would yet give them the victory.

But we have said that these statements of the "Decay of Universalism" are mainly false—we can prove them so. We have not the original statements of the Puritan at hand—but it gives a list of towns in Massachusetts, where some weak societies were formed, and remain weak, or have become merged in larger societies, or ceased to exist—and of some towns where no societies ever were; and by parading these, attempts to prove that the cause has declined within the last ten years—when the truth is, that in Massachusetts within only five years past, we have gained 41 societies, 44 meeting-houses, and 42 preachers, making an average gain of more than ten per cent. per annum! In the account of the "Decay of Universalism" in Vermont, three societies are named, of which two are falsely stated. In his list of renouncing preachers of Universalism, he numbers twenty-two, but gives the names of only twenty. Hear them! Paul Dean and — Wright, Boston; Adia Ballou, Mendon; Barton Ballou, Waltham; Stephen Cutler, Cumberland, R. I.; Charles Hudson, Westminster; Seth Chandler, Oxford; Geo. Bradburne, Nantucket; A. St. Clair; Wm. Morse, Marlboro'. Every one of these, so far as we can learn now believe, as they ever did, the final salvation of all men. They have left the general Universalist Convention it is true, and formed an Association of their own, called Restorationist, but they have not changed their views on the subject of universal salvation. Some may even have left the ministry; but they have not renounced the faith of the restitution of all things. The others are—John Samuel Thompson, Charlestown; (he renounced some time in 1828, more than ten years ago;) E. Palmer, New-York; (he left the denomination, but without renouncing;) L. C. Todd; (he says he was de-ranked during the brief time he was among the Methodists, and has ever since held firmly his former faith. Br. Todd now lives in Ohio—is an avowed believer in Universalism;) E. Trull, — Chapin, G. Dean, Taylor, of Easton; (our brethren ask "who are they?" and we answer—"non est inventus,"—they can not be found, save in Parson Cooke's imagination;) E. N. Harris, Lynn; (he has not renounced, but only left us in doubt,) W. Whitaker, New-York! (he left because he could not stay, and did not believe in endless misery after he had renounced;) M. H. Smith, of Salem; (he renounced back again, and then renounced the third time, and probably by this time pleads derangement again.) Such is the famous list of 20 (miscalled 22) renouncers—no-renouncers—of whom only three or four have really renounced; while, in the same period of time, from fifty to one hundred Partialist preachers in good standing have renounced that faith and embraced Universalism. The Puritan had better try some other test of truth; at this one, he will be proved in error ten to one!

In the statement respecting Connecticut, it gives New-Haven, where we yet have a society, but no preaching; Newton, Cheshire, Southington, Minden, and Barkhamstead, in all of which places the societies still exist and have stated preaching; Stafford, which has a settled pastor; Norwalk, about fifteen years ago, they had regular preaching, but not since; Norwich, has been without preaching for a few months, but has now a settled pastor; and in some other ten or twelve places named, it is doubted whether societies ever existed. So much for the facts.

The unfairness of our opposers in these statements is not yet fully disclosed. The Editor of the Puritan, when he published these false and distorted statements, asked Universalists to point out his mistakes if he had made any. Rev. H. Jewell, of Lynn, where the Puritan is published; sent in a respectful communication, making the requested corrections, and Mr. Cooke returned the article without publishing it, or any part of it! Such is their honesty, candor and love of truth! Their papers very generally copy these false statements, and our papers very generally have corrected them; but none of them copy the corrections. May it not be said of such lying Editors—such partizan presses—that they have made lies their refuge and under falsehood hid themselves?

We would not deny, or attempt to conceal the fact that some of our societies have died away—having been got up in an excitement, and wasted their strength in fruitless efforts, or their members having removed elsewhere, or from other natural causes—not that a very few of our preachers have renounced the doctrine, from various motives. But we do say, also, that in the United States many more new societies have been formed than have died away—many more old societies have grown stronger than have been weakened—many more Partialist preachers have embraced Universalism than there are Universalists that have renounced it—and that more new preachers have entered the field, than old ones have left it. Hence, while we may be declining in a very few places, in zeal, in numbers, or in effective efforts, we are gaining far—far more in all these in other places. For proof we refer to the Universalist Register for 1841, where the facts are carefully and candidly stated; and from which it appears that our gain during the past five years has been about 200 societies, 230 meeting-houses, and 204 preachers, (of whom, probably, not less than forty or fifty were accessions from the ministry of Partialist denominations,) making an average gain of about 13 per cent. per annum! God grant that Universalism may always decay and decline in this manner and no less rapidly!

"UNIVERSALISM ANTI-CHRISTIAN."

A friend has sent us a copy of the New-York Evangelist, of October 31st, in which is the ninth number of a series of articles under the above caption, signed "Enoch." The writer makes quite a parade of extracts from Universalist books and periodicals, in stating our views, but he nevertheless contrives to keep out of sight any explanations which tend to show our full views of a subject, or those portions which obviate objections based on only a one sided view of them. As an instance, in the number before us, he charges Universalism with being a system in which is no Saviour—destitute of mercy—representing God as perfectly inexorable, etc. He says that the charge against us that we believe in a God "all mercy," is unjust. Now who does not see his policy in these charges? By "justice," and "mercy," he would have his readers understand, not what we mean by these terms, but a peculiar sectarian meaning, in which they will be arrayed against each other, and understood as perfect antipodes. We do believe that God is "a God all mercy;" but we do not believe that he is therefore "a God unjust." And we do believe that he is "a just God," an infinitely, and therefore perfectly and entirely just God; but we do also believe that he is "a just God and a Saviour." As "Enoch" has read our works, he must know that such are our views of God's mercy and justice; and therefore by denying that we believe God to be "all mercy," and by insinuating that we believe God to be inexorably stern and vindictive (or, in other words, cruel), he is guilty of intentional falsehood—of suppressing the truth, as well as misstating it.

There is another very remarkable feature in this writer's labors. He states our views and lifts up his hands, and rolls up the whites of his eyes, in apparent holy horror at their falsity—but he never quotes a passage of Holy Writ—never gives a "thus saith the Lord" to prove their incorrectness! Why is this? If our views of the certainly of punishment, and of the forgiveness of sins instead of the punishment of sin, are so very unscriptural, surely he could quote some passages of Scripture showing that the punishment of sin was not certain—that punishment of sin, instead of sin, is to be forgiven. Why don't he do it? Why appeal to popular and sectarian prejudices instead of the divine testimony? Ah, reader, it is much easier to stir up old prejudices, than to prove God's truth an error by Scripture testimony!

This writer copies some remarks of mine in reply to a correspondent, in volume viii: page 358, of this paper, on the punishment of suicide—and affects very great horror at my supposing it the result of insanity. Poor fellow!—he is afraid that the Universalists may all commit it, if these views prevail, and asks, What is to hinder the frequent commission of this act? We can tell him what will not hinder it—the doctrine of endless misery—for that doctrine has driven more to suicide than all other causes combined.

But why does not the writer prove us wrong by Scripture? We appealed to the Bible for the truth of our views—we referred to every case of suicide recorded in that Holy Record—and we declared that in no case is the act condemned, or named as criminal. Why does he not go to the case of Saul and his armor bearer, and to that of Abithophel, and adduce the sentence of endless damnation on them for that act? We declared that in all the lists of crimes enumerated and forbidden in the Bible, suicide is never named. Why does he not turn to those lists, and point out suicide therein written, and publish the command of God, or of his messengers, for men to refrain from its commission under penalty of endless sin and woe? The reason is plain—HE CAN NOT! As to the "bug-bears" he would make out of my remarks, by appeals to the ignorant and prejudiced, I am sorry for those whom he may frighten by them; but I say it fearlessly "to the law and to the testimony," convince me from that, that I have stated any thing wrong, and most eagerly will I do all in my power to recant what I have said, and to prevent its injuring community.

"Universalism hinders no one from death, if he wishes it," says this sapient "Enoch." No—but it hinders people from wishing for death, by, rendering this life a blessing in the certain hope of happiness hereafter—and the certain confidence in God's goodness in all he ordains for us to bear here. But the fear of endless misery as the lot of ourselves, our wives, our little ones, our brethren, or sisters, or friends, has made thousands wish to God they had never been born, until reason tottered on her throne, and suicide closed the scene. "Facts are stubborn things," and they prove these to be the opposite effects of the two systems.

In conclusion, this writer, for the sake of effect probably, has magnified very much—from a mite to a mountain—our "commanding influence" in our denomination. I know not that my views on suicide are agreed to by even a hundredth part of my brethren, but I do know that "Enoch" has not adduced a particle of proof that I have misstated what the Bible teaches on the subject. Till he does this, rolling up the whites of his eyes will as much reproach that book, as it does me, and his appeals to prejudice and ignorance will be against God and truth. It is easy to know in all such cases, which must prevail at last. And when the triumph does come, community will no longer damn to endless pain the poor suicide for having insanely destroyed his life; nor brand his memory for that which was more a misfortune than a crime; nor harrow up the souls of his family almost distracted with grief at their loss, by a yet greater fear that it is to him, and to them, to God, to Jesus and to heaven, an endless loss, and a great gain to "Enoch's" cause and to the devil! #### PRAYER.

God, in his wisdom, has made man a dependent being. In some sense or other, every condition in which man moves, finds him dependent upon a higher power. He can not cause the sun to shine nor the clouds to drop their tribute to the fields and streams. He can not call up the refreshing breeze, nor stay the raging tempest. He can not give power to the soil which he fertilizes, nor re-production to the seed which he sows. Then there is the power of slaking thirst, in the water which he quaffs at the fountain, the nutriment of food, with which his mortal and decaying frame is continually regenerated; the gentle throbbing at the heart, as it sends its warm and generous supply to the otherwise cold and lifeless frame; the muscular action, answering to the promptings of the will; and life itself—can he give these? No, for here his arm and his wisdom and his cunning are powerless!

And should it not be so? We would seldom seek advice, or ask a favor of one whose inferiority rendered him incapable of affording us aid. Place one of us in a condition where, in every sense, we should be independent of our fellow beings; where our superiority placed us above their reach, or sympathy, and with our imperfections, we could not even treat them respectfully. We might command, for we should become haughty and domineering; but we could never ask a favor, for that would be acknowledging a sense of dependence. But being mutually dependent, we cling to each other. Feeling our obligations, we pour out our hearts in gratitude. Sensible of the importance of all to us, and our interests, we consult them, and strive to imbibes their spirit so that we may know our prospect of success. We should be together often, and, if we have a proper sense of our relations to each other, we should be together always in our memory of each other's counsel, that, like a three-fold cord which is not easily broken, we might present a resistance which temptation or dishonor or treachery could never overcome.

Our dependence upon God is not without a higher object. If we are dependent upon Him for life, should we not pledge that life to his service as we would pledge our gratitude to a benefactor who had saved us from ruin? If we are dependent upon God for wisdom, should we not ask for a disposition to see it rightly and for his glory? If we live and move and have our being in Him, and see the display of his spirit of love and truth around us, ought we not to commune with that spirit, and love and admire and confide in it. We are ungrateful and unjust when we do not so. He is around us with his blessing, and the favor should be both acknowledged, and its continuation supplicated. And the more certain we are of its continuation, the more fervent should be our prayer. And for this reason—because our will and our desires should be in conformity with what we are permitted to believe is the will and purpose of God.

It would be folly for us to pray for what we know God was disinclined to grant. It would be worse. It would be mockery. We argue then, that we must conform our wills to the will of God, and it is the special will of God that we should cultivate and breathe the desire for the accomplishment of his sovereign will. "Thy will be done" was both the prayer and the instruction of the Saviour. Yet he knew that this will would be done. Why then pray for it? Because it would be done—would be answered; and because he had this desire. Why should he conceal his feelings; or not concealing, why should he hesitate to express them? If he had thought God was opposed to the coveted blessing, he would have had some reason for not praying, but faith, or knowledge that God designed to bless him, was his encouragement to pray for that blessing.

We can not, by our prayers, change God, for he is unchangeable. He is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. And his unchangeability is another reason why we should confide in him. If he was capable of being changed by our supplications, we could not constantly pray to him; because in our imperfection we might induce him to grant that which would not be for his glory. But being immutable, we can safely seek any spiritual blessing which accords with his will, or comes within the range of his instructions. The question, however, has been asked, If God is unchangeable, how can our prayers be answered? Can we, by prayer, enjoy any blessing which we could otherwise secure?

Yes; and without impeaching the immutability of God in the least. When Paul became sensible of his obligations to God, and of the error of his conduct towards Jesus of Nazareth, he prayed in a manner indicating his desire for instruction. "Lord what wilt thou have me to do?" And by this he obtained the answer which we have reason to believe he would not, had he never uttered it. "Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do." Here were certain instructions which he could not obtain without going into the city. And I think that the connection proves my position. I shall not say that Paul might not ultimately have received the simple instruction without going to the city; but it was deemed proper to appoint this as a means for obtaining that instruction, as well as some other matters of discipline preparatory to the great work before him. Why should it be thought less proper, or less consistent with the immutability of God, that prayer should be appointed as the first means of bringing him within the reach of instruction.

A similar remark may be made of the prodigal son. His prayer, or his resolution to pray, did not create the favorableness of his father, nor even make him any more kind, than he was before; for his father was more favorable than he asked, or dared to hope for. Yet that prayer was the means of bringing him within the proper sphere of his father's blessing. The benevolence of his father justifies us in concluding that after sufficient punishment, he would have been sought and led home. But in this case the suffering which was necessary to teach him the folly of sin, was also sufficient to induce him to return home voluntarily. He did not need a more special influence, for he had not forgotten that even the hired servants of his father had bread enough and to spare—this was a sufficient influence, joined with the sober chastenings which he endured in his waywardness. Now, it will be admitted by all, that the immediate blessings of his father's house, and the attending deliverance from misery and want, would not have been enjoyed by him, had he not seen the nature of his condition, and resolved to go to his father and express his feelings; all of which was due to that parent, even though he had been well acquainted with his situation and wants. He resolved to go to his father, acknowledge his faults and pray for mercy. It was right and necessary, for his own good, that he should do so.—Could he, then, honestly have neglected to fulfil his resolutions?

God is our heavenly Father, and he knows our wants, and has made ample provisions for their satisfaction.—He has appointed purity of heart as necessary to the enjoyment of him. He has, with equal consistency, appointed spiritual communing, holy, confiding faith, and ardent supplication as intermediate means of bringing us nearer to him and his approval. He will be sought. Seek him, and with all his unchangeability, he will be found, because the heart that seeks in faith and resignation, and it only, is permitted to see the spirituality of the divine presence. Seek him not, and still he is near though unseen, and his provision not less ample though untasted; nor will these fail—they will continue till the same immutability of purpose shall result in the final triumph of holiness and truth; "for his people shall be willing in the day of his power." Seek him and the heart shall increase in immediate and progressive confidence. Seek him, and while we are yet far off he will meet us and conduct us into new and lasting favors which have been waiting for the work of preparation in us. Seek him, and the spirit of our religion, and the disposition which prompts us to supplication, shall kindle in other hearts a flame of kindred feeling and kindred principle. Seek him, and the soul shall imbibe, and love, and cherish more and more of the excellences of the divine nature with which it communes. O, for a more fervently praying people.

RELIGION—A SONNET.

There is a cordial in this vale of woe;
 'Tis one that nerves the heart of man to bear,
 With meekness, all the evils here below.
 It smooths the wrinkled, moody brow of care,
 And flings the light of hope o'er black despair.
 When fortune frowns and all of life is dark—
 When friends forsake and penury doth wear
 Its ghastliest look, subduing every spark
 Of nature's fire that rises in the soul—
 If we accept her guidance and control,
 Will lead us safe until the closing even
 Of this dark, brief, unhappy day of life:
 This sinful, weary, wand'ring scene of strife,
 And then, o'er thy oblivious valley, death! to Heaven.

AN ALBUM TRIBUTE.

BY REV. DAY K. LEE.

"Until the day break, and the shadows flee away,
 I will get me to the mountains of myrrh,
 And to the hill of frankincense."—SOLOMON'S SONG.

Dear lady! the text I have chosen,
 Imbodies alone a full sermon;
 Whose spirit no more could be frozen
 Than the warm dews of Zion or Hermon!

Such an eloquence flames in the letters
 That make up the words of our motto,
 As snatches his soul from the fetters
 And shackles of sorrow's chill grotto.

If a sermon of mine thou desirest,
 I'll preach thee one, breathing the spirit
 That thou in the text so admirest;
 And now—art thou listening to hear it?

This world hath its joy and its sadness,
 Its shadows, and sunbeams, and vapor:
 The gales that to-day bring us gladness,
 To-morrow are flaring hope's taper.

But O, when the shadows are darkling,
 And sorrows their revels are taking
 Then look on the beacon that's sparkling,
 Then think on the day that is breaking.

Or, fly from the dark valley, rather,
 Where floweth so bitter a fountain!
 And myrrh and sweet frankincense gather,
 From faith's flowery hill-top and mountain.

COMMODORE DECATUR.

The late gallant Decatur, was a sailor to the very heart's core, and loved to tell anecdotes of the common sailors. I recollect one which he used to relate, to the following purport: In one of the actions between Tripoli, while fighting hand to hand with the captain of a gun-boat, Decatur came near being cut down by a Turk, who attacked him from behind. A seaman named Renben James, who was already wounded in both hands, seeing the risk of his commander, rushed in and received the blow of the uplifted sabre on his head. Fortunately, the honest fellow survived to receive his reward. Some time afterward, when he had recovered from his wounds, Decatur sent for him on deck, expressed his gratitude for his self-devotion, in presence of the crew, and told him to ask for some reward. The honest tar pulled up his waistband, and rolled his quid, but seemed utterly at a loss what recompense to claim. His mess mates gathered around him, nudging him with their elbows, and whispering in his ear. "He had all the world in a string and could get what he pleased;" the old One advised this thing, another that; "double pay," "double allowance," "a boatswain's berth," "a pocket-full of money, and a full swing on shore," etc. Jack elbowed them all aside, and would have none of their counsels. After mature deliberation, he announced the reward to which he aspired; it was, to be excused from rolling up the hammock cloth! The whimsical request was of course granted; and from that time forward, whenever the sailors were piped to stow away their hammocks, Jack was to be seen loitering around, and coking on, with the most gentleman-like leisure. He always continued in the same ship with Decatur. "I could always know the state of my bile by Jack," said the commodore. "If I was in a good humor, and wore a pleasant aspect, Jack would be sure to heave in sight, to receive a friendly nod. If I was out of humor, and wore, as I sometimes did, a foul-weather physiognomy, Jack kept aloof, and skulked among the other sailors. It is proper to add that Renben James received a more solid reward for his gallant devotion than the privilege above mentioned, a pension having been granted to him by Government.

On another occasion, Decatur had received at New York, the freedom of the city, as a testimonial of respect and gratitude. On the following day, he overheard this colloquy between two of his sailors:—"Jack," said one "what is the meaning of this freedom of the city, which they've been giving to the old man?" "Why, don't you know? Why, it's the right to frolic about the street, as much as he pleases; kick up a row; knock down the men, and kiss the women!" "Oho," cried the other, "that's something worth fighting for!"—Knickerbocker.

A correspondent of the Portland Advertiser gives the following description of the present appearance of Malta.

"Malta, 'take it for all in all,' is the most romantic place I have yet visited. The fortifications are immensely strong and extensive, and, to my inexperienced eye, impregnable. With the exception of the Strada Real, which is the Broadway of the place, the streets are narrow, but straight, and cross each other at right angles. To the pedestrian, however, they are extremely fatiguing, being a continued succession of stone steps rising in every direction to the centre of the city, and are at all times thronged with naval and military officers, as well as with the soldiers of the different regiments at present stationed here—fine, hardy looking fellows—one of whom appeared to be worth a dozen of those who now enlist in our army. I particularly noticed several sturdy fellows in the picturesque dress of the Scottish highlanders, wearing bear-skins caps, red jackets, green plaid kilts, huge hangers, and red and white plaid leggings. With such men, no commander in like circumstances, could fail to become a Marlborough or a Wellington. The streets presented the resemblance of a masquerade or fancy ball. For variety of costume, every nation had its representative. The mention of national representatives reminds me of a smart reply made by a countryman of ours, the captain of an American vessel now in our harbor. Walking through the crowded streets here a few days since, he heard a port miss, who was hanging on the arm of an officer of the army, as he passed her, exclaim, in a rather sharp tone, 'What! is that a Yankee?' 'Yes,' replied the captain, turning 'short around,' 'a true-blooded Yankee, direct from Bunker Hill, bearer of Pakenham's despatches.' Upon receiving this retort, the young lady walked off in another direction."

ANTIQUITY OF MECHANICAL SCIENCE.

We read in Genesis, that ships were as old, even on the Mediterranean, as the days of Jacob. We likewise read that the Philistines brought thirty thousand chariots into the field against Saul; so that chariots were in use 1070 years before Christ. And about the same time architecture was brought into Europe. And 1030 years before Christ, Ammon built long and tall ships with sails on the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. And, about ninety years after, the ship Aigo was built; which was the first Greek vessel that ventured to pass through the sea, by help of sails, without sight of land, being guided only by the stars. Dædalus also, who lived 980 years before Christ, made sails for ships, and invented several sorts of tools, for carpenters and joiners to work with. He also made several moving statues, which could walk or run of themselves. And, about 800 years before Christ, we find in 2 Chron. 15, that Uzziah made in Jerusalem, engines, invented by cunning men, to be on the towers and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal. Corn-mills were early invented; for we read in Deuteronomy, that it was not lawful for any man to take the nether or the upper mill-stone to pledge; yet water was not applied to mills before the year of Christ 600, nor wind mills used before the year 1200. Likewise, 580 years before Christ, we read in Jeremiah 18, of the potter's wheel. Architas was the first that applied mathematics to mechanics, but left no mechanical writings behind him; he made a wooden pigeon that could fly about. Archimedes, who lived about 200 years before Christ, was a most subtle geometer and mechanic. He made engines that drew up the ships of Marcellus at the siege of Syracuse; and others that would cast a stone of a prodigious weight to a great distance, or else several lesser stones, as also darts and arrows; but there have been many fabulous reports concerning these engines. He also made a sphere which showed the motions of the sun, moon, and planets. And Posidonius, afterwards made another which showed the same thing. In these days, the liberal arts flourished, and learning met with proper encouragement; but afterwards, they became neglected for a long time. Aristotle, who lived about 290 years before Christ, was one of the first that wrote any methodical discourse of mechanics.—But, at this time, the art was contained in a very little compass, there being scarce any thing more known about it than the six mechanical powers. In this state, it continued till the 16th century and then clock-work was invented; and about 1650, were the first clocks made. At this time, several of the most eminent mathematicians began to consider mechanics; and by their study and industry, have prodigiously enlarged its bounds, and made it a most comprehensive science. It extends through heaven and earth; the whole universe, and every part of it, is its subject. Not one particle of matter but what comes under its laws. For what else is there in the visible world, but matter and motion? and the properties and affections of both these are the subject of mechanics.—Emerson.

DO AS I DO, NEITHER MORE NOR LESS.—The Pope once stopping for the night in a small village of Italy, the inhabitants resolved to send him a deputation. The mayor also suggested to present his holiness with the chief produce of the country, consisting of pine-apples, figs and cream. The pine-apples, however, were dispensed with, and each member was to carry figs and cream in silver basins. "Now," said the mayor, with all the gravity of office, "you are not accustomed to appear before these high personages, therefore let us have no nonsense; do what you see me do, neither more nor less." The deputation was arranged accordingly. The mayor placed himself majestically at its head, armed like his fellows, with a basin of figs in his left hand, and of cream in his right. At this time it was the custom to wear beards. The door opened, and the mayor repeated his caution. "Neither more nor less, I beseech you." There was a step down into the room, but the mayor not thinking of it, the shock plunged his beard and face into the cream basin, and not being very young, brought him upon his knees, with his hands and basin under him, and his creamed face (richly ornamented with a well lathered and dripping beard), as it were imperiously raised toward the representative of St. Peter. The corporation thinking this a grave matter of form, simultaneously ducked their bearded faces, prostrated themselves on their marrow-bones, and significantly cast a half-inquiring and confident look at their leader, as though to say, "You see we are all right." The Pope was at first (and well he might be) astonished; but burst into as genuine a fit of laughter as his lowest menial could have indulged in; while his officers, conceiving that his addressers meant merely to humbug his high mightiness, gathered up the figs, and pelted the body corporate most lustily. The mayor hobbled out of the room as fast as he could, closely followed by his brethren, one of whom whispered him, "How lucky we did not bring the pine-apples; they would have battered out heads & a mummy."

"DESTROY BOTH SOUL AND BODY IN HELL."

BY REV. MENZIES RAYNER.

"Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul, but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Matt. x: 28.

"And I say unto you, my friends. Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do; but I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear: Fear him which after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him." Luke xii: 4, 5.

The editor of the Expositor, for May 1838, strenuously argues that the pronoun him in the above passages, refers to God; and he states what appears to him insuperable objections to the supposition that it should refer to any human authority or power. To us the objections to referring the word him to the Supreme Being appear much the strongest, and indeed to render such a reference wholly inadmissible.

It is quite evident that to some expressions in the passage, a liberal, and not an entirely literal construction should be given. For instance—when our Saviour says to his disciples, "Fear not them that kill the body,"—or as St. Luke states it, "Be not afraid of them that kill the body," we are not to understand him as commanding, or advising them to dismiss all apprehension, and to be wholly indifferent as to any injuries their enemies and persecutors could inflict upon their bodies, for he had just before admonished them to "beware of men," and prudently to avoid the effects of their malice and rage, when they could do it consistently with fidelity to the cause in which they were engaged. "When they persecute you (says he) in this city, flee ye into another."

Our Saviour is evidently forewarning his disciples of the evils and injuries to which they would be exposed in pursuing the objects of their mission; and he reminds them that while from one quarter, or from one power, they would be liable to injuries of a certain description; from another source, or from another power, should they fall under its condemnatory sentence—they would be subjected to a much more dreadful punishment than the other power could inflict. Contrasting these two powers together, therefore he might properly say, in language of comparison, Fear not the former power, and be not so much concerned to shun the comparatively small injuries it can cause you to suffer, as to avoid that most terrible calamity, which the latter power is able, and has authority to inflict—even of causing you to be burned alive in Gehenna, and deprived of the sacred rites of sepulchre, which, by the Jews, was of all calamities considered the greatest.

This appears to us to be the sense and meaning of this part of the passage. But that our Saviour was warning, or forewarning his disciples, especially to fear God, because he had power—was able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna: or as the Editor says, "to utterly exterminate, not only the body, but the soul also," is an idea, the propriety of which we are unable to comprehend, and is, we think, peculiarly revolting. We can not regard the forewarning here given to the disciples, otherwise than as intimating a calamity which might be supposed liable to happen, from the virulence of their persecutors. But that they should be forewarned of a power that could exterminate, or annihilate soul and body, though it was certain that power would never do it, to us appears utterly incongruous. And why it should require a greater power to annihilate the soul or mind in Gehenna, or why it would be more dreadful for the soul to be annihilated, or utterly exterminated in that than in any other place, we are unable to perceive or imagine; and yet here the stress of the warning seems to be laid. Towards the close of his article—which we choose to notice here—the Editor says, "That it was the design of Christ, in the passages under consideration, to lead his disciples to reverence the surpassing power of God, which he thus illustrated, and not to make them fear an actual destruction of their souls and bodies in Gehenna, seems evident from the words that immediately follow." To us this does not seem so evident. For why should it be necessary, in order to lead the disciples to reverence the surpassing power of God, to represent him as able to do that which he never would do?—able to effect a total destruction of human existence, to which the Editor does not believe either the disciples, nor any human being was ever liable? Are there not real instances of God's power, exhibited in acts of infinite benevolence, sufficient to lead the Christian to reverence the surpassing power of God?—to lead him not only to recognize with the Psalmist, that "Power belongeth unto God," but also to exclaim with the prophet, "How great is his goodness; how great is his beauty!" Is not God's surpassing power exhibited in the works of creation? Was it not sufficiently evident in the benevolent miracles of Jesus, wrought by the power of God, and of which the disciples were witnesses? And was not the doctrine of the glorious resurrection, as taught by Jesus—in which mankind shall be as the angels in heaven, and die no more—sufficient to lead the disciples to reverence the surpassing power of God, without illustrating it by a declaration of his ability to destroy forever the souls and bodies of men in Gehenna, which he never will do? Indeed the Editor admits that the divine power was sufficiently manifested in that unerring and gracious providence, which (says he) "did not overlook even the sparrows; and as for the disciples, it numbered the very hairs of their heads. Would it not, then, (he asks) protect the disciples themselves, who were manifestly of more consequence than many sparrows!" Truly. But how this makes it evident that the former declaration, (made to the disciples by way of forewarning) of power to cast into Gehenna, should be referred to God, we do not understand. The Editor then quotes, "Fear ye not, therefore," etc., and he thus expounds it, "That is, Fear not your mortal enemies; ye are under the protection of your heavenly Father's power." Might he not—according to the explanation he gives of the passage, have justly added, "Yes, my beloved disciples, I say unto you, Fear not; for ye are under the protection of that same Almighty power which I have just forewarned you, is able to destroy—utterly to exterminate your souls and bodies in Gehenna!"

In another part of his article the Editor says, "That it was God of whom he (Christ) spake, is to us the natural conclusion from the tenor of the passage taken with its context." We arrive at a different conclusion from the same premises. It appears to us that the tenor of our Saviour's instructions in this passage goes, first, to apprise the disciples of the difficulties which, as public teachers and advocates of his religion, they would have to encounter, the trials and dangers to which they would be subjected by their persecuting opposers; and secondly, to excite in them a full confidence in the care and protection of their heavenly Father. In relation to the former he tells them, "Behold I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves;" and he admonishes them to be therefore "wise as serpents, and harmless as doves." But, says he, "Beware of men." Be prudent and careful to give no just occasion of offence, and to avoid the rage of your enemies as much as possible, consistently with the faithful discharge of your duty. "When they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another." Still, with your utmost prudence and harmlessness, ye will not be able always to escape the violence of your inveterate opposers, "for they will deliver you up to the councils, and they will scourge you in their synagogues; and ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake. But when they deliver you up"—when ye are thus compelled to appear before governors and kings, and councils, yield not to despondency, or distressing anxiety, for ye shall not be left without help in time of need. "Take no thought how or what ye shall speak, for it shall be given you in that same hour, what ye shall speak: for it is not ye that speak, but the spirit of your Father which speaketh in you—Fear them not, therefore"—rely upon the care of your heavenly Father: He is your helper, and ye need not fear. Let not the apprehension of danger cause you to suppress the truth, or to cease to declare the whole message with which you are charged—declare it publicly, and without hesitancy or reserve. "What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light, and what ye hear in the ear, that preach—proclaim—ye upon the house-tops."

This appears to be the tenor and substance of our Saviour's discourse to his disciples on this occasion, till we come to the text. This, as stated by St. Matthew, is as follows, "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." The important inquiry is, who, or what power are the disciples here admonished to fear, or rather to fear—that is, to fear most. This, we think is evidently the meaning. For here are represented two distinct powers: the one capable of doing them a comparatively small injury—that of killing the body; (some think the allusion is to the scourging and torturing of the body, and not actually the taking of life;) the other power being able, having authority, to destroy both soul and body, or life and body, in Gehenna. Because therefore, one of these powers was able to do the disciples a much greater injury than the other, they were especially to fear that power on that account, and to be more particularly careful not to subject themselves, by any imprudence, to its condemnatory sentence. They were to fear that power so much more than the other, that, comparatively, they should not fear the other at all. It appears to us from the tenor of the passage taken with its context, that our Saviour intended to admonish the disciples that both the powers alluded to, were not only able to inflict injuries upon them, but that they were in fact liable to injuries from both; and that they were especially forewarned to fear one of those powers, or judicial tribunals, and with all possible care to avoid its condemnatory sentence, because of the terrible nature and consequence of that sentence.*

* It seems not to be well ascertained whether the Jews, in the time of our Saviour, did possess the power of life and death, or not. We think the evidence is rather in favor of the opinion that they did possess that power; though they had no law by which they could sentence to death by crucifixion, this was not a Jewish punishment. Now the Jews were bent upon having Jesus crucified. For this they importuned Pilate again and again, crying, "crucify him, crucify him." When therefore Pilate said to them, "Take y

Such is our view of the tenor of the passage. But it can not be consistent with this view to understand the greater power alluded to in the text, as referring to God; for the disciples were surely not admonished to fear the exercise, or to avoid the effects of his power, but to rejoice and confide in it.

The Editor further says, "If then we have correctly fixed the reference, it was God whom the disciples were to fear; and this in consideration of his surpassing power. The infinite superiority of this power is illustrated by the remark that he is able, after he has killed, to cast into Gehenna: that is, to destroy, or utterly exterminate, not only the body, but the soul also, in those judgments that were expressed by Gehenna; the most terrible and destructive punishment that was known among the Jews."

We can not agree with these views of the Editor. It certainly could not be a greater exhibition of power to exterminate soul and body, than to create them—to destroy existence, than to produce it. And would the Saviour choose to impress the minds of his disciples with a sense of the surpassing power of God by considerations calculated to fill them with dismay and horror, rather than by exhibitions of power combined with infinite goodness and benevolence? Can we rationally suppose that Jesus was holding up to the view of the disciples a most terrible calamity, which God was able to bring upon them, but which he never would inflict—and this too in order to impress upon their minds the consideration of his surpassing power?

The Editor says, "We see no allusion, here, to the idea of endless misery, but rather to that of annihilation. It was a killing of the soul as well as of the body, a destroying of both soul and body," etc. We, of course, see no allusion here to endless misery; nor do we believe that God has ever threatened it in his word, or forewarned mankind of it. But neither do we see in the text, any allusion to annihilation, nor do we think God has ever forewarned of that. Let St. Luke's statement of the subject be particularly noticed—"And I say unto you, my friends, Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do; but I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear: Fear him, which after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, Fear him." Here seems to be two distinct things which he, or him, possessing the greater power is able to do. First, he is able to kill, (that is to torture as some think) or take the life of the body. This can not mean annihilation, or the utter extermination of existence, for the smaller power could do this—could kill the body, and that was all it could do, and therefore the disciples were not to fear such power—or such authority; that is—as we have explained it, they were to fear it less—comparatively, not at all. The second thing which he, the greater power, could do, was, after killing, that is the body—to cast into Gehenna. Did this mean or denote annihilation, or extermination of existence? If so it was the annihilation of the soul, or mind, for the former power could kill the body, him and crucify him; and they replied, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death," we think the meaning intended is, that they had no law authorizing them to inflict death by crucifixion; and therefore, that they might put Jesus to this death, it was necessary to bring him under the Roman law. It seems to have been on this account that they were so urgent to obtain the sentence of Pilate against Jesus. And this sense appears to us to be confirmed by what immediately follows the above statement of the Jews—that it was not lawful for them to put any man to death. The Evangelist adds, "That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spoke, signifying what death he should die." For he had before told his disciples, that he should be delivered to the Gentiles, and be crucified. Matt. xx: 19.

Moreover, that the Jews did possess the power to sentence to death by stoning, soon after this, appears by the case of Stephen. For he was brought before a Jewish court, or council, and was confronted with witnesses, (false witnesses indeed, as is doubtless often the case,) and on their testimony he appears to have been condemned and put to death; for the historian says, "The witnesses laid down their clothes"—that is, when they were about to stone him—"at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul."

but that was not utter extermination; for the soul, or mind could still exist; and this could be annihilated, only by the greater power, and by casting it—that is, the soul or mind—into Gehenna.

The Editor seems—if we understand him—to consider Gehenna here to be employed as a figure to represent annihilation—the utter extermination of existence, to which he thinks allusion is had, though no danger of it was to be apprehended. We confess we do not see the fitness or propriety of such a construction, nor its agreement with the tenor of the passage, taken with its context.

The Editor himself intimates an objection to this construction, as follows, "But granting that the object was to impress the disciples with an engrossing sense of the divine power, yet, why did Christ, for this purpose, remind them that God was able to annihilate, unless he meant to imply some danger that he would actually annihilate them? Why should they fear a power, though it were adequate to this effect, if they themselves were not exposed to its execution." This objection, we think, is not very satisfactorily answered. The Editor shows, indeed, that it could not be any more consistently answered by the advocates of endless misery, because they would not admit that the disciples were exposed to its actual infliction. The Editor, we presume, does not believe that the disciples were ever exposed to endless misery, or that Christ ever reminded them that God had power to torment forever. But does he think it would have been inconsistent for Christ to have reminded his disciples of God's power to inflict endless misery, because—as he doubtless believes—neither they nor any of God's creatures ever were, or ever will be, liable to suffer it; and yet that it was perfectly consistent for him to remind them of God's power to annihilate—utterly to exterminate human existence, which he does not believe God ever will exert his power to do?

But the Editor says, "So far as this point is concerned, we have a parallel instance in John the Baptist's admonition to the Pharisees and Sadducees: 'Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our Father; for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.'" We can not think this a parallel instance, according to the explanation which the Editor gives of this part of the passage which he is illustrating. He says, "John can not have meant to imply that God would, in any case raise up children unto Abraham from those stones." We think differently, that John did mean, not only that God was able, but that he actually would and did, raise up children unto Abraham of the very characters to which he alluded, and to which, in his discourse he probably pointed, metaphorically representing them as stones.

Let us briefly consider the address of John on the occasion, and notice particularly who were his auditors. Firstly, they were Pharisees and Sadducees; secondly, Publicans, or tax-gatherers, and thirdly soldiers. See Matt. iii, and Luke iii. The Pharisees and Sadducees who came to his baptism he thus addressed, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance: and begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our Father; for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones"—not of the stones, but of these stones—referring, we think, immediately to the publicans and soldiers, who probably were situated apart from the former, and who were despised by the Pharisees as outcasts and reprobates, and thought to be as hard and impenetrable, and as incapable of religious principles or impressions, as rocks or stones—God is able of these vile and obdurate characters, as ye consider them to be, "to raise up children"—spiritual children—"unto Abraham," who shall inherit the faith, and emulate the virtues and the piety of that renowned Patriarch; whose lineal descendants, faithless and perverse as ye are, ye claim to be, and vainly boast your prerogatives.

"And now also," continues the prophetic harbinger, "the axe is laid at the root of the trees (what a variety of appropriate metaphors!) every tree therefore, which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire." He here likens the Pharisees to lofty trees, firmly rooted, green and flourishing—such they were in their own estimation—but withal he forewarns them that the axe is lying at the root, and that those lofty, but fruitless trees, must quickly fall, under its heaven-directed and fatal stroke. This predicted event did take place—this "wrath to come" did overtake and overwhelm this degenerate seed of their pious progenitor; whilst aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenant of promise, cordially embraced the Gospel, "which before was preached unto Abraham," and thus became the adopted children of the Father of the faithful.

Such is our view of this passage; and thus illustrated, it does not present an instance of God's declared ability to do that which he never would do; much less a forewarning where there was no danger.

The Editor in reference to that part of the text, "Fear him, who after he hath killed, hath power to cast into Gehenna"—says, "That it was God of whom he (Christ) spoke, is to us the natural conclusion. * * * That it was not the Roman authority, seems unquestionable, on account of the form of the pronouns here used. * * * Were the reference to some civil authority, the idiom of the Greek would not admit the masculine; it would require the neuter, as indeed our own language would." We had supposed that the idiom of the Greek language, in its grammatical construction, admitted considerable latitude as to the genders of nouns with their pronouns; having sometimes the noun in one gender, and the pronoun referring to it as its antecedent, in a different gender. This is manifestly the case in the Greek of the New Testament, of which several examples might be cited. Matt. xxv: 32, is one instance—"Before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another," etc. Here the Greek pronoun autos, translated them, refers to the Greek noun ethne, rendered nations, as its antecedent; and there is no other antecedent to which it can refer; yet the noun is in the neuter, and the pronoun in the masculine gender. A similar instance occurs in Rev. ii: 26, 27, "And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron." Here the same original words are used as in the former passage, the pronoun them (autos) referring directly to nations, (ethne), as no one will question; yet one of them is in the masculine and the other in the neuter gender. On this point, however, we claim not the ability to be critical.

It appears to us that the term Gehenna in the text is particularly emphatic. "But rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Gehenna.) "Fear him, which, after he hath killed, hath power to cast into Gehenna." Our Saviour employed the word Gehenna in several other instances. Does he in any of them allude to annihilation, or to God's power to annihilate? Does he, in any other instance—either to the disciples, or to others, declare or intimate God's power to annihilate? Does he ever forewarn, or remind them that God has power, "is able," utterly to exterminate the existence of soul and body? If not (and we can think of no such instance) then the evidence to induce the belief that such allusion is intended in the text, ought to be very clear and conclusive—more so than we are able to perceive it to be.

On the whole, from a careful examination, we are of the opinion that the part of the passage, "Fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna," is not to be referred to God, our heavenly Father, but to some civil judicial tribunal, then existing, which, for certain offences, had authority to sentence to the punishment of Gehenna—not only to take life, but to cause the body, after it was killed, to be entirely consumed by fire, or cast out unburied, to be preyed upon by worms—"an abhorring unto all flesh"—in that detested valley, or land of Hin-nom, "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." And it appears to us that the object of our Saviour's admonition to the disciples was, to lead them to be particularly careful not to incur, by any imprudence, that most dreadful condemnation. * At the same time he teaches them that, with their prudent care, they might have the fullest, and most consoling reliance on the protection of their heavenly Father, whose affection was unceasing, and by whom the hairs of their head were all numbered.

At the close of his article our worthy Brother expresses the hope that it will receive, not only the candid and patient consideration of his brethren, but the advantage also of their revision."

In the Editor's general theological skill and accuracy, especially in the interpretation of scripture, we have great confidence; and we entertain for him sentiments of entire respect and friendship. It is therefore, with much hesitancy and diffidence that we offer the above illustration and remarks. We crave for them indulgence and candor, as being merely the honest expression of "mine opinion."

* The Jews had a great veneration for the rites of burial, and the idea of being wholly deprived of them was, of all things, most distressing and abhorrent. Solomon says, "If a man beget an hundred children, and live many years, so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, and also that he have no burial, I say, that an untimely birth is better than he." Eccl. vi. 3. Of Jehoiakim king of Judah, it was predicted that he should be "buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem." Jer. xxii. 19. Among the terrible judgments prophetically denounced against the Jews for their wickedness, their being deprived of burial is mentioned as the most grievous part of their calamity. "They shall die of grievous deaths, they shall not be lamented, neither shall they be buried; but they shall be as dung upon the face of the earth;" etc. Jer. xvi. 4.

The Patriarchs expressed an earnest desire to be buried with their own kindred. Jacob, a little before his death, charged his sons saying, "I am to be gathered unto my people; bury me with my fathers, in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite....(there they buried Abraham, and Sarah his wife; there they buried Isaac, and Rebekah his wife; and there I buried Leah.)" Joseph before his death, said unto his brethren, "I die, and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land, unto the land which he swore to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob....and ye shall carry up my bones from hence." The apostle to the Hebrews states this circumstance, and says, "By faith Joseph when he died, made mention of the departing of the children of Israel, and gave commandment concerning his bones." Gen. i. 24, 25. Heb. xi. 22. When the aged Barzillai had gone with king David over Jordan, and the king urged him to remain with him in Jerusalem, he replied, "Let thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again, that I may die in mine own city, and be buried by the grave of my father, and of my mother." 1 Sam. xix. 37.

There is nothing in the New Testament which goes to discountenance this anxiety for a decent burial. Rather, several notable examples, impliedly approve such care and solicitude. When John the Baptist was beheaded in prison "the disciples came and took up the body and buried it, and went and told Jesus." Matt. xiv. 12. When St. Stephen was stoned to death, "devout men carried him to his burial, and made great lamentation over him." Acts vii. 2. When the woman, in the house of Simon the leper, poured the box of ointment upon the head of Jesus, at which the disciples murmured, Jesus said, "Why trouble ye the woman, for she hath wrought a good work upon me....For in that she hath poured this ointment on my body, she did it for my burial;" (for, she hath done it to embalme me, preparatory to my burial.) Matt. xxvi. 12. On the evening after the crucifixion, Joseph of Arimathea went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus, that he might give it an honorable burial. And they wound the body in clean linen cloth, with spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury. And they laid the body in Joseph's own new tomb. Matt. xxvii. 57-60. John xix. 38.

Such, and many more, are the evidences of the great solicitude which prevailed among the Jews, that their own bodies, and those of their friends might have a decent burial: to which anxiety and care, Jesus himself—far from censuring—gave his implied sanction. Is it unlikely then, is it unreasonable to suppose, that he should forewarn his disciples to be especially careful, by all possible prudence, to avoid "the condemnation of Gehenna?"

TRUE GREATNESS.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

What constitutes the principles of true greatness? Where shall we look for the truly great man? Many there are, I am aware, to whose name an applauding world has attached the word great.—And many there are, I know, with whose characters a gazing and wonder-seeking multitude have coupled this word. But are all those who have been called great, justly entitled to the appellation? Are the principles which make up the truly great man, well understood by the generality of people? Might not the old adage be applied to some who have been thought worthy of this character, "Tis not all gold that glitters?"—Look about you, reader, and see what ideas are entertained by no small share of community respecting the acts which should claim for an individual this name. Go you into the fireside circle of this happy nation, and see what characters are exhibited as models for the rising generation—what characters are talked of most, and held up for the children of our land to imitate. Are they not those whose greatness consists in something aside from the usefulness they have been to mankind? Are they not such, of whom it would be an outrage upon common sense to say, "the world has been better for their having lived in it?" The young are often led to associate with true greatness, the man who, by some favorable circumstance, has arisen above his neighbors in wealth and worldly honors; or he who has laid waste many a city, and converted into a barren wilderness many a fair portion of the habitable globe. See! there he stands upon a fancied eminence which many regard as real, with a cold and unfeeling heart, with an ear deaf to the cries of penury, and with a hand that never ministered to the wants of suffering humanity. Or there he lies amidst smoke, darkly frowning over the battle field, the booming cannon tolling the death dirge of thousands, the flesh of the burnished blade streaming from his side, and the war steed bearing him onward like a thunderbolt against his enemies. Are these the acts which clothe an individual with the character of a truly great man? Oh! say it not—it is an insult to the better and more sacred features of the human character! Speak not of such actions—encourage them not, either by word or deed. Desire not to see any taking upon themselves either of these characters, and much less a child, unless you could glory to see it possessed of a heart as hard as the adamant; or one that could unfeelingly triumph over expiring humanity.

It has been well said by an author—"It is not in the glare of public, but in the shades of private life that we are to look for the man," and I might add, the "truly great man." There he will act out the simple dictates of his heart. There he will have no motive but inclination—no incentive but his own individual sense of right. And there he will be sure to act himself; and if his acts are great they will be great indeed. And again has it been well said, "our private deeds, if noble, are noblest of our lives." There we should look for greatness—there we may expect to find a man to be just what he is. Let men act great in the retreats of private life, and they will be worthy of the imitation of all. "Their greatness will consist in rendering the world, in which they live, better—in making those happy who are around them—in elevating their thoughts and feelings to drink in the streams of earthly felicity, and lead others to go and do likewise.

DEATH.

What is death? The vigorous and elastic frame, at its touch, will moulder back to dust.—The fleeting pleasures of the gay and thoughtless vanish at its approach. The festive song of mirth—the sound of rejoicing and conviviality is hushed in its dolorous silence. The floral wreath fades from the brow of beauty, and the guerdon of fame is snatched from the grasp of the ambitious aspirant. Behold the young man of promising hopes and flattering prospects! His fragile bark is launched upon the sea of time, and with light heart and buoyant spirits he stems the yielding tide. His feet wander over earth, and with eagle eye he scans the world, and thrends its intricate mazes with facility. A thirst for distinction, for knowledge, stimulates him to action; a laudable ambition fires his breast. He seeks to entwine around his brow the laureled wreath of fame—to weave for the future a garland of unfading honors. But death arrests him in his brilliant career; life's fragile cord is severed, and he falls in all his pride and glory!

Again, behold the young maiden in her mild loveliness. Grace and beauty are in her form, and heaven in her eye—the glad music of light, of life, and love, is breathed from her coral lips. A father's fond hopes, a mother's deep, devoted affections are centered in the loved one, and as she kneels at the vesper hour, she remembers their love, and wafts to heaven a fervent prayer for their weal. But death aims at her his unerring shaft!—She falls, and the insatiable tomb closes over her loveliness and beauty! The glad smile has vanished, the music of the young voice is hushed, her orisons rise no more, her graceful form no longer lingers among the mild beauties of earth. Her memory lives only in the hearts of her friends. She slumbers with the dark ones of earth!

I have beheld such scenes and murmured, are such beautiful flowers, then, so frail! Are they to bloom but for an hour; then wither, die, and be forgotten? But again, I beheld the weary pilgrim, and was silent. To him death seemed a welcome messenger. The frost of time had silvered his head. His cup had been full—full of disappointment and misery, and he hailed the grim monster with pleasure, as the end of toil and suffering. To him the grave seemed a resting place, a cemetery, where hopes of future gladness were fostered, free from human contingency and sorrow. He had drained the bitter cup of life to the dregs, but with its most bitter draught had been mingled the sweets of pardoning mercy. To his eye have been presented beatific visions of spotless glory, and as the decay of mortality warns him of his departure from earth, it announces his ascension to the abodes of felicity, where he will mingle with the spirits of a ransomed world round the throne of the Omnipotent.

ANOTHER RENUNCIATION OF UNIVERSALISM!

Our Partialist brethren—especially the Editors of the Puritan, the Connecticut Observer, the New-York Evangelist, the Baptist Register of this city, and others, have so few sources of real comfort, such few occasions of solid joy and triumph over Universalists, that we feel bound to save them the labor of inventing cases, when ever we can find one actual occurrence. We therefore furnish them with the following genuine case of another renunciation of the demoralizing and pernicious heresy of Universalism; we hope they will not crow too loudly over it, nor make more than ten cases out of it.

Swanton, Lucas county, Ohio, November 19, 1840.

DEAR SIR—Your paper to this office, directed to Samuel Elder, is not taken from the office. Reason—Elder renounced his universal principles, by saying he never believed the doctrine—joined the Methodists, and was at all their anxious seats for several weeks, and then "absquatulated," leaving his postage bill for the last year unpaid. With respect yours,

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

BR. GROSH—An oral debate on the question, "Does the Bible teach the doctrine of endless misery?" came off at Washingtonville, Oswego county, on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, the 18th, 19th, and 20th days of November, 1840, between Rev. Joseph Kilpatrick, (Methodist,) on the affirmative, and our highly esteemed brother and fellow-laborer, Pitt Morse, on the negative.

Notice of this discussion had been circulated pretty extensively, and considerable interest had been manifested by the surrounding community. Early on Wednesday morning a large congregation assembled in the Methodist meeting-house at Washingtonville, with countenances plainly indicating the deep interest which each felt, upon this great and thrillingly important question, which divides the Christian world. Br. Morse read the written agreement previously entered into by the parties; which specified the particular form of the question to be discussed, and some brief preliminaries, etc., etc. After which, Mr. Kilpatrick arose and delivered his opening speech. But what was our astonishment, when we listened to the first mighty argument with which we were presented by Mr. K., by way of convincing us, that the "Bible teaches the doctrine of endless misery." And what think you, Br. Grosh, was this awful argument, which Mr. K. anticipated would carry the "besom of destruction" into the very heart of the camp of Universalism? Precisely such, as all who were acquainted with the crooked policy of Methodism might have expected—viz., "man is a free agent," and therefore, the Bible must of course, "teach the doctrine of endless misery."

Br. Morse arose, and objected to his introducing "free agency" into the discussion; inasmuch, as a man might or might not be a free agent, and still, so far as that was concerned, be endlessly miserable. The question was, whether the Bible taught the doctrine of endless misery—and not whether man is free and independent of the God who made him. But as Mr. K. had introduced this foreign subject, and would not leave it for the main question, until he had been allowed to read to the congregation all that he had written upon the point: Br. Morse, for the want of other employment, took the doctrine of free will, which had been brought forward to prove the doctrine of endless misery, and from it proved incontrovertibly, the final salvation of the world. He showed that if man does really possess this much talked of agency—and if it places him entirely beyond the control of the Almighty, and enables him to act in direct opposition to the positive determination of God, and absolutely to thwart the eternal purposes of his will; and furthermore, if it be so all powerful, that God himself can not violate it, or induce man to perform that which he is opposed to doing; then will God be unable to keep man in hell, even if he should succeed in getting him there. Man's free agency would enable him to thwart God's plans and purposes, and get himself out of hell, as easily as he could make void God's purposes for man's salvation, and work himself down to hell, in opposition to the will and wishes of the Almighty.

And it does appear to me, that this argument in favor of the world's salvation, drawn from the supposed free agency of man, can not possibly be controverted by any Methodist, except in the manner, adopted by Mr. Kilpatrick—viz., by contending that at death, "God will positively destroy this agency"! But how God can deprive us of that over which he has no control elsewhere, is a point upon which Mr. K. gave us no light—except the faint glimmer which we received from his bare assertion.

From "free agency," Mr. K. travelled off in search of some "conditionality" in God's promise of future salvation—but in this search he proved remarkably unsuccessful. Br. Morse showed us clearly and conclusively, that God's purpose to bless all the nations, families and kindreds of the earth in Christ, was positive and unconditional—that all the attributes of Jehovah, were actually pledged for its fulfilment—and that God, in order to set this matter for once at rest, had given us his immutable oath.

After abandoning his foolish chase after conditionality, Mr. K. fled for support to the supposed "endless penalty of God's law"—and from thence he presently travelled off in another direction, to see what support and assistance he could gain by bringing into the field, a personal, omniscient, and omnipotent devil. His embarrassment while pleading the cause of his devil, was evident to the most careless observer—and well might he have manifested some embarrassment, while entertaining so low an opinion of his audience, as to suppose that they could not see the irrelevancy of his bringing a personal devil, to prove that the Bible teaches the doctrine of endless misery.

Next came his "general judgment"—which brought us up to Thursday night; having consumed two whole days, without bringing forward one single proof, in favor of the question—"Does the Bible teach the doctrine of endless misery?"

On Friday morning, Mr. K., for the first time, brought forward a passage from the Bible, by which he intended to sustain the affirmative of the question in debate. Br. Morse followed after him, and patiently removed every argument which was adduced. Showing from "Orthodox" commentators themselves, that the passages brought up, do not support the awful doctrine of ceaseless woe. Finding all his arguments refuted as fast as brought forward, Mr. K. wound off his last speech, with an uproarious childish "boo-hoo"; evidently intending in this way to distract the attention of the audience, and thus prevent their listening to Br. Morse. So well convinced were the congregation that such was his intention, that they listened with evident satisfaction to the severe rebuke which Br. Morse thought proper to administer to him.

One thing surprised us—which was, that the neighboring Methodist clergy, did not cheer their brother's heart by their presence. Br. Morse had the satisfaction of beholding five of his brethren in the ministry in attendance, one of whom came about sixty miles.

Mr. K. boasted of an intimate acquaintance with the principles and writings of Universalists, and made frequent reference to Whittemore's Notes on the Parables. I am inclined to think, however, that Br. Whittemore, had he been present, would have smiled at some of his pretended quotations from the book. On the whole, I think this discussion will do good. It has thrown some light before the "Orthodox" portion of community; and if it should induce Mr. K. to study Universalism, before he again attempts to annihilate it, it would certainly save him much embarrassment and mortification.

-PARTIALISM CHANGING GROUND.

The following extracts are copied from the Star in the West—we have not been able to find the Rev. Asa Shinn's work, so as to examine, and select from it for ourselves—and the comments which we put in [ ] brackets, for distinction sake, are from the pen of Br. E. M. Pingree, the Associate Editor of the Star. We have not given all his comments, so that we could give all the extracts from Mr. Shinn's work, deeming them the most interesting and important to our readers.

This work forms another "sign of the times" in regard to the changes of so-called Orthodoxy. Total, inate, and hereditary depravity—the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity—the modifications of old fashioned Calvinism, extending even to the alteration of the Westminster Assembly's Catechism, (which has lately been purged of some of its grossness by the Congregationalists in the vicinity of Boston)—the attempts lately made to drive Universalists from the doctrine of limited future punishment, so as to appropriate the believers in that sentiment to the "Orthodox" or "Evangelical" (!) party—and various other changes that have been made during the last few years, all led us to prepare for some such change as this work of Mr. Shinn's holds out—some new field on which the great battle between Universalism and Partialism must yet be fought. If Mr. Shinn's system is adopted, the next question will be between positive and limited punishment, and indefinite (not infinite) punishment. But to the extracts, they will speak for themselves, and are ably commented on by Br. Pingree. It is proper to add, that Mr. Shinn's views are new only in this country—substantially the same scheme is held by many of those "Evangelical" theologians of Germany who hold to the doctrine of endless misery—viz., the exercise of free agency in the immortal state, and the consequent repentance of many of the damned in hell. ## NEW WORK—NEW GROUND.

Review of Rev. Asa Shinn's work "on the Benevolence and Rectitude of the Supreme Being."

BY REV. E. M. PINGREE.

[This work has already been referred to in the STAR; but it is proposed, in this article, to notice it more extensively. The writer, it is well known, is a prominent Minister of the Protestant Methodist Church—a man of talent, who writes with much clearness and force; but most important of all, he has broken—as far as my limited knowledge extends—new ground in theology. He has taken a position, which, if it attracts much attention among the Orthodox sects, will effect a great revolution in the religious opinions of the people of this country.]

[Let it be kept in mind however, that Mr. Shinn does not believe in the salvation of all men; that is to say, he denies the doctrines of Universalism and Restorationism. Concerning the former as a distinct system from the latter, he says, p. 239, "It obviously saps the foundation of responsibility, opens wide the door for accumulating ungodliness and crime." He then calls it "a covert scheme of infidelity." Hence he lets this pass without any opposing argument; but to the latter he devotes much attention, arguing against it at some length; especially on p. 239–248.]

[But to the important principles above referred to. 1. "God is love;" and there is nothing in his character opposed to this principle. Even "wrath is kindled at the fountain of love," p. 174, and is "the energy of love," p. 170. 2. God will always seek the good of all his creatures; whether in time or eternity; in heaven, earth or hell. He will eternally seek to make all "holy and happy," that are willing to be made so," p. 318. 3. He believes in eternal punishment; and yet, 4. Believes there may be a change of moral character among the damned, that men may repent in hell, and that there may be a corresponding abatement of sufferings; still, 5. All will not be happy in heaven. 6. He denies that the misery of the damned will be infinite, or that it will be as great as it can be, or as it is commonly represented to be; but that it will be strictly according to justice, and the exact demerit of sin.]

[Concerning God's wrath, he has the following just remarks, showing that, according to the common opinion, God's wrath is like the devil's wrath! and we could hardly tell which was the worse being, p. 170.]

"Now the question before us is this: does the wrath or vengeance of the Lord proceed from the same source with his mercy and kindness, or from a different source? Is wrath, in a holy Being, any thing else than the energy of love? Or is it something opposite to love? There are two kinds of wrath, that are to be carefully distinguished; the one is the action of justice, which flows from love; the other, the operation of injustice, which proceeds from malevolence. The devil is represented as a very wrathful being, and we are told he was a murderer from the beginning. It will doubtless be granted by all Christians, that there is no such wrath as this in the Almighty. Nay, it must be admitted, that if the Divine character be opposite to the character of the devil, which none will deny, the wrath of God proceeds from an opposite principle; therefore as the devil's wrath proceeds from malevolence, the Divine wrath results from the principle stated above. Some appear to think that a perfectly benevolent Being can have in his nature no such thing as wrath; while others conclude, 'A God all mercy, is a God unjust.' These seemingly opposite opinions, however, will probably be found to be nothing more than a dispute about words. To say an unjust being is at the same time all mercy, is a paradox that can not bear examination."

[The following is one of the most important passages in the book, showing Mr. Shinn's opinion in reference to the object of divine punishments, as the result of divine wrath; p. 178.]

"The wrath of God is not animosity towards sinners; for he delights to pardon them; whenever it can be done without giving up his kingdom, and sacrificing the welfare of his unoffending subjects. The redemption of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ was intended to open the way for the pardon of sin to be extended as far as it is possible for mercy to extend it. That is, so far as will not impair the moral system on which the common welfare depends; and beyond this, the grant of pardon would be unmerciful. Divine wrath, when put into a flame, is kindled at the fountain of love. It punishes the sinner, in order either mercifully to reform him, or kindly to protect the general happiness. Even in the wonderful suffering of redeeming love, wrath and mercy operated in perfect harmony."

[As already said, Mr. Shinn believes that God will have some good will toward even the damned in hell, and will seek their good, even there. This, all know, will be considered a great heresy in the minds of the Orthodox generally; for they suppose that God will have no more benevolence for them, than for the devil himself. But we might ask, Why not? Who will tell? But hear Mr. S. p. 222.]

"But does not this suppose that God will exercise benevolence toward the damned? He is certainly disposed to favor them as much as he can without injury to others. Will any man have the assurance to say, that the Divine action towards them will proceed from the principle of malignity? We are aware of the answer, that future punishment will be the act of Divine justice. True: for justice is one essential part of God's eternal character of love. Justice secures to every one that which is right; and consequently, it secures to every criminal an exemption from all degrees of punishment that would be wrong. If God will carry on an administration of justice over hell, it is because hell is under his government, as well as heaven; and consequently its destinies are regulated by the same principles. Is he just in one part of his dominions, and unjust in another? Has he good-will towards a part of his creatures, and ill-will towards another part?"

[And again to the same effect, on p. 250.]

"We are aware, that the alarm of heresy will be taken, at the least deviation from the supposed uniformity and infinity of hell torments. It is thought essential to the sound and orthodox view of this subject, to believe that all who are condemned in a future state, are entirely abandoned to absolute misery; that no degree of regard will be had to their welfare, throughout eternal ages; and that any concern for them, other than to perpetuate their misery, is not to be supposed to exist in the Divine Mind, and can not be entertained by any man, without inexcusable heterodoxy."

"But why should all regard to the welfare of the millions of those wretched creatures be abandoned forever? Has the Deity no right to entertain any other disposition towards them, than that of a fixed purpose to perpetuate and augment their misery? If he has a right to entertain other sentiments towards them, then it would not be wrong for him to aim ultimately at their well-being, so far as it could be promoted without injury to others. If it would not be wrong for God to do so, then it is not a heresy for us to believe he may, at some time or other, modify their condition, with a view to an abatement of their misery, so far as will consist with the common welfare. Would such a procedure be unworthy of our Creator? Would it tarnish his glory? Would it grieve and offend his holy angels? If at any future period of eternity, a benefit could be extended to some of God's creatures, without injury to any, has not God authority to extend to them that benefit? If he has, who will be offended to see him exercise it? If he has not, in what way has his authority been forfeited?"

[In reference to his opinion that God will seek to bring about universal holiness, we find the following language on pp. 248-9.]

"The three great axioms of Christian theology are these: First, that the God of infinite wisdom, power and love, has formed the best possible plan of holiness and happiness."

"Secondly, that upon this plan he operates in the best possible manner, to accomplish the good originally intended."

"Thirdly, that his impartial mind has no respect to persons, but that towards all individuals, and in all periods of time and eternity, he invariably and immutably uses the best and most efficient means to promote holiness and happiness, and to prevent and diminish sin and misery."

[This is also expressed on p. 353.]

"A holy Being delights in holiness; and of course, is disposed to promote holiness as effectually and universally as it can be promoted; consequently, the Holy One of Israel never will do anything to prevent the spread of holiness in any region of the universe, where moral agents are willing it should prevail. He will never do any thing to hinder any of his creatures from repenting of their sins and becoming holy; for this is what the devil has been doing ever since sin entered into the world. To affirm that our Creator will pursue this course in a future state, is to suppose the most holy Being, and the most unholy one, will manifest themselves alike, both in purpose and in operation."

[We come now to the strongest part of Mr. Shinn's doctrine, and that part which will excite the greatest apprehensions of the Orthodox; to wit, that the sufferings of the damned will not be uniform for ever; but that there may be an abatement of them, as moral character may become conformed to the will of God. This is brought to view on p. 237.]

"But that the state of the damned will remain uniform, without any modifications of their condition, through the depths of eternal duration, is a matter that no man is able to prove. The reasons for the severity of their punishment, are found in the moral state of their own minds; if this should become modified in individuals during the progress of eternity, so that there would be less fuel for Divine wrath to operate upon, we may suppose there would be a corresponding abatement of their sufferings. The fire shall never be quenched; but the force of its action will be varied according to the state of the subject on which it operates. And why shall this fire never be quenched? Because no hostile power will ever be able to quench it, either by changing the holy character of God, or by controlling the righteous action of his administration. The eternal fire of his anger and fury is against the spirit of a corrupt malignity; and to quench this fire would be to change the glory and loveliness of the Eternal Mind. For let it be remembered, that our God is a consuming fire.—Heb. xii."

[Concluded next week.]

Dr. Adam Clarke, in his comments upon Romans v: 21, he speaks as follows:

"As sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord."—As extensively, as deeply, as universally, as sin, whether implying the act of transgression, or the impure principle, from which the act proceeds, or both—hath reigned, subjected the whole earth and all its inhabitants; the whole soul and all its powers and faculties, unto death, temporal of the body, and spiritual of the soul, and eternal of both; even so, as extensively, deeply, and universally, might grace reign, filling the whole earth, and pervading, purifying and refining the whole soul; through righteousness, through this doctrine of free salvation, by the blood of the Lamb, and by the principle of holiness, transfused through the soul by the Holy Ghost; unto eternal life, the proper object of an immortal spirit's hope, the only sphere where the human intellect can rest, and be happy in the place and state where God is; where he is seen as HE IS; and where he can be enjoyed without interruption in an eternal profession of knowledge and beatitude; by Jesus Christ our Lord, as the cause of our salvation, the means by which it is communicated, and the source whence it springs. Thus we find that salvation from sin here, is as extensive and complete as the guilt and contamination of sin; DEATH IS CONQUERED, HELL DISAPPOINTED, THE DEVIL CONFOUNDED AND SIN DESTROYED. Here is glory to him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and has made us kings and priests to God and his Father, to whom be glory and dominion forever and ever, Amen! Hallelujah! The Lord God omnipotent reigneth! Amen! and Amen!!"

Reader, if the Rev. John Murray or Hosea Ballou had been the author of the above remarks, do you not suppose our Methodist friends would look upon them as rather strongly tinctured with a certain very gross and soul destroying error, known generally by the name, UNIVERSALISM.—Palladium and Amulet.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. 21.

"And he spake this parable unto certain [men] which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others. Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a pharisee, and the other a publican.—The pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself: God, I thank thee that I am not as other men; extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican; I fast twice in the week; I give tithes to all that I possess. And the publican standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner. I tell you this man went down to his house justified rather than the other; for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased—and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." Luke xviii: 9-14.

Observe the prayer of him who trusted that he was righteous and despised others. He thanked God that he was not as other men, and he boasted that he fasted and paid tithes. And yet what did the Saviour say of the very sect of pharisees, to which this self-righteous man belonged? He called them robbers of widow's houses, the binders of heavy burdens upon men, and those who, while they discharged the minute and ceremonial parts of the law, yet disregarded the weightier matters of justice, judgment and mercy, matters of more importance than all the ceremonies in the world.

How far many of the pharisees carried their notions of self-righteousness, the following history, quoted by Dr. A. Clarke, from a Jewish writing, will show.—"Rabbi Simcon, the son of Jocai, said; the whole world is not worth thirty righteous persons, such as our Father Abraham. If there were only thirty righteous persons in the world, I and my son should make two of them; and if there were but twenty, I and my son would be of the number; and if there were but ten, I and my son would be of the number; and if there were but five, I and my son would be of the five; and if there were but two, I and my son would be those two; and if there were but one, myself should be that one." A. Clarke, on Luke 18: 12.

In this self-righteousness, the Pharisees represented the Deity as acting just as they would have done, if they had possessed infinite power. They believed that he had fitted up a heaven for their righteous selves, and that no Gentile dog would ever be permitted to enter it. And believing that they were the favorites of Heaven here and would be hereafter, so they treated all whom they considered heretics with the most supreme contempt. Well did our Saviour rebuke them.

And well were it for the world, if the spirit of Phariseism had been confined to the age in which the Saviour condemned it. But in all ages of the Christian church, there have been those whose religion is mere form—who make their long prayers, attend to all the duties of the sanctuary, and yet who oppress community, are hard to the poor, and grinding in their bargains—in fact, who, like the Pharisees of ancient days, while they are ceremonious, omit the weighty and important matters of justice, judgment and mercy. And need I remark, that there are those, who, arrogating all religion to themselves, consider themselves the favorites of Heaven, and that God will exclude from heaven, all who do not believe their creed and whom they deem heretics. This pride of opinion and arrogance of self-righteousness, have been the foundation of a great share of religious persecutions. For, when a body of people absolutely deem themselves perfectly safe, that they are right and all others are wrong, that God loves them and hates heretics, how perfectly natural it is to persecute those whom God hates. It was this spirit that crucified the Saviour. And it is this self-same spirit which now rages among the sects, causing them to slander one another, because they do not believe alike, and think they can not believe alike.

To obtain just notions of the character of Deity—to see in him the Father, Creator and Preserver of all—to behold him watching over all the creatures of his hand and satisfying their rationally multiplied wants—to hear him, through Christ, exhort his offspring to forgive their enemies, that they may become characteristically his children—to see in him the love, the everlasting, immutable and undying love, which sent the Saviour to taste "death for every man," to give himself a "ransom for all to be testified in due time," to shed his blood as a Lamb for sacrifice, that life and truth might dawn upon the world—fill the soul with that humility which induced the publican to pray, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Such humility is acceptable in the sight of God.

SPIRIT OF THE OPPOSITION.

For a few years past we have enjoyed a comparative calm. Protracted meetings have been few in number, and generally were conducted with some decency and moderation. Preachers of endless wrath busied themselves in preaching their own distinctive tenets, or in settling the quarrels and divisions of their own respective sects—at all events, they seldom said anything about Universalism and Universalists. The Partialist press has also pursued the same general course, excepting a manufactured anecdote, now and then. But of late, the latter means of spreading truth or error, (as the case may be,) has been roused up, and an out pouring of bitterness, wrath and malignity has been commenced in New-York city, and the gall and wormwood of sectarian spite has been swallowed down and revomited by the buzzards of the country press, until it has exceeded all former instances. It is not a warfare with opinions or tenets—not a correction of mistakes or morals—but an attack on private losses and misfortunes, attended with every distortion, suppression and perversion that malice can dictate. The New-York Evangelist generally leads the van, and the Baptist Register of this city usually swallows down the abuse and revomits it with every token of gratification, as it follows in the pathway of attack thus marked out.

Thus, the removal of one preacher from New-York city, and the renunciation of another, left but one preacher in that city, for a few months. This was eagerly seized on, and copied far and wide, as proof of the downfall of our cause in that city!—and that, too, when our congregations there were increasing in numbers, zeal, strength and mutual confidence from week to week! Thus these papers deceived their readers. More recently Br. Price and ourselves have called for aid in collecting our outstanding accounts, and in increasing our subscription lists, that we may free ourselves from pecuniary embarrassments fastened on us by the difficulties of the past few years. Immediately a misrepresentation of the causes is got up by the Evangelist and copied by papers of that kidney—distorting and concealing facts, and ridiculing personal misfortunes and losses—so as to induce a belief that Universalists have either no pecuniary strength, or not common honesty! What adds to the ungodliness and inhumanity of these misrepresentations, is the fact that the Evangelist is a greater sufferer by the pecuniary weakness or the dishonesty of Presbyterians, than either the Messenger or the Magazine and Advocate is by those faults in Universalists. As to the Baptist Register of this city, our correspondent "W. R.," has shown in our last number, what was its late condition.

The Evangelist, in noticing my remarks on Br. Price's Circular, says—"From a recent article in the Magazine and Advocate, a Universalist paper published at Utica, N. Y., we learn that 'the number of papers circulated in this large State, embracing so many professed believers in Universalism, is but little more than half as large as it was three years ago.' This can not be entirely owing to reverses in business, because the same Editor assures us, that 'there are thousands who could, and who should take a paper, (and some of them two papers,) who do not take any.'" All very true—and as true of Baptist and Presbyterian subscribers and believers, as of Universalists. The Register in this city had to "cut down" its list very much a few years ago—and various Partialist journals have died off, by discontinuances and losses; and there are thousands in each of these sects who take no paper, and yet are able to take one or more.

But, to show more completely the petty malice and meanness of this opposer, we copy the following expose from the Messenger, cordially agreeing in the sentiment of the closing paragraph. A. B. G.

"A SINKING CONCERN"

Such is the caption Rev. E. F. Hatfield gives to an article in the editorial department of the last New-York Evangelist. It comprises an extract from Br. Grosh's late remarks in reference to the affairs of the Magazine and Advocate, and the Union and Messenger, and other extracts from what we have said in regard to the business matters of this paper, put together as a matter of course to suit his own purpose and object in the notice, and winding up with a characteristic exultation over the pecuniary difficulties of this establishment.

We can pardon Mr. Hatfield a good deal of his spite toward this paper, for it has latterly been the medium of many pungent reproofs to him for his waywardness, and much wholesome advice, which he is evidently not yet in the right spirit to receive properly and kindly; and having had his mouth sealed in regard to his late hopeful convert from Universalism, it is quite necessary he should have something whereon to vent his feelings, and it may as well be our misfortunes as anything else!

Without stopping to comment on his gross misrepresentation of our language, which predicated our embarrassments on the amount of our outstanding debts, and assigned as the principal reason of their accumulation, the unparalleled state of the times for a few years past, we will proceed to state a few facts touching the pure, and exalted, and efficient orthodoxy of which Mr. Hatfield is a professor.

And first. This very New-York Evangelist, through whose editorial columns Mr. Hatfield is piously exulting over the pecuniary misfortunes of his neighbor, because that neighbor indulges more liberal and enlarged views of the character of God than can possibly enter into his own partial and contracted heart, has undergone greater difficulties and embarrassments than ever did the Union or the Magazine and Advocate? The proprietor who left it two years ago last Spring, told us with his own mouth, that he had at that time twenty-five thousand dollars, in subscriptions not standing. And within a year has observed to us that he had not yet realized one-fifth of the amount! This is the way, then, in which the moral and sanctifying doctrine of endless misery makes its professors pay their newspaper subscriptions! This is a specimen of the moral and pecuniary strength of Presbyterians!

Again. The proprietors who succeeded the one above, went on struggling with "every imaginable pecuniary difficulty"—at least we may well suppose so, for a year ago, or more, they could not meet the regular expenses of their office, as their pressman had great difficulty in getting his pay—frequently, he said, had to take money that he was compelled to take to a broker's and get shaved at from 6 to 12 per cent., and finally had to sue them for a bill of a hundred or two dollars! And if we are not much mistaken their compositors fared no better, and one even quit, refusing the money! And at this very time, Mr. Johnson, the Editor of the Evangelist, was taunting the Union about "burying itself to exchange the credit for the cash system," as may be seen by the early numbers of this volume. Beautiful consistency this!

But the proprietors of the Evangelist continued to struggle along till April last, when they failed—became "bankrupt," as the very charitable Mr. Hatfield would say—assigned their property for the benefit of their creditors! The readers of the Evangelist, however, knew nothing of it directly. The proprietors' names were quietly dropped from the head of the paper, and in a few weeks the names of "Hunt and Johnson, Proprietors," as quietly went up! Notice of their assignment was not given in their own columns, but placed among the multitude of advertisements in a large commercial paper.

"And is this the boasted strength and goodness of" Presbyterianism? "Can not the whole body in this city"—the twenty, or thirty, or perhaps forty, churches—"afford to pay a poor Editor," or his publishers, "enough to keep them from starving?"

Again. E. W. Chester, Esq., formerly Editor of the Evangelist, bears the following testimony to the "strength and goodness" of Presbyterianism in sustaining religious periodicals. It appeared in the editorial columns of the Evangelist, July 6, 1839, the first article under the head.

"A RETURN TO THE LAW.—The temporary connexion of the subscriber with the Evangelist is about to expire. After sinking no less than $7,500 in sustaining a religious paper for about three years, he betakes himself again to his profession, the law."

In a late number of the Evangelist, Mr. Chester appears again, in an article of some length, defending himself against certain insinuations that had been thrown out. He says a former proprietor of the same paper told him he had sunk about $5,000 in sustaining it—another firm something like the same amount, and another individual a very considerable sum more, to which we must add Mr. Chester's own losses, and we then have the very handsome sum of twenty thousand dollars, or rising, all sunk in endeavoring to sustain one Presbyterian paper!

Again we exclaim, "Is this the boasted strength and goodness" of Presbyterianism! Is this the evidence of its "moral," and sanctifying power over Universalism!

In view of all these facts, the Rev. E. F. Hatfield, pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian church, in New-York, through the editorial columns of the Evangelist itself, can exult over the pecuniary difficulties of a Universalist paper—can cantingly talk about the "moral and pecuniary strength" of Universalists! Fie, fie, Mr. Hatfield, you had better, much better, be engaged in proclaiming the power and greatness, the distinguished talents and influence of converts from Universalism!

A word in conclusion. We rejoice in no man's misfortunes—we can sympathize with any one, friend or opposer, from our own experience—would despise the idea of adverting to the pecuniary difficulties of the Evangelist, but to exhibit the conduct of Mr. Hatfield in its true light in this business, and show how hopeless must be his situation when he can find nothing better than our pecuniary misfortunes, whereof to accuse Universalism!

THE END OF THE MATTER.

Having received a communication commenting on a statement made by Br. D. Pickering, and calculated, if published, to elicit a controversy in our columns for which neither we nor our readers have any inclination,

POETRY.

[From the New-York American.]
TO MY MOTHER.

Mother, I kneel upon thy grave,
And tears are falling fast,
As o'er me now come rushing on
The memories of the past:
Of Summer days, when youth and hope
Were glowing in my soul,
Life's silver chord was tuned to joy,
And full its golden bowl;
When earth seemed fair around me,
When skies looked bright above,
When my spirit leaped in gladness,
For thou wert near to love.
When thy sweet voice, my mother,
When the close of day had come,
Rose in low prayer to Him on high,
That He would bless our home.
Again I see thee, Mother,
Again that loved voice hear,
Like an angel tone of a better world,
It is falling on my ear.
I see thee stand with out-stretched arms,
With joy upon thy face,
I feel thy warm kiss on my cheek,
I fall in thy embrace.
Thou chidest me, my mother,
Yet thy words are soft and mild,
And amid thick tears of sorrow,
You bless your erring child.
Thou cheerest me, my mother,
An honored name to win,
And not from virtue's peaceful ways,
To stray in paths of sin.
When in life's last, most fearful hour,
Thy brow with death was chill,
I see thee calmly yield thyself
To thy holy Father's will.
And with a fearless trust on Him,
Who had the power to save,
Enter as one with armor on,
The portals of the grave.
I see upon thy pale cold clay,
That heavenly smile of rest,
Which told to earth thy spirit's bliss,
In the regions of the blest.
Oh! mother, if from you bright land,
Thy spirit looks on me,
And here I kneel upon the sod,
Which now is covering thee.
I ask forgiveness for the un-
Kind word, the look or frown,
Which must have bow'd to earth
Thy gentle nature down.
I feel them now, dear mother,
Deep into my soul they sink,
And fill for me, at this sad hour,
A bitter cup to drink.
Oh! could the tears which dim my eyes,
Recall them back again,
I'd pour them on thy resting place,
As clouds pour down their rain.
Since the grave has held thee, mother,
Winter hath spent its blast,
Spring's flowers have bloomed and withered,
The tree its leaf hath cast.
And I have walked, with spirit sad,
Amid earth's busy throng,
And felt their joy was not for me,
Or their merry dance, or song,
I have felt alone, deserted,
In a world both dark and drear,
Where most will blame, discourage,
And few forgive and cheer.
Yet, mother, now I'll nerve myself
To break this gloomy spell,
And tread the path, where duty points,
Both wisely, true and well.
And be thy spirit o'er me,
With a meek and holy power,
When darkness lies upon my path.

And tempests round me lower.
Be o'er me in my hour of joy,
Lest pride my heart should fill.—
Be o'er me in my hour of grief,
My troubled bosom still,—
Be o'er me in my hour of strife,
And calm the raging soul.—
Be o'er me when temptation holds
Her wreathed and sparkling bowl.
I leave thy grave, my mother,
To journey on through life,
To mingle with its restless tide,
Its battle and its strife.
And when a few more flowers shall bloom,
And Summer's suns shall shine,
They'll bear me to this narrow house,
And lay my head by thine.
Then my freed spirit, mother,
Shall stand with thine in light,
Before you throne of glory,
With God's own radiance bright,
In never-fading realms of bliss,
With angel harps to raise,
As endless ages roll their course,
The songs of joy and praise.

THE BRIGHT SIDE OF HUMANITY.

There are good men everywhere. There are men who are good for goodness' sake. In obscurity, in retirement, scarcely known to the world, and never asking to be known, there are good men—in adversity, in poverty, amid temptations, amid all the severities of earthly trials, there are good men, whose lives shed brightness upon the dark clouds that surround them.—Be it true, if we must admit the sad truth, that many are estranged from infinite goodness; that many are coldly selfish and meanly sensual—cold, and dead to every thing that is not wrapped up in their own earthly interest, or more darkly wrapped up in the veil of fleshly appetites. Be it so; but I thank God, that it is not all that we are obliged to believe. No; there are true hearts, amid the throng of the false and faithless. There are warm and generous hearts, which the cold atmosphere of surrounding selfishness never chills; and eyes unused to weep for personal sorrow, which often overflow with sympathy for the sorrow of others. Yes, there are good men, and true men; I thank them, I bless them for what they are. God, from on high, doth bless them, and he giveth his angels charge to keep them; and no where in the holy record are these words more precious or strong than those in which it is written, that God loveth these righteous ones.

Such men there are. Let not their precious virtues be distrusted. As surely and as evidently as some men have obeyed the calls of ambition and pleasure, so surely and so evidently have other men obeyed the voice of conscience and "chosen rather to suffer with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." Why, every meek man suffers in a conflict keener far than the contest for honor and applause. And there are such men, who amid injury and insult, and misconstruction, and the pointed finger, and the scornful lip of pride, stand firm in their integrity and allegiance to a loftier principle, and still their throbbing hearts in prayer, and hush them to the gentle emotion of kindness and pity. Such witnesses there are, even in this bad world, signs that a redeeming work is going forward amid its mournful derelictions; proofs that it is not a world forsaken of heaven; pledges that it will not be forsaken; tokens that cheer and touch every good and thoughtful mind, beyond all other power of earth, to penetrate and enkindle it.—Dewey.

M. BRIDAIN.—Bridain was one of the most celebrated of the French preachers. Mermontel relates, that in his sermons he sometimes had recourse to the interesting method of parables, with a view the more forcibly to impress important truths on the minds of his hearers.—Preaching on the suffering of Christ, he expressed himself thus: "A man accused of a crime of which he was innocent, was condemned to death by the iniquity of his judges. He was led to punishment, but no gibbet was prepared, nor was there any executioner to perform the sentence. The people, moved with compassion, hoped that this sufferer would escape death. But one man raised his voice and said, 'I am going to prepare a gibbet, and I will be the executioner.' You groan with indignation! Well, my brethren, in each of you I behold this cruel man. Here are no Jews today, to crucify Jesus Christ; but you dare to rise up and say, 'I will crucify him.'" Marmontel adds, that he heard these words pronounced by the preacher, though very young, with all the dignity of an apostle, and with the most powerful emotion, and that such was the effect that nothing was heard but the sobs of the auditory.

A WIFE.

When a man of sense comes to marry it is a companion that he wants, not an artist. It is not merely a creature who can paint, and play, and sing, and dance; it is a being who can comfort and judge, and discourse and discriminate; one who can assist him in his affairs, lighten his sorrows, purify his joys, strengthen his principles and educate his children. Such is the woman who is fit for a mother and the mistress of a family. A woman of the former description occasionally figures in the drawing room, and attracts the admiration of company, but she is entirely unfit for a helpmate to a man, and to "train up a child in the way he should go."

A military officer being at sea, in a dreadful storm, his lady, who was sitting near him, and filled with alarm at the safety of the vessel, was so surprised at his composure and serenity, that she cried out, "My dear are you not afraid?" How is it possible you can be so calm in such a storm?" He arose from a chair lashed to the deck, and supporting himself by a pillar of a bed place, he drew his sword, and pointing it to the breast of his wife, he exclaimed, "Are you not afraid?" She instantly replied, "No, certainly not." "Why?" said the officer. "Because," rejoined the lady, "I know the sword is in the hands of my husband, and he loves me too well to hurt me." "Then," said he, "remember I know in whom I have believed, and that he holds the winds in his fist, and the waters in the hollow of his hand."

PRACTICAL SARCASM.—One of the most ingenious practical sarcasms ever made use of, was that of the late Rev. Robert Hall, addressed to a clergyman who had obtained a lucrative living after a change of religious opinions. Mr. Hall pressed him hard upon the question of "church reform." The gentleman's constant answer to the arguments advanced to him was—"I can't see it." "I don't see that at all." At last Mr. Hall took a letter from his pocket, and wrote on the back with his pencil, in small letters, the word "God." "Do you see that?" "Yes." He then covered it with a piece of gold. "Do you see it now?" "No." "I must wish you a good morning, Sir," said Hall, and left him to his meditations.

LEARNING.—Accomplishments and ornamental learning are sometimes acquired at the expense of usefulness. The tree which grows the tallest and is most thickly covered with leaves, is not the best bearer, but rather the contrary.

MARRIAGES.

In Rochester, November 5th, by Rev. J. Chase, Mr. DANIEL V. ROGERS, of Alden, Erie county, to Miss ANNA GAIL, BABCOCK, of Riga.

In same place, by the same, Mr. EDWARD BEERS, of Piusford, to Mrs. ELLEN SNOWDEN, of Rochester.

In the Universalist meeting-house in Oxford, on Sunday morning, November 1st, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. S. E. BARRY, of Preston, to Miss NANCY BARRY, of Madenough.

DEATHS.

In Smithville, September 5th, WM. T., infant son of Edward L. Wilcox, aged 5 months.

In Greene, November 12th, SARAH JANE, infant daughter of D. F. Smith, aged about four weeks. J. T. G.

In Litchfield, November 13th, of dropsy on the brain, LUCINDA M. BALL, daughter of Joseph and Lucy Ball, aged 16 years. Two weeks before her death, she was apparently in good health, nor was her danger known, until a few days before her departure. For a part of the time that her danger was known, she appeared comparatively insensible to pain; and while the light of consciousness beamed upon her, she murmured not, for she was a stranger to murmuring or distrust in her heavenly Father. In excellence she was beautiful in life, and her memory made her lovely even in death. And O, it was painful to think that all that remained on earth of that much loved being, must be conveyed to the chambers of decay. But God has not left her parents, and most of her relatives, without the strong assurance of a reunion in the immortal world. Her modest deportment, and exalted virtue, and superior intellectual attainments, endeared her to an extensive circle of companions and friends. She was a constant and happy attendant at the Universalist meetings in that place, and member of the choir, where her voice has long been heard in the songs of Zion. But though her voice is hushed on earth, a heavenly song shall be given her in the immortal world; for her glad heart shall be tuned to the anthem of praise to God and the Lamb forever and ever.—Sermon on the 15th, by A. ## NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION....NO. XVI.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die. And...thou sowest not that body that shall be. But God giveth it a body.....So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption.....It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.....As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly."—PAUL.

In this number will be presented what we deem a fair and weighty argument for the progressiveness of the resurrection, founded mainly upon the manner in which the present and future tenses are applied to the subject by Paul in 1 Cor. 15th chapter, and in 1 Thess. 4th. Not that we have forgotten, or have any idea of recalling, the concession which we have made in the course of these articles, that the tenses of verbs in the New Testament, inasmuch as they are not always used with grammatical precision, can not be safely relied upon in all cases, as indicating each a certain specific time. It is unquestionably a fact, that the tenses are sometimes applied in quite an indeterminate manner. Yet it is also a fact, that, to say the least, they do actually express, as often as otherwise, each its own proper time. We even affirm that in the argumentative portions of Scripture, they are, for the most part, applied with a good deal of precision. It is in a declaratory language, chiefly, that their indeterminateness appears.

In verse 35 of the chapter first mentioned, the apostle remarks, "But some man will say, 'How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?'" to which question he replies, according to the common version, "Thou fool, [properly, thou inconsiderate or unreflecting person,] that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die. And [as to] that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare [that is mere] grain; it may chance of wheat or of some other grain; but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his [properly, its] own body." He then adds three verses of the nature of a parenthesis, setting forth, 1. That not all bodies are formed of the same material—("there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts," etc.)—2. That there are different classes of bodies—"celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial;" 3. That the two classes have different kinds or degrees of glory—"the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another;" 4. That this is also the case among bodies of the same class, and even of the same order—"there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon," etc.; "One star differeth from another star in glory;" Then follows the application of his simile respecting the grain: "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body," etc., etc.

I deem the above passage to be strong proof that Paul believed the resurrection to be going on, and that he expected and designed to be so understood. For

1. The asking how the dead are raised up, instead of how they will be, is at least perfectly in accordance with the idea that the questioner had understood the apostle as teaching a passing resurrection; and the inquiry, "With what body DO the dead come?" instead of, With what body will they come? manifestly requires no small stretch of interpretation to even make it seem otherwise than totally inconsistent with the supposition that the person presenting it had understood him as teaching that the resurrection is altogether future.

But it may be objected that the wisest and acutest are liable to misunderstand; and moreover that the apostle charges this man with the absence, if not of intellect, at least of its proper use; hence that his having understood the apostle as he seems to have done, is no certain sign that the latter intended to be so understood.—Observe, then,

2. The interrogatives, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" are put into the mouth of the objector by the apostle himself, who would not be very likely to misunderstand his own language. And, besides,

3. As it was the manner, or perhaps rather, the practicability of the resurrection which was the point in question, it is highly improbable that the apostle would make the objector to have misunderstood, or to mistake, his teachings in respect to the time of that event. Yea, it is incredible that he would do this without afterwards offering some correction of the mistake or misstatement; yet, he certainly is chargeable with having done it, if his doctrine here is, that the resurrection is exclusively future.

It is important to observe, also, that when he comes to show the application of his simile respecting the grain, his language accords much better with a passing resurrection than with one altogether to come. Thus he says of something without naming what, (for even the word "it," which appears in the common version of the passage, though almost perfectly indefinite, is not in the original.) "It is sown in corruption.....it is sown in dishonor.....it is sown in weakness.....it is sown a natural body." Now whatever it is that he would here have us understand as sown; whether he is speaking of man's introduction into existence, or of his body's being committed to the grave—one point is clear—the thing is being done; this process is undergoing repetition from time to time. But he says, also, using the same form of expression, "It is raised in incorruption.... it is raised in glory....it is raised in power....it is raised a spiritual body." Now, then, if to be sown is a process which each individual experiences separately, and which in relation to the race is continually going on, (and who will dispute this?) why is not the same thing true as respects being raised, seeing that the same form of expression, four times repeated, is applied as well to the one process as to the other, and all in the same sentence?

Again: in reply to the questions, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" the apostle tells his questioner, in amount, that when grain is sown it dies, (that is, the kernel perishes, and is no more a kernel,) and yet the grain shoots into life, and is furnished with a body, not the same one that was sown. Now if he had added, "So also will be the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it will be raised in incorruption;" and so of the rest, this would have been perfectly in accordance with an exclusively future resurrection. But instead of this, he says, as we have seen, "So also is the resurrection of the dead....it is raised in incorruption" etc.: a plain indication, to me, that his doctrine was such as that the use of the future tense in this place would have conveyed a wrong impression.

Once more. The 48th verse, without the supplied words, reads thus: "As the earthy, such they also that are earthy; and as the heavenly, such they also that are heavenly." (We omit the supplied words, not because we deem them incorrect, but because it might else be thought that we build an argument upon them.) Now it will not be disputed that those "that are earthy" are mankind in a state of mortality, who are "such" as was Adam. See the context. And it is equally clear that those "that are heavenly," are mankind in an immortal state, who are (or will be) "such" as is Christ. But the text plainly expresses the very manifest fact that there actually are, in the present time, those "that are earthy;" and it also teaches, and just as plainly, what I must be excused for believing to be a fact, that there actually are in the present time, "they [or those] also that are heavenly," that is to say, human beings who have been raised into a heavenly or immortal state.

We observe further, that in this chapter the rising of the dead has the present tense applied to it some twelve or thirteen times. Will the reader please peruse the chapter, and substitute in his own mind, the future tense for the present in verses 12, 13, 15, 16, 29, 32, 35, 42, 43, 44, and then decide whether, with such an emendation, the most of them do not comport with the doctrine of an all future resurrection much better than they do without it. We give the following as examples: If the dead are not to rise, then is not Christ raised—how will the dead be raised up? and with what body will they come?—It is sown a natural body; it will be raised a spiritual body—there is a natural body, and there will be a spiritual body.

It is admitted that the time of verbs is frequently relative—that when by the language employed, the mind of the reader is carried forward to some future time, an event then to happen, which of course must be future at the time of its being announced, may be intelligibly expressed in the present tense. And this may be the case in some of the texts above referred to, but certainly not in all. Thus, for example, I deem it preposterous to suppose that Paul would introduce some as asking how the dead ARE to be raised up, and with what body DO they come, and then answer the questions in the way we have seen he did, if it was really his intention to teach that the resurrection is exclusively future.

We must now consider those texts in which the future tense occurs. And we expect to show that wherever in these chapters the apostle uses this tense, he applies it in a manner perfectly accordant with that view of the subject which we suppose him to have entertained: since the immortalization of the race as a whole, of the dead in a comprehensive sense, as including all who have or shall have died, of persons then alive on the earth, or to be thus alive at some future time, is as clearly future upon the idea that the resurrection is present and progressing, as upon the idea that it is future and simultaneous.

The rising of Jesus Christ from the dead as a member of the human family, is, as was shown in our last number, an unequivocal and decisive proof that a resurrection to immortality awaits each mortal of the race. But connected with the subject, are certain questions of considerable interest, to which the fact of his rising furnishes no adequate answer: Will there always exist human beings in a state of mortality, passing one after another into the unseen state, as generation shall succeed generation upon earth? If not, how will this vast world full of inhabitants be disposed of? Will they be removed by death? or will they be "translated," as were Enoch and Elijah? Will the earth be depopulated suddenly? or will its inhabitants disappear in gradual succession, till the last shall have no fellow-mortal to witness his exit? To these and similar questions, all our reasoning, from all the facts in our possession, might not ever furnish a satisfactory answer. But it was of some importance that the truth in this case, which had so long been a secret, should at last be made known to mankind; accordingly to the apostle, through the divine goodness, was granted a special revelation of the secret, which secret or mystery he communicates to his brethren in the words following: "Behold I show you a mystery, [or secret.] We shall not all sleep," etc.

There were some in the Corinthian church who, though they believed in the resurrection of Christ, yet contended that there is no resurrection of the dead; (see verse 12;) from which I gather that they taught that in him was exemplified all the resurrection there ever was or ever would be. In opposition to this, Paul argues, as was shown in the preceding number, that as certainly as Christ rose, so certainly do the dead rise.—Thus far he speaks of passing events—of the dying or rising of mankind in the present or passing time. But he goes on to speak of mankind universally, and of course must include future as well as past and passing generations; he therefore employs the future tense, averring that "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Query: Men die one after another—why then are they not raised "even so?"

But though it is a fact that all do die, as Paul here says, we still have his authority for stating it to be a matter of revelation, that not all our race will die. Some will be immortalized without passing through death. See verse 51, already in part quoted, and which will be considered presently. Hence he says, "In Adam all die," using the present tense. So it is a fact that all the dead rise, and that all the dead will rise; yet it is not a fact that each one of mankind will rise from the dead, for some will not die. Hence when the apostle wished to include all our race as the heirs of immortality, he did not affirm that they shall all be raised; but, varying the expression, he says, "shall all be made alive," that is, shall be put in possession of immortal life. We thus perceive that there are two classes of mankind—those who die and then rise to immortality, and those who are to be rendered immortal without dying. To one or the other of these classes belong all our race; hence Paul adds, immediately after the text last quoted, "But every man in his own order;" that is, as I understand him, every one is, or has been, or will be, immortalized in, or after the manner of the class, company or division, to which he belongs.

In verse 49 he observes, "As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Here, by "we" the apostle either personates himself with probably the brethren he was addressing, or else he was speaking in the name of the whole race. In either case, the use of the future tense is perfectly in accordance with a progressing resurrection; and the use of the present tense would have been manifestly incorrect.

Will the reader now please peruse 1 Cor. xv: 51-53—also 1 Thess. iv: 13-17? These passages are supposed to teach, and in stronger and more direct terms than any other part of the Scripture, the doctrine that the immortalization of all mankind is to take place at the same time, and in very nearly the same instant. Those particular expressions in the passages which are chiefly relied upon in proof of this doctrine, we shall now present; also the interpretations commonly given to those expressions; our objections to those interpretations; the view we take of the passages, etc., etc.

1. In Corinthians it is said, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." Here it is thought that Paul speaks in the name of the whole race, as well when saying, "we shall all be changed," as when saying, "we shall not all sleep." The import of the text is hence deemed to be, that all of mankind, at some future time, whether they shall have died, or shall be at that time alive on the earth, will be at that certain time immortalized in a moment. But I can not admit that the expression, "we shall all be changed," was designed by the apostle to apply to, and include, both the dead and the living; for in the same sentence, as if to prevent such an understanding of his words, he adds, "the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed;" thus evincing, to my understanding, that the change is not affirmed of the dead, but only of those who shall not "sleep," or as he says in Thessalonians, who shall be "alive." Hence I understand the text thus; "We," that is the human race, "shall not all die, but we," that is, those who shall not die, "shall all be changed," etc.

But this may be unsatisfactory. Let it then be admitted, for the sake of the argument, that according to this passage, the immortalization of all, both dead and living, is to happen "at the last trump." But now it must not be overlooked, that according to the passage, the whole change is to be effected "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." Now a moment is an indeterminate measure of duration, sometimes longer, sometimes shorter; hence it may be equal to a number of seconds, and may be but a very small part of one. But the time employed in the process of involuntarily shutting and opening the eye, is nearly the same in all cases, and is so short a space of time as to induce the conclusion that "in the twinkling of an eye," is equivalent to saying "in an instant," that is to say, in about the smallest measure of duration, it being difficult to conceive of a point of time or space wholly unextended. In one brief moment, then, as brief as can well be imagined, all the dead are to be raised, and all the living to be changed. And yet in Thessalonians, the apostle, in two different forms of expression, assures his brethren, upon the authority of a special revelation, or as he has it, "by the word of the Lord," that the dead are all to be immortalized before any of the living are to undergo that change. It, then, according to the interpretation we are examining, is a matter of sober revelation that the one of these events is to be finished before the other is to be begun; and yet the two events, separately and singly, first one, and then the other, are to be commenced, and carried on, and consummated, in as brief a space of time as that in which a man can wink his eye! "This," says Paul, "we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive [properly which shall be alive] and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent [that is, shall not precede] them which are asleep." "The dead in Christ shall rise first." How long, first? The moiety of a moment—one half of the twinkling of an eye. I have never meant to be unreasonably hard of belief; but verily, I can not credit the idea that a supernatural revelation was made to the apostle for the special purpose of communicating so trivial a matter as this.

2. In Thessalonians we read, "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them," etc. This is thought to teach that the dead are to be raised and the living to be caught up both at the time when the Lord Jesus shall descend from heaven. It is also thought that the expression, "caught up together with them," imports that those intended by "them" are to be caught up also—that not only the changed living, but also the raised dead, are to be at that time caught up from earth "to meet the Lord in the air." But really, I can not so understand the apostle. For does he not say in verse 14, "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so [we believe that] them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him?" Mark the expression, "will God bring with him," that is to say, with the Lord Jesus. He then in verse 16, adds, as above quoted, "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven," etc. Will it not then be the case, according to Paul's teachings, that those who "sleep in Jesus" will come with him from heaven at that time, instead of being raised from the dead? It certainly appears so to me; but let others understand it differently if they can.

3. The apostle in Corinthians, after mentioning "the last trump," subjoins, "for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." The sense attributed to these words is nearly the same as is thought to be conveyed by the text first cited from Thessalonians, namely, that the dead are to be raised and the living to be changed both at the time when the last trumpet shall sound. Against this interpretation we bring the same objection that we brought against the common interpretation of the text first cited from Thessalonians. And we add merely this, in this place, that admitting the apostle's doctrine to be, that the dead are to be raised all at once at some future time, it seems strange indeed that he should have said so many times in this chapter, that "the dead rise."

I have diligently compared with each other the two passages in hand, from Corinthians and Thessalonians; I have also compared the several parts of each of the passages one with another. And I must say that I find nothing in either or both of the passages which accords not as readily with a progressing resurrection, as with its opposite. Thus in Corinthians we read, as has been quoted, "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed;" yet it by no means necessarily follows that because these three events are mentioned together, and in a certain order, they therefore must certainly happen together, and in exactly that order. The apostle had just said, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." The phrase, "at the last trump," naturally leads to some affirmation respecting the thing thus incidentally mentioned; the affirmation that some shall not sleep, (or die,) and the mention of what shall happen to them, naturally suggests a thought as to the destiny of the rest of mankind, who shall have died; and his language being such as might convey the impression that the dead are to be changed with the living, it was natural for Paul, who employed an amanuensis, to dictate some explanatory remarks rather than order an emendation; hence he adds, "for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed;" a form of expression as well adapted to the mention of events independent of, and far distant from each other, as of those which are nearly and closely connected.

"The dead," here, are indisputably all who shall have died: which remark is equally applicable to the text in Thessalonians, "the dead in Christ shall rise first." And, as has been before observed, the rising of the dead in this universal sense, is as clearly future upon my view of the subject, as upon any other.

"And the dead in Christ shall rise first." This remark of the apostle, as it stands in the common version, is preceded and followed by a colon: a fact indicating that the rising here mentioned is not intended to be set forth as an event to happen after the descent of the Saviour, but rather before; not second, but "first." Its import, to me, is the same as would be indicated by the following reading: "For the Lord Jesus shall personally come down from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trumpet of God: (now the dead in Christ shall rise before this:) then we who shall be alive," etc.

In 1 Cor. xv: 23, we read, "Christ the first fruits: afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." The import of this we take to be, that Christ is the specimen and pledge of those who die; but that there will be some at his literal coming, (not at the end of the Jewish, but of the Christian age) who will be exceptions to the general rule. These I understand to be the ones who shall not sleep, or who shall be alive at the approach of "the end," and who are all to be "changed" from mortal to immortal "in a moment."

We have now finished the proposed examination of the manner in which Paul applies the present and future tenses to the subject of the resurrection, in 1 Cor. xv chapter, and in 1 Thess. iv. The result of our examination is given below:

1. He employs the present tense a great many more times than it would seem natural for a man to do, who designed to teach that the resurrection is exclusively to come.

2. He, in a number of instances, uses the present tense in such circumstances as that his language seems not easily reconcilable with the doctrine of an all future resurrection.

3. When he uses the future tense, he employs it in such a manner as that his language, taking all the examples together, accords not any more naturally with the doctrine that the resurrection is all future, than with the doctrine that it is progressing.

We claim, then, that the facts herein presented in relation to Paul's use of the tenses, ought to be taken as strong proof that he meant to teach a progressing resurrection.

One number more will close the series.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XLIV.

TIMOTHY.—This book comes to be considered, as being next in order of the time of writing these epistles. It was written by Paul, from Macedonia, A. D. 56, to Timothy a young preacher of the Gospel. The object in writing it sufficiently appears in the epistle itself.

1 Timothy ii: 6. "Who gave himself a ransom for all." Christ, in consequence of delivering men from sin and death by his Gospel, and dying to effect this great purpose, may be considered in a figurative sense as giving his life for us; and this he observes he did for all without exception.

1 Tim. iii: 6. "Lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil." Verse 7. "He fell into the condemnation of the devil." Here the word devil signifies accuser or adversary; alluding to the many persons who are ready to expose the faults and vices of Christians, and especially those who are in more conspicuous stations, such as elders, overseers, or deacons.—[Priesly.]

Lest he be justly condemned by those who watch for an occasion to calumniate and accuse Christians. See Improved Version, Newcome, Wakefield, Kneeland, etc.

1 Tim. iii: 1. "If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work." Or an overseer, a superintendent of the church, the same as a presbyter or elder; for it is the same original word. See Acts xx: 17-28.

TRUTH IN AFFLICTION.

Death is the mighty conqueror of all earthly conquerors. He lays low the proud and the humble, the weak and the powerful, and consigns them all to the earth, their common mother.—The stirring spirit of ambition, roused by the energies of a restless mind, rushing from triumph to triumph amidst the terrible conflict and shock of battle, is assisted by this insatiate monster, in its victorious and sanguinary career, and thousands become untimely victims to the dark night of a warrior's grave. At his dread approach, the deep resolve, and high, energetic purpose, sink into nothing; the bounding step, and elastic gait wither beneath his icy touch. Kindred and friends, linked together by the warmest ties of human affection, and enjoying an earthly paradise in the confidence and repose of each other's love, are snatched away one after another, by this universal destroyer, until none are left on earth to tell their friendship, their hopes and desires.—

We follow them to their graves with their images fresh in our memories; and with deep and lively feelings of sorrow, we drop a tearful tribute to their worth and goodness, and recall with fondness their many endearing virtues, and as the grave closes upon their remains, all these are impressed vividly on our minds, by the surrounding scene and attending circumstances; yet how often amid the hurry and bustle of worldly affairs which succeed, are they weakened, or quite effaced from our memories. A few years roll on and their names are not heard among men, and the place which once heard their glad voices echoes no more to the sound. A melancholy silence rests on their tombs. When that silence is unbroken by the sweet, soothing voice of the Gospel, or is rendered more distressing by a harrowing uncertainty concerning the destiny of their immortal spirits beyond the tomb, our reflections over the grave of departed friends and relatives must be painful indeed. Those who have no abiding hope, no bright prospect of futurity, no assurance of a happy immortality in another world for the whole human race, can not look down into the narrow house of loved ones, without experiencing the most excruciating pangs of misery and regret. It is deeply afflicting at any time, and under any circumstances, to be separated by death from our connections and friends; but when to that separation is added a painful belief in an unending state of misery in the next world, to which a cruel faith and false creed would consign them, it must rend the bosom with the most bitter emotions of anguish and sorrow. Can there be a single individual of sound mind, in the wide universe, with a heart so hard, that, when standing by the grave of even an enemy, it will throb with the slightest pulsation of delight at the triumph of death over poor, frail humanity? Or still more cruel; had he the power, would he willingly consign the immortal soul to a doom of unending night and despair? The rejoicing of infuriated bigots, under the excitement of a frenzied imagination, over hell torments, resemble the hissing of infernal spirits in Pluto's damned abode, as described by Homer, and can never be indulged in by any person under the influence of reason or common sense. How strange, that some men, instead of consulting the Bible and following its glorious precepts as their guide, will take the dark and gloomy creeds of men, originated in barbarous and superstitious times, by a cunning priesthood, to operate upon the fears of mankind and frighten man into what they ignorantly conceived to be his duty. We may well rejoice that false views of God's holy character, and of his pure Gospel are yielding to the benevolent spirit of true Christianity, and that those barbarous and cruel creeds are dying away under its benign influence, and that this spirit is working a great and radical change in the hearts of men and in the affairs of the human race. Can there be any thing more sublime or transporting to the soul of man than that the whole human race, linked in the universal bonds of brotherhood, by the ties of God's boundless love, shall bask in the sunshine of Him in whom there is no variableness or shadow of turning, in one eternal day beyond the tomb? With this happy assurance, this glorious prospect of immortality, we can follow the remains of our nearest and dearest relatives and see them committed to the cold and silent tomb, and say, without murmuring or repining, "God's will be done." Thou hast given, and Thou canst take away.

A CARD.

The undersigned adopts this method of returning his sincere thanks to the friends in Champion, for the very comfortable favor, which they have conferred upon him as a testimonial of their friendship and regard. Judging the tree by its fruit—or in other words, forming our opinion relative to their principles, by the conduct which they have exhibited, it would appear evident that the practice of saying to a naked brother, "depart in peace, be ye warmed and clothed;" and still, doing nothing by way of furnishing him with such "things as are needful to the body," forms no part of their creed.

They may rest assured that whenever the undersigned has occasion to face the cold tempest and storm, he will remember their liberality, with emotions of unfeigned gratitude and thankfulness. And when his prayers in their behalf shall ascend to the mercy seat of our common Father in heaven, they will be, that if their time of need shall ever arrive, God will raise them up friends, who will prove as active and liberal in relieving their wants.

CORRESPONDENTS! We want a large number of communications of various lengths and on a variety of topics, to make our paper "go ahead" next year in the path of improvement. Can't you help us. Do try. There are a few lady writers, from whom we wish very much to hear in prose or verse—Mrs. Broughton, S. C. E. (where's the letter!) and others. There is one on the banks of our native stream, from whom we would gladly hear if health would permit—it would give us double pleasure, as a favor, and as a token that she was enjoying some comfort in life. I am too busy, or these requests would have been made by letter. A. B. G.

RECIPES.

"CURE FOR SORE THROAT."—As much flour of sulphur (powdered brimstone) as will lie on a shilling taken dry into the mouth, and swallowed after becoming moist enough, will cure that sore rawness of the throat and roof of the mouth, caused by cold. It is also efficacious in curing canker in the throat and roof of the mouth. It should be taken at night, and will cure before morning—but may be taken at any other time.

CURE FOR ULCERS IN THE EAR.—When "sores gather and break in the ear," the disease may in general be cured in a short time, by dropping into the ear, two or three times a day, a drop or two of the Balsam of Peru.

N. B. Warming the Balsam a little will increase its fluidity.

CHARACTER OF MAN.

BY REV. I. GEORGE.

We may search in vain among the creatures of mortality, to find another being which presents so many contradictory characteristics as man.—Possessing, as he does, the threefold qualities of a moral, intellectual and animal nature, he exhibits traits and features which have astonished the most profound of his kind. The philosopher and poet have tasked their greatest skill to unravel and describe the intricate qualities of his nature; and yet they have left a dark cloud of the unknown, undispersed by the little light which they have been successful in throwing upon the subject. Viewed in one aspect, he presents all the abhorrent qualities of the fabled inhabitants of Milton's dark and benighted regions, delighting in the unparalleled miseries of his fellow-man. History, both sacred and profane, will ever stand as an unimpeached witness against him, to accuse him of his almost unpardonable crimes; while the voice of the blood of murdered millions, is crying from the earth in accents of pity and reproof, warning him of the disapprobation of Heaven, and inviting him, with all the fervency and holy love of a kind parent, to forsake the barren wastes of sin, and come and repose under the broad banner of Christian purity.

Look, for instance, at a Nero and a Caligula. Their lives seem to have been one continued scene of horror! But we need not go back to these monsters in human shape, to prove our proposition, but come down to the present day and age of the world, and here behold a revolting picture. See man imbruing his hands in his brother's blood—see the bloody dagger smoking with the life tide of its unoffending victim—see the deadly rifle aimed at the breasts of our fellow-men, by those who should have been their protectors; thus clothing the widow and orphan in the sable habiliments of woe, and causing the tears of injured innocence to flow!

Viewed in this light, man surely presents a heart-sickening sight. But we are happy to say that he possesses far more admirable and exalting qualities—qualities which constitute him the Christian and philanthropist. They are love, benevolence, and every other virtue which has been the leading star of the great and good in all ages of the world. See him, while on his errands of love, alleviating the distresses of humanity; and he seems as a bright messenger from the upper world. Well might the poet break forth and say—

"From realm to realm with cross and crescent crowned;
Where'er mankind and misery are found;
O'er burning sands, deep waves, and wilds of snow,
Mild Howard journeys—seeks the house of woe.
Down many a winding step to dungeons dank,
Where anguish wails aloud and fetters clank;
To caves bestrewn with many a mouldering bone,
And cells whose echoes only learn to groan—
Where no kind bars a whispering friend disclose,
No sunbeam enters and no zephyr blows,
He treads inemulous of fame or wealth,
Profuse of toil and prodigal of health,
Leads stern eyed justice to her dark domains,
If not to sever, to relax her chains;
Gives to her babes the self-devoted wife,
To her fond husband, liberty and life.
Onward he moves, disease and death retire"

At his cheering approach, and the widow and orphan smile at his presence. O philanthropy! long may thy mild sceptre be swayed over the universe of God, till every son and daughter of Adam's race shall become loyal subjects of thy gentle government.

Thus we see man portrayed in all his diversified characters; at one time clad in the bloody garments of vengeance, spreading devastation, destruction, and slaughter among the family of man, and filling the air with the shrieks and lamentations of widowed mothers, fatherless children, and mourning friends—at another, his implements of war are laid aside, the frowns of cruelty have vanished from his brow, and love, friendship, and charity beam upon his countenance.—In contemplating this latter condition of man, our souls seem to rejoice in the happy and pleasing prospect before us, and we would earnestly inquire into the cause of these contradictory characteristics, and the means which might stay the arm of the midnight assassin, and bring him to the paths of virtue and peace.

It is evident that happiness is, and ever has been, the object of all the actions of man, whether commendable or not. What has caused him to plunge the fatal dagger into the heart of his brother man, and thus cause the crimson stream to flow? I answer, that it is doubtless the impression that, by so doing, he can render himself happy by satisfying a malignant spirit of revenge; or that he can procure gold, which he supposes will satisfy his many wants, and cause pleasures to bloom around him. And how often has he been led astray by the delusive phantoms of an untutored mind! How often has he brought upon his own head, the sorrow, misery, pain and death which ever await the sinful and disobedient sons of mortality! How many fond and doating parents have seen their dearest hopes blasted before the meridian of their existence, by the deceitful and tempting scenes of earth! The unfeeling pirate, who stains the billows of the trackless ocean with the crimson gore of his fellow-beings—who meets his defenceless brother on some lonely and distant sea, where no cry for help can be heard amid the thundering roar of the lashing wave, and relentlessly destroys his victim, who is calling on him by all the ties of kindred, friends and home, to spare—is such a man as you or I might have been. Orphanage in childhood, unfriended youth, evil companions, resort to sinful pleasures, familiarity with vice, a scorned and blighted name, seared and crushed affections; these are circumstances which might have caused any one among us to unfurl the bloody flag of universal defiance; to clothe ourselves in the dreadful attributes of the most wicked of our race, and to perpetrate those deeds which would have clothed ourselves and our posterity in infamy and shame. This is a most important consideration—a subject the most momentous of any that ever engaged the attention of the Christian and the philosopher. It is, however, a subject that has been unaccountably overlooked, even by the professed philosopher and philanthropist.

Numberless facts abundantly prove that ignorance and crime are almost inseparably connected. Notwithstanding the severity and multiplicity of our penal statutes, and the new enactments, year after year, against crimes; they have multiplied almost in proportion to the increase of our laws. And we are satisfied that so long as the principles of crime, and those passions which lead to it, are suffered to exist without a counteracting moral influence; human laws, however severe, will be altogether unavailing. It has been too often the case, that those who have set themselves before the public as moral guides, have hedged up the way by representing the ways of virtue as being interspersed with many thorns and sorrows, while, on the other hand, the way of the transgressor has generally been represented as comparatively pleasant.

But, alas! nothing can be more contrary to reason, nature, and revelation—they unitedly and unequivocally declare, that virtue and true happiness are inseparably connected, while the "way of the transgressor is hard." Again—we have been too much inclined to exercise a revengeful and scornful disposition towards him, who has, through his frailty and imperfection, departed from the ways of peace; and yet how many affecting relationships of humanity plead with us to pity him?

That head that is now doomed to pay the price of blood, once rested on a mother's bosom. That hand that slew his unoffending brother, and soon must be stretched cold and nerveless in the felon's grave, was once taken and cherished by a father's hand, and led in ways of sportive childhood and innocent pleasure. That dreaded monster of crime was once the object of sisterly love and domestic endearment. O! pity him, then—pity his crushed and mangled heart; for it is a wholesome sensibility. Let us learn that man is still our brother, notwithstanding he has departed from the paths of peace and virtue. Let us exercise towards him a spirit of charity and kindness, notwithstanding his conduct should be highly worthy our indignation."

This will be the means, and the only means, that will cause man to forsake the barren mountains of sin and iniquity, and to become a devoted subject to the ways of peace and virtue. And we trust that the period is not far distant, which shall witness the happy day when man shall consider his high and holy origin, his relationship to his kind, and act consistent therewith.

FREE AGENCY.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—Permit me to express my sentiments through the medium of your excellent paper; upon the subject denoted by the caption of this article. Perhaps my notions about free agency may be deemed erroneous; nevertheless they appear to me to coincide with reason and common sense. Therefore I have the presumption to send them to you for you to dispose of as you think proper.

Be it known, then, that I am a believer in free agency, or the doctrine which bears the name of free agency; by which I understand that man possesses the power of choice in his actions, so far as right and wrong are concerned. Perhaps it will be said that I have a wrong view of the subject, inasmuch as I limit free agency, or do not attach the same signification to the phrase that some other people do. But is it not possible that they who object to my view of the subject, are in an error themselves—especially if they believe the common notion, that to be a free agent a person must possess unlimited power, both moral and physical, which would make him equal to God?

This latter notion is too great an absurdity to deserve a serious consideration. Nevertheless, I have heard free agency objected to on this very ground; by intelligent men, too. But it is strange that such a thought should ever have entered into the mind of an opposer of free agency; for certainly no believer ever dreamed of such a thing. Therefore when an opposer brings up such an anomalous objection, it seems as though he is afraid to meet the subject on fair ground. I call this objection anomalous, because it is out of order, from the very fact that no believer in the doctrine of free agency, ever so understood it. Then, why bring up such an objection?

The signification of words must be determined, in some measure, by the things or ideas with which they are associated. And if words are merely the signs or representatives of our ideas, used by common consent, the word free when applied to agency, or the power by which man acts, can not mean unlimited, because no person ever had so absurd an idea as to suppose that any person ever possessed unlimited power. What propriety can there be in giving names to things that never had an existence? Now if I know any thing about free agency, if a person is not under the absolute necessity of following his duty, but has the capacity of acting in conformity to or against it, as he deems most expedient, he is a free agent. A person may have a strong inclination to do a certain thing, but his judgment may act counter to his inclination, and finally preponderate. Every one's experience will bear testimony to this. In establishing my opinion, therefore, upon the subject of free agency, I shall assume that the Almighty saw fit, when he created man, to endow him with a capacity for distinguishing between good and evil, and with power to do either the one or the other. Hence the propriety of his being amenable to his Creator for his conduct. I believe it is admitted on all hands, that it is just and proper that man should receive rewards and punishments according to the good or the evil of his actions, but what justice would there be in this, were he under a fatal necessity of acting always as the whim of his fancy or inclination might dictate? The objector may say that man is governed in his actions by surrounding objects, and that he can not act contrarily to the impression made upon his mind by them. Admit this objection, and what follows? Why, that man is just as much at liberty, to follow the dictates of his baser passions and appetites, as he is to follow his more ennobling and God-like attributes; for it is not improbable that the alluring things by which man is every where surrounded, will have at least some influence in engendering evil desires. But when we take into consideration that it would be contrary to the goodness of God, (and it certainly would,) to call us into existence without any agency on our part, and place us in a situation where we should be ignorantly led away from the paths of rectitude and honor, following vice, and suffering all its attendant consequences, and yet be accountable for our actions, if he had not seen fit, in his bountiful goodness, to acquaint us with the general principles of vice, and at the same time give us power to show it on all occasions. This will, I think, be readily conceded as proof sufficient to show that a person may sometimes act according to his inclination, and against his judgment, and at others, against his inclination and according to his judgment, which seems to be the only point necessary to be established in order to substantiate man's free agency.

Many people believe, and are very tenacious in their opinion, that the Almighty saw fit from some cause best known to himself, to call such a being as man into existence, lay a plan for him to follow, prescribe an unalterable course of conduct, which he is compelled to pursue, and then tell him that, "he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong he hath done." What propriety would there be in this? I can reconcile it with neither reason nor Scripture. If we were the creatures of destiny—or more properly, if our every action was arbitrarily governed by objects by which we are surrounded, and we yet responsible for the evil of our action, we should be the most unfortunate beings imaginable. It would be the height of vanity in us to exercise our own thoughts about any thing, for it would be as impossible to get out of the beaten track, as it would for the sun to withhold its light and heat.

NEW WORK—NEW GROUND.

Review of Rev. Asa Shinn's work "on the Benevolence and Rectitude of the Supreme Being."

BY REV. E. M. PINGREE.

We do not find ourselves able to conclude the extracts and comments, in this number, as we promised to do last week; but shall do so in our next.

[To the same effect, on p. 245, while arguing against the Restorationists, he says:]

"In regard to the future misery of the wicked, the Bible teaches expressly that the degrees of it shall correspond with the amount of turpitude in the guilty individuals. Now every moral reason which can be given for this judicial procedure, will be exactly the same reason for varying the treatment towards every subject of punishment, as his moral character shall vary. If one shall voluntarily augment the amount of his guilt, his punishment will be increased accordingly; if another shall surrender, and 'consent unto the law that it is good,' there may be reasons in the system of perfect rectitude, for mitigating his condition; and yet no reasons whatever, for elevating him to the felicities and glories of the kingdom of heaven."

[On pp. 237—8, he notices the common sentiment that the Almighty will keep up the amount of sin and hatred in the hearts of sinners, sufficient to make it just for him to keep up the punishment, and exposes the absurdity of this supposition in the following language:]

"It may be thought, perhaps, that the Divine penalties are so arranged and established, that their own operation will necessarily keep up the amount of malignity that is in each one of the damned, in order to perpetuate their condition, and to prevent any diminution of their torment. Can any man prove this from the Bible? If this be true, Dr. Dwight must have been utterly mistaken, when he said, 'The whole state of mankind will be settled agreeable to the most consummate benevolence;' for this essentially implies an invariable regard to happiness; whereas the above hypothesis supposes the Supreme Being to have such an absolute regard to misery, that he fixes sin in the souls of his creatures by omnipotent power, lest they should surrender, and not continue to be suitable subjects of the amount of misery which he delights to inflict upon them. This would plainly charge him with producing and perpetuating misery for its own sake, which charge is only applicable to a being of unmixed revenge and malignity."

[In connection with this subject may be quoted his remarks about repentance in hell, on pp. 315—16.]

"It is often said with great assurance, that there is no repentance in hell; and it seems to be taken for granted that this unqualified maxim is sufficiently authoritative, to silence all farther inquiry. We have no evidence, indeed, that in a future state repentance is ever granted as a gospel privilege, whereby condemned sinners may be brought into the Christian covenant, and made sons of God, and joint heirs with Christ, but if any man shall affirm that all repentance is there forbidden, we may justly require something more than his ipse dixit before we yield our assent to such a singular proposition. This is a favorite hypothesis, which, far from having any foundation to rest upon, presumptuously assumes that God will punish his creatures for being wicked, and at the same time be unwilling that they should repent of their wickedness! It is either true that those sinners ought to repent, or that they ought not; if they ought to repent, then to say our Maker forbids or hinders it, is to say he is unwilling his creatures should discharge their duty; but if they ought not to repent, it follows that, some how or other, their obligation to do it is cancelled, and it is consequently right for them eternally to continue in a state of impenitency."

"If it be admitted, that God is willing for all sinners to repent, it must be equally admitted that he is willing for them to be sincere in their repentance; for the notion of a deceitful repentance, is an absurdity and a contradiction, and will involve the consequence, that the Almighty Creator really desires, either that his creatures should maintain a spirit of undeviating hostility against him, or that all their efforts to cease from their rebellion, should be mere efforts of hypocrisy."

[The question now comes up in the minds of all reflecting people, after having read these extracts, If the damned may repent; if they may reform; if their punishment may cease as their moral character becomes what it ought to be, and if God will always seek to make them holy and happy, what will be their condition, seeing that Mr. Shinn denies Universal salvation? He answers this question; but his answer shows that here he is in the dark; all is misty, foggy. Here is the greatest difficulty. He lays down and establishes principles that lead to Universal restoration, yet denies that result in word. This query will naturally arise in the mind of every body who reads his book; but his answer will not satisfy every body. Each will draw his own conclusion from the premises, despite the efforts of Mr. S. And here it may be proper for me to say that, so far as this book is read, it is my opinion that it will tend more to advance the doctrine of Universalism than any book in our order, although Mr. S. says one reason for publishing the book was to stop the spread of that heresy, which he says the common Orthodox preaching tends to advocate. But let him answer for himself, on pp. 254—5.]

"In regard to the query that may arise in the reader's mind—what would the Creator do with such subdued and yielding sinners? it may be answered by another question:—is it a more easy matter with Him to manage his creatures while they remain wicked, than it is to know what to do with them when they forsake their wickedness? Is he under the necessity to keep them wicked by his own power, or decree, for fear he should not know what to do with them, if they repent and reform? As the Almighty has power to create ten thousand worlds, so he certainly has an undoubted right to do it; and also to people those worlds according to the wise and just provisions of his universal government. The particulars we are ignorant of, but the great truth we know, and it should rest with entire composure, that the judge of all the earth will do right. And that is, to treat his creatures, in the case we are considering, in a way best calculated to promote their own welfare, without injury to that of others. Those who deny this, if any such there be, must suppose that it is not right for creatures to be treated in the way best calculated to promote their own welfare, without injury to the welfare of others; or else, that in a future state our Creator will not do right, and of course, that in some way, a total change will have taken place in his moral character."

"Alas! the fear of falling into the heresy of Universalism has caused the christian world to look away from this subject, while their neglect to examine it, and to remove from the doctrine of eternal punishment the tremendous concomitants above specified, has vastly promoted and diffused the system of Universalism, of which they have been so much in dread."

[There are several other passages which show that Mr. S. is here entirely in the dark; but if he should venture into the light, he would find himself a full Universalist. On p. 389, he acknowledges that he has "no hypothesis framed in regard to any precise results of the Divine administration, through the great deep of a coming eternity." But Universalists, relying upon the Bible, do see the result of this administration in what Mr. Shinn's principles and arguments lead to—Universal Salvation. In the following paragraph he ingeniously acknowledges that he does not know what this result may be; and hence it may be Universal felicity. It is on pp. 349—50—1. Read it carefully, and see his quandary.]

"If the agency of the wicked will be perpetuated forever, we can not certainly know what variations will take place in their character and condition, because we know not how they will ultimately exercise their responsible powers. The present objection would apply with all its force to God's treatment of nations in the present world: for although we know definitely that God will treat them according to their works, yet what that treatment will be we know not, because we are necessarily ignorant of the manner in which they will conduct themselves. We are willing to confess that 'we know not what the truth is,' in regard to the actual results of the Almighty's administration in a future world. Our minds should cheerfully consent to be ignorant of these secret things which belong to the Lord our God, so long as we can rejoice in the brilliancy of the great truth revealed to us and to our children, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. To abandon this glorious Sun and Shield, for the purpose of supporting the man-made orthodoxy of invariable punishment, is a sacrifice too great for any human soul to make, that can realize the immense importance of rightly knowing the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent."

"Let opponents prove, if they are able, that condemned sinners are eternally destitute of all degrees of agency. If they can not prove this, then it is evident, whatever they may pretend, that they 'know not what the truth is' concerning this matter."

"Agency appears evidently to be an essential constituent of a mental being: and if I mistake not, it can as soon be proved that the damned are deprived of all intelligence, as that they are destitute of every degree of agency."

"We may justly require of the advocates of invariable or accumulating misery, to prove, if they are able, that it is possible for a man or angel to lose his agency, without at the same time losing his intelligence, and becoming absolutely insane. If they admit that the inhabitants of hell are still agents, we call upon them to prove, if they are able, that their agency is eternally forced into one invariable course of action. If they can not prove this, how do they know what will be the precise course of action which will be pursued by the millions of fallen spirits in a future state? And if they do not know this, how can they be certain that they foresee the exact mode of treatment that all fallen creatures will receive from that Almighty Sovereign, whose indubitable right it is to reign! Is God bound to explain to us all the secrets of his empire, and to make known all that he knows himself concerning the arrangements of his government throughout all future ages? If not, why should presumptuous man be unwilling to own, that peradventure he 'knows not what the truth is,' in regard to many of the unexplored scenes of a boundless and infinite hereafter."

[You see how he attempts to avoid the difficulty which presses upon him, in view of his principles; how he attempts to avoid the conclusion we should derive from them, let us read on pp. 240-1.]

"And even if all should repent and reform, how can Restorationists prove that the Almighty would in consequence of it, be morally bound to elevate them to the glories of the kingdom of heaven? After forfeiting their eligibility to that kingdom, by a course of unprincipled wickedness, the spirit of which they obstinately carried with them into eternity, will any future repentance of theirs entitle them to have it restored to them? Certainly not."

"It will be replied, however, that although they can never do any thing which will give them a claim to such a privilege, yet God has not forfeited his right of benevolence; therefore if it be his will to extend such a favor to penitent sinners in a future state, he has a right to do so. This must be granted; but that which we affirm is that he has not pledged himself by promise, to grant such a favor to any of Adam's race, except to such as accept the overture upon the gospel plan, during their probationary existence on earth: therefore to conclude that he will do it, is a gratuitous assumption, for which we have no authority whatever from the Bible."

[Here it is all plain. All may repent; but if they do, they have no claim on heaven. So do not sinners who repent on earth. He admits that God has a right to bring them to heaven, if he pleases, and here he rests, saying that God has not promised to do so, and hence may not; while we say he has promised, and will do. This is the entire difference between him and the Universalists.]

The following beautiful extract is found on the 75th page.

"It is delightful, however, to understand, that in the operation of all those mighty attributes, infinite goodness is at the centre. Love reigns supreme, uncontrolled, immutable, immense, and eternal. Eternity affords the time for its action, and immensity the theatre; wisdom forms the plan of benevolence, power carries it into effect, truth displays it, and justice defends it. In all this there is a harmony more perfect and complete, than is even exhibited in the serene and untroubled movements of the stars and suns and planets of the material heavens; and as soon will Jupiter fall into the Sun, or the Moon be dashed against the Earth, as justice will contradict mercy, or counteract any other perfection of the universal Ruler. The greatness of God should make us modest in our conclusions, and not so immodest as to believe He is too great a sovereign to be righteous and benevolent in all his actions."

MOTIVES.

People do not always reflect on the influence which bad or improper motives have upon the character. They sometimes suppose that if they can escape detection in the commission of crime, they are safe, as though God did not see them, and cause the bare motive to do wrong, to lay the foundation within them for the sure and wise inflictions of justice, even when the act itself was to be prevented, and the motive overruled for good. It is, not often, however, that men calculate on receiving a palliation through the failure of their intentions. They do not contemplate an entire failure. God has so constituted them, that generally a disappointment in this respect comes upon them so unexpectedly as to be one source of punishment; and as men never succeed in all their criminal expectations, it is folly for them to expect to commit iniquity with impunity, or even to indulge in impure motives without carrying along with them its solemn reward.

The wise man has said that "the expectation of the wicked shall perish"—yea, and he had felt it too. He said in his "heart, go to now, I will prove thee with mirth, therefore enjoy pleasure"—and behold in this also was vanity! Yes, he tried laughter and mirth, wine and folly, wealth and grandeur and display, pride and unrestrained indulgence. He was fond of these things, and expected to find wisdom and substantial peace, at the same time that he was secretly indulging in them. But he was disappointed—his hopes perished. He found that all was vanity and vexation of spirit, until he discovered that wisdom—true wisdom—was wholly a stranger to folly, inasmuch as it excelled it "as far as light excelleth darkness." What man is there who can lay his hand upon his heart, and say of the wicked, that the agony of perished hopes and blasted expectations, is not enough, especially when he reflects upon the dark passage, and the thorny pathway by which he has arrived at this dreadful consummation. Who has not seen the hopes of the wicked perish? Who has not seen him stand up before himself and the world in guilty accursed disappointment? See the king of a haughty and sinful people, himself an oppressor at the head of a nation of oppressors, lifting himself up against the King of heaven; blaspheming the name of his God; impiously enforcing the idolatry of his own heart upon those who despised it, that he might gratify his love of power; exclaiming, "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?" see him doing all this, until God through his corruptions of heart, and debasement of mind, and abandonment of intellect and moral energy, brought upon him that fearful disease which drove him from men to make his habitation and his dwelling with the beasts of the field! Where were his hopes of power? Where were his expectations of lasting glory? Buried in the ruins of that impiety; crushed beneath the prostration of that daring, which sought to establish a tyranny over the spiritual kingdom of the Most High? What if he did not succeed? there was the motive and the expectation; and the enormity and prevalence of the one, received its reward and check in the perishing of the other. Truly "the expectation of the wicked is wrath."

But let us look at the influence of motive upon character. Joseph's brethren became exasperated against him on account of his prospective greatness. They did not love their brother, and sought to prevent his prosperity by taking his life. They were murderers, for the apostle John says, "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer," and they hated their's. And that hatred impelled them to take his life. The motive which they had in this was, to get him out of the way, so that he might never gain that superiority over them which his dream indicated. They only relinquished the design of being themselves his immediate destroyers, when they supposed that their main object could be accomplished in some other way. But the same motive pervaded all their actions; and though they utterly failed in the accomplishment of their object—yea, though their treatment of Joseph was the direct means of placing him in that station of superiority which they dreaded and sought to prevent, still their motives were wrong, and they knew it—they were guilty. When, therefore, unknown to them, they stood before that very brother, and dependent upon him for their bread—that Joseph who only could supply their wants—how did their former motives effect them—what was the influence which those secret motives had upon their character? A consciousness of their enormity; a deep sense of guilt, and shame, and abandonment, extorted from them the confession among themselves, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear, therefore is this distress come upon us."

This is an extraordinary example, but it will teach us a lesson. If the active scenes of many years, if adversity and sorrow, can not efface from the mind the abandonment and guilt, and degradation which bad motives have imprinted there; and if even an after knowledge that these motives have been overruled for good can not remedy that abandonment, and the disposition to crime which such motives always produce, until God in his wise providence and grace sees fit to do it, is it not important that we examine every motive by which we are actuated? If hatred could so effectually secure the vindication of justice in the case of Joseph's brethren, or impiety in the case of the proud and blasphemous king of Babylon, ought we not to see that love is the active principle in all our thoughts, desires and deeds?

TO OUR MINISTERING BRETHREN.

Dear Brethren—I wish to enlist your aid in a special effort for the benefit of the two Universalist papers published in this State. I need not tell you how intimately the pulpit and the press are connected in our denomination—that their interests and ends are the same—and that when both act unitedly, our cause must flourish more, than when only one operates alone. We have endeavored to use our influence in your favor, as co-workers with us—may we not ask your aid in our favor? At the last session of our State Convention, the following preamble and resolutions were passed—I believe unanimously.

On motion of Br. T. Clowes, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted—

1. Whereas, history has demonstrated that the Gospel of impartial grace advances in proportion as light and knowledge are diffused among the people—and whereas the experience of our denomination proves that our periodicals have been greatly blessed of God in spreading true religious knowledge among the people, and are important aids in devising means for advancing the prosperity of our Zion, therefore

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend the Expositor and Universalist Review to all our able lay brethren, who, in conjunction with our preachers, are often called on to defend and advocate the doctrine of the Restitution—and that our societies in this State be requested to subscribe for it also, and to keep it in their several libraries, for the use of their present and future ministers.

2. Whereas, the circumstances of the times require renewed exertions in favor of the weekly periodicals devoted to the cause of Universalism, therefore

Resolved, That this Convention do recommend to our ministering and lay brethren, their continued and efficient support of the Christian Messenger (or Universalist Union,) published in the city of New York, and of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, published in the city of Utica.

I would respectfully propose the following plan, in which I think there is no impropriety. In each place where you may preach during the present and the next months, at the close of some public service that is pretty well attended, call the attention of the congregation to the foregoing resolutions, by reading them—then state briefly the state of our periodicals, caused by the general derangement of the exchanges, etc., during the past three years; and the necessity of sustaining the Universalist press, and the great importance of extending its usefulness by increasing its circulation as much as possible. After this, invite those of the congregation who are not subscribers to both papers, and are able to take one or both, to tarry, examine the specimens, (with which you should be provided, one number of the Messenger (and the Union,) and one of the Magazine and Advocate,) and ask them to subscribe for one, or both, as they may see proper. If there is no regularly appointed agent present, act as the agent yourself, or select some thorough and prompt Universalist to act in your stead, and give him a prepared memorandum on which he may enter the names, post office and payments of those who pay down. You may add such recommendations of either or both of the papers, (stating the terms of each,) as you deem proper, without fear of giving offence to either party whom you may not prefer to the other.

If, however, this plan does not meet your views of propriety or expediency, adopt any other to suit your self. You will merit our gratitude for any aid bestowed, whatever mode you adopt. We are convinced that now is a favorable time to restore our papers to their former useful circulation, and humbly believe that your influence can effect that highly desirable object. But, understand one thing—we wish good subscribers.

Dear Brethren—one and all—we greatly need your aid—we believe our common cause needs it—and we hope and trust you will render your own labors more effective by giving it. We humbly solicit it. Can you not, and will you not give it? A. B. G.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

THE WINTER TERM of this excellent institution commences on the first Monday of January next, and will continue fifteen weeks.

We can not omit the present occasion for saying, that Universalists and all liberal men who are in favor of an unsectarian course of education for the rising generation, owe it to themselves, their principles, and to this excellent school, to show their faith by their works.—The Institute needs pupils, as much as young men and women needed the Institute. It needs the support—the substantial support of all its friends. The past few years have compelled many a young man reluctantly to forego its advantages, for the want of means—many a parent in his retrenching plans, has kept his sons and daughters at home, where, in a less excellent and less liberal institution, they could be partly educated at some less outlay of cash. In the meanwhile, the Institute has needed the aid thus withheld, or lavished on sectarian or illiberal schools, by its friends. This should no longer be—we hope it will cease immediately, and the Institute be encouraged, for it well deserves to be.

One word more. Let all who intend entering for the next term, be there on the first day, if possible—at all events, early thereafter. This loitering behind for days and weeks, is not only a great annoyance to the teachers, and derangement of rules and regulations, and infringement on the classes, but is a serious loss to the pupil also. "Begin at the beginning," is an admirable rule. The State also requires (in the distribution of the Literature Fund, according to the number of pupils,) that pupils shall have attended during the whole term. We hope these hints will be attended to, the number of students be greatly increased beyond any former year, and every one be in attendance by the first Monday of January. A. B. G.

THINGS TO THINK OF.

Our Partialist brethren generally maintain that there can be no genuine Gospel, without the doctrine of ceaseless torments is at the bottom, or in the midst of it all. And in opposition to Universalism, they generally contend that without the doctrine alluded to, the world would run wild in mad and reckless abomination.—Now, I am not sure but here is one modern discovery, and a chance for another—that is, that endless misery is the foundation of the Gospel which must be opposed to all supposed heresy, and the extent of the probability, that endless misery or a supposed liability to it, has always operated to restrain and reform, more than love and forgiveness.

At any rate I should like to have these matters illustrated by our Partialist brethren. Will they tell us Universalists why, when the doctrine of the grace of God which bringeth salvation to all men, begins to prevail in any neighborhood—it is all at once discovered that instead of preaching the love of God, the most revolting pictures of hell and damnation must be dwelt upon from Sabbath to Sabbath, from day to day, and evening to evening, almost to the exclusion of every other subject. After they have done this, they might further enlighten us by showing whether the belief in endless misery has not accompanied the Heathen in all their abominations, the Crusaders in all their deeds of blood, the Papists in all their burnings and tortures and persecutions, etc., etc., and by making a calculation as to how much worse all these would have been, had they not believed in that doctrine. A. R. B.

A COMPENDIUM OF CHURCH HISTORY.

By the kindness of the Author, I have been permitted to peruse in Manuscript, a great portion of a Compendium of Ecclesiastical history, prepared expressly for the use of Sunday Schools and Bible Classes; but suitable for the perusal of all who wish to obtain a brief and correct outline of the subject, for their own satisfaction. In saying that I am highly pleased with the plan and execution of the work, I wish not to set up as a critic or a good judge of the matter; never having had much relish for that kind of reading in early life, and having been prevented from studying it in later years. But we need such a work in our schools and classes—many grown persons in active life, who have not means or leisure to read a voluminous work, will find such a compend very useful—and most heartily do I rejoice that the Author has at last completed it. It will probably be published before long, by some of our publishers, and will, I hope, find a ready circulation, not only among Universalists, but also among other denominations. A. B. G.

"THE EXPOSITOR MUST STOP!"

Such is the announcement contained in the last and long delayed number. The proprietors complain of a loss in the already small subscription list, a delay in payments by those who remain, and that not one half of our preachers take the work! Under these circumstances even its anxious Editor, Br. H. Ballou, 2d, admits the propriety and necessity of discontinuing it. We regret it much, deeply with shame and mortification; for it was an excellent, useful and much needed work in our denomination—giving more than value for its price to those who receive it, and furnishing valuable aid to those who by pen, or speech, or press would aid in promulgating truth to the world. I have not time to peruse the present number before our paper goes to press, and can therefore say nothing of its special merits—nor is it so necessary, as the work is to cease. A. B. G.

LECTURES ON JEWISH HISTORY.

We have been promised eight or ten brief lectures on Jewish History, delivered by Br. A. C. Barry, before his Bible Class. From the Introductory, now before us, we presume they will be very interesting to our readers—too much so to divide them. We will reserve them therefore, for our next volume, which we hope to render much more interesting, by the aid of numerous good correspondents; and much more useful, by the increased circulation which we hope our agents and ministering brethren will secure for it. We shall see. A. B. G.

STATE OF THE DEAD.

Br. Clowes informs us, that he will be ready to commence his series of articles on this subject, (as requested by Br. Montgomery and others,) early in our next volume. These with some other articles promised us from other quarters, will we, are confident, render our paper far more interesting and useful than the dearth of communications has latterly made it, of necessity. A. B. G.

REMOVALS.

Br. Cook has accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the Second Universalist Church in Philadelphia. He commenced his regular services on Sunday the 6th inst. The installation is appointed for next Sunday. This Society is the one which but lately enjoyed the sweet influences and labors of our lamented Br. S. W. Fuller, and we are sure that his successor will secure their confidence and love. We wish Br. Cook and his flock peace and prosperity in their new relations. All letters and papers intended for him should be directed to Philadelphia.

Br. Geo. W. Gage has accepted an invitation to labor with the Universalist Society in Poughkeepsie, and entered upon his regular duties last Sabbath. He wishes his letters and papers directed accordingly.

By the Nazarene we learn that Br. K. Townsend has accepted an invitation to labor with the Universalist Society in Troy. A. R. B.

TWO PAPERS MORE

Will close the present volume. Will agents and others, please let us hear from them early, as to the responsibility and payments of delinquents whom we otherwise may strike from our list—as to those who have removed—transferred their papers—or ordered discontinuance? We hope, also, to receive a large number of new subscribers—good and prompt ones—as we find that those who make the trial find liberal men more willing to subscribe than in years past. Regulate, therefore, your returns as early as you can, that we may know what edition we may calculate on printing next year.

Those resolved to discontinue, and who have not yet given us notice, will please to remember that we must receive the notice before the volume expires to make it legal. We hope none will discontinue; but if they will, or must, let them give us timely notice—that is, provided they can not get a good person to take their place. PERS.

To AGENTS.—One agent has secured us fifteen new subscribers in one neighborhood, where no material addition could be made in years past—and he assures us that they are good. Depend upon it that Universalists and liberal minded men are disposed to take and read our papers, more now than they have been for some time past. Try it, and see how the cause will be decaying, and our papers going down, in a few months hence! A. B. G.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.
AN OLD MAN'S EXPERIENCE.
BY REV. J. CHASE.

I have been where the sunlight of truth never shone—
Where the clouds and cold mists of deep prejudice dwell
I have sighed in that wilderness, dreary and lone,
And the goadings of error, severely have felt.

In that land of oppression, and phantoms, and fears,
Where the thunders of vengeance incessantly sound—
I have wasted the vigor of sixty full years,
And nought but affliction and bitterness found.

With the dread of a slave, many lectures I've heard,
And descriptions of God, which my spirit have chilled;
By the heralds of wrath, who were wont to be feared,
My soul with delusion and death has been filled.

But now from that gloomy dominion, I'm free;
Those vapors of error, oppress me no more;
The beauties of Truth, I can now clearly see,
And rejoice in their brightness as upward I soar.

To the fables and follies of Pagan and Jew,
No more with the fetters of fear am I bound,
For a Maker and Father in God I now view,
And in Jesus a Saviour, whose mercies abound.

In the light of the Gospel, my vision is blessed,
With the prospect of grace, universal and free,
And a home where the millions of earth soon shall rest—
Where all kindreds in praise to the Lord shall agree.

From the New-York Mirror.
THE BARGAIN.

"What have you there, husband?" said Mrs. Courtland to her thrifty and careful spouse, as the latter paused in the open door, to give some directions to a couple of porters who had just set something upon the pavement in front of the house.

"Just wait a moment, and I'll tell you. Here, Henry! John! bring it in here," and the two porters entered with a beautiful sofa, nearly new.

"Why, that is a beauty, husband! How kind you are!"

"It's second-hand, you perceive; but it's hardly soiled—no one would know the difference."

"It's just as good as new." What did you give for it?"

"That's the best part of it. It is a splendid bargain. It didn't cost a cent less than a hundred dollars. Now what do you think I got it for?"

"Sixty dollars?"

"Guess again."

"Fifty?"

"No. Try again."

"But what did you give for it, dear?"

"Why, only twenty dollars."

"Well, now, that is a bargain."

"Ain't it, though? It takes me to get things cheap," continued the prudent Mr. Courtland, chuckling with delight.

"Why, how in the world did it go off so low?"

"I managed that. It ain't every one that understands how to do these things."

"But how did you manage it dear, I should like to know."

"Why, you see, there were a great many other things there, and among the rest some dirty carpets. Before the sale, I pulled over these carpets and threw them upon the sofa; a good deal of dust fell from them, and made the sofa look fifty per cent. worse than it really was. When the sale commenced there happened to be but few persons there; and I asked the auctioneer to sell the sofa first, as I wanted to go, and would bid for it if it were sold then. Few persons bid freely at the opening of a sale."

"What's bid for this splendid sofa?" he began.

"I'll give you fifteen dollars for it," said I; "It's not worth more than that, for it's dreadfully abused."

"Fifteen dollars! fifteen dollars! only fifteen dollars for this beautiful sofa!" he went on; and a man next to me bid seventeen dollars. I let the auctioneer cry the last bid for a few minutes, until I saw he was likely to knock it down.

"Twenty dollars!" said I, "and that's as much as I'll go for it."

"The other bidder was deceived by this as to the real value of the sofa, for it did look dreadfully disfigured by the dust and dirt, and consequently the sofa was knocked off to me."

"That was admirably done, indeed!" said Mrs. Courtland, with a bland smile of satisfaction at having obtained the elegant piece of furniture at so cheap a rate. And it's so near a match too, for the sofa in our front parlor."

This scene occurred at the residence of a merchant in this city, who was beginning to count his fifty thousands. Let us look at the other side of the picture.

On the day previous to this sale, a widow lady with one daughter, a beautiful and interesting girl about seventeen, were seated on a sofa in a neatly furnished parlor in Hudson-street. The mother held in her hand a small piece of paper, on which her eyes were intently fixed; but it could readily be perceived that she saw not the characters that were written upon it.

"What is to be done, Ma?" at length asked the daughter.

"Indeed, my child, I can not tell. The bill is fifty dollars, and has been due, you know, for several days. I haven't got five dollars, and your bill for teaching the Miss Leonards can not be presented for two weeks, and then it will not amount to this sum."

"Can't we sell something more, ma?" suggested the daughter.

"We have sold all our plate and jewelry, and I'm sure I don't know what we can dispose of, unless it be something that we really want."

"What do you say to selling the sofa, ma?"

"Well, I don't know Florence, it don't seem right to part with it. But, perhaps, we can do without it."

"It will readily bring fifty dollars I suppose."

"Certainly. It is of the best wood and workmanship, and cost one hundred and forty dollars. Your father bought it a short time before he died, and that is less than two years past you know."

"I should think it would bring nearly a hundred dollars," said Florence, who knew nothing of auction sacrifices; "and that would give us enough, besides paying the quarter's rent, to keep us comfortably until some of my bills come due."

That afternoon the sofa was sent, and on the next afternoon Florence went to the auctioneer's to receive the money for it.

"Have you sold that sofa, yet Sir?" asked the timid girl, in a low, hesitating voice.

"What sofa, miss?" asked the clerk, looking steadily in her face with a bold stare.

"The sofa sent by Mrs. —, Sir."

"When was it to have been sold?"

"Yesterday, Sir."

"Oh! we haven't got the bill made out yet. You can call day after to-morrow, and we'll settle it for you."

"Can't you settle it to-day, Sir? We want the money particularly."

Without replying to the timid girl's request, the clerk commenced throwing over the leaves of a large account book, and in a few minutes had taken off the bill of the sofa.

"Here it is—eighteen dollars and sixty cents. See if it is right, and then sign this receipt."

"Ain't you mistaken, Sir? It was a beautiful sofa, and cost one hundred and forty dollars."

"That's all it brought, miss, I assure you. Furniture sells very badly now."

Florence rolled up the bills that were given her, and returned home with a heavy heart.

"It only brought eighteen dollars and sixty cents, ma," she said, throwing the notes into her mother's lap, and bursting into tears.

"Heaven only knows, then, what we shall do," said the widow clasping her hands together, and looking upwards.

There are always two parties in the case of bargains. The gainer and the loser. And while the one is delighted with the advantage he has obtained, he thinks nothing of the necessities which have forced the other party to accept the highest offer. But few buyers of bargains think or care about taking this view of the subject.

UNIVERSAL PILLS.—What virtuous things are pills and panaceas, and how astonishing it is that disease can exist in the world while we have so many universal and infallible remedies! One great public benefactor proves the virtue of his medicine by offering "five hundred dollars if it fails." Another advertises a list of modern miracles wrought by his wonderful discovery. Every pill manufacturer keeps a poet laureate, paid by the year, half salary in pills; and the virtues of potent pills are sung to the world through newspapers in most melodious verse. But we hear of one pious medical lady who could find no virtue in universal pills. Feeling unwell, she sent one of her children to the apothecary's for a box of pills—the latest infallible. The child returned with a box of "Universal pills." "Universal!" exclaimed the horrified matron, "I'll have nothing to do with Universalists. Take them back; never go to that shop again; go to brother Jenkin's shop; he keeps no such nasty medicine, I'll be bound!"

Dr. Franklin said, "where I see a house well furnished with books and newspapers, there I see intelligent and well informed children; but if there are no books or newspapers the children are ignorant if not profligate."

Just so. The doctor was a sensible man. A newspaper in every family—a Bible in every family—and a school in every district—all valued and studied as they deserve to be—are the principal supports of sound and civil liberty.

"Nothing is more nauseous than apparent self-sufficiency; for it shows the company two things which are extremely disagreeable: that you have a high opinion of yourself, and that you have a comparatively mean opinion of them."

"There is an affected humility more unsufferable, than downright pride, as hypocrisy is more abominable than liberalism."

DEATHS.

Departed this life, in Xenia, Green county, Ohio, on the 30th day of October last, THOMAS BARLOW, Sen., aged 68 years. He was born in Massachusetts, at Sandwich, in 1772; (was raised a Calvinist.) He removed in his childhood to Dutchess county, New-York; in 1809, to Schenectada county; in 1831, to Herkimer county; thence to Xenia, Ohio, in 1834, where he died; having at twenty years of age, embraced the doctrine of a universal resurrection of mankind to glory and immortality. This faith he never deviated from to the hour of his death, which he found not only good to live by, but better to depart this life with; myself and others are living witnesses of his testimony in a dying hour. And how applicable the language of the poet in this case, where he says, "How blest the place where the good man meets his fate! 'Tis highly privileged beyond the common walks of life, quite on the verge of Heaven!" Xenia, November 2, 1840. N. C.

In Springwater Valley, October 3d, Mr. MARTIN, son of Josiah Mack, late of Burlington, Otsego county, in the 18th year of his age. The circumstance of his death was peculiarly distressing to his family. He accidentally thrust a small gimblet through the principal artery in his thigh, which bled internally, and after a week of pain and anguish terminated the earthly existence of the sufferer. To his numerous friends, his loss is a source of unutterable grief. May the richest blessings of our Father and God rest and abide upon the remaining relatives, may they be prepared by his grace for every event of life; supported in the hour of their dissolution; and eventually be raised to life unending, in the celestial city of God. WM. QUEAL.

In Hamilton, November 2d, Mr. WILLIAM PIERCE, aged 44 years.

In Lebanon, November 9th, Miss LUSINA, youngest daughter of Mr. Samuel Stetson.

In Litchfield, Herkimer county, on November 2d, after a lingering illness, Mrs. M. GAGE, consort of James Gage, Esq., aged 64 years. In the various relations of life she well performed her duty, and through a useful life secured the respect and affection of all who knew her. She was a devoted believer in the restitution of all things, and the herald of glad tidings found under the roof of her and her partner, that hospitality which cometh from the heart.

Her funeral was attended on the 4th, at the Universalist meeting house in the vicinity, and the consolations of the Gospel she believed in life and in death were tendered to the bereaved mourners present, and a large concourse of sympathizing neighbors by the writer. A. B. G.

THE ASSEMBLY'S CATECHISM.

"People at the present day do not like the Assembly of Divine's Catechism; but there is this sentiment which must be true and which all must admit—'All mankind by the fall lost communion with God; fell under his wrath and curse, and so made liable to all the miseries of this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell forever.'"

The substance of the above was uttered and strongly inculcated in the Presbyterian desk in this place, by a minister of that school, from Skaneateles, last Sabbath. Let us examine it and see if it will bear the test of investigation. Here, then, it is said, is a truth in the Catechism. I know the Catechism is antiquated and is thought to be of high authority. I have been taught it from my infancy—week after week for years—by my good parents; which, no doubt, they did from the purest motives, that the sentiment might be thoroughly instilled into the mind and become a permanent part of a useful education. Well, perhaps on the whole, it has been no material injury. But we may be allowed to inquire, Is it agreeable with fact? Let us inquire. The sentiment is an answer to the following question—Into what estate did the fall bring mankind?—meaning by the fall, the transgression of Adam. Answer. "All mankind by the fall lost communion with God." Is this part of the answer agreeable with fact? Did all mankind by the fall lose communion with God? Did Adam lose communion with God? We are informed that the Lord communed or talked with Adam after his transgression. We are informed of what the Lord said to him and what should be the consequences of his transgression. We are also informed of Abraham's communing with the Lord, Gen. xviii: 33. Also of Moses—"When he had made an end of communing with him upon Mount Sinai," etc., Exodus xxxi: 18. From this it does not appear that all mankind by the fall lost communion with God. Furthermore, has not God communicated to the sons of men in a variety of ways, bestowing upon them favors innumerable—commending His love toward them while they were yet sinners, in every period of the world? This is certainly the scriptural representation.

Well, let us pursue it a little further. "Are under His wrath and curse." What idea does this sentiment convey? Does it not convey the idea that prior to Adam's transgression the nature and feelings of God were good and benevolent, but that now he becomes very much enraged against him; and that now, instead of communing with him in love, and commending that love, he has become changed from love to hatred toward the same being? If this be so, can it be said that He is without variableness or shadow of turning? If God be omniscient and knew perfectly well that Adam would fall; and if he loved him before he fell and hated him afterward, is there not a change in the divine Being? But the fact is, Adam is the being who had become changed. He felt his shame, his guilt and remorse. But God towards him remains the same unchangeably good Being. If all mankind fell under the wrath and curse of God, it certainly was that kind of wrath and curse which is governed by his own unchangeable goodness, and it is no less true, that mankind fell under, or were the subjects of the love and compassion of God. They have been ever since the first transgression the objects of His unchanging love, mercy and tender compassion. Hence the apostle sums up the nature of God in these emphatic words—"God is love." And "herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us." 1 John iv: 8, 10. But let us pursue the answer a little further. "And so made liable to all the miseries of this life—to death itself." Is it true that all mankind by the fall were made liable to death itself? That is to natural death, as I suppose the divines meant by the word death? I shall contend that they were not. I know it is said to Adam, "The day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," but this I understand to be not a natural but a moral death, as Adam did not die the death of the body on the day of transgression.

But in objection it is said, "He became mortal." But what was he before he became mortal? Was he immortal? If he was immortal, how could he become mortal? What is the meaning of the word immortal? It means exemption from death—indissoluble. If he was immortal, that is, never to die—not liable to die—will it be maintained that he became liable to die? What! not liable to die and still liable to die! What confusion! Are we to draw an inference from the words, "Thou shalt die," involving so much confusion and contradiction—and that, too, regardless of the context immediately following? Certainly not. Adam was not informed that he should return to the ground because he had sinned—but the reason assigned was—"For out of it (the ground) thou wast taken—dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." Mankind were not made liable to "death itself"—that is, the dissolution of the body, by the transgression, but in consequence of the nature and material of which he was composed and constructed.

Now for the latter part of this answer. "And to the pains of hell forever." Is it true that all mankind by the fall were made liable to the pains of hell forever? Where did our Assembly of Divines learn all this? Is here another inference from the phrase, Thou shalt die? Is such an inference compatible with the plan and perfections of the divine Being? Would He create man in his own image, pronounce him good, and then subject him to a law which He knew would render him liable to the pains of hell forever? Is this consistent? But again. Is this theory of these divines consistent with itself? Let us see. After declaring that "all mankind by the fall.... were made liable to the pains of hell forever," they say (in answering the next question,) "God out of his mere good pleasure from all eternity elected some to everlasting life!" What! Are those whom God from ALL ETERNITY ELECTED TO EVERLASTING LIFE, made liable to the pains of hell forever!! So these divines have said.—Well, how liable to the pains of hell forever were those made, whom God from all eternity elected to everlasting life? Why just as liable as Jehovah's decree is to fail and no more. It is unnecessary to deny that all mankind by the fall were made liable to the pains of hell forever, for our divines have exploded the idea themselves, and that too, by the eternal decree of Jehovah.

LA MARGUERITE.....NO. VI.

To the Young Ladies of the Clinton Liberal Institute.

DEAR GIRLS—Of what use will it be to me?—is a very common question for scholars to ask, and a very pleasant one for teachers to hear; if the inquiry is made in a becoming spirit. The use of it, ought certainly to make the motive of every undertaking.

I have endeavored in preceding papers, to convince you of the impropriety of neglecting the cultivation of your minds. I shall ask you in this, to listen to a few remarks upon the worth of knowledge; the best method to render its acquisition easy, and the use you should make of it. I know that these are subjects for volumes, rather than a few manuscript pages. And though in their brevity and imperfectness, the suggestions which I shall make may be wholly unworthy the importance of the subject, as incitements to further reflection, yet they may not be all unworthy of your attention.

What is it that has made the difference between the New-Englander, treading with buoyant steps his rocky soil; and the Islander of the Pacific, reposing listlessly upon the flower covered turf, before his wretched dwelling? What power has been propitiated by those who have sent their names with trumpet tones, to the millions of the wide earth, who have never waked an echo to their own? By what is it permitted to others, to seat themselves; scorning even fame, "above the clouds and fogs of sense upon a mount serene!" And by what cause do we see among the earth-soiled multitudes on all sides, many whose garments are white from pollution, and whose eyes are even now radiant with the glories of the life to come? There is but one answer to all these—it is knowledge.

You may be inclined to doubt this. You may think that success in life, the goodness that we practice, and the happiness that we enjoy, are not wholly dependent upon knowledge. Perhaps you will say that circumstance is too mighty an agent in human affairs to be overlooked. Circumstance is a magician in the dreams of the young. The genius of Aladin's lamp was not more powerful. But the best and greatest of earth, have made themselves such by despising the power of this necromancer. The lessons which they have given to the world, will be fully explained to you, by the realities of life. There is even now something mingled with all your anticipations of the future, wild as they may be, which is able to teach you the little worth of circumstance alone. Could you, merely, by wishing for it, obtain the coronet of Victoria, would you not ask as a dearer gift, the ability to honor the sceptre of the kings of England?—Should circumstance place you in a home surrounded by all the fabled delights of Calypso's isle, would it not occur to you, that the taste of the artist, the poet's refinement of soul, and the devotion of the Christian were all necessary to the full appreciation and enjoyment of its beauties. What were either condition worth, without mental gifts and mental attainments? And with them, how powerless is circumstance. They can of themselves make place, influence, and honor; and what is better, they can make us happy without them.

You will tell me, perhaps, that among those who, in various ways have risen to distinction, are some who may be ridiculed for their ignorance; and others who are even detested for their vices. This is all very true. It is possible to become even brilliant in some particular science, and yet suffer for our ignorance of others. And there are many, who in their eagerness to obtain "the wisdom of this world," have neglected to study "the wisdom which is from above." Innumerable, almost, are the varieties of character which different degrees and modifications of knowledge contribute to form. In the free, outgushing thought of childhood, and in that graceful perception of truth which distinguishes native simplicity of character, we discover the beauty and richness of our mental nature, and all the differences in intellect and morals, are mostly to be traced to the different use made of this inestimable gift. Look around upon the world as it has appeared to you. Is there any difficulty in perceiving, that what you respect, admire, and love, in human character, is in some manner the effect of knowledge? And is not the erring, the graceless, and the sinful, in the behavior of others, always associated in your minds, with the want of that which would correct, improve, and restrain?

And what will you do then? Will you, while you admit the worth of knowledge, resolve to possess it; or do you shrink from the immensity of the task which you think it would impose upon you; or have you resigned yourselves to be contented with an humbler portion, than may fall to the share of those, whom you suppose more favored by nature or fortune? I know that such feelings are frequently indulged, or I would not ask the question. I know, too, that there would be little occasion for them if, in the pursuit of knowledge, we were not so apt to mistake the nature and object of our search. Let me persuade you to allow them no influence over you. Think of yourselves as you really are, individuals of an innumerable race of beings, placed by creative Godness, during the commencement of an unending and progressive existence, in a world where blessings are to be obtained as the reward of labor. That exertion is necessary even to life—that it can purchase luxuries and refinements, convert the desert into a paradise, and change the rude and discordant into the beautiful and the harmonious—is sufficient evidence, that we were not sent here to dream away an idle existence. That there is attached to our earthly nature an immaterial part, which is destined to live on, when this world is no longer our abode, is most conclusive proof that we ought not to neglect the immortal mind. How easy of comprehension, then, are the objects of knowledge. We are to beautify the life that we now possess, by perfecting, as far as possible, the nature of our enjoyments here; and fit ourselves, at the same time, for the life that is promised us, by a preparatory improvement of that higher nature which is to constitute our felicity there. Nor less easy of comprehension are the lessons which teach us to accomplish these glorious objects, than the objects themselves. They come to us every hour of existence, traced in lines clear as the sunlight; but we look beyond the simple loveliness of truth, and sigh at the difficulties in the pathway to wisdom. We regard those who by successful efforts have become learned, as the plebeian may look upon the titled nobleman; with bitter feelings of envy, that he was not born to the same destiny. I do not say that there may not be differences in the ability and means of different persons to acquire knowledge, but these differences are not as injurious to the less favored party, as ignorance of its object, and carelessness in its application. Let any one of you become fully and feelingly convinced, that it is necessary for you to learn; that you may pass a lovelier life in this world, and be more worthy the immortal gift of intellect—remembering to value every acquisition you make, however important or however trifling it may be, and from whatever source derived—for these things alone; and you will soon learn that though truth has but few objects, it has many voices; and that they are all eloquent. What teachings would come to you in every sound that greets the now attentive ear! What pages of instruction, in every scene that is pictured upon the sense of vision! What power would there be in words, what strength in expression; what light and beauty every where in the universe! How would the same lesson received in all its varied repetitions, blend with the thought, and influence the will; till to act upon it would be performed as involuntarily as to breathe the blessed air of heaven! You have this day, perhaps, alone with your books, admired the order and arrangement in some one of the departments of nature. Perhaps in accomplishing a mental process, required of you in some school exercise, you have learned that even the ungovernable thought may be disciplined into method. Perhaps some serious inconvenience which you have suffered, has taught you the necessity of a regular division of your time, for the performance of all your duties. Do you not perceive the unity of design in this, and all the similar communications that might be mentioned? Every one of them teaches, what they all teach—that mind, whether existing as mind in the infinite, or in that emanation from it which we boast; whether directing the mighty operations of his works, or employed in the labors given to us to perform; is as much the opposite of confusion, as light is of darkness. This single instance will be sufficient to show you, how often, and without any direct effort on your part, the same truth may be repeated to you in the course of a few hours. It will be all in vain unless received and applied to the improvement of the mind and the regulation of the conduct. What countless myriads of beams are radiated from every point of the great centre of our planetary system. Yet how few of them are necessary to convey to us a sense of its effulgence. And what millions of beings in this and other worlds, drink from the same unexhausted flood of splendor. So the light of knowledge is shining upon us; and if but few of the rays fall upon the mental vision, it is our own fault, if the impression be not distinct and enduring.

It has been my purpose to close this communication, the last in the present volume of "LA MARGUERITE," with some advice relative to the use to be made of what you learn. But having anticipated this subject in mentioning the objects of knowledge, I will be more brief than I at first intended.

One very important use of what you have already acquired, is to aid you in gaining more. Nothing can be more absurd than the idea, that the labor of education is to be confined to the first years of life; yet nothing is more frequently carried out in practice, in the female world.—Removed from many things which keep alive an enquiring spirit, and mental energy in the other sex; young ladies in too many instances, after they leave school, suffer their former love of study to be superseded by their interest in other things. Such individuals, left behind in the intellectual enterprise of the age to which they belong, must feel in a few years their inability to answer the call of society for their aid in the great social interests of human existence. To them the meridian of life, the period which ought to be the glory of womanhood, passes away without its proper influence and without its due honors, and "age is dark and unlovely," not for the blanching of the cheek, the sinking of the voice, and the silvering of the hair; but because we see rather the wrecks of what is soon to pass away forever, than the undying spirit, rising from the ruins of its earthly tenement, to assume its new and angel form. It is wrong—utterly wrong. I am aware of all that is said in extenuation, about more engrossing cares, want of time, duties to others: but I know of nothing that can constitute in general a reasonable excuse. If the individual herself be not at fault, there is fault somewhere. We acknowledge the superiority of the intellectual nature; we rejoice in the promise that it is to exist immeasurably beyond the duration of the other; yet for the improvement of the immortal, we have no time to spare from our cares for the mortal being.

Another use for knowledge is to make beautiful the life that we now enjoy. There is a very great difference between being so engrossed with our condition in this world, as to leave ourselves no time for mental culture; and exerting for the improvement of that condition the advantages of a well instructed mind and a refined taste. It is a beautiful arrangement of the divine care which is exercised over us, that we can employ our intellectual wealth, for the benefit of ourselves and others, in a state of being where it is so much needed. What we have learned then, is to be applied. And there is scarcely less diversity in the means of application, than in the sources of knowledge themselves. Let a truth be fully understood and deeply felt, and unless counteracted by ignorance and carelessness in other things, it is certain, in one way or other, to find its employment. One illustration among the many that crowd at once upon the thought, will be sufficient. We will take, if you please, the truth which we have so often learned, and which we are generally so ready to feel, that beauty, grace, and refinement, produce a more pleasing effect than their opposites. It is desirable to apply this truth to the improvement of social intercourse. With one it may be effected by training every motion, according to prescribed rules, or a mere copying of the behaviour of the polite. Another under the influence of this truth, has studied so intently the beauties and excellencies of nature and art, has been so accustomed to compare and discriminate, that the outward act, like the mind which directs it, comes insensibly under the dominion of taste. The whole being has learned "to feel the graceful and reject the rest." To another, nothing more may be necessary, than a love of those ministering angels of the soul; the emotions that come unbidden, and work their pleasures upon our feelings. Else why should the poet tell us, that "Beauty born of murmuring sounds, Shall pass into her face."

Nor shall she fail to see,
Even in the motions of the storm,
Grace that shall mould the maiden's form,
By silent sympathy."

And once again; if hating the source of all unloveliness, we receive in its fulness of power, the religion that was brought to us, from the regions of perfect beauty and sinless life, shall we not become assimilated to the divine spirit, not in thought and motive only; but in word and deed? The ungenerous in purpose, the coarse in language, and the uncourteous in manner, can have no association with the purity and gentleness of Christian feeling. Be sure, dear girls, that you learn; be sure you feel that what you learn is to do you good, and then, "though there be diversities of gifts, there is the same spirit."

Another use for knowledge is, to impart it to others. There is no truth which will be repeated to you more frequently, in all your studies, than the moral one that there is neither enjoyment nor wisdom in selfishness. You can not live for yourselves alone. You are ever associated with those to whom you must look for kindness; and those who ask it of you. I speak of kindness in general, but among all its favors, what is there which can impart such blessedness to the giver, and awaken such gratitude in the recipient, as the gift, that shall remove ignorance from the mind, and evil from the heart. If benevolence be the most godlike principle in human nature, and if there be a reward attached even to the giving a cup of water, we can well understand, why the good of the present day are making such active exertions, for the benefit of the poor in knowledge and virtue; or why genius has uttered the noble sentiment, "What matter is it that we shall sleep in the dust, if our work is done, and well done; if we have helped to raise up in those that come after us, a mighty host of the intelligent, the virtuous, the happy, and the free?" It may never be your employment to teach in the usual acceptance of the word; but it will be greatly in your power to aid the cause of education. As a general thing, too much is left for teachers to do; then the time and means usually afforded are insufficient to accomplish all that is expected. Growing out of these, or from the want of a due consideration of all the difficulties, come the opinions formed, the judgments passed, and the thousand speculations of those who know better how to censure than to assist. The last mentioned evils might be removed, if the women of our country universally would mingle with the love of their domestic duties, a love of literary pursuits; and feel that society has claims upon them, as well as their households. This would produce more uniformity of feeling in relation to the right and wrong, and perhaps a more generous sympathy for teachers. For the first difficulty there is but one remedy; an early and judicious mental and moral education at home. To this field of labor you are most earnestly invited for all your future years.

Look abroad in imagination over the fair face of our far extended country. What is it among all its features, that fixes the thought with the deepest, and most varied interest? Is it that all forms of the wild, the magnificent, and the beautiful are mingled with its scenery? Or is it that every where, up and down, on the mountain side, and in the valley; on the ocean shore, and in the depth of woods; on the wide plain, or by the river; congregated with many and with few, and alone in green solitudes stand the dwellings of earth? To some of these habitations, the thoughts of each of you are wandering as to the scene of future joys. And what a land were ours, if that, and every other within its wide extent, were the constant abode of virtue and peace!

How often in every heart rises the ambitious wish to do good. Check not the holy aspiration, when its blessings are implored for the home of your love. Go, when your school days are over, to that cherished spot; and if there be grief there, which human solace can search; if there be one there whom vice has led into forbidden paths; if those are there whose inexperienced steps require the leading hand and the admonitory voice; if peace be not a perpetual dweller in that habitation; if hospitality preside not at the board; if all the virtues mingle not in the fireside gathering; if even the rose tree be not planted at the path side, and if the porch want its shadowing vine, there is good to be done, and abundant use for all your knowledge.

I might say much to you upon the use of knowledge in the formation of your individual characters. But I have already asked your attention too long, and will close with but one injunction in regard to yourselves. Let what you learn teach you to be happy. Happiness is a moral principle, and one of the highest order. The Being who gave you existence had a beneficent motive in the bestowment of the gift; and the thought that you are worthy to be, in his hands, an instrument of wisdom and goodness, should teach you to adore his forming power. He has dressed the earth in beauty, and spread out the sky; He has filled the flowers with perfume and drawn from a thousand chords, the harmonies of nature; and to you it is given, to see, to inhale, and to listen. He has given you power to appropriate to yourselves some portion of his own infinite wisdom. He has imparted to you moral sensibilities, a quick and vivid perception of right and wrong; and tuned the harp-strings of your hearts to thrill to the softest touch of the hand of affection. It is true that these things may prove to you sources of wretchedness, but it is equally true that, regulated by knowledge and virtue, they can give you, what it is my sincere wish that you may all possess, a cheerful manner and a happy heart.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. XVII.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

"Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle."
 "The body without the spirit is dead."
 "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."
 "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God."
 "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality."

"Not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life."

In this number we propose to show from the Scriptures what the resurrection in the after death sense, specifically is. "What is the resurrection?" is surely an important question. And in order that our answer to this question may not be misunderstood, we deem it requisite, in addition to the preparatory remarks heretofore offered, to first consider and answer certain other questions, which will be presented as we proceed.

The word man sometimes includes in its meaning both body and mind; and sometimes, indeed, has reference merely to the body; but, in philosophical strictness, the mind is the man, and a man's body is merely the medium through which he holds intercourse with the external world. The question now arises whether man, as above described, is really a simple or a compound being. Does he exist in simple unity? or in binity? (to coin a word) or in trinity? or does the motto of the United States describe the nature of each individual? *

Some consider man to be a compound being, because, as they inform us, there are two distinct and opposite principles in man, the one good, the other evil. But suppose we admit the existence of these principles, so called, what then? These principles are mere attributes of the mind; and their existence no more proves the mind to be a compound, than the existence of various and conflicting passions in the mind, shows an individual to have just so many different souls; a doctrine which, if I mistake not, has had its advocates. Note. Some think they discover three such "principles" in the mind, and therefore refer to man's nature to prove the doctrine of "the adorable trinity," so called.

The word mind, like the words soul and spirit, is used in a variety of senses, both in the Scriptures and elsewhere. Sometimes it signifies opinion or determination, as where the apostle James tells of "a double minded man." In this sense a man may have a half a dozen minds in a short space of time. Paul exhorts, "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus," etc. Phil. ii: 5. Here mind manifestly signifies mental disposition. In certain passages the mind, as also the spirit, is set in opposition to another principle denominated the flesh, as where Paul says, "With the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin." Rom. vii: 25. Again, in Gal. v: 17, "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that ye can not do the things that ye would." Here, by the mind, and the spirit, I understand man's moral sentiments; and by the flesh, his animal passions and propensities; all which are attributes of that which is literally the mind or spirit. For immediately after this text, the apostle gives a lengthy catalogue of vices as "the works of the flesh;" and specifies various virtues and enjoyments as the "fruit of the spirit." Other scriptures are cited to show that man is a compound being; and they are in general similar to the foregoing.

I take the ground, then, that man, considered apart from his body, is an uncompounded or simple being. For in the first place, I find nothing in the Scriptures to prove the opposite position; second, I consider the doctrine of the compound nature of man to be palpably unphilosophical; third, the evidence of my own consciousness goes to establish the fact that I myself am but one; and I somehow happen to think that at least in this respect I am constituted like my fellow men.

Man, then, is a simple unit. He inhabits a mass of organized matter denominated a body, which body is said to possess life, for the mere reason that it presents various phenomena which are not even witnessed except in connection with mind. The next question is, What is death, as experienced by man? By man's dying is usually meant that the body becomes devoid of life; and by this is meant that it ceases to be the organ of the mind. The dissolution or disorganization of the body, which commonly follows death, may be regarded as the result of the severing of that mysterious connection which exists between the living body and the mind inhabiting it. Death, then, is the severing of the connection between the mind and body, by which means the latter is surrendered to the operation of those laws, so called, which govern the physical world. This is the popular opinion, and nature seems to pronounce it correct; but the point must be established by the testimony of Scripture.

The apostle James remarks incidentally, chap. ii: 26, that "the body without the spirit is dead." This is positive proof of the separation of the body and spirit at death. To the same purport are the words of Peter, 2 Ep. i: 14. "Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle;" that is, must die. The words of James also show that when the body dies the spirit does not die with it, as the body when dead is said to be without the spirit. And as it is nowhere said in Scripture that the spirit without the body is dead, it follows that if life is at any time an attribute of the spirit, there is no scriptural proof that on the dying of the body the spirit suffers death, either with the body or separate from it. The common opinion, then, that the soul or spirit never literally dies, is strictly and perfectly true, provided it is also true that the soul or spirit does at any time live. Does, then, the spirit of man possess life? Answer, "God is a spirit;" and he is "the living God;" and he is "the Father of spirits;" and man is the offspring of God;—so saith the Scripture—ergo, therefore, the spirit of man is alive. It doubtless is not alive in the same sense that a living body is; but in some sense it lives; and notwithstanding the death of the body, it still continues to live, for aught that appears to the contrary.

After the body is deprived of life, and is dead to all intents and purposes, it may still have an existence, because the body possesses a certain configuration, which may for a time remain, and so long as that remains, the mass will be a body, though but a dead one. But if the spirit were deprived of life, it would be impossible to prove that it still had an existence, seeing that it could not be proved that mind or spirit possesses figure, or any other of the properties of matter.

REMEMBERED MUSIC.

There is something in music, whether vocal or instrumental, that seems to affect alike the infant and the sage. We may look back upon the scenes of early youth, and who is there that can not bring to mind some lovely strains of melody that would fill our hearts with love? Let the most depraved wretch upon earth, (who it is contended, is void of every feeling of moral virtue that should fill the breast of man,) enter the sanctuary where the God of love is worshipped in spirit and in truth, and if the singing of praise to God in such lovely strains as I have heard, will not melt that hardened heart to love his God, then will I consider that I have one argument in favor of total depravity. I can call to mind many instances in my life, where I have been completely overpowered by music. The first vocal music which I can recollect was from the lips of my sister. I can distinctly recollect the effect it had upon me when she sang, "Loving kindness oh, how great." The words, the tune, and the singing were so sweet, that memory holds the impression still. I was then too young to comprehend the Being whose "Loving kindness was so great." But years have rolled on, and I have had a greater opportunity to hear music of nearly every variety, in my short journey through life, and it does not lose its interest in the least, but rather increases as I learn to appreciate its worth—though the effect, I am aware, is in many instances, owing to the circumstances or feelings of the hearer.

I recollect one instance when I was just entering my teens, that I had gone on board a schooner, at Buffalo, which was bound for the "Lake of the Woods," or the head of lake Superior, and was laden with stores for the fur traders in that section. We had cast off and were leaving the harbor with a fine breeze from the East, when a band upon one of the steamboats, struck up the air of "The Bonny Boat." The music was so adapted to my feelings that I was no longer downhearted, though almost a total stranger to all on board of the vessel. It was new business to me, a stranger in a strange place. The voyage was as pleasant as could be expected in so complete a wilderness, with no white inhabitants within three or four hundred miles, save some few fur traders and our own ship's crew. It is true, there was some most splendid and romantic scenery, but it had but little attraction for me.

On our return, I enjoyed another feast of music. We were laying near one of the forts; (I think fort Gratiot,) the sun was just setting in the West, and the wind had died away to a calm—so much so that every heart seemed to upbraid the air for its stillness. Our crew was in different parts of the vessel, some whistling and singing, and others viewing the fort and a small group of soldiers near the beach. Suddenly there came a sound upon the breeze. It was from the band belonging to the fort. Its effect was like a shock of joy thrilling every fibre of the human frame. Not a voice could be heard on our decks, as those soft and mellow notes came floating on the breeze, for that music seemed too sweet to be earthly. The scenery, the fading light of the departing day, and our long absence from our friends, combined to add to that melody a charm which can not be forgotten.

Long after this, upon another occasion, there was quite a fleet of vessels becalmed near the Three Sister's Islands, at the head of lake Erie. There were several vessels in our sight and three or four within hailing distance. The sun had gone down behind the Western waters and left the lake as smooth as one vast sheet of glass, save the almost imperceptible roll of the dead swell. Our crew was lounging about upon the quarter deck, some spinning tough yarns; some singing, and some conversing with the crews of other vessels near by. In a moment again, the scene was changed. A flute was heard on board of one of the nearest vessels, and three or four excellent voices joined in the favorite song, "The Star Spangled Banner." They sang a number of national airs, and then every ship's crew in our hearing joined to sing "Hail Columbia;" and those voices betrayed the feelings of the hearts that guided them, for if there is a soul that loves his country it is in the breast of an American sailor. And though this was melody from the coarse voice of sailors, it inspired me with a deeper love for my country.

But what sound can be more pleasing to the ear than to hear a choir of rich mellow voices singing the praises of their God, when the words made use of correspond with the true character of a God of love. I have often attended church more to hear the singing than to hear what the speaker would say; but when the words were analyzed which accompanied the music, it made of God a fallible being which would rob celestial music of its melody. But why, or how I ever could be so blinded as to be made to believe all that these words expressed is more than I can tell, if it was not that I trusted more to tradition than to reason; for though a member of a Partialist society, there was no music that had half the melody for me that there was in the "Resurrection Hymn." Though a Partialist, I might often have heard humming over some lines of that hymn—it was "Remembered music." Nor could I keep it from my mind—it expressed so much of the most sincere desire of my soul.

Sometime in the Fall of 1838, I attended an Association in Le Ray's Ville, Bradford county, Pa. I was still a Partialist. The first discourse I heard, I thought was the most excellent that I had ever listened to, but my feelings were first touched by the singing. Oh! my soul, how shall I express the melody of those voices, or the loveliness of that music! It touched the deepest recesses of my heart; it melted my selfish heart to love my brother man, and to feel a deeper love to my God, who I began to see was a God of love indeed. And now I contemplate the day when I shall hear the melody of those kindred voices now hushed by death, and join my voice with theirs to sing "the song of Moses and the Lamb." Then, O cultivate the voice, for in it there is a sacred loveliness—a foretaste of heaven.

THOMAS BARLOW.

This aged man, whose obituary notice is alluded to in the present paper, was a person noted for his strength of intellect through life. Truth will be borne out in the suggestion, that a greater mathematical mind did not exist in his day, than that he possessed. Shut out from the light of this world for the last twenty-five years, by loss of his eye sight, not a single mathematical problem was ever presented him to be solved, but what found a ready solution to the greatest accuracy, without the aid of pen, pencil or slate.

A few years since, he caused a small mathematical work to be published called, "The Blind Man's Key," embracing several of his original arithmetical rules. He was sanguine in the belief that no problem could be solved by any Algebraic process, but what he could readily solve in his head, by arithmetical arrangements of figures only; and although he challenged the world through the public press, a few years since, to test his position and powers; and had the most intricate problems presented him from various persons, institutions and mathematical professors, they were reduced to their simple and elementary parts by the power of his genius, with the greatest ease, and solutions readily given. "I have many valuable original arithmetical rules in my head which should be written down by some one who can see to write, before I die, that they may not be lost to the world at my death," said he, a short time before he died. But whether written or not, the writer can not tell. But his power of demonstration was not confined to mathematics alone. The system of moral principles seemed also to be completely at his command of demonstration. The manner in which he would illustrate moral responsibilities, bearings, pains and rewards, addressed itself with astonishing simplicity and power to the mind. Firmly believing that all nature was established in harmony and order, and governed by systematic laws disclosing themselves to the human understanding through a knowledge of the things operated upon by those laws, he conceived that imagination should have but little or no part in arranging evidences of our moral or religious sentiments; but that from the "handy work" of God, and the applications and operations of them, with the aid of the Scriptures, we should "prove all things and hold fast that which is good." His inquiring mind would not allow him to abandon proof in any case, and substitute mere imagination.

After these remarks, to an intelligent and unprejudiced mind it is unnecessary to add, he died in the full faith of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. Although he was brought up under all the prejudices and partialities of Limitarianism, and at an early day received the ordinance of baptism after the Presbyterian ritual, the strength of years burst the bands of regularly schooled prejudices, and when about twenty-two or three years of age, he found that the kind of religion cherished by his parents and friends was destitute of that proof entitling it, in his opinion, to the claims of truth. Notwithstanding the popularity at that day of partialism, and the unpopularity of Universalism; and notwithstanding he had parents moving in the first circles of society, influential, wealthy, and then devoted to popular orthodoxy, (Presbyterianism,) he conceived that as a being created by his God, endowed with rational and moral faculties, he was possessed of the ennobling privilege of exercising those powers independently of the peculiar views and opinions of his fellow beings, and to seek for truth, and truth only, wherever it could be found. Almost solitary and alone, he embarked in this mental pursuit; yet with that prudence and charity in his course, which secured him against censure or opposition from his parents, to whom he was greatly and affectionately attached. With an astonishing equanimity of temper he would argue in defence of his own sentiments against those of partialists; and to the earliest recollection of the writer, he never knew him to become irritated at the uncharitable and abusive attacks of his opponent. "Even if Universalism is untrue," would he say to the bigoted, professor of Limitarianism who had made an uncharitable attack, "I shall stand a better chance for salvation than you do; for the purity of motives, the eternal principles of love, gratitude and parental affection prove it." And he would ask this all subduing question, "Will God, our heavenly Father, punish a child of his own creating for believing its Father to be infinitely better than he is?"

But he is gone! And he passed away with that hope which is an assurance that he will meet the endeared spirits of his parents, brothers, sisters, wife, children and friends, and all those of the whole human family, in a happier and a better world! Amen!

NEW WORK—NEW GROUND.

Review of Rev. Asa Shinn's work "on the Benevolence and Rectitude of the Supreme Being."

BY REV. E. M. PINGREE.

"The duration of this punishment, it is said, may be shortened by the prayers of the clergy, provided the friends and relatives of the deceased will pay them money enough to compensate them for these prayers. Now the design of this invention evidently was, to enrich the clergy, and to establish and perpetuate ecclesiastical dominion. Their invention of a hell of absolute and boundless misery was a part of the same clerical policy. By this latter doctrine they hoped to frighten heathens and heretics into the bosom of the church, out of whose pale there is no salvation; by the former, they could control them after being brought into the church; and thus a fair prospect presented itself, of gradually subduing the whole world under their despotic sway, and securing for themselves a temporal dominion, affording every kind of gratification to the corrupt propensities of the human heart! Surely this was the master piece, and the most potent engine that ever was devised by the profoundest policy of hell. All anticipations of future punishment were so shaped and moulded, as to build up an earthly kingdom, in which the love of power, of ease, of wealth, of veneration, and of pleasure, should be gratified to the full! Did those men really believe in the truth of man's responsibility for eternity? No; a secret infidelity was evidently at the bottom of the whole contrivance."

[The above extract shows Mr. Shinn's view of the origin of the notion of boundless misery; the following shows that the same spirit is the foundation of the labor of promulgating and perpetuating it; to wit, selfishness and love of dominion. In relation to this matter, it appears to me that there need be no mistake; it is evident to any one of the slightest observation. Mr. S. is answering an objection to his views of the abatement of human sufferings in eternity, as moral character shall be improved, expressed in the following words:]

"Men are influenced to modify and lower down the common view of future punishment by a secret love of sin. They indulge some secret vice which they are unwilling to relinquish; and hence their desire to establish moderate anticipations of future misery, in their own defence."—p. 329.

[On this, he remarks:]

"There is a great propensity in our nature to invent excuses for our sins, and to remove restraints from our indulgences, must be admitted; but the above objection is based upon a false assumption. It assumes that a good man, who has no longer any love of sin, will have no concern about future misery, however tremendous it may be supposed to be, because of his own individual security from danger; which supposes a holy Christian to be one of the most selfish beings in existence. Will he have no concern for the honor and glory of his Creator's character? Will he have no concern about his neighbors, his parents, his brothers and sisters, and his wife and children, provided his own dear self shall be secure from the danger? Should a Christian find evidence to support a strong probable conclusion, that there will be a less amount of misery through a coming eternity than he had apprehended, will he be grieved at the discovery, and feel unwilling to give such evidence a candid consideration? To answer in the affirmative, is manifestly to suppose that benevolence is not an essential attribute of the Christian character."

"Besides: there are more ways of gratifying a selfish principle, than removing restraints from our sensuality. Sectarian partiality and the desire for ecclesiastical dominion, are equally selfish, and equally strong; and if I mistake not, these last have generated the desire to fill the world with frightful images of a tremendous hell, more than all other causes put together. This is the precise reason why the different degrees of punishment in a future state, and all other considerations of this sort, have been so commonly left out of sight. Mr. Saurin need not to have often observed with astonishment the little use, that Christians in general make of this article, since the doctrine itself is taught in Scripture in the clearest manner? This fact is easily accounted for, and the mystery easily solved, by the general desire to hold forth a most terrifying image of hell, with which to lengthen the cords, and strengthen the stakes, of sectarian influence and ecclesiastical power. Take from them this engine or weaken its influence over vulgar minds, and they will become as eloquent against heresy, as was Demetrius the silversmith in the days of the Apostle Paul."—pp. 329—30.

[While on this subject, I will give another extract, showing what Mr. S. thinks of the tendency of this doctrine, and what feeling of the heart it gratifies; whether man's love of holiness, or his passion of hatred and revenge, or love of self. Hear what he says in relation to this matter. Let it be remembered, too, that there is more truth expressed here, than, at first view, might appear evident.]

"Human nature is a great deep; and is very acute in turning away the force of motives, however influential they may appear to be. The objection before us gratuitously assumes that when men are firm believers in the doctrine of infinite punishment, this faith will of course restrain them from sin; but facts have too abundantly contradicted this theory, to allow it to have any weight with reflecting minds. Men who heartily believe this doctrine, and especially those who are fond of it, commonly take for granted with great assurance, that they themselves will certainly be of the number who will be saved from the tremendous punishment. Hence it has little or no influence upon their fears, but excites and gratifies other and very different passions of the heart. The pleasure they will have in viewing the immense contrast between their future condition and that of outcast reprobates in hell; the satisfaction of seeing their enemies and antagonists, and especially heretics, receive a full cup of torment for their opposition to them and the creed of their party;—these and such like anticipations may possibly find admittance, sometimes, in 'that hideous sight, a naked human heart.' How it is possible for the soul of man to have a fondness for such a doctrine, (which is proved by a great eagerness in its defence) except by some such secret influences, is perfectly incomprehensible."—p. 339.

[To the same effect, he also remarks on p. 354:] "If any people imagine that true holiness causes them to love the doctrine of infinite sin and misery, as brought about by the judicial vengeance of the Almighty, they are very much mistaken; and they need a rebuke from Jesus, such as the disciples received, when they requested that they might have power to call down fire from heaven upon the Samaritans: Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. A fondness for this system of wrath arises from a source very different from that of holiness; and it would be well for men, not only to inquire into the foundation of their opinions, but also to scrutinize the cause of their attachment to those views of future misery, which are so reproachful to God, and so revolting to the feelings of justice and humanity."

[Believers in a hell of boundless and endless torment too frequently think their zeal for the promulgation of this sentiment arises from their love of holiness, regard for God's glory, the good of man, etc.; but alas! they are greatly mistaken. One who is among them, and knows their spirit, ascribes it to a far different motive—selfishness and love of ecclesiastical power, together with the spirit that says, "I thank thee, Lord, that I am not as other men," or even as this sinner, who will go to hell, while I shall go to heaven. Let this be remembered.]

This being the spirit of man while "subject to vanity," how thankful ought we to be for the knowledge of the truth expressed in the following language of Mr. Shinn:]

"Alas, for poor sectarian, bigoted man! if he had the prerogative to wield the thunders of eternity, what millions would by wholesale be hurried quickly into unavoidable and eternal ruin! What a spectacle, to see Jews damn all Gentiles—Gentiles damn all Jews—Roman Catholics damn all Protestants—and Protestants damn all Roman Catholics! Let heaven and earth be glad, and shout for joy, that 'The Lord is Judge himself.' Let the redeemed millions of heaven say, Alleluia, and let them repeat the triumphant exclamation, Alleluia! that the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! and that he has not committed the eternal destiny of any creature to the sovereign decision of human selfishness and sectarian bigotry."—pp. 193—4.

Keep in mind, then, the origin, the motive for perpetuating, the tendency, and the spirit of this doctrine, and reject it at once, as unworthy of God, of Christ, and of the Gospel!

REMEMBER THE POOR.

The season calls with imperative voice for obedience to this injunction. When every family is fencing itself against the increasing inclemency of Winter, stopping up every crevice and cranny by which heat escapes from the comfortable sitting room, and heaping clothing on the frame, and guarding the stores of provision for the wants of the season, and piling high the blazing wood on the hearth—when the beloved inmates of home are seated comfortably around the well spread board, or in the cheerful family circle—then, then is the time to think of those in comfortless, terrible poverty. Their looped and windowed raggedness lets in the piercing blast and drifting snow—their scanty garb makes the want of clothing the more felt, as a dim light renders darkness visible—no stores of provision for even the morrow, and perhaps hungry famine gnawing at their vitals even now—a few faintly glowing embers on the hearth, or so small a store of fuel, that every stick laid on the fire, excites a terrible sense of the want that already stares them in the face—oh, "remember the poor"! God has not allowed such inequality of condition, such destitution among his children, for nought. It matters not to you, what he purposes to accomplish by it with respect to those who suffer, but what he proposes to effect by it in your heart and soul. He furnishes you with cases calculated to excite your sympathies, develop your benevolence, and draw forth your exertions to relieve suffering. Will you neglect the opportunity—will you cast it from you, all laden as it is with blessings and happiness to you and to them? Oh, beware of this injury yourself, despising the voice and providence of God, and aggravating the miseries of the miserable! "Remember the poor;" for in so doing, will you remember yourself, your highest interests and your purest and most lasting pleasures. I can conceive of no more enviable station in this life, than the possession of means to relieve want, and suffering, and wretchedness, with a will to do it—and none more to be despised, abhorred and dreaded, than the possession of the same means, without a will to use them in the cause of benevolence.

But some may fear to encourage idleness and vice by their benefactions. The husband and father—or the widow and mother, is an idle and vicious person—addicted to vice, and bringing up the children in the same ruinous practices. Admit it—and shall those miseducated and unprovided for children freeze, and starve, for their parent's vices? Shall your indifference to their sufferings and your neglect of their wants, aid the unnatural precepts and examples of their parents, in steeling their young hearts with selfishness—with a bad opinion of and hatred to mankind, especially toward their more wealthy fellow beings? Forbid it, every principle of virtue and human kindness, that you should thus aid in their deprivation—in closing the nearly sealed avenues to their better feelings, by reaching which, they may at least be saved from their parents' evil teachings; or, in later life, be reformed! Surely, they need not perish utterly because they are vicious—nor their parents either. Relieve their pressing wants, then search out the causes, and tender them the advice and the aid they need for the removal of the causes themselves; and you will find patient hearers. Go not to them with reproaches to irritate, when they need soothing—with officious intermeddling, when their ignorant jealousy needs removing—with tracts, when they need bread—or with advice when they need fuel and clothing. But reverse the case—feed, clothe, supply with fuel, administer medicine, and manifest sympathy; and then you may hope for some success to attend your instructions—then you may hope that the saving of the body, may lead to the saving of the soul.

Thus much for those blessed with this world's goods. But there are others who are not able to bestow much, for they have but little themselves. Let such seek out objects of distress, and make known their wants to such as can relieve. Let them devise modes of assistance, and communicate them to those who have means to execute them. There are few able persons who will not give to the poor, if solicited by a worthy individual to do so. And there are few so poor, that can not exert this influence if they try. Yes—there are few so poor, that they can not even set an example to their wealthier neighbors. It has several times come to my knowledge, that poor people who had scarcely sufficient to last them from day to day, have often imparted a few potatoes, or divided their solitary loaf, or shared their scanty pile of wood, with their poorer neighbors! Is there a heart that does not rise up with choking emotion at such evidences of the goodness of human nature, and involuntarily exclaim, "God bless them!" Oh! imitate, as well as admire their example.

"WHAT WILL PARTIALISTS SAY?"

It has been remarked by Phenologists, that approbateness is pretty largely developed in the heads of Americans—disproportionately so, in comparison with self-esteem and conscientiousness; but probably not as greatly as in the French nation. It is probably this organization that renders us so peculiarly sensitive to the ridicule and censures, and critical remarks, of the Trollopes, Filders, and Halls, who have written respecting our country, people, manners, and customs; and elates us so much when a mustachioed baron or count condescends to visit our shores, and deigns to accept our hospitality, and smiles his approbation of our ridiculous apings of foreign extravagance and folly to entertain him. This, also, may account for some of our empty boasting of superiority over other nations, not in regard to things wherein we are really superior, but to those in which we expect to be so. And it is this undoubtedly, that frequently hinders the open avowal of sentiments believed to be correct and salutary, in populous places where a large majority openly profess and support a contrary system. I say profess, for there can be no evidence in such cases that they really believe what they support—the very fact that many do believe differently from what they profess, is sufficient to excite a suspicion that others, more cautious still, do the same; and hence, what is set down as unpopular, may in truth be the popular belief, though it is the unpopular profession.

But this feeling is not confined to popular professors only. There are many who have mustered courage sufficient to come out openly and support Universalism, in despite of all opposition: who, nevertheless, are ridiculously under the influence of approbateness in other respects—and even in the minutia of their faith, and religious practice. The doctrine of the great salvation is deservedly dear to their hearts, and they can not conceal their convictions of its truth from the world.—But they are surrounded by lynx and Argus eyed opposers, whose censures and criticisms they dread with almost as much sensitiveness as they do the condemnations of conscience and of God. The good opinion of these opposers is therefore very dear to them, and they will make almost any sacrifice to obtain it. Let us state a few cases in which such sacrifices are sometimes made.

Universalist preaching is commenced in a schoolhouse, or a public hall, or a court house, because no meeting-house can be obtained in the place for the purpose. Our approbative friend attends very reluctantly, (or stays away, perhaps, entirely,) with his family; and "throws cold water" on every attempt to keep up the meetings, or increase their frequency. Why? Because "what will the Partialists say?" is uppermost in his mind. "They will ridicule the idea of 'respectable' people going into such a dim, dark, smoky hole; and of 'well-dressed ladies' sitting in the jury box, or at the witness stand!" And these, and similar reflections continually floating in his mind, will prevent his enjoying the services, or hearing the language of his own better sense or the dictates of his conscience. In a short time, he will say, "If you build a meeting house I will go with you—if not, I and my family must cease attending where we can have no regular pew, and none of the conveniences of meetings." This being impossible in the circumstances of the society, and he having no enjoyment because of the continual question, "What will the Partialists say?" he at last withdraws altogether, and reads prayers in an Episcopal church, or attends and supports some other Partialist meeting, because he and his family "want some place where they can attend meeting regularly."

Take another case. A young man of good talents and improving mind, but considerable modesty and diffidence, is employed by the friends of the restitution to preach with them. Mr. Approbateness comes in to hear him—looks very keenly at him, and finding him somewhat embarrassed, is unable to hold up his head, or listen any longer to the preacher—for, "What will the Partialists say?" The young preacher having heard Mr. Approbateness spoken of as the first man in the society and the best judge of preaching, feels his approbateness asking "What will Mr. Approbateness say?" He consequently becomes more and more embarrassed by seeing his distinguished hearer hang down his head, or reading his Hymn book, and a pitiable stammering and confusion succeeds, which ends perhaps in a full stop before the services are completed. A few Partialists present rejoice greatly that "the pious Mrs. A's. prayers have been heard, and that God has stopped the mouth of the devil's emissary," and Mr. Approbateness sneaks home looking as vexed as if he had been grossly insulted, and as ashamed as if he had been caught stealing a sheep. He can not remember the dozens of Partialist preachers who have repeatedly failed more signally than did this modest and worthy young man; but resolves at once, that if the society will not (and not having the means, they can not) procure "a first rate preacher," he will not aid them either by money, or attendance, or influence. "They are down—down flat—the fellow is a miserable bungler, and the cause is disgraced! My God, what will our opposers say?" But hear the sequel. Mr. Approbateness having ceased his attendance, and the young preacher having been encouraged by the faithful few, the meetings go on—the preacher acquires confidence and experience—and in a few years, the Partialists, pleased with his worth, talents and perseverance, say, "Those men deserve credit for sustaining their young preacher in his trials, and are now reaping the reward of their Christian charity, zeal and fidelity!"

One case more. A relative dies—one always known as an active Universalist—and the family resolve to have a Universalist preacher. But who shall they get? The approbative friends are afraid the nearest preacher is not "smart" enough for such an occasion—"there will be a great many Partialists present, and what a fuss they will make if we have not an able and eloquent preacher." So a messenger is sent off some twenty or thirty miles for Br. A. He can not go; but there is a young man of good talents who has preached for a few months, that can be sent. The messenger declares he won't do. Off he posts to Br. B. But Br. B. is unwell and can not bear the journey. However, there is Br. C., a good man who can be had. The messenger knows he will not do, and returns home at the last hour, without a preacher. It will not do now to get their neighbor, whom, in the first place they had rejected. So a Partialist preacher is called in to insinuate that the deceased is in hell, and that the whole family who hold to the same damnable heresies will go there also, unless they embrace the saving doctrine of endless damnation. The mourners, already stricken to the heart, feel deeply wounded at such consolations, and complain bitterly of the preacher for faithfully declaring what he honestly believes is his duty to preach! And now what do the Partialists say? One and all are agreed that the Universalists have displayed neither honesty nor consistency in their conduct—that it would have been far more honorable for the friends, if they really believed Universalism, to have employed any Universalist preacher they could get, than to take one of a faith they were unwilling to hear preached to them. As to the complaints about the preacher's cruelty to the mourners, both Universalists and Partialists would agree in the old verdict—"Served them right!"

I might go on and fill sheet after sheet with supposed cases of this kind—yet so much like those daily occurring, that I should not wonder at being charged with dealing in personalities—all the results of too much regard to what our opposers may say. And in every case, I doubt not that the consequences would prove that the desired approbation of Partialists has been lost by the very course taken to win it. And thus will—thus must it ever be in the very nature of things. For the only opposers whose good opinions are worth having, are honest, sincere, conscientious and consistent men and women, and will reverence and esteem the same virtues in others, whatever the faith professed. Every Universalist, therefore, who swerves from conscientiousness must lose their good opinion, as well as his own. They may laugh for a time at the fewness of our numbers, the poverty of our means, the low estate of our members, the mean hall or school house in which we are compelled to assemble, and the youth, inexperience, or moderate talents of our preachers; but depend upon it, if we are true to the cause we have espoused—if firm in the faith we have professed—if zealous in the practice of our principles—if faithful to improve the means we enjoy, and affectionate to each other as brethren and sisters, it will not be long before they will give us all the credit we can ask from them—all we deserve—and thus, after gratifying every moral sentiment, will approbateness also receive its "rich and large reward."

THE UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES' REPOSITORY.

Oh how I wish for a blanket sized sheet about these days, that we might find room to copy some of the numerous excellent articles which we are daily finding in our various exchanges! The Ladies Repository would be duly cabbaged from—no, I don't mean that, for I love to give credit for a good thing—and our readers, male and female who are not among its regular readers, would rejoice with us. But it may not be. We therefore commend—yea, re-commend the publication to the patronage of our brethren and sisters—to the reading public at large—as well worthy their support and perusal. The December number reminds us, what an acceptable Christmas or New Years gift a paid subscription to the present volume, would be to many a fond wife, or mother, fair sister, cousin, or friend, from a gentleman who not only knew the value of such a gift, but also how to present it! Let such an one enclose two dollars, with the directions, to the Publisher, Br. "A. Tompkins, 33 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.," and see how it will work.

A. B. G.

"HOW FORTUNATE!"

Last week we addressed Correspondents, soliciting favors from them, and expressing a particular desire to hear from a designated few—the ladies. Hardly had the paper gone to press, before a letter containing a poetic and a prose article from Mrs. J. H. S. came to hand—and most thankfully was it received—and a few days after another letter containing similar favors, came to hand from Mrs. Broughton. We hope now to hear from the others very soon—we find ourselves not forgotten by these, and begin to feel “ourselves” of more consequence than to believe that the others could have done more than merely delay their favors to enhance their value a little!

Sister Broughton will find us disobedient, should she even give the order—so we hope she will not think of it—we are the debtors. A. F., T. J. T. and H. H. W., have been received, and will appear. We thank them fervently. A Rural Evangelist's last number came to hand so late that we could not get it all in the present number; and the next number containing the Index, allows too little room to contain it in full. We had no alternative therefore, but to divide it, or defer it till next year. We have preferred the former.

N. B. It takes many articles each week to fill out our paper—and we like a great and good variety to select from—we hope therefore that our correspondents will not “weary in well doing—especially those who do not write often.” A. B. G.

STAR OF BETHLEHEM.

This is the title of another new Universalist periodical. It is a small sheet, folio, published weekly in Lowell, Mass., at one dollar per annum in advance.—A. G. Bagley, Agent—Brs. A. C. Thomas and T. B. Thayer, Editors—two capital yokefellows, even in Bachelorism! The specimen number is full of good things, well told and handsomely printed. God grant they may have their due effect, and that the Star of Bethlehem may guide many to the Saviour of the world! A. B. G.

“LA MARGUERITE.”—We this week give the closing number of the brief series of excellent articles under this caption. They were originally written for a manuscript periodical, prepared by the young Ladies of the Clinton Liberal Institute, to improve themselves in composition. Their teacher having been solicited to furnish occasional contributions to “La Marguerite,” furnished the articles we have published; without the intention, however, of publishing them. Those who have read them—and we hope there are none among our female readers that have not read them—must have been interested and probably instructed by the perusal, and made to rejoice that they have been given to the public. For ourselves, we unfeignedly thank Miss Barker, for making our humble sheet the medium for their publication, and hope that she will not deem us so over-much honored as to withhold any similar favors that it may be in her power to grant hereafter. Could not a few other leaves of “La Marguerite” be spared to us occasionally? We are credibly informed that they would be highly interesting. A. B. G.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.—Few things give more delight than the making of a suitable present to a deservedly beloved object, on a holiday. It is far “more blessed to give than to receive,” though the receiver is deeply blessed also. The young readers should be remembered, therefore, at Christmas and New Years, in the presents of books that will instruct while they interest and amuse—that will aid in laying deep the foundation of life—enduring moral and religious principle, while they aid in delighting the fancy and pleasing the affections. Such books as “Spring Flowers,” “Ellen Clifford,” and “The Palfreys,” by Miss Edgerton—“Hope on, hope ever,” “Riches without wings,” “Home,” “Means and Ends,” etc., are all of this class. Br. Hutchinson has these, and many more suited to every sex and age, at his Book store.

For older readers his collection is also well stored. I would recommend as among the very best and cheapest Annuals, the Rose of Sharon, Edited by Miss Edgerton —a work of which our denomination may well be proud, and the circulation of which they should encourage, not because of its inculcation of doctrine, but because presents the beauty and spirit of our faith, and will tend greatly to remove prejudices from the public mind, so far as our people are concerned. But for those who prefer other Annuals, Br. Hutchinson has a good assortment—and though too poor to enjoy the luxury of giving presents, we can enjoy that of telling others where they can accommodate themselves with the presents which they can give to others—or, we can enjoy receiving presents! Hem! A week from to day is Christmas—a week after, follows New Years day—capital holidays on which to give or receive gifts from those who love us, or whom we love—and good Universalists love all mankind. #### POPULAR REVIVALS.

“Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets.”

It is obvious that a belief in the doctrine of endless misery has driven many persons into the most horrid and ruinous insanity, and all believers in it, who still retain their senses, are calculating, either by hook or by crook, to escape it themselves. Some are modest enough to pacify themselves with the notion that the all-searching eye, had, from all eternity, seen something so exquisitely good in them, as to consign them to the heaven of eternal rest. Still many of these live under a heavy, galling yoke which they would not, but for the fear of jeopardizing all at last; and this we judge from having heard them say, that if they believed the doctrine of universal salvation, they would be no longer troubled with their religion! That is, they would lie, cheat, steal, etc. Others there are, who dare not indulge the vanity that they shall be saved by the charming attribute of partiality, and still are vain enough to think that they shall win heaven and escape hell by some “grand but deranged efforts” of their own. Many, no doubt, regardless of the text at the head of this article, have struggled hard to get their poor souls converted, and who, by the aid of their new measure revivalists, have wrought themselves into the belief that the result of a few hours weeping, and agonizing, is that they are so completely metamorphosed that their whole natures are as thoroughly changed from bad to good as Lucifer's was from good to bad, just before he was dislodged from that holy place into which no unclean thing can enter. This point once gained, some believe that eternal safety is the inevitable consequence; others think themselves just as much exposed to an endless hell as they were before they got their souls converted, for they can sin enough in one day to change them right back again just as they were on the start. To prevent their apostatizing, another deranged effort must be made at serving the Lord, as they call it; i. e., believing the Lord to be only in the whirlwind. Some have dashed through thick and thin thirty nights in succession, with a determination to see all that is done. They learn to pray long and loud in the synagogues, they make a great account of those carnal ordinances, those weak and beggarly elements, whereunto they desire to be in bondage. Their heads are full of forms, ceremonies, doxologies, and choruses; but tell one of them that “the whole law is fulfilled in one word, even in this: thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,” that “this is the Christian religion in substance—they will fly—they can not think of such a little thing for a moment; for what is this compared with all the glory of a proselyting foundery?

From experience and observation, I speak the words of truth and soberness, when I say, that those manufactured converts, as well as most of their blowers and strikers, are generally very ignorant of the sacred writings, and for this good reason; their religious exercises are so very warm and enchanting, their heads so full of noise and clamor, by the clanking of sword and shield, that the Bible is to them as cold and uninteresting as a clod. Ask one of them their views on the subject of the Gospel as preached before unto Abraham—why surely they never thought of such a thing before. Ask one of them whether the covenant that was confirmed before of God in Christ was 430 years before the law, or whether the law was 430 years before the confirmation of the covenant; ask them which is to take place first, the salvation of all Israel, or the bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles; ask them to say something about the difference between Jerusalem which now is and is in bondage with her children, and Jerusalem which is above, which is free, and is the mother of us all; ask them what the inheritance was which God gave to Abraham by promise; and whether the promise was yea and nay, or yea and amen—they do not seem to know any thing about these things, nor can we enlist their attention on the subject.

Still these champions, some green and some gray, will arise in formidable array against the doctrine of God's all conquering grace. Sometimes they tell us that as a tree falleth there it lieth, and that as death leaves us so judgment will find us; and when we offer them a sermon to read, they frequently look wise, and throwing back the head with an air of pomposity, tell us that they have got a Bible! Yes, they have got a Bible, but I say in candor that I have known several such converts, and Sabbath school pupils too, who could not tell whether the story of Balaam was to be found in the book of Ahab, or of Ezekiah; whether father Abraham lived before the deluge or after; who was first, Moses or the twelve patriarchs; whether the proof of the resurrection by Paul, is to be found in the 4th chapter of Titus, 5th of Jude, or 15th of Corinthians. Ask them if their ears were frequently saluted with what is called our Saviour's golden rule in their great revival meetings; the answer is, O, no! if our ministers did not dwell upon subjects better calculated to arouse the feelings than such things as that, they might preach seven years and never convert a single soul.

But when we reflect that these things call into requisition both the mental and physical energies of many great and learned men, who, with all their greatness are full of craft and cunning, using stratagems like legerdemain to “beguile unstable souls,” placing them on their coining bench, where they may proceed to impress their mark in the palms of their hands, and on their foreheads, thus palming them off on themselves, and on the world, for gold without alloy; making them believe that they will pass through eternity at a high premium, as though the Almighty would eternally recognize and own the image and superscription stamped upon them—we are ready to say that all these proselyting engines are but so many Catholic inquisitions in miniature. For the most of their adherents have in a few years become so straight laced, so full of bigotry, self-love, and intolerance, that nothing seems wanting but age and power, in order for them to exchange the “signs and lying wonders” of an anxious seat, for the cauldron, the stake, and the screws of the inquisition. And since the anxious seat is a creature of purely human origin, we think that those who bow down to it, or sweat over it, are hardly consistent in condemning the Mormon Bible, merely because its origin is not divine. ## POETRY.

[From the London Weekly Dispatch.]

INADEQUACY OF LANGUAGE.—Words are poor weapons. The most beautiful verses are those which we can not express. The diction of every language is insufficient, and every day the heart of man finds, in the delicacy of his sentiments, and the imagination discovers in the impressions of visible nature, things which the mouth can not embody for want of words. The heart and the thought of man are like a musician driven to play infinitely varied music on an organ which has but few notes. It is more advisable to be silent. Silence is a refined poetry at certain moments. It is felt by the soul and appreciated by God. And that is enough.

THE TEAR OF PITY.

God smil'd—and all the angels bow'd—
As through the bright celestial crowd
Sweet Mercy's mandate ran.
That Pity, with her pearly tear,
Should dwell within the earthly sphere
To soothe the mourner, man.
Although her birth-place was above,
Her radiant home a heav'n of love.

And Pity's our immortal guest,
Her temple is the human breast,
Where soft compassion's giv'n.
Her tear's the essence of the soul,
That pure emotion prompts to roll,
Like falling dew from Heav'n;
For fellow-man its sweetly flows,
The rain-drop to the drooping rose.

It trembles in the brightest eye,
It gushes with the burthen'd sigh,
And dews the damask cheek.
In sympathy it seems to start
From the full fountain of the heart,
Some suff'ring heart to seek;
It flows, too, with the fleeting breath—
Grief's agent at the house of death.

When round the wretched wails the wind,
Where man in misery has pin'd
Within the dungeon's walls;
Or where the hovel's tenants show
The bare retreat of want and woe,
When the rude tempest falls—
There Pity doth her vigils keep,
As sent o'er human ills to weep.

But O! her sweetest tear is shed,
Like sacred incense, to the dead!
Pour'd forth at mem'ry's shrine;
For there, from nature's purest source,
The silent tear pursues its course,
And man looks half divine,
As he bedews, in gleam or gloom,
The child of sorrow's lonely tomb!

INTERESTING EXTRACT.

"And this is the Dead Sea, and below these dark waters are the sites, perhaps the ruins of Sodom and Gomorrah, such as when the smoke of the country went up, as the smoke of a furnace." There is a tale, that nothing living, not even a bird, can ever cross this sea. But there is no need of imaginary stories to heighten the desolation of the scene, and we, as well as other travellers, can testify to its inaccuracy, by our own observations. We believe, however, that its waters are unfavorable to animal life; and though a shell or two may be occasionally picked up upon the shore, yet these have probably been brought down by the Jordan. The water is excessively bitter and nauseous; and, if additional evidence were wanting, we also could testify to its great gravity, when immersed in it. It is only by much exertion, and for a very short time, that any one can get and remain below the surface.

We went from here to the Jordan, and struck the river, where tradition says, the children of Israel passed over, when they first entered the land of promise. On the west side is a low bottom, and on the east a high sandy bluff, and the shores of the river are covered with aquatic bushes. The water was thick and turbid, and the current rapid, and too deep to be sounded, 'for Jordan overflowed all his banks, all the time of leaves.' And here crossed the Jewish nation over this turbulent stream, 'on dry ground, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan.' And we followed their route to Jericho, the frontier city of the Canaanites, 'where the people shouted with a great shout, that the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city.' There is no city now to take, nor are there any walls to fall. There are a few miserable hovels, made of rude stones and mud, and the ruined walls of a building of the middle ages, where the wretched Arabs burrow, rather than live. Jericho has disappeared as completely as her rival cities, which sunk before the wrath of the Almighty. And it requires an effort to be satisfied, that here the great miracle, which attended the entrance of the Jews into Canaan, was performed through the truth of the denunciation is before the eyes of the traveller; "Cursed be the man before the Lord that raiseth up and buildeth this city Jericho."

Thus speaks L. Cass, American minister at Paris, who, in August, 1838, stood upon the shore of the Dead Sea, traversed the track-way of the Israelites through the wilderness, had noted the place of their passage across the Red Sea.

THE DEATH BED.

"The tongues of dying men Enforce attention like deep harmony."

It is sad, but yet instructive, to linger around the couches of the dying and the dead. There we catch a pang of that sorrow which all are doomed to feel; and there remember that all the hopes and fears of life must be crowded into one short hour! Appalling reflection! and must we die?—must this eye glance feeble and be veiled in death's noiseless slumbers? Must this warm blood seek the heart for the last time, and must this eloquent glow on my cheek fade away in the dimness of the tomb?—And what shall I receive as a recompense for the pang of death?—Are there no pleasant landscapes nor green islands upon which to recline the spirit fainting on Jordan's dark billows? Oh! shall the worm the death sheet, and the senseless earth alone meet me in life to come? Who shall answer? The tomb may not. Six thousand years have borne witness to its silence. But list, O man, "to that divinity which stirs within thee!" Does it tell thee nothing of joys to come? Does it reveal no gleaming of a reviver of life, no echo of angelic song, no harping of redeemed spirits in untroubled realms? Or, rather, does it not tell thee of golden landscapes, elevated and expansive; of lovely temples and burning spirits; of unflaming diamonds, and of a pleasant realm, where no sorrows may come over us like the coldness of Alpine streams?

A WARM CORPSE.—A couple of resurrectionists started for a subject one cold night, in a small covered wagon, and succeeded in finding one—when they had disinterred the body they dressed it up in a frock coat, hat, etc., placed it between them in their wagon, and started for home. The weather being very cold, and coming in sight of a tavern, they concluded to stop and 'take a drink,' which they did, leaving the inanimate companion sitting erect upon his seat, with the horse's reins lying in his lap. The ostler observing three individuals in the wagon when it was driven up, and noticing that but two went into the house, thought he would inquire of the third why he did not follow his companions. So he walked up to the wagon and asked the reason for his remaining behind.

No answer was returned.—After questioning the dumb gentleman some time, he took hold of him, and found that his hand was upon a DEAD MAN! Although terrified at first, his mind soon solved the mystery, he recollected that one of the individuals who was sipping toddy at the bar, was a medical student. 'So,' said the ostler, 'I'll have some fun with these larks.' He hoisted the body from the wagon and carried it into the stable, where he took off his clothes, put them on himself, and then placed himself in the wagon; after a short time the students returned—one of them jumped up beside, as he supposed, his dead man, and in merriment struck him upon his knee, exclaiming 'how would you like some flip, old fellow?' The moment the words had passed his lips, he observed to his companion, in a low and trembling voice, 'Ben, he's warm!' This started Ben, but he recovered his self-possession in a moment, and after reproving his friend for frightening him unnecessarily, stepped up and touched the ostler himself: in an instant, choked with fear, he repeated what his companion had just said, 'He is warm, by Heaven.' 'And so would you be,' replied the ostler, in a measured and ghostly tone 'if you had just been stolen from him, as I have!' The students took to their heels, and never returned to claim their horse or wagon.

NATIONAL CHARACTERISTICS.—The London Morning Post gives three anecdotes in illustration of English, Scotch, and Irish character, as follows:

1. In a crowd, two young women were frightened, and not knowing what they did, save that they sought protection, rushed into the arms of the first two men that were nearest them. The first, an Irishman, clasped the refugee in his arms, and embraced her cordially. The second who was an Englishman, instantly clasped his hands on his pockets to secure their contents.

II. An Irishman and a Scotchman walking in the street, descried behind the counter in a milliner's shop a young woman of singularly attractive appearance. The Irishman proposed to go in and buy a watch riband, in order to have a nearer view of the pretty milliner. The Scotchman said, "Hoot awa' mon, let us gang in and ask two sixpences for a shilling."

III. An Irish and a Scotch regiment advanced together to charge the enemy with the bayonet. The Irish flung away their knapsacks and dashed on pell-mell, shouting like wild Indians as they rushed upon the foe. The Scots quickly and steadily followed on, but as they passed, picked up the knapsacks the Irish had flung away, and fought unflinchingly, while they carried the Irishmen's knapsacks and their own too.

AN EXTRACT.

Go out beneath the arched heavens in night's profound gloom, and say if you can, "There is no God!" Pronounce that dread blasphemy, and each star above you will reproach you for your unbroken darkness of intellect—every voice that floats upon the night winds will bewail your utter hopelessness and despair! Is there no God? Who then, unrolled that blue scroll, and threw upon its high frontispiece the legible gleamings of immortality? Who fashioned this green earth—with its perpetual rolling waters and its wide expanse of island and main? Who settled the foundations of the mountains? Who paved the heavens with clouds, and attuned amid the banners of storms the voice of thunders, and unchained the lightnings that linger and lurk, and flash in their gloom? Who gave to the eagle a safe eyrie where the tempests dwell and beat strongest, and to the dove a tranquil abode amid the forests that ever echo to the minstrelsy of her moan? Who made thee, oh Man? with the perfected elegance of intellect—and of form? Who gave thee that matchless symmetry of sinew and limb? That regular flowing of blood? Those impressive and daring passions of ambition and of love? No God! And yet the thunders of heaven, and the waters of the earth are calm! Is there no lightning that heaven is not avenged? Are there no floods, that man is not swept under a deluge? They remain—but the bow of reconciliation hangs out above and beneath them. And it were better that the limitless waters and the strong mountains were convulsed and commingled together—it were better that the very stars were conflagrated by fire, or shrouded in gloom, than that one soul should be lost, while Mercy kneels and pleads for it beneath the Altar of intercession!

Washington once called upon an elderly lady, whose little grand daughter, at the close of his call, waited on him to the door, and opened it to let him out. The general, with his customary urbanity, thanked her, and, laying his hand gently upon her head, said:—"My dear, I wish you a better office." "Yes sir—to let you in!" was the prompt and beautiful reply.

NOTES ON THE RESURRECTION.....NO. XVII.

BY A RURAL EVANGELIST.

[Concluded.]

Now comes our main question, that which in our introductory we described as "the first point in the doctrine of the resurrection; namely, what the resurrection is." What, then, is the resurrection? Answer, as death is the separation of the mind and body, the resurrection is the investing of the mind with another body. This is manifest from many texts of Scripture, as for example, where Paul says, "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God," etc.; that is, if our present bodily organization were dissolved, we have another. 2 Cor. v: 1. And the manner in which he applies the figure of the resurrection to that "newness of life" for which we should strive in this state of being, shows clearly that the above is a correct definition. "Put off," says he, "the old man—" Put on the new man." Eph. iv: 22, 24. Compare Col. iii: 9, 10, and observe particularly the first words of the chapter, "If then ye be risen," etc.

It may not be amiss to offer some few remarks upon the expressions, "sleep in Jesus," and "the dead in Christ," which expressions occur in 1 Thess. iv: 14, 16. It is plain from 1 Cor. xv: 22, that, without exception, all who die, die in Adam. What then, it may be asked, can be meant by the expressions just quoted? I reply that in the first expression, "in" should be "through," (or "by.") and that the phrase "through Jesus" should be understood as qualifying the verb which follows it, instead of the one that goes before. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so they also which sleep, [that is to say, who have died,] through Jesus will God bring with him." I deem the passage to be parallel with 2 Cor. iv: 14; "Knowing that he which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise us up also by Jesus, and shall present us with you." So in relation to the text, "the dead in Christ shall rise first," it may be that by the phrase "in Christ," Paul intended to describe not the condition of some or all of the dead, but the manner in which they should rise; in which view of the text, it, so far as it reaches, is parallel with that which says, "In Christ shall all be made alive."

But it is not very likely that such a construction of the text in question will be deemed correct, especially by critics. Let it then be observed that the writer has not affirmed its correctness. And if the reader's conclusion must be, that Paul was speaking of the dead's being in Christ, instead of being raised in Christ, then let three things be considered and remembered:

1. "The dead," in Scripture, is a phrase which, as applied to the departed, expresses merely the fact that they have experienced the death of the body; and does not import that they are not alive. See Christ's conversation with the Sadducees, Matt. xxii: Mark xii: Luke xx: considered in Nos. 10, 14, of these articles.

2. Paul teaches expressly that all who die, die in Adam; and moreover, that all shall be made alive in Christ Hence,

3. If the dead, or any of the dead, are in Christ, then certainly they have been made alive, which is equivalent to saying that they are raised.

In some remarks of ours upon 1 Cor. xv: 21, in No. 15 of these articles, we advanced the idea, as a doctrine fairly implied in what the apostle there says, that it is as natural for human beings to rise from the dead, as it is for such beings, to die—again, that "the rising of the dead.....is as much the result of the constitution given us by the Creator as dying is." In certain texts now about to be presented, the language of the apostle seems not only to confirm the correctness of this interpretation, but also to reveal the particular circumstance upon which the said naturalness of rising depends. In 2 Cor. v: 2, 4, the apostle twice speaks of being "clothed upon;" and in 1 Cor. xv: 53, he says, "for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." (The same thing is taught in the next verse also.) This language of the apostle sounds as though it were his doctrine that our present bodies are to be invested with others, as a man puts on an over-coat in addition to his ordinary clothing. But certainly this can not have been his doctrine—he can not have meant to teach that man's corruptible and mortal body, in toto, is to form the interior or nucleus of his resurrection body. Yet we actually are to be clothed upon or superinvested—something that is really corruptible and mortal is to put on incorruption and immortality—and how is this to be understood? The following is "mine opinion" respecting it.

I deem it to have been Paul's intention to teach that the rudiments of an incorruptible and immortal organization are contained in the organization we at present inhabit, like as the rudiments of a future plant are contained in the germ of a seed. And that this was really his idea, appears also from the context of each of the passages. In the one he says, "Not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." In the other he says, "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, 'Death is swallowed up in victory.'" In the first quotation, the swallowing up of mortality is clearly described as the result of being clothed upon; and in the last, the swallowing up of death is declared to be an event that shall happen when this corruptible and mortal shall have put on incorruption and immortality. To be swallowed up is manifestly equivalent to being enveloped in; and as it is something really corruptible and mortal which is to be thus invested or enveloped at the time when we ourselves shall be clothed upon or superinvested, it seems a fair conclusion that the apostle's doctrine is, as we have observed above, that the rudiments of an incorruptible and immortal organization are really contained in our present bodies, and that when we rise from the dead such organization becomes perfected.

The above may not be the proper interpretation of those passages; but I truly can not think of any other so natural as this; or which even makes good sense of the apostle's language; circumstances which with me, of course, possess considerable weight. And surely the fact supposed in such interpretation will not be deemed incredible, it being known that in the body of the creeping caterpillar exist the rudiments of the winged and beautiful butterfly. And if the above interpretation is the true one, those passages furnish an additional argument for the progressiveness of the resurrection; since if the rudiments of our resurrection bodies are really contained in our present ones, it must be much more probable that our future organization will be perfected pretty soon after death, than it is that it will be delayed for perhaps unnumbered ages.

It may be deemed an objection to this theory, that according to it, that which is properly corruptible and mortal composes the rudiments of an organization incorruptible and immortal. The whole force of this remark, as an objection, depends upon the assumption that the rudiments of any organization must necessarily possess the same properties as such organization itself. But this assumption is false. The embryo of a fowl exists in a new laid egg; yet the egg itself is not fowl's flesh. "Large oaks from little acorns grow," the rudiments of an oak tree being contained in an acorn; yet it is by no means the case that the acorn possesses the qualities of oak timber.

It may also be objected that upon this view of the subject our resurrection bodies must be material, whereas the apostle teaches that we are to have "spiritual" bodies. The force of this objection lies in the assumption that that which is spiritual can not be composed of matter, though this were in ever so refined and sublimated a state. To this I answer, that the word spirit has, as we have seen, a great variety of significations; and we could easily show that the word spiritual is not always used in the same sense: it therefore is not positively certain that a spiritual body must necessarily be immaterial. But to come to the point directly and at once, we observe that the Greek term rendered spirit is the one from which comes the English word pneumatics; and, as might easily be conjectured from our use of this word, the Greek pneuma, from which it is derived, imports not only spirit, mind, etc., in a number of senses, but sometimes also denotes wind or air. (It is rendered both wind and spirit in John iii: 8.) Now then, where Paul applies the adjective of pneuma to our resurrection bodies, it would be a strictly literal rendering of the word to translate it aerial. And I deem it not an unreasonable conclusion that he intended to convey thereby the idea of extreme rarity and lightness, such as we endeavor to express by the use of the word ethereal. There is no knowing how exceedingly fine and subtle matter may be in some of the forms which God is able to give it.

The language of Paul in 1 Cor. xv: 42-44, must now receive some attention: "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption;" etc. We remarked in our last number that the apostle does not here say what it is that is sown, or what it is that is raised; the word it being an addition by the translators. This is even so. As an English grammarian would say, the verbs have no nominatives expressed. It is however known from the inflection of the verbs, that their nominatives must be of the third person singular. The insertion of the neuter pronoun as a nominative, turns the passage into nonsense, as "it" seems to stand for the noun preceeding it, which makes the apostle say that "the resurrection of the dead" is sown and raised thus and so. Some supply the word "body;" as, "The body is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption," etc. This I can not receive, because it represents the apostle as teaching that the body which is sown is the same one that is raised; whereas he says expressly, of that with which he compares the unexpressed thing we are in search of, "Thou sowest not that body that shall be." Others think the word "man" should be understood; as "Man is sown.....he is raised," etc. To this I object, because it makes the apostle say what I should think it very unlikely he meant to say, namely, that man is a body; as, "Man is sown a natural [or animal] body; he is raised a spiritual [or ethereal] body."

I conceive that the apostle left those nominatives blank on purpose; and that though we can not now know with what he filled those blanks mentally, we may yet, by due attention to certain circumstances, supply such words as shall give the sense intended. Observe then, he had just been saying to an objector, "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be." This he now uses to illustrate his subject saying, "So also is the resurrection," etc. His having been speaking of sowing grain, was obviously the occasion of his using the verb "is sown;" hence the nominatives to this verb I should copy from his expressions in relation to the grain, only varying their form to make them correspond with a passive instead of an active verb; and to the verb "is raised," I should give nominatives of the same form, but not in precisely the same words, since the apostle teaches plainly enough that that which is sown is not that which is raised. I thus offer the following reading as being at least equivalent to that which the apostle had in his mind: "That which is sown is sown in corruption: that which is raised is raised in incorruption;" and so of the rest. That is, we put off, or relinquish, a corruptible, inglorious, weak, animal body; we put on, in its stead, an incorruptible, glorious, energetic, ethereal body.

It is probably worthy of note also, that in the texts where the putting on of incorruption and immortality is mentioned, the apostle omits to name what it is that is to put them on, since the adjectives "corruptible" and "mortal" are left without a noun expressed. Now that the body is actually corruptible and mortal, no one will be likely to dispute; and some hold the strange idea that this is also the case with the spirit. But I must say that if Paul designed to teach that this corruptible and mortal body is actually to be invested with incorruption and immortality, like a poor perishable mushroom enclosed in a net work of gold, thickly set with the most costly of precious stones; or if he meant to teach that the spirit of man is really corruptible and mortal, and is to be in this manner invested, it truly is passing strange, to me, that he did not say, "this corruptible body," or "this corruptible spirit," according as his doctrine was, and not frame language so needlessly indeterminate. But suppose the apostle's doctrine to be, that the germ of incorruption and immortality, so to speak, does really exist in our present bodily organization; and that this germ, or whatever else it may be called, is in reality that which is raised when it is said, "the dead rise," like as the body is really that which suffers death when it is said, "Man dies"—in that case, it seems natural enough that he should put forth the imperfect expressions, "This corruptible * * *" and suffering in the feeling and pathetic prayer, saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Well might the veil be rent, and the sun be darkened! The fatal deed was done, and the prophecies fulfilled. No longer did the glorious intercessor writhe in pain and anguish from the cruelty of his unfeeling enemies. The moral world was shook to its very centre. From this memorable event, arose the spirit of universal love and grace. The first drop of innocent blood which gushed from his bleeding wounds sealed the truth of life and immortality, which he came to establish, and which had long been foretold by all God's holy prophets. All power in heaven and in earth being given him, he burst the bars of death and rose triumphant from the gloomy tomb to consummate the grand and glorious object of his mission; and to his few and humble disciples, he gave the emphatic command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." Oh! what an object of love and admiration is here presented for sinful erring man, in the life and character of Jesus Christ, and his Gospel. In his death he exhibited the perfection of divine love, in his resurrection he robbed death of its sting and the grave of its victory, and in his precepts and examples, we behold a religion and a morality which is alike suited to every station and condition in life. The stately king seated on his throne, and the humble plebeian clad in wretchedness and rags, are alike the objects of his benevolence and love, and will not fail to find a "balm for every wound, and a cordial for every fear."

"A MERRY CHRISTMAS TO YOU ALL!"

This day closes the present volume—the tenth I have aided in editing and publishing—and custom and inclination combine in urging me to offer a few general remarks on the occasion. Few and brief they must be, for we have but half our usual space this week, and much to crowd into it.

The birth of Jesus of Nazareth—what a seemingly trifling event in itself, yet how wonderfully extensive and increasingly important in its effects and results. But eighteen centuries ago, and in a stable on the outskirts of a crowded city, a Jewish babe was born. Helpless and weak in body and in mind—dependent on a mother's unwearied and all-supplying affection, it lay in its stall-cradle, and closed in sleep the eyes that had just opened on the world around it. A moment of brute force—y'en, a day's neglect, and those eyes would have closed in a sleep that never had known earthly waking. Yet that babe was to become, and in view of its entire mission already is, "the Saviour of the world." That spark, so minute as to be scarcely visible in the all-surrounding darkness of that period—so feeble in its glimmering as to be unseen, except by those who were near around it—has spread, and increased, and risen higher and higher, until it is known and felt to be the Sun of Righteousness, with healing in its every beam. And from the past, we gather confidence in the prophetic declarations which assure us that its beams shall spread and spread, gathering power and influence with every new increase, until all darkness shall be dissipated by its light, all coldness by its warmth—till the radiance-filled heavens reflect back the rays of its glory, and the earth, illumined by its light, repays the reflection with the bursting hallelujahs of its sin-ransomed myriads! Is there a heart that loves human kind, and can not rejoice in such a transporting view as this? Is there a soul that reverences God, and does not more fervently adore its Father's glory thus displayed in the Gospel? Yet, reader, this is UNIVERSALISM, that despised and dreaded doctrine, which is supposed to be so pernicious to the better affections of the soul—so destructive to all piety and religious feeling!

The year is closing—desolated nature around us, speaks of death—the grave—eternity. The sobered mind looks back through the vista of memory, and beholds the past filled with wrecked hopes, blasted prospects, perished pleasures, and memorials of the fondly loved and highly prized who are wandering far from our personal communion, or have gone to their final "home." True, hopes as bright, prospects as cheering, pleasures as gay, and friends as loved and valued are around us now—but even as we write, the bubbles burst as they rise to the surface—the wreaths vanish in to viewless air, the flowers fade and the perfumes fail, and the hectic flush on the cheeks and the dewy fire in the eyes of our fairest friend, tell us that the blessings of earth are brightening for their final flight! Oh, earth—earth—how changeable, how brief are thy joys and blessings! Is it any wonder that we feel the clouds of Autumn and the desolation of Winter enter our souls and hang them around with solemn and weighty drapery?

But, hark! Who talks of darkness and despair? There is the festival, and gay hearts and bright eyes surround the board, and warm wishes roll from every lip as the heart gushes out its affection and good will. The themes are of the season—of the shortness of life, the certainty of death, and the endlessness of eternity. Strange! that joy and cheerfulness can be found where themes like these are discoursed of, and by those who seem to love happiness and shun misery. But mingled with their discourse, are the name of Jesus of Nazareth and the subjects of the Gospel he proclaimed—the Paternity of God, the resurrection of the dead, and the salvation of all the lost! No wonder, then, that joy reigns on the anniversary of Christ's birth—that the season of deepest gloom, and when Winter's desolation seems most dreary by contrast with the glories of just departed Autumn, should also be one of gladness and rejoicing—that hope springs exulting from the grave of the dying year, and man triumphs in approaching immortality as he bends before the stroke of death! No wonder—for Jesus has been born! Reader, dear reader—for our feelings grow tenderly alive to your worthiness of our love as we think of these things—dear reader, "A merry Christmas to you—TO THE WORLD!"

A PROPOSAL TO THE MEMBERS OF THE UNIVERSALIST MINISTRY.

It seems by the judgment of many of our ministering brethren, that the Universalist denomination has not a sufficient number of papers in its ranks. We come to this conclusion, from the circumstance, that so many newspapers are continually springing up among us, and as continually dropping out of existence. The history of many of these papers is that of the mushroom—life and death in a night. But this fact, it appears, is of no consequence—we still want more papers; we have not half enough—so say the actions of many preachers—and if we judge the tree by its fruits, we judge righteous judgment. Now, in order to obviate this want of papers in the denomination, the following proposal is offered for the consideration of the members of the Universalist ministry. Let each preacher, no matter how small his society or how few brethren there may be in his neighborhood; no matter whether there is more than one preacher, or society, or paper in the town in which he labors—let each preacher immediately commence a paper in his society with the determination to carry it on as long as possible. This plan will give to the denomination about five hundred papers, which, no doubt, will shower blessings upon us. Among those blessings we enumerate the following—

1. You will have the great satisfaction of enfeebling and materially decreasing the support of those veteran papers of the order, who have for years struggled for the common good, through every discouragement—and the satisfaction will be heightened by the fact, that most of their publishers, who have kept along under every difficulty, will have their difficulties increased and their hopes crushed down by debts and a diminished patronage. 2. You will have the satisfaction of getting very deeply into debt in a few years; of debt, which, in most cases, you can never liquidate. 3. Under such circumstances, you will have the pleasant reflection, of knowing that you have had the use of other men's property and money; that you can never pay them; that they hate you; and that your influence, as a preacher, is materially lessened. 4. Or if you have property and can pay for a few years, for your paper, you will have the satisfaction of losing it all, and discovering that your paper must stop. 5. You will have the consciousness of having given our opposers some apparent reason to harp on the old string, that our cause is running down, because its papers are not supported. These are among the blessings of such a course. More might be pointed out; but these are undoubtedly sufficient to induce you to enter into the proposed plan.

ANOTHER CRUMB FOR BR. BEEBEE.

The Conference of the Cayuga Association, which was held in McLean on the 21st and 22d of October, met in the Baptist Meeting House in that village. It was opened to us, with Christian kindness and without a hesitating voice, for which its owners had the warm thanks of the Conference. The object of noticing this fact, is twofold.—1. To show Br. Beebee, that there is another instance, in which his Baptist brethren have been liberal and accommodating, added to that which occurred in Auburn. 2. To make our acknowledgements to the Baptist denomination, for the many and repeated cases of granting the Universalists the use of their Meeting Houses in various parts of the country, on particular occasions. And we have no doubt that they will continue to exercise this neighborly conduct, even though it should grieve the very bigoted and exclusive feelings of Br. Beebee.

LETTER FROM BR. TORREY.

Pittsburg, Nov. 23d, 1840.

BROTHER GROSH.—With reluctance I have taken my pen to write you a melancholy fact. The Universalist Society in the city of Pittsburg, is dead. My forebodings have been realized. Some of the causes which contributed to hasten its downfall, I mentioned in my last letter; in addition to those previously noticed, I will merely state, that, during the suppression of business, three or four of our most worthy members became involved in the general bankruptcy. And, also, that fifteen or twenty of our most zealous friends had left the city within the past year. These things, together with the hard times, operated against us, and we were necessitated to "hasten unto death." I must say that Brs. Hull, Young, and Frisbee, were zealous in the good cause, and held out to the end, but it is sad to think that they have labored in vain.

I have now been here three months, ardently engaged in the cause of my Master; I have labored with energy and zeal; and like those of old I have cried in all the earnestness of my soul, "Lord, save us, we perish." But, the Lord was not pleased to smile upon us, and the result shows that we could do nothing of ourselves.

It was a long time before I could be convinced that "Ephraim was joined to his idols," and that it was best to "let him alone." But after a deliberate consultation of the friends, we came to the conclusion that all further exertion would prove fruitless and unavailing; and therefore we closed our meetings on last evening. The religion of this city is mostly of a temporal nature. The inhabitants are all business men, and will make hypocritical professions, and sacrifice honest principle, for the supposed promotion of their pecuniary interests. This is a miserable state of society; but such is the case in Pittsburg. We pray that the Lord may not forsake and leave them forever, but that in his own time, he may enlighten their minds, bring them into a knowledge of the truth, that they may be enabled to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

Your brother in truth, H. TORREY.

N. B. Br. H. Torrey requests all papers, letters etc., intended for him, directed to Ravenna, Ohio, until further notice is given in this paper.

RELIGIOUS PROPRIETY.

Let a religious spirit divested of superstition, be infused into the minds of the people, and Christianity will then exhibit its true position in the world, and it will be seen that from such a spirit virtue and good will must necessarily flow. From the general prevalence of superstition, and intolerance, and religious perversion, most corruptions in conduct have proceeded. There is much true philosophy in the suggestion—"clean fish swim in clear water." So does the reign of a pure spirit give birth to all that is amiable, lovely and good. Wherever it reigns it will render itself visible in a variety of ways, and will be quickly discovered by all around. But take an outline of the opposite, and see the distinct contrast. Jesus says, Not what is taken in but what proceedeth from the mouth, this corrupteth the man. And yet corrupt manners, and ridiculous epithets are of too general usage among most classes of the day. Almost as common, is a concealed way of countenancing vice without openly practicing it. I have known many professors of religion to proceed wholly on this principle. They wish not to be considered friendly to vice, and yet they fear to offend its votaries. So from a divided regard to both they adopt a middle course, by which they appear equally friendly to both vice and virtue; and when in the retreats of their society both will understand them to be their friends. Here is discovered a corrupted taste—an odious spirit—unlike that decided principle of purity, which is ready to condemn whatsoever is evil, and justify whatsoever is good. Religious purity, in its influence over men, will be like the leaven which was put in meal until the whole was leavened. As darkness recedes before the rays of the sun, so will immoral dispositions give way to the reign of heaven in the bosoms of men.

Affection.—A man with two wooden legs complaining of "cold feet"—or a block-head complaining of the "head ache."

THE SEASONS. In a poem, written by a German who died in 1791.

In fair Spring's fresh budding hours,
What adorns our garden bowers?
Little flowers.

When departing Spring we mourn,
What is shed from summer's corn?
Hay and corn.

What is Autumn's bounteous sign,
Mark of Providence divine?
Fruit and wine.

When old Winter, hobbling slow,
Comes, what do we gain, d'ye know?
Ice and snow.

Hay and corn, and little flowers,
Ice, snow, fruit and wine are ours,
Given to us every year,
By Spring, Summer, Autumn, Winter.
As they each in turn appear.

Spring gives treasure, Summer pleasure,
Autumn gladdens, Winter saddens,
Spring revives, Summer thrives,
Autumn pleases, Winter freezes.
Therefore friends, we all have reason
To extol each coming season,
Spring and Summer, Autumn, Winter.
Honor, counsel, deeds sublime,
Are the precious gifts of time.

DEATHS.

In Salisbury, November 13th, CLOTILDA daughter of Newman and Mary Smith, aged 5 years lacking 3 days. The deceased came to her death by her clothes accidentally taking fire when her parents were out of the room, and before assistance could be obtained the little sufferer was so seriously burned as to survive but a short time. The day following, the body was conveyed to the tomb, and the tear of affection shed round the same. We trust that her pains are now over, and that her spirit now blooms in eternal youth.

"Dearest sister thou hast left us,
Here thy loss we deeply feel,
But 'tis God that hath bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal."

A Sermon was delivered on the occasion in the Centre Meeting house, founded on Mark x: 14, by the writer.
J. D. HICKS.

In Russia, December 10th, of Consumption, Maj. HENRY S. TODD, in the 36th year of his age. The deceased was one of the most worthy and estimable citizens of the town in which he lived; universally respected and beloved by all who knew him. He was a devout and exemplary believer of the final blessedness and happiness of all mankind, a Trustee of the Universalist Society in Russia at the time of his death, and manifested through life, through sickness and in death, the purifying, consoling and happy power of the blessed doctrine in which he believed. He has left a wife, two children, and a numerous circle of relatives and friends to mourn his early departure from his active and useful sphere of life. His funeral was attended at the church in Russia on the Sabbath following by a numerous concourse of sincere mourners—for all who knew him, mourned his loss—and a discourse delivered on the occasion from 2 Samuel xiv; 14.

He died as he had lived, a Universalist. His funeral was attended on the 25th, at the Presbyterian church. Sermon by the writer.

In Hamilton Village, after a short illness, December 11th, Mr. JOHN HAUGHTON, aged 52 years. In this dispensation of divine Providence, the widow is called to mourn the loss of a kind and provident husband, the children a tender and affectionate parent, the other relatives and neighbors an enterprising and worthy citizen. May all who mourn his death find present and abiding consolation and peace in the Gospel of Christ.

In same place, November 19th, JOHN FREEMAN, youngest Son of Mr. John Martin, aged 6 years. "Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven."
